" The other thing he mentions in the concluſion of the dialogue, namely, the utility of philoſophy, does alſo belong to the ſubject; for it was very proper, after having philoſophized ſo much, to ſhow that it was not to no purpoſe, but on the contrary, of the higheſt uſe. This he proves, not by a continued diſcourſe, as he proves other things, but by cloſe pungent interrogations and anſwers, which, at the ſame time that they are moſt convincing, make a beautiful variety in the ſtile; and he concludes the whole by ſhowing, that, in fact, all men do philoſophize right or wrong; for they deliberate about what is uſeful or hurtful, what contributes to their happineſs or not; and, even if they ſhould determine not to deliberate at all, but to follow every fancy or conceit that is uppermoſt, ſtill that will be in ſome ſort to philoſophize.

" Thus I have analyzed this moſt beautiful piece; ſo beautiful in its ſtile and compoſition, that it ſhews the author well qualified to write upon the Beautiful, which indeed is the chief ſubject of the piece. I will conclude with ſome general obſervations upon it.

" And, in the firſt place, as the principal thing, according to Ariſtotle, in every dramatical piece, ſuch as I hold this to be, is the fable, that principal part in the Moraliſts is, I think, admirable: for, at the ſame time that there is a perfect unity in it, there is a greater variety of characters and incidents, than in any dialogue of Plato, and more than even in Cicero's dialogue De Oratore, where the two days are not near ſo well filled up as the three days of the Moraliſts; and there are ſeveral changes of the ſcene, beſides the introduction of new perſonages, which I think are very agreeable. It is therefore a fable of the kind which Ariſtotle calls complex; and which, if the unity of the action is preſerved, he prefers to the ſimple.

" The ſtile is ſuch as might be expected from a thorough well bred Gentleman, well acquainted with life and manners, at the ſame time an accompliſhed ſcholar, and who in his travels had acquired a very high taſte for the fine arts, as appears from many paſſages of his writings. The ſtile of ſuch a writer muſt needs be copious and rich in all the ornaments which the knowledge of mythology, antient hiſtory, and the fine arts can furniſh. His ſtile is too luxuriant, as I have obſerved elſewhere, in ſome other of his writings; but I think it is chaſte and ſober enough in this piece. The ſtile of the Rhapſodies of Theocles, is, as I have obſerved, very uncommon, excellent however of the kind, but very different, as it ought to be, from that of the dialogue, which is eaſy and natural, and a very good imitation of the converſation of Gentlemen upon learned ſubjects: and it has that politeneſs, which I have commended ſo much in Cicero's dialogue, particularly in what is ſaid by the two principal perſonages Theocles and Philocles, and which has a contraſt in Shafteſbury, that is not to be found in Cicero; I mean the roughneſs and ill-breeding of the old Gentleman.

" As to the philoſophy of this work, though it do not belong to the ſubject of this volume, I cannot help making ſome obſervations upon it. It is plainly a ſupplement, as the author has told us, to the Inquiry concerning Virtue; and he has in it carried the philoſophy of morals to theology, and, I think, the moſt ſublime theology that is to be found in Engliſh: and he has very properly connected the doctrine of morals, that is, the knowledge of ourſelves, with theology; for, as I have obſerved elſewhere, we can know nothing of Divinity, without firſt knowing ourſelves. He has therefore founded morality and theology upon the ſame principle, namely, that the beautiful and good are one and the ſame thing; and that what is beautiful and good in the characters of men, is beautiful and good, but in an infinitely higher degree, in the Divinity. This propoſition therefore, that the beautiful and the good are the ſame, and which is a fundamental propoſition in this treatiſe, I hold to be the baſis ſerving of any great applauſe. It is written, on the whole, in a deſultory manner; and there are in it many exceptionable paſſages, eſpecially with reſpect to revelation. The ingenious author of "Pompey the Little," in one of his introductory chapters, has humorouſly reckoned the "Miſcellaneous Reflections" among the nothings.

Lord Shafteſbury's advocates have taken great pains to ſhew the connection that ſubſiſts between his different works: and that we may do full juſtice to his Lordſhip upon this head, we ſhall tranſcribe what has been advanced by the writer of his life in the General Dictionary [M]. That there is a connection between our noble author's treatiſes, and baſis both of morality and theology, though it be not ſo laid down in any treatiſe of morality in modern times, nor explicitly in any antient work, as far as I know, upon that ſubject.

"And, as beauty is the object of love, without which, as I have obſerved, love cannot be conceived, I find a wonderful agreement betwixt the philoſophy of my Lord Shafteſbury upon this ſubject and the doctrine of our holy religion. The firſt and fundamental precept of the law, as our Saviour tells us, was 'to love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, 'and with all thy ſoul, and with all thy ſtrength, 'and with all thy mind, and thy neighbour as thy-'ſelf.'—Again, our Saviour ſays to his Diſciples, 'a new commandment I give unto you, that ye love 'one another.'—'By this ſhall all men know, that ye 'are my Diſciples, if ye have love one to another.' And St. Paul, in that remarkable paſſage in I. Corinthians chap. 13, where he commends love, makes it the eſſential duty of every Chriſtian, without which nothing that he can do, neither propheſying, underſtanding myſteries, nor working miracles, nor even martyrdom, will ſignify any thing.

"From this principle of beauty, which he has made the foundation, as we have ſeen, both of virtue and religion, Shafteſbury has deduced a demonſtration of the Being, as well as the Attributes of God, better, I think, than what is to be found in any modern book: for he has proved, from the order, regularity, and beauty we ſee in all the works of Nature above, below, and round about us, that Supreme Intelligence governs in the univerſe; and, as there can be no beauty without an unity of deſign, and as ſuch unity appears to be in every particular work of Nature, and in the whole, as far as falls under our obſervation, he from thence very juſtly, I think, infers that there is but one Supreme Intelligence (13)."

(13) Origin and Progreſs of Language, vol. iv. p. 344—371.

[M] What has been advanced by the writer of his life in the General Dictionary.]

"With regard to the Characteriſtics, as they ſtand here methodiſed, it is to be obſerved that the ſeveral pieces, which compoſe them, are not only perfectly finiſhed in themſelves, according to the nature and genius of that ſpecies of writings to which each belongs, but that all together they form a complete whole, whoſe parts have a certain order and relation to each other, and which cannot be inverted without the whole's being injured.

"Such a dependency and connexion of the ſeveral joint tracts, is what the author himſelf in many places hints at. See vol. iii. p. 135. 189, 190. 284, 285, &c. Particularly vol. iii. p. 190, he ſays, that in this joint edition it will appear, that the three former treatiſes are preparatory to the fourth, and the fifth a kind of apology for this revived treatiſe concerning virtue and religion.

"Indeed, as he had a peculiar ſyſtem, as well of Divinity as of Ethics, and had many things to advance, to which the ears of mankind had been little accuſtomed, it was neceſſary before he aſſumed the formal ſyſtematic and didactic character, that he ſhould firſt appear in the preparatory, the corrective, or refutative.

Sincerum eſt niſi vas, &c.

To this preparatory therefore or refutative method may be referred the treatiſes of his firſt volume. And though in general they may be all three ſaid to attack the follies, vices, and falſe taſte of mankind, and ſo prepare the mind for the better doctrine it was to receive from the two following; yet each piece in particular ſeems to have a peculiar end of its own.

"The letter concerning Enthuſiaſm for inſtance, is more immediately levelled againſt the primary and moſt capital enemy of all true philoſophy, and liberal ſentiment, ſuperſtition. The cauſes of this evil are here accurately inquired into, and its ſources traced to a natural paſſion, which if properly managed and turned upon its proper objects, is ſhewn to be productive of whatever is moſt amiable. This paſſion we are told is no other than enthuſiaſm, concerning the nature and riſe of which he informs us (vol. iii. p. 20) that there is a power in numbers, harmony, proportion, and beauty of every kind, which naturally captivates the heart, and raiſes the imagination to the opinion or conceit of ſomething majeſtic and divine. He adds in another place, (vol. iii. p. 37.) that in itſelf this is a very natural and honeſt paſſion, and has properly nothing for its object, but what is good and honeſt. It is apt however, he confeſſes, to run aſtray. And by modern examples, ſays he, we know perhaps yet better than by any antient, that in religion the enthuſiaſm, which works by love, is ſubject to many ſtrange irregularities; and that which works by fear, to many monſtrous and horrible ſuperſtitions. Theſe then are thoſe exceſſes of it, which he here profeſſes to encounter, and againſt which he makes no ſmall uſe of the weapons of wit and ridicule.

"It was this manner of attack, as well as a conſtant purſuit of it through his following pieces, which made it neceſſary that in his ſecond treatiſe he ſhould accommodate his reader to that free, eaſy, and humorous method, to that ſpirit of mirth and wit, and raillery, which he uſes ſo freely upon occaſions and ſubjects, where the uſual ſtyle had been only the moſt grave and magiſterial. As the method indeed was new, ſo it well wanted an apology. But of this ſee above remark [H] upon the eſſay, &c.

"The third treatiſe called Soliloquy, or Advice to an Author, beſides a great ſhare of ſubjects in common with the treatiſes abovementioned, has ſtill ſomething farther which is peculiar to its ſelf. As the philoſophy he had to exhibit, was calculated not only to furniſh the head, but to mend the heart; as it was to correct thoſe fancies and opinions, which are the ſprings of all our actions, for this reaſon it was abſolutely neceſſary that the reader ſhould be taught to turn his eye inward, and ſhewn how to recognize within himſelf the order as well as diſorder, the œconomy as well as confuſion of his own paſſions, appetites, imaginations and ſentiments. This, in the judgment of this author, was the only means, by which a man might come to be ſenſible (vol. iii. p. 147) who or what he is; whence he aroſe or had his being; to what end he was deſigned; and to what courſe of action he is by his own natural frame and conſtitution deſtined. And (to uſe the words of vol. ii. p. 285) as we have more or leſs of this intelligence or comprehenſion of ourſelves, ſo this author held that we were accordingly more or leſs truly men, and either more or leſs to be depended on in friendſhip, ſociety, and the commerce of life. To aſſiſt therefore in this important buſineſs of ſelf-converſe and examination, appears to have been the principal purpoſe and deſign of the ſoliloquy.

"And now if we may ſuppoſe by the force of theſe previous treatiſes the dark and ſuſpicious apprehenſions of ſuperſtition to have been diſſipated; the freedom of wit and humour to have been juſtified and eſtabliſhed; and the method of ſelf-converſe and inſpection to be made intelligible; we may well conſider the preparatory part of his philoſophy to have been diſcharged, and no obſtacle left unremoved, which might prevent paſſing to the didactic part or preceptive.

and that it was intended by himſelf, cannot be denied; but whether that connection be ſo accurate and cloſe as is repreſented below, may juſtly be called in queſtion. Perhaps the "Letter concerning Enthuſiaſm" and the "Eſſay on the Freedom of Wit and Humour" might have been ſpared without any loſs to the moſt valuable part of his Lordſhip's deſign; and the ſame may be ſaid of the "Miſcellaneous Reflections." The "Advice to an "Author" may be conſidered as in ſome degree preparatory to the "Inquiry concerning "Virtue;" and between the "Inquiry concerning Virtue" and the "Moraliſts" there is a real and apparent union. This union has been fully inſiſted upon, and well diſplayed, in the laſt of the works now mentioned (z). The "Hiſtorical Draught or Tablature of the "Judgment of Hercules" and the "Letter concerning the Art, or Science of Deſign," are two adventitious pieces, which have been annexed to the "Characteriſtics" ever ſince the edition of 1713. With reſpect to theſe pieces it may be ſufficient to obſerve, that they afford ſpecimens of the noble Writer's love for the fine Arts, and of that degree of taſte in them to which he had arrived.

(z) Characteriſtics, vol. ii. p. 263—290.

On the whole of the Earl of Shafteſbury's character as an author, much has been ſaid to his praiſe, and much to his diſadvantage. Mr. Bulkley and others have beſtowed upon him the higheſt commendations. With theſe perſons muſt be joined Lord Monboddo, who, ſpeaking of the Rhapſodiſt in particular, is not afraid to pronounce it not only the beſt dialogue in Engliſh, out of all degree of compariſon, but the ſublimeſt Philoſophy, and if we will join with it the Inquiry—the completeſt ſyſtem both of Morality and Theology, that we have in our language, and, at the ſame time, of the greateſt beauty and elegance for the ſtile and compoſition. "Whatever may be ſaid," continues our learned Grammarian, "againſt the other writings of Lord Shafteſbury, I never heard any ſerious objection "made againſt this piece of his, though I know Mr. Pope has endeavoured to ridicule "the rapturous Viſions of Theocles. And I know very well that in my younger days, "that is, about fifty years ago, all his writings, and particularly his Rhapſody, were much "eſteemed. But I do not know how it has happened, none of his writings at preſent "appear to be in any eſtimation. I ſhould wonder the more at this, if I did not know "ſome other fine writings that appear to be forgot in much leſs time; ſuch as the Art of "Health by Dr. Armſtrong, as fine a didactic Poem as in any language, and for diction "and verſification not exceeded by any thing in Engliſh: and the Caſtle of Indolence, "written by his friend Mr. Thomſon, is the beſt allegorical and deſcriptive poem that "I know in any language, and the richeſt and beſt rhyming verſification, for ſo long a "work, that is to be found in Engliſh. As to my Lord Shafteſbury's works, they are "now ſo much out of faſhion, that I have no doubt that I ſhall give offence to ſeveral "readers, by endeavouring to bring them again into vogue. But I do not write to "flatter the prejudices of any man, or ſet of men, but to do juſtice to all authors, both "ancient and modern, dead or living, as far as I am able. The faults of Lord Shafteſ-"bury I have cenſured pretty freely elſewhere, and particularly the too great freedom "which he has uſed with religion upon ſome occaſions, to which he appears to have been "provoked by the arrogance and high ſtile of authority which was aſſumed by ſome "Churchmen of thoſe days. But in this work, at the ſame time that he has eſtabliſhed "the truth of natural Religion, better than any other writer in Engliſh, there is not a "word in the whole work that carries the leaſt inſinuation againſt the Chriſtian Religion; "but on the contrary, he makes Palæmon, in the end of the ſecond Section of the firſt "Part, ſpeak of Chriſtianity in the moſt reſpectful terms. And what have we got to put "down ſuch a writer as Lord Shafteſbury? Writings, which for the honour of the nation "ought not to be mentioned.——I would have thoſe writers of the day, who affect to de-"ſpiſe ſuch a writer as Lord Shafteſbury, try to produce a dialogue like the Moraliſts; or "if they ſay that they have not time or leiſure to compoſe a work of ſuch length, (for I am "ſure they will not think that they want genius or learning) let them try to write but a "Letter of ſuch elegance and ſtile, and politeneſs of compliment, as the Letter on "Enthuſiaſm (a)."

(a) Origin and Progreſs of Language, vol. iv. p. 383—388.

Several of the authors who have diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their direct oppoſition to many of the ſentiments which occur in the Characteriſtics, have, nevertheleſs, mixed no ſmall degree of applauſe with their cenſures. "I have again peruſed, with freſh pleaſure, "and freſh concern," ſays Mr. Balguy, in his Letter to a Deiſt, "the volumes of Cha-

"To this therefore we arrive in his ſecond volume, where, as he confeſſes himſelf (vol. iii. p. 187) the reader is about to ſee him in a new aſpect, a formal and profeſſed Philoſopher, a ſyſtem-writer, a dogmatiſt, and expounder. Here then we have his real ſentiments, his philoſophy and ſyſtem. Here is the completion of that, to which his former treatiſes were but preparatives, and to which they are conſidered as being wholly made ſubſervient, like thoſe drugs and medicines, which Phyſicians often adminiſter, only to prepare the body for that ſubſequent regimen, from which alone it is to expect a ſound and healthful eſtabliſhment.

"As to the third volume (excepting the two laſt ſmall treatiſes, which are independent and foreign) it is, what its name declares, a number of miſcellaneous reflections upon the whole; a ſort of defence and explanation of what had gone before; a comment, in which not only the ſcope and genius of his philoſophy, but the nature, ſpecies, conduct, and deſign of each particular treatiſe are examined and criticiſed with the greateſt wit and accuracy (14)."

(14) Gen. Dict. ubi ſupra, p. 183, 184. note [A].

"racteriſtics

" racteriſtics—I heartily wiſh the noble author had been as unprejudiced in writing, as I " was in reading. If he had, I am perſuaded his readers would have found double plea- " ſure and double inſtruction. It ſeems to me, that his Lordſhip had little or no temp- " tation to purſue any ſingularities of opinion by way of diſtinction. His fine genius " would ſufficiently have diſtinguiſhed him from vulgar authors, in the high road of truth " and good ſenſe; on which account his deviations ſeem the more to be lamented. The " purity and politeneſs of his ſtile, and the delicacy of his ſentiments, are, and muſt be " acknowledged by all readers of taſte and ſincerity. But nevertheleſs, as his beauties " are not eaſy to be overlooked, ſo neither are his blemiſhes. His works appear to be " ſtained with ſo many groſs errors, and his fine thoughts are ſo often mingled with " abſurdities, that however we may be charmed with the one, we are forced to condemn " the other." Mr. Balguy hath farther obſerved, with regard to the " Inquiry concern- " ing Virtue," which is the immediate object of his animadverſion, that though he cannot agree in every particular contained in it, he finds little more to do than to tell how much he admires it; and that he thinks it indeed, in the main, a performance ſo juſt and exact, as to deſerve higher praiſes than he is able to give it (b).

(b) Balguy's Tracts, p. 1—4.

Dr. Brown's encomium on the " Advice to an Author," we have already mentioned. But with regard to the Characteriſtics in general, his commendations are more reſtricted; for he obſerves, that the Earl of Shafteſbury hath mingled beauties and blots, faults and excellencies, with a liberal and unſparing hand. At the ſame time, the Doctor applauds that generous ſpirit of freedom which ſhines throughout the whole. " The noble author," ſays he, " every where aſſerts that natural privilege of man, which hath been ſo often " denied him, of ſeeing with his own eyes, and judging by his own reaſon. It may poſ- " ſibly appear ſtrange to ſome, why he ſhould ſo extremely labour a point ſo plain. But " in juſtice to his Lordſhip, theſe Gentlemen muſt remember, or be informed, that in for- " mer times, ſome well-deſigning men among ourſelves, from a groundleſs dread of the " unlimited freedom of the preſs, attempted to make the moſt unnatural and cruel ſepa- " ration between truth and liberty. Having ſhaken off the corruptions of Popery, and " eſtabliſhed what they thought a pure and perfect ſyſtem, they unhappily ſtopped ſhort " in their full career of glory; prepoſterouſly attempting to deprive others of that com- " mon privilege which they had nobly exerciſed themſelves. This miſtaken ſpirit ſeemed " entirely ſubdued by the excellent LOCKE and others, about the time of the Revolution. " But at the period when our noble author wrote, it not only revived, but was heightened " by a terrible acceſſion of bitterneſs and rancour. Hence thoſe frequent ſallies of invec- " tive which he throws out againſt thoſe intolerant principles, which he juſtly ſtigmatizeth as " equally impolitic, irrational, and unchriſtian.—It will ever be our trueſt praiſe therefore, " to join the noble apologiſt in his encomiums on freedom; the only permanent baſis " on which religion and virtue can be eſtabliſhed. Nor can we leſs approve his frequent " recommendations of politeneſs, chearfulneſs, and good humour, in the proſecution of " our moſt important inquiries. The moroſe, contemptuous, and ſurly ſpecies of compo- " ſition is generally an appendage to bigotry, as appears in inſtances innumerable, both " among the miſtaken friends and enemies of religion. On the contrary, the amiable " qualities of chearfulneſs and good-humour caſt a kind of ſun-ſhine over a compoſition, " and naturally engage us in favour of the writer. They reſemble that gentle ſmile that " often lights up the human countenance, the never-failing indication of a humane temper. " How naturally then muſt we be diſpoſed to liſten; how open our minds to receive convic- " tion, when we perceive our opponent's intention is benevolent? When we perceive " that his aim is not victory but information: that he means not to inſult but to inſtruct " us (c)!"

(c) Eſſays on the Characteriſtics, p. 2, 3. 5, 6.

Another direct antagoniſt of the Earl of Shafteſbury, Dr. Leland, has obſerved, that no impartial man will deny him the praiſe of a fine genius. " The quality of the writer," continues the Doctor, " his lively and beautiful imagination, the delicacy of taſte he hath " ſhewn in many inſtances, and the graces and embelliſhments of his ſtile, though perhaps " ſometimes too affected, have procured him many admirers. To which may be added " his refined ſentiments on the beauty and excellency of virtue, and that he hath often " ſpoken honourably of a juſt and good Providence, which miniſters and governs the " whole in the beſt manner; and hath ſtrongly aſſerted, in oppoſition to Mr. Hobbes, the " natural difference between good and evil; and that man was originally formed for " ſociety, and the exerciſe of mutual kindneſs and benevolence; and not only ſo, but for " religion and piety too. Theſe things have very much prejudiced many perſons in his " favour, and prepared them for receiving, almoſt implicitly, whatever he hath " advanced (d)."

(d) View of the Principal Deiſtical Writers, vol. i. p. 49. fourth edit.

There are writers, and thoſe too of no mean name, who have ſpoken concerning Lord Shafteſbury as an author, in the language of general contempt and indignation. In this number we are ſorry to reckon the admirable Jortin; who in the caſe before us, has, we think, departed from that candour of expreſſion, which might have been expected from a man of ſo liberal a mind. He calls his Lordſhip a conceited, fantaſtical, and half-learned writer (e). The eminent Poet Gray is not leſs ſevere. " You ſay," addreſſing himſelf to Mr. Stonehewer) " you cannot conceive how Lord Shafteſbury came to be a Philoſo-

(e) Britiſh Biog. vol. vii. p. 445.

" pher in vogue; I will tell you. Firſt, he was a Lord; ſecondly, he was as vain as any " of his readers; thirdly, men are very prone to believe what they do not underſtand;
" fourthly, they will believe any thing at all, provided they are under no obligation to be" lieve it; fifthly, they love to take a new road, when that road leads no where; ſixthly,
" he was reckoned a fine writer, and ſeemed always to mean more than he ſaid. Would
" you have any more reaſons? An interval of above forty years has pretty well deſtroyed
" the charm. A dead Lord ranks but with Commoners: vanity is no longer in the matter,
" for the new road is become an old one. The mode of freethinking is like that of " ruffs and farthingales, and has given place to the mode of not thinking at all. Once
" it was reckoned graceful, half to diſcover and half conceal the mind; but now we have " been long accuſtomed to ſee it quite naked. Primneſs and affectation of ſtile, like the " good breeding of Queen Anne's court, has turned to hoydening and rude famili" arity (f)."

(f) Maſon's Memoirs of the Life of Mr. Gray, p. 263, 264.

Dr. Johnſon, as we are informed by Sir John Hawkins, bore no good-will to Lord Shafteſbury; " neither did he ſeem at all to reliſh the cant of the Shafteſburian School,
" nor inclined to admit the pretenſions of thoſe who profeſſed it, to taſtes and perceptions
" which are not common to all men; a taſte in morals, in poetry, and proſe writing, in " painting, in ſculpture, in muſic, in architecture, and in government! A taſte that cen-
" ſured every production, and induced them to reprobate every effort of genius that fell
" ſhort of their own capricious ſtandard (g)."

(g) Life of Dr. Samuel Johnſon, p. 255.

The grand point in which our noble Author has rendered himſelf juſtly obnoxious to the friends of religion, is his having interſperſed through the Characteriſtics a number of inſinuations that appear to be unfavourable to the cauſe of Revelation. There have not, however, been wanting many among his admirers, who have thought that he ought not to be reckoned among the Deiſtical writers. The author of " Animadverſions upon Dr.
" Brown's three Eſſays on the Characteriſtics," obſerves, that it is " imprudent, to ſay no
" worſe, in ſome ſincere advocates for Chriſtianity, to reject the friendly advice and aſſiſt-
" ance of ſo maſterly a writer as the Lord Shafteſbury, and to give him up to the Deiſts,
" as a Patron of Infidelity (b)." But it is matter of fact, and not conſiderations of prudence or imprudence, that muſt determine the queſtion. In ſupport of his Lordſhip's having been a believer in our holy religion, may be alledged, his Preface to Whichcot's Sermons, and his Letters to a Student at the Univerſity; in both which works he conſtantly expreſſes himſelf in ſuch language as ſeems to indicate that he was really a Chriſtian. And with regard to the " Letters" it may be remarked, that they were written in 1707, 1708, and 1709, not many years before his Lordſhip's death. Nevertheleſs, there are in the Characteriſtics ſo many ſceptical paſſages, that he muſt be conſidered as having been a doubter at leaſt, if not an abſolute diſbeliever, with reſpect to Revelation. But if he muſt be ranked amongſt the Deiſts, we agree with the obſervation of one of his Biographers, that he is a very different Deiſt from numbers who have appeared in that Character; his general principles being much leſs exceptionable (i).

(b) Britiſh Biog. ubi ſupra, p. 445.

(i) Ibid. p. 446.

The inſinuations that have been thrown out by the Earl of Shafteſbury, to the prejudice of the ſcriptures, have been frequently animadverted upon, and fully confuted. Occaſional ſtrictures on his writings occur in Berkley's " Minute Philoſopher," in Warburton's " Divine Legation of Moſes" and in a multitude of other works. Biſhop Warburton has entered pretty copiouſly into the queſtion, whether Ridicule be a Teſt of Truth (k). In the productions of Mr. Balguy, Dr. Brown, and Dr. Leland, Lord Shafteſbury's direct and principal antagoniſts, will be found a compleat anſwer to whatever is juſtly exceptionable in the Characteriſtics; and a particular conſideration of that part of his Lordſhip's ſcheme which repreſents a regard to future rewards, as derogating from the dignity and excellency of virtue, as well as of his objections to the New Teſtament, becauſe it does not inculcate, as poſitive duties, the love of our country and private friendſhip. On the laſt of theſe heads, Mr. Melmoth, in the concluding note to his elegant tranſlation of Cicero's " Lælius," has made ſome remarks ſo admirably judicious, that we cannot fail of gratifying our readers, by giving them a place below [N].

(k) Divine Legation of Moſes, vol. i. fourth edit. Dedication, p. 12—3.

That

[N] We cannot fail of gratifying our readers, by giving it a place below.] " The antient moraliſts were not agreed in what claſs of ſocial merit to rank friendſhip; ſome placing it high in the ſcale of moral virtues, and others conſidering it as having no claim, in a ſtrict and proper ſenſe, to be admitted into their number. The notions of two celebrated moderns in eſtimating the value of this connection, are at a ſtill greater diſtance from each other. The noble author of the Characteriſtics, animated with a warm ſenſibility of the moral charms of this generous affection; and not being able, it ſeems, to diſcover that it is either injoined, or encouraged, by the Chriſtian inſtitution; imputes this pretended omiſſion as a capital defect in the code of evangelical ethics. On the contrary, a late ingenious advocate for that ſacred cauſe, which it was the unhappy direction of this accompliſhed Nobleman's learning and talents to depreciate; far from diſcerning any thing laudable or meritorious in private friendſhip, has attempted to prove, that " it is totally incompatible with the genius and ſpirit of the goſpel." Thus the very ſame ſuppoſed circumſtance, which appears to have been no inconſiderable obſtruction to the noble philoſopher's faith; is aſſigned by the elegant defender of Chriſtianity, as one of thoſe internal marks which authenticate its Divine origin!

—Mihi

That a man of Lord Shafteſbury's excellent character, and whoſe principles were, in various reſpects, ſo favourable to piety and virtue, ſhould, in any degree, have been hoſtile to

——Mihi convivæ prope diſſentire videntur
Poſcentes vario multum diverſa palato:
Quid dem, quid non dem? Renuis tu, quod Jubet alter.
HOR.

Widely, however, as theſe admired writers differ in their moral taſte; there is one point in which they may be perfectly united: for the ſame mode of reaſoning which overturns either of their reſpective poſitions, will equally confute both.

"That private friendſhip does not expreſsly enter into the precepts of Chriſtianity, is unqueſtionably true: for, the nature of the connection neceſſarily excludes it from being the ſubject of a religious, or moral, obligation. The diſtinctive character of this relation, conſiſts in a ſpontaneous ſentiment of the heart, unconſtrained and uninfluenced by compulſive, or external, motives of every kind and degree. To attempt therefore to produce a voluntary affection, by the authority of a poſitive command; would be to publiſh a law evidently deſtructive of its own end: for, its ſanctions could no ſooner operate as primary, or determining, inducements, than the ſentiment they were deſigned to create would utterly be prevented from exiſting.

"But a general ordinance for this purpoſe, would not merely be abſurd; it would be unjuſt: becauſe it would require univerſally, what is not in every man's power to perform. A great variety of circumſtances muſt concur, to form and cement this union: and theſe are of a nature ſo exceedingly contingent and fortuitous, that they are frequently never realized in the courſe of the longeſt life. Indeed, they ſo rarely meet together, that what a ſagacious obſerver of mankind remarks concerning love, holds equally true in reſpect to friendſhip; il eſt du veritable comme de l'apparation des eſprits; tout le monde en parle, mais peu de gens ont vû.

"If what the noble author requires from Revelation is, in the firſt inſtance, inconſiſtent with the eſſential nature of its object; it implies, in the next, an aſſertion no leſs contrary to fact: for although friendſhip could not, either in reaſon or juſtice, have been commanded by the precepts, it is evidently encouraged by the ſpirit of Chriſtianity. Univerſal benevolence or good will to mankind, is the vital principle that animates and pervades the whole ſyſtem of evangelical morality: and it is by a proper cultivation of this enlarged and comprehenſive virtue, that the heart is beſt prepared and qualified to enter into the engagements, and diſcharge the offices, of private friendſhip. This the noble moraliſt himſelf acknowledges in a ſubſequent treatiſe: for when the religion of his country was not in his immediate contemplation, and his inveterate prejudices had not their uſual object to call them forth; his Lordſhip aſks "can any friendſhip be ſo heroic, as that towards mankind? Do you think—that particular friendſhip can well ſubſiſt without ſuch an enlarged affection and ſenſe of obligation to ſociety?" This kind of reaſoning, however, when applied to revelation, will not ſatisfy his demands; he contends, that "friendſhip is no eſſential part of a Chriſtian's charity." But if there were any force in this objection, it would overſhoot its intended aim, and wound natural religion no leſs than revealed; as friendſhip, for the reaſons above aſſigned, can no more be the eſſential part of a theiſt's benevolence, than it is of a Chriſtian's.

"In confirmation of his Lordſhip's opinion, he cites the authority of Biſhop Taylor, who aſſerts that "the word friendſhip, in the ſenſe we commonly mean by it, is not ſo much as named in the New Teſtament; and our holy religion takes no notice of it." But it may be queſtioned, perhaps, whether this very reſpectable ornament of our Church, would have been able to juſtify his aſſertion in its full latitude. Does not Chriſt himſelf make the moſt honourable mention of friendſhip, in the preciſe and proper ſenſe of that word? For, diſcourſing with his diſciples upon the ſubject of his approaching crucifixion, he illuſtrates the magnitude of that benevolence which induced him to ſubmit to the painful and ignominious death he was going to ſuffer, by a compariſon drawn from the higheſt poſſible inſtance of human amity: "Greater love than this," he obſerves, "hath no man, than that he layeth down his life for his friends." To which he immediately adds, "ye are my friends if ye do whatſoever I command you:" that is, ye ſhall ſtand to me in the ſame relation as that term imports. For, the meaning of the word friends in the latter of theſe paſſages, muſt bear the ſame ſenſe it evidently does in the former; otherwiſe the idea would be ſuddenly changed, without the leaſt mark to diſtinguiſh its difference.

"But the texts juſt cited, are not more unfavourable to the learned Prelate's aſſertion, than that of the ingenious author of the "Internal Evidence." For it cannot, ſurely, be ſuppoſed with the leaſt degree of reaſon, that our Saviour, either by way of analogy, or compariſon, would have choſen to repreſent himſelf under a character, the genuine principles of which "are totally incompatible with the genius and ſpirit" of thoſe moral laws, which it was one great object of his divine commiſſion to confirm, or promulgate.

"Nor is it ſolely by neceſſary implication, or circumſtantial inferences, that the Chriſtian revelation recognizes friendſhip: it ſtrongly and expreſsly recommends and encourages this amiable alliance; if exhibiting it in the nobleſt and moſt animating exemplar, may be allowed to have an immediate and direct influence over the heart of man. Two very remarkable inſtances for this purpoſe occur, in the hiſtory of our Saviour's life: and they have repeatedly been pointed out. Nevertheleſs, as the principal writers who have animadverted upon the reſpective tenets under examination, have contented themſelves with ſlightly alluding to them; it may not, perhaps, be altogether unneceſſary to ſtate them in all their ſtriking circumſtances; eſpecially as they ſeem to have been overlooked, or not duly conſidered, by the truly Right Reverend Author, on the credit of whoſe opinion Lord Shafteſbury has endeavoured to ſupport his own.

"The Evangeliſt, in relating the miracle which Chriſt performed at Bethany by reſtoring a perſon to life who had lain ſome days in the grave; introduces his narrative by emphatically obſerving, that "Jeſus loved Lazarus;" intimating, it ſhould ſeem, that the ſentiments which Chriſt entertained of Lazarus, were a diſtinct and peculiar ſpecies of that general benevolence with which he was actuated towards all mankind. Agreeably to this explication of the ſacred hiſtorian's meaning, when the ſiſters of Lazarus ſent to acquaint Jeſus with the ſtate in which their brother lay; they did not even mention his name; but pointing him out by a more honourable and equally notorious deſignation, the terms of their meſſage were, "Behold! He whom thou loveſt is ſick!" Accordingly, when he informs his diſciples of the notice he had thus received, his expreſſion is, "our friend Lazarus ſleepeth." Now that Chriſt did not upon this occaſion uſe the word friend in its looſe undiſtinguiſhing acceptation, but in a reſtrained and ſtrictly appropriated ſenſe; is not only manifeſt from this plain account of the fact itſelf, but appears farther evident from the ſequel. For, as he was advancing to the grave, accompanied with the relations of the deceaſed, he diſcovered the ſame emotions of grief as ſwelled the boſoms of thoſe with whom Lazarus had been moſt intimately connected; and ſympathizing with their common ſorrow, he melted into tears. This circumſtance was too remarkable to eſcape particular obſervation: and it drew from the ſpectators, what one ſhould think it muſt neceſſarily draw from every reader, this natural and obvious reflection, "behold! how he loved him!"

"But in the concluding cataſtrophe of our Saviour's life, he gave a ſtill more deciſive proof that ſentiments of the ſtrongeſt perſonal attachment and friendſhip, were not unworthy of being admitted into his ſacred boſom: they were too deeply, indeed, impreſſed, to Revelation, has been matter of regret to many of his admirers; and they have endeavoured to account for ſo diſagreeable a circumſtance. Mr. Huntingford has favoured us with ſome anecdotes and obſervations upon the ſubject, which we inſert with peculiar pleaſure. " From undoubted authority it is related, that the Preface prefixed to Dr. " Whichcot's volume of Sermons, was dictated by Lord Shafteſbury to his ſiſter the Lady " Elizabeth, who with her own hand wrote it as he proceeded in pronouncing it. From " the ſentiments contained in this Preface, there is every reaſon to believe what Biſhop " Butler uſed to aſſert, that had Lord Shafteſbury lived in the preſent century, when " Chriſtianity is more perfectly underſtood, he would have been a good Chriſtian. The " intolerant doctrines of the Church, which in the laſt century were unfortunately too " prevalent, and the intemperate zeal of thoſe Miniſters who ſignalized themſelves by " enforcing thoſe doctrines, gave great offence to the benevolent mind of this Philoſopher: " and the tranſition, from a diſlike of ſuch teachers, to diſapprobation of the ſyſtem, " which he erroneouſly conceived to inculcate and encourage perſecution and ſpiritual " pride, was eaſy and natural. And hence it ſeems to have ariſen, that the letters in " which Mr. Locke recommended Chriſtianity to his Lordſhip, were of no avail. It is to " be lamented that theſe letters are not now to be found; though many years have not " elapſed ſince they were read by two Gentlemen, who were ſo affected by the ſtrong and " preſſing terms in which Mr. Locke expreſſed his ſentiments, that they could not abſtain " from tears. Perhaps however theſe letters might have leſs effect on his Lordſhip's " mind, from a degree of diſlike with which he conſidered Mr. Locke's philoſophy re- " ſpecting the human mind, and its being void of natural tendencies to what is right and " fit. Mr. Locke does not ſeem to have been ſo thoroughly read in ancient philoſophy, " or indeed ancient learning of any kind, as Lord Shafteſbury was; and it is ſaid that " diſputes on the real excellence of ſuch learning were ſometimes carried on between " them with a degree of warmth; inſomuch that Mr. Locke, in a great meaſure, loſt the " affection of Lord Shafteſbury. No man ſeems to have ſtudied the Greek Philoſophers " to more effectual purpoſe than the author of the Characteriſtics; for he has not only " caught their manner of inveſtigating the ſubject, not only explained the magnanimous " principles on which the beſt ſchool founded its ſyſtem, but has left indiſputable marks " of a mind deeply impreſſed with a love of rectitude."

There is a tradition, that, amongſt other difficulties which occurred to the Earl of Shafteſbury with regard to the truth of the Chriſtian Revelation, he was ſtartled at the idea of its containing the doctrine of the Eternity of Hell Torments; that he conſulted ſome eminent Churchmen, whether the New Teſtament poſitively aſſerted that doctrine; and that, upon being aſſured that it did, he declared himſelf incapable of aſſenting to a ſyſtem of Religion which maintained a tenet ſo repugnant to all his views of the benignity of the great Governor of the Univerſe. If his Lordſhip had lived in the preſent day, he would have found a number of Divines who would have given him quite a different anſwer. They would have informed him, that, in their opinion, Chriſtianity holds out no doctrine of ſo dreadful a nature; and that, at the very utmoſt, it only denounces the final extinction of the impenitently wicked; ſo that ſuch, if there be any ſuch, who after all, ſhall remain incorrigibly corrupt and abandoned, will, at length, no longer exiſt in the Creation of God.

The ſtile of Lord Shafteſbury's compoſitions is a point upon which various and contradictory ſentiments have been entertained. For a conſiderable time he was deemed one of our moſt polite and elegant writers; and how highly he was thought of in this reſpect, has appeared from ſeveral of the paſſages already cited. A recent authority in his favour preſſed, to be extinguiſhed even by the moſt excruciating torments. In thoſe dreadful moments, obſerving among the afflicted witneſſes of his painful and ignominious ſufferings, that faithful follower who is deſcribed by the hiſtorian as " the diſciple whom he loved;" he diſtinguiſhed him by the moſt convincing inſtance of ſuperior confidence, eſteem and affection that ever was exhibited to the admiration of mankind. For, under circumſtances of the moſt agonizing torments, when it might be thought impoſſible for human nature to retain any other ſenſibility but that of its own inexpreſſible ſufferings; he recommended to the care and protection of this his tried and approved friend, in terms of peculiar regard and endearment, the moſt tender and ſacred object of his private affections. But no language can repreſent this pathetic and affecting ſcene, with a force and energy equal to the ſublime ſimplicity of the Evangeliſt's own narrative: " Now there ſtood by the croſs of Jeſus, his " mother and his mother's ſiſter,—and Mary Mag- " dalene. When Jeſus ſaw his mother, and the " diſciple (ſtanding) by, whom he loved; he ſaith to " his mother,—behold thy ſon! then he ſaith to the " diſciple, behold thy mother! And from that hour " that diſciple took her to his own home."

" It may ſafely be aſſerted, that among all thoſe memorable examples of friendſhip, which have been celebrated with the higheſt encomiums by the antients; there cannot be produced a ſingle inſtance, in which the moſt diſtinguiſhing features of exalted amity are ſo ſtrongly diſplayed, as in the foregoing relation. The only one, perhaps, that bears even a faint ſimilitude to it, is that famous tranſaction, recorded by a Greek author, which paſſed between Eudamidas and Aretheus. But when the very different circumſtances attending the reſpective examples, are duly conſidered; it muſt be acknowledged, that the former riſes as much above the latter in the proof it exhibits of ſublime friendſhip, as it does in the dignity of the characters concerned.

" Upon the whole then it appears, that the divine Founder of the Chriſtian Religion, as well by his own example as by the ſpirit of his moral doctrine, has not only encouraged but conſecrated Friendſhip (15)."

(15) Lælius: or an Eſſay on Friendſhip; by Marcus Tullius Cicero. With Remarks by William Melmoth, Eſq. p. 328—343.

is

(r) Ibid. p

is Mr. Knox. "It is to be lamented," says this ingenious Essayist, "for the sake of "virtue, that Lord Shaftesbury was a sceptic. His stile was a fine imitation of Plato, and "displays such beauties, as might conceal the uglineſs of a deformed system (l)." On the other hand, Mr. Walpole observes concerning our noble author, that his writings are much more estimable on account of their breathing the virtues of the mind, than for their stile and manner; and that he delivers his doctrines in extatic diction, like one of the magi inculcating philosophic visions to an eastern auditory (m). It is obvious to remark, that this stricture can only be deemed just with regard to a small part of his Lordship's works, and especially the Rhapsodies that occur in the "Moralists." Dr. Campbell has pointed out a great fault which sometimes occurs in the Earl of Shaftesbury's Compositions; and that is, the becoming unintelligible from the affectation of excellence. "I proceed," says the Doctor, "to give examples of a still higher order, in sentences more complicated. "These I shall produce from an author, who, though far from being deficient in acute-"ness, invention, or vivacity, is perhaps, in this species of composition, the most eminent "of all that have written in the English language." In proof of this assertion, three sentences are alledged, which undoubtedly deserve the censure cast upon them (n); but it is observable, that they are taken from the "Miscellaneous Reflections," which we do not reckon amongst the most valuable parts of the Characteristics. Of all the criticisms that have been made upon Lord Shaftesbury's stile, that of Dr. Blair is the most full, and the most judicious. Upon the head of precision the Doctor expresses himself as follows.

(l) Essays moral and literary, vol. ii. p. 176. Edit. of 1782.

(m) Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors, vol. ii. p. 195.

(n) The Philosophy of Rhetoric, vol. ii. p. 72—74.

"Lord Shaftesbury's faults, in point of precision, are much greater than Mr. Addison's; and the more unpardonable, because he is a professed philosophical writer; who, as such, ought, above all things, to have studied precision. His style has both great beauties, and great faults; and, on the whole, is by no means a safe model for imitation. Lord Shaftesbury was well acquainted with the power of words; those which he employs are generally proper and well sounding; he has great variety of them; and his arrangement, as shall be afterwards shown, is commonly beautiful. His defect, in precision, is not owing so much to indistinct or confused ideas, as to perpetual affectation. He is fond, to excess, of the pomp and parade of Language; he is never satisfied with expressing any thing clearly and simply; he must always give it the dress of state and majesty. Hence perpetual circumlocutions, and many words and phrases employed to describe somewhat, that would have been described much better by one of them. If he has occasion to mention any person or author, he very rarely mentions him by his proper name. In the treatise, entitled, "Advice to an Author," he descants for two or three pages together upon Aristotle, without once naming him in any other way, than the Master Critic, the Mighty Genius and Judge of Art, the Prince of Critics, the Grand Master of Art, and Consummate Philologist. In the same way, the Grand Poetic Sire, the Philosophical Patriarch, and his Disciple of Noble Birth, and lofty Genius, are the only names by which he condescends to distinguish Homer, Socrates, and Plato, in another passage of the same treatise. This method of distinguishing persons is extremely affected; but it is not so contrary to precision, as the frequent circumlocutions he employs for all moral ideas; attentive, on every occasion, more to the pomp of language, than to the clearness which he ought to have studied as a Philosopher. The moral sense, for instance, after he had once defined it, was a clear term; but, how vague becomes the idea, when, in the next page, he calls it, "That natural affection, and anticipating fancy, which makes the sense of right and "wrong?" Self-examination, or reflection on our own conduct, is an idea conceived with ease; but when it is wrought into all the forms of, "A man's dividing himself into "two parties, becoming a self-dialogist, entering into partnership with himself, forming "the dual number practically within himself;" we hardly know what to make of it. On some occasions, he so adorns, or rather loads with words, the plainest and simplest propositions, as, if not to obscure, at least, to enfeeble them (o)."

(o) Lectures on Rhetoric and Belles Lettres, vol. i. p. 192, 193.

In the article of the construction and distribution of his sentences, Dr. Blair observes, that Lord Shaftesbury has shewn great art. He is, indeed, in the Doctor's opinion, unfit to be considered as a general model. "But, as his ear was fine, and as he was extremely "attentive to every thing that is elegant, he has studied the proper intermixture of long "and short sentences, with variety and harmony in their structure, more than any other "English author: and for this part of composition, he deserves attention (p)." Dr. Blair farther remarks, that some writers practise that degree of inversion which our language bears, much more than others: Lord Shaftesbury, for instance, does it much more than Mr. Addison; to which sort of arrangement is owing, in a great measure, that appearance of strength, dignity, and varied harmony which his Lordship's stile possesses. The words are often placed, not strictly in their natural order, but with that artificial construction, which may give the period most emphasis and grace (q). "Of later writers," adds the Doctor, in another lecture, "Shaftesbury is, upon the whole, the most correct in "his numbers. As his ear was delicate, he has attended to music in all his sentences; "and he is peculiarly happy in this respect, that he has avoided the monotony into which "writers, who study the grace of sound, are very apt to fall: having diversified his periods "with great variety (r)." In treating concerning simplicity and affectation of stile, Dr.

(p) Ibid. p. 207, 208.

(q) Ibid. p. 234.

(r) Ibid. p. 263.

Blair is far leſs favourable to the compoſitions of Lord Shafteſbury; and as the Doctor has here taken occaſion to give a general view of his Lordſhip's character in the point we are conſidering, the whole paſſage ſhall be produced.

" Of authors, who, notwithſtanding many excellencies, have rendered their ſtyle much leſs beautiful by want of ſimplicity, I cannot give a more remarkable example than Lord Shafteſbury. This is an author on whom I have made obſervations ſeveral times before, and ſhall now take leave of him, with giving his general character under this head. Conſiderable merit, doubtleſs, he has. His works might be read with profit for the moral philoſophy which they contain, had he not filled them with ſo many oblique and invidious inſinuations againſt the Chriſtian Religion; thrown out, too, with ſo much ſpleen and ſatire, as do no honour to his memory, either as an author or a man. His language has many beauties. It is firm, and ſupported in an uncommon degree: it is rich and muſical. No Engliſh author, as I formerly ſhewed, has attended ſo much to the regular conſtruction of his ſentences, both with reſpect to propriety, and with reſpect to cadence. All this gives ſo much elegance and pomp to his language, that there is no wonder it ſhould have been ſometimes highly admired. It is greatly hurt, however, by perpetual ſtiffneſs and affectation. This is its capital fault. His Lordſhip can expreſs nothing with ſimplicity. He ſeems to have conſidered it as vulgar, and beneath the dignity of a man of quality, to ſpeak like other men. Hence he is ever in buſkins; full of circumlocutions and artificial elegance. In every ſentence, we ſee the marks of labour and art; nothing of that eaſe, which expreſſes a ſentiment coming natural and warm from the heart. Of figures and ornament of every kind, he is exceedingly fond; ſometimes happy in them; but his fondneſs for them is too viſible; and having once laid hold of ſome metaphor or alluſion that pleaſed him, he knows not how to part with it. What is moſt wonderful, he was a profeſſed admirer of ſimplicity; is always extolling it in the ancients, and cenſuring the moderns for the want of it; though he departs from it himſelf as far as any one modern whatever. Lord Shafteſbury poſſeſſed delicacy and refinement of taſte, to a degree that we may call exceſſive and ſickly; but he had little warmth of paſſion; few ſtrong or vigorous feelings: and the coldneſs of his character led him to that artificial and ſtately manner which appears in his writings. He was fonder of nothing than of wit and raillery; but he is far from being happy in it. He attempts it often, but always awkwardly; he is ſtiff, even in his pleaſantry; and laughs in form, like an author, and not like a man (s)." (s) Ibid. p. 396, 397.

We have been the more large in our extracts from Dr. Blair, becauſe he has ſo particularly conſidered the Earl of Shafteſbury's ſtile, and becauſe his ſentiments upon the ſubject appear, on the whole, to be very accurate and judicious. On the re-peruſal of the Characteriſtics, we have been clearly convinced that the noble author was almoſt always excellent in the diſpoſition of his words, but that in the choice of them he is frequently liable to cenſure. A ſtriking inſtance of his nicety, not to ſay faſtidiouſneſs, with regard to compoſition, is diſplayed in the difference between the ſurreptitious edition of his Inquiry concerning virtue, and the corrected one, as it now ſtands in his works. It affords a curious and uſeful example of the Limæ Labor; the art of poliſhing language, breaking long ſentences, and working up an imperfect draught into a highly finiſhed performance (t). There is one diſagreeable circumſtance in reading Lord Shafteſbury's compoſitions, which is, that he adopted the faſhion which at that time prevailed, of writing many of our words in a contracted form. This was then ſuppoſed to contribute to the eaſe and politeneſs of ſtile; but it was far far from producing ſuch an effect; and accordingly, it is now wiſely rejected by our beſt authors. (t) Ibid. p. 397, 398. note.

It has been mentioned before, that it was cuſtomary with the Earl of Shafteſbury to write notes in the margin of the ancient authors that were his principal favourites. This cuſtom he exerciſed very copiouſly with regard to Horace. By the friendſhip of Mr. Huntingford, we are enabled to give a large ſpecimen of his Lordſhip's remarks on the Satires and Epiſtles of his admired Poet; and we are perſuaded that it will be an acceptable preſent to our claſſical and critical readers [O]. It is obſervable, that the Earl of Shafeſbury entertained exactly the ſame idea concerning the deſign of the Epiſtle to the Piſos, [O] And we are perſuaded that it will be an acceptable preſent to our claſſical and critical readers.] Mr. Huntingford's communication is entitled, " A critical Epiſtle from George Iſaac Huntingford to Henry Addington, Eſq; containing notes on Horace, by the Author of the Characteriſtics," and is as follows.

DEAR SIR,

YOU may remember perhaps that part of our laſt converſation was on the various excellencies of Horace. You expreſſed your opinion, that the works of this author were particularly calculated for the reading of a Gentleman, abounding as they do with ſo many exquiſite ſtrokes of ſatire on the foibles of Human Nature, and containing ſuch an extenſive knowledge of men and the world. You were perfectly right in this, as in every other opinion. Horace is indeed a moſt thorough maſter of Moral Science; and no wonder, ſince he was educated in that beſt ſchool of ancient philoſophy, the Socratic.

The writings of all the Socratics, and particularly thoſe of Xenophon (who has moſt faithfully as well as moſt elegantly recorded the tenets of his Maſter) perpetually teach us, " to know ourſelves; to ſtudy mankind; to form liberal and magnanimous ſentiments of morality, which may be not only beautiful in ſpeculation, but alſo practicable in common life." The doctrines of this ſect Horace imbibed (as plainly appears from his works) at that early period of his age when he ſays of himſelf,

Adjecere

Piſos, which has ſince been ſo ably and judiciouſly ſupported by Mr. Colman. We need not add, that Mr. Colman could not have any knowledge of his Lordſhip's opinion upon the ſubject.

The

Adjecere bonæ paulo plus artis Athenæ:
Scilicet ut poſſem curvo dignoſcere rectum,
Atque inter ſilvas Academi quærere verum.
Lib. 2. Ep. 2. V. 43.

It were to be wiſhed that Horace had uniformly adhered to this high philoſophy: but dire neceſſity compelled him to court the favour of Auguſtus, and to accommodate himſelf to the diſſolute Mæcenas; from which unfortunate circumſtances he became tainted with Epicurean notions. Theſe notions he ſeems to have favoured for ſome time, but at length however he happily emerged from ſo degrading and degenerate a ſyſtem, and roſe again with all the dignity and ſuperior beauty of his firſt principles.

The different influence, which at different times theſe various changes of philoſophy could not fail to produce on the mind and writings of this Poet and Moraliſt, is ſo ſtrongly marked in very many of his Odes, Satires, and Epiſtles, that it can ſcarcely eſcape any obſervant reader. But no one ſeems to have noted it ſo accurately, as the truly noble, becauſe truly virtuous, author of the Characteriſtics. Indeed that elegant ſcholar and admirable philoſopher ſeems to have ſtudied the writings of Horace with uncommon attention; for he has left behind him ſome valuable notes, which are written with his own hand in a Cambridge edition of that author. Some of theſe notes may perhaps be thought worth your peruſal, and therefore they are tranſmitted to you for your inſpection.

LIB. 1. Ode 34. Inſanientis Sapientiæ.

Ab Epicureis diſcedens jam Senex ferè Horatius ſolùm Socraticam Sapientiam amplectitur. Vid. inf. Epiſt. 1. Neque adeo ſcurra aut impius Horatius ut ironicè hìc riſus captans, pietatem et Patriæ Ritus ita palam contemneret, et malignè laudans roderet. Hæc illa eſſet Ærugo Mera (Sat. 4. V. 100). Quod Vitium procul abſore chartis promiſit. At ille magis apertè quidem et ingenuè quando Epicureus fuit, opinionem ſuam de Providentiâ profitetur. Sat. 5. Circa Deos tamen et Deorum templa quanta Cura et Pietas Horatii, Vide Sat. 2. L. 2. V. 104. Teſtantur quoque tot Odæ in honorem Deorum. Vid. Od. 6. Lib. 3.

V. 5. Relictos. Quia olim in Academiâ et Philoſophiâ Socraticâ nutritus. Ut inf. Ep. 2. L. 2. V. 45.

Satyrarum LIB. 1.

Sat. 1. V. 1. Quis fit.

Inconſtantiæ cauſam quærit. Reſpondet Avaritiam ſpecioſis nominibus velatam. (Inf. V. 30, &c.) Cupiditatem inexplebilem extra naturam. (V. 50.) Hinc Invidia, Æmulatio, Dolor (V. 109, &c.) et exitus e vitâ querulus. V. 117.

V. 14. Fabium.

Vide Vet. Comment. et Inf. ad Verſ. 82. Sat. 3. de Labeone, et rurſùs ad Verſ. 3. Ep. 4. de Caſſio. ubi apparet Horatium idem feciſſe in gratiam Auguſti. Sic etiam Sat. 6, V. 24 et 107. Vide et Inf. Sat. 7. V. 1.—et Sat. 8. Lib. 2. V. 1.

V. 29. Caupo—Miles—Nautæ.

Hi omnes Avari, inſatiabiles, miſeri. Nemo avarus ergo ſe probat: omnes diverſa laudant, ſibi invident invicem, &c. V. 108.

V. 31. Ut in otia, &c.

Eadem Hominis Avari Excuſatio.—Infr. V. 80.

V. 80. At ſi condoluit.

Excuſatio Hominis Avari. Ut ſup. V. 31.

V. 88. At ſi.

Reſpondet ſuperiori, At ſi (V. 80.) ubi Avarus loquitur: hìc Horatius. Et eſt argumentum a fortiori: ut ſupr. V. 84. Non filius, &c.—Quomodo ergo habebis Qui aſſideat, fomenta paret, &c. (V. 82.) Noli ergo excuſationes iſtas adferre. (V. 80 et 31.) Avaritiamque defendere, ſed tandem aliquando ſit finis quærendi, &c.

V. 90. Operam perdas.

Etiam cooperante Naturâ, operam avaritiâ perdas. Surdi Cognati. Aſini ad Lyram.

V. 92. Denique ſit finis.

Cum ſuperioribus conjungo, ut ſit ſenſus, at ſi in ipſis Cognatis retinendis operam perdas, tandem aliquando ſit finis quærendi, &c. poſſunt tamen hæc in eodem ſenſu disjunctivè legi, ſine mutatione interpunctionis, et hoc rectiùs.

V. 108. Illùc.

1. 6. Sup. V. 95 et 101. Priora enim de avaris ſe non probantibus, et huc faciunt, jam inde a Verſu 30.

V. 108. Nemon' ut Avarus.

Itàne fieri? Ut nemo avarus, &c.—Sic Lambinus, latinitatis optimus judex, ſenſu quidem optimo. Cruquius ex M. S. legit, nemo ut ſine eliſione quod in Horatio non adeo rarum. Sic imitator Horatii Perſius. Sat. 4. V. 23.

Ut nemo in ſeſe tentat deſcendere, nemo.

Quòd autem Avarus ſe probat Horatius non dicit, ſed e contra, viz. Inconſtantiæ, Invidiæ, Æmulationis, cauſam eſſe Avaritiam (Vide Sup. Annot. V. 1.) Neque iſte quidem Athenienſis ſordidus, de quo ſup. V. 65, &c. ideo vitam ſuam et lucrandi genus laudavit, quia lucrum ipſum omnimodum et ex omni re probavit. Si Mercator enim fuit, adverſâ Tempeſtate aliquando militem laudavit; ſi agricola, civem, &c. —ut ſupra in initio Satyræ. Si ergo legimus nemo ut, poſſumus interrogationis notas amittere: ſi verò Lectionem receptam ſequimur, ſenſus temen erit affirmâtivus, itane ſcil. comparatum eſſe vel a naturâ conſtitutum, ut nemo avarus, &c.? et ſic, ni fallor, Lambinus accipit; aliter non tam benè, peſſimè autem qui Avarum a cæteris diſtinguunt, quaſi alius Horatio eſſet Avarus, alius Inconſtans, ut inf. in Annot. Cantab.

V. 117. Inde fit.

Inde. i. e. Ab eâdem hâc avaritiâ. Ergo ne hoc ſenſu quidem Avarus ſe probat, et ad extremum miſer eſt.

SAT. 2.

V. 77. Pœniteat te.

Scil. Te tuo non rerum vitio laborantem. Dum tibi res, non te rebus ſubjungere ſtudes. Vid. Epiſt. L. 1. V. 19. Sic Epiſt. 17. V. 24. Tentantem majora, &c. non æquo animo preſentia quæque accipientem, ſed ſplendidiora et difficiliora captantem—ſicut inf. V. 108, &c.—Sunt hæc tamen Epicurea vel Cyrenaica magis quàm Stoica. Hi enim neminem niſi ſuo vitio laborare dixerunt: illi laborare quidem, ſed multum referre, ſuo vitio rerumne laboret quis.

V. 117. Verna.

Sic Lucretius ſecundùm præcepta Epicuri (quem et noſter in prioribus his Satyris ſequitur) et jacere humorem collectum in corpora quæque.—In hâc enim Philoſophiâ, ne umbra quidem τε καλε.

SAT. 3. Ad Mæcenatem. V. Inf. V. 64.

V. 1. Omnibus, &c.

Correptus, credo, a Stoico quodam et coram Mæcenate Horatius apologiam hanc Mæcenati ſcribit, et contra Stoicos et Severiores invehitur. Anticipatione utitur in initio: ac veluti infra (Ep. 15.) propter inconſtantiam ſuam, ubi Mænio ſe confert, ſic in hâc Satyrâ cum Tigellio. Et hìc quidem cum Stoicis verum Bellum. Inf. Sat. 3 et 7. Lib. 2. fictum gerit.

V. 29. Iracundior eſt, &c.

Planè Ipſus Horatius eſt. Et in ſequentibus his 6 verſibus ſeipſum deſcribit, uti nominatim inf. V. 63. Hìc verò tacitè quia ſeipſum laudat magis quàm infra, Sat. 6. V. 70. Vide integrum locum et confer. De Iracundiâ autem et Aſperitate Suâ erga Monitores etiam Amicos, Vid. Ep. 8. V. 9. Vide et Ep. 2. Lib. 2. V. 210. Confer et V. 63, &c. infra.

V. 66. Communi Senſu.

Stoicus loquitur (Vide ſup. V. 1.) et eſt hìc ſenſus communis

The fate of Lord Shafteſbury as an Author, may furniſh uſeful inſtruction to thoſe who build their expectations on literary fame. For a conſiderable time he ſtood in high reputation communis idem quod Juvenalis indicat. Sat. 8. V. 73. viz. κοινονοημοσύνη· Vid. Caſaub. et Gat. in Mar. Ant. Sat. 16. Lib. 1. Neque adeo Stultus aut fatuus accuſator Horatii, ut illum puræ putæ ſtultitiæ argueret.—Vide quod infr. Sat. 4. V. 77. — Sine ſenſu; quod planè ad ſocietatem refertur.

V. 76. Stultis.

Ironicè, credo, contra Stoicos. Sic inf. L. 2. Sat. 3. V. 81. Dum doceo inſanire omnes. Si omnes iraſcuntur, inſaniunt omnes et ſtulti ſunt. Sed omnes iraſcimur (inquit Horatius) ergo omnes Stulti ſumus.

V. 82. Labeone inſanior.

V. Vet Comment. et Sup. Sat. 1. V. 14. Vide etiam Lambinum, et Chabotii cenſuram. Alibi etiam Horatius hoc facit in gratiam Auguſti (Hactenus enim Aulicus fuit, nec Liba recuſavit. Inf. Ep. 10. V. 10.) et quia a partibus Reipublicæ olim ſteterat, unde illi in Aulâ Principis invidia conflata. Nunquam tamen ipſam Cauſam deſeruit, neque de viris majoribus (Catone Scil. vel Bruto) malè loquitur: de Minoribus verò ſæpe occaſione quovis modo arreptâ. Sic eſt Sat. 6. V. 24 et 107. Vid. Inf. Sat. 1. Lib. 2. V. 76.

V. 96. Paria.

Stoicum Dogma; ſed inter ſpinoſa et ſubtiliora diſciplinæ; ad Praxin minimè referentia; in Logicis reſervata; neque a Nobilioribus (Arriano Scil. et Marco Ant.) tractatum eſt. Non tam acriter tamen Horatius in hoc dogma, inf. Ep. 16. V. 52, &c. Ubi potiùs favet Stoicis etiam in hoc paradoxo.

V. 113. Nec Natura.

Hæc omnia cum Epicureis Horatius: poſtea non item. V. inf. Sat. 2. V. 75. Lib. 2.

V. 122. Magnis parva mineris.

Imperitiſſimus ſanè Stoicus (ſive Criſpinus ſive alius aliquis Romæ) qui hæc dixerit: nec reverà philoſophus, ſed imitator ipſius, quales tunc temporis Romæ multi. Sic infra Damaſippus (Sat. 3. Lib. 2.) et ipſe Davus (Sat. 7. ejuſdem libri) introducitur.

SAT. 4.

V. 1. Eupolis, &c.

Apologia hæc eſt pro Satyris ſuis: plures ergo ante hanc ſcripſit. Sequitur Apologia altera pro hâc ipsâ Satyrâ inf. Sat. 10. Prima quoque Sat. Lib. 2. Apologia eſt, uti et 6ta hujus Libri. quæ potiùs Epiſtola eſt, quàm Satyra.

V. 6. Pendet.

Significat, Satyram (cujus inventor Lucilius) veteris Comœdiæ locum occupâſſe.

V. 11. Lutulentus.

V. inf. Sat. 10. V. 50. et Od. 29. Lib. 3. V. 36.

V. 44. Comœdia.

Quia in initio Epiſtolæ Satyras Romanæ inventionis Lucilianas cum Comœdiâ Græcâ Veteri conjunxit, tanquam inde derivatas.

V. 47. In eſt.

Horatius quidem ineſſe dicit. Vide Artem Poet. V. 93 et 148.

V. 63. Aliàs.

Inf. Art. Poet. V. 93. Ubi Horatius affirmativè: regulas etiam de Comœdiâ tradens a verſu 153 ad 178.

V. 91. Nigris.

Quia priùs dixerat Horatio Cenſor ille, Lædere gaudes, pravus, niger es. Sup. V. 78. Quis verò, et omnium maximè niger eſt, Horatius dicit. V. 100.

V. 136. Hoc.

De ſeipſo et ſuo facto loquitur.

V. 137. Simile.

De irâ ſuâ intellige. Vide infr. Ep. 20. V. 25. et Ep. 8. V. 9.—Vid. et Ep. 2. Lib. 2. V. 210, 211.

V. 142. Plures.

Vide Epiſt. Ad Auguſtum. V. 108, &c.

SAT. 5.

V. 101. Deos, &c.

Juvenis adhuc Horatius et parcus Deorum cultor, ut in Od. 34. Non ſic poſtea. Vid. Sat. Sequent. V. 114. et quæ ſupra ad Od. 34. Lib. 1. Scripta eſt hæc Satyra Anno ab ter. Cond. 713, quando Pax inter Octavium et Antonium. Sup. V. 27.

SAT. 6.

Tota Apologetica eſt hæc Satyra, vel potiùs Epiſtola Horatii, commendantis ſe Mæcenati. Omnia enim ad ſeipſum referuntur, nec reverà apologiam relinquit, quanquam, V. 45. Nunc ad me redeo inquit. Sed tacitè et cum aliis collatione factâ, ſeipſum laudat. Non immerito ergo, inf. V. 70. Ut me collaudem.—Vide Annot. Inf. V. 19. 24. &c.

V. 8. Ingenuus.

Rectè Vet. Com: Ingenuus, hic ad morum probitatem pertinet.

V. 22. Vel merito quoniam.

V. Inf. V. 49.—Et Ep. 20. V. 21.

V. 19. Populus Lævino, &c.

Vide interim (inquit Horatius) quanta ambitionis vis, etiam in ignotis! Populo enim non favente, cenſore et ſenatu prohibente, nihilominus pergunt (et fulgente trahit, &c.) etiam excluſi (uti Tullius) redeunt rurſus, inſtant, clamant. Mox verò exclamante populo, Tune Syria, &c.—reclamat ambitioſus. At Novius, &c. reſpondent omnes, Hoc tibi, &c. Tune ergo Paulus et Meſſala? Ille vero, Homo impudens, pro ſe dicere, et eodem modo clamare non deſiſtit. Eandem excuſationem ſemper profert. Supra omnes vociferatur, et exultans ſonat (cornua quod vincatque tubas). Saltem tenet hoc nos. i. e. Saltem hoc nobis conceditur. Hæc noſtra eſt Solatio. V. Inf. V. 44.

V. 24. Ignotos.

Tacitè ſe Mæcenati commendat Horatius. Non enim, inquit, quia ignobilis ideo ambitioſus non ſum (Ignobiles enim æquè ac Nobiles ambitioſi ſunt) ſed quia Bonus, Modeſtus, et Vitâ et pectore puro. Inf. V. 51. 55. 57. et 64. Et eſt quidem tota hæc Satyra quaſi Epiſtola Apologetica et commendabilis.

V. 24. Tulli.

Tullius hic ſenatu motus a Cæſare quaſi Pompeianus: occiſo vero Cæſare recepit latum Clavum, et Tribunus Militum factus eſt.

V. 40. At Novius.

Apologia Hominis Ambitioſi novi, rurſus alia Apologia inf. V. 90.

V. 44. Saltem tenet hoc nos.

Verba Ambitioſi Hominis qui Paulus et Meſſala ſibi videtur, clamans perpetuò, at Novius Collega, &c. Quid illi facias? Silebit nunquam: eandem cantilenam cantabit Saltem tenet hoc nos. i. e. Solatur (nam ita Lambinus; quanquam verba hæc ad Populum refert, ut Commentatores omnes: quod moror.) Sic ſup. Sat. 2. V. 53. Verum hoc ſe amplectitur uno, hoc amat, et laudat Matronam nullam ego tango. Hæc Amatoris, illa Ambitioſi vox eſt: Horatii verò longè diſcrepans et Vox et Ratio inf. V. 90 et 93. Non enim ſolatur ſe vel defendit, ſed congratulatur ſibi. Vid. Sup. V. 19.

Tenet nos—verbum tenet hìc in bonam partem ſumitur, ut inf. Ep. 18. V. 23. Quem tenet argenti ſitis. Sic etiam, Sat. 3. Lib. 2. V. 45. Hæc magnos formula reges tenet. inf. autem Epiſt. 7. V. 18. tam teneor dono.

V. 46. Rodunt.

Veriſimile eſt Horatium hanc Satyram ante, Od. 3. Lib. 4. ſcripſiſſe. Vide iſtic, V. 16.

V. 47. Olim.

Temporibus Bruti et Reipublicæ. Hinc Horatio Invidiæ crevit qui Majores pennas, &c.—Inf. Ep. 20. V. 21.

V. 49. Diſſimile.

Quaſi ſeipſum damnans, ut ſup. V. 22. Etiam hoc modo purgans ſe Mæcenati et Auguſto, quòd olim pro Republicâ ſtetiſſet, a Bruto honoratus, olim enim ambitioſus (inquit) fuì. Nunc non ita. Non ergo jure mihi invideat.

V. 114. Aſſiſto divinis.

Non jam ergo amplius, uti olim Parcus Deorum cultor, &c. Od. 34. Lib. 1. Quanquam alitèr accipiunt reputation as a polite writer, and was regarded by many as a ſtandard of elegant compoſition. His imitators, as well as admirers, were numerous, and he was eſteemed the Head of cipiunt Vet. Com. et Torrentius, fortè non immeritò. Mæcenati enim ſcribit, et nondum ſenex Horatius.

V. 123. Tacitum juvet.

Sup. Sat. 4. in fine. Hæc ego mecum compreſſis agito labris. Hìc ergo philoſophica iſta intelligit, quæ ad ſui emendationem pertinent, non poetica et vulganda. Id enim eſt chartis illudere, et aliis ſcribere; hoc verò philoſophari, dum tacitus ſibi legit et ſcribit. Sic inf. Ep. 2. Lib. 2. V. 143. Sed veræ numeroſque modoſque ediſcere vitæ.—Seneca de Tranquil. Cap. 10. In ſtudiis puto meherculè melius eſſe res ipſas, &c.—minus moleſtiarum habet Funus tacitum, &c.—Sequitur, Quæro meherculè tacitus, &c.

SAT. 7.

Pugna hæc jocoſa inita eſt paulo ante cladem Philipenſem (ut conſtat ex verſu 18 et 19, infra). Scripta verò poſtea, ſi ipſi quidem Horatio fides adhibenda eſt Ep. 2. Lib. 2. V. 50. Ille enim, ſi Reſpublica ſtetiſſet, omnino Poeta nunquam exſtitiſſet, minùs adhuc ſcurriles hos ludos ſcripſiſſet. Nec credibile eſt Horatium ſerium, et res ſerias adeò atque arduas ſub Amico et Patrono Bruto agentem, pro Patriâ periclitantem, Tribunum etiam Militum, talia ſcripſiſſe. Deciſis vero Pennis Paupertati ſuccumbens, poſtquam Poeta factus eſt, atque audax victum quærebat, facetiis jociſque ad Cæſarianos Victores ſe commendans, non mirum eſt, ſi occaſionem hanc citò arripuit recentem adhuc injuriam ulciſcendi ſine magnâ Bruti Nominis reverentiâ. Quòd ſi Bruto et Caſſio et præcipuis iſtis viris pepercit Horatius, non tamen eodem modo et aliis militantibus, et eidem cauſæ faventibus.

Perſius hic Græcus, Dives; et Rupilius olim Prætor et in Triumviratu proſcriptus, ut in Vet. Com. An ergo tunc temporis et in Caſtris Bruti odioſum erat Proſcripti nomen? Id quaſi odioſum tamen Horatius profert, et in initio Statim in Rupilium jacit. Mortuo ergo Bruto et in humili ſtatu Horatii, ſub tyrannide ſcripta eſt hæc Satyra. Vid. Annot. ad Sat. 3. V. 82. et ad Sat. 1. V. 14.

SAT. 9.

V. 44. Paucorum.

Garruli, non Horatii, verba. Turn. et Torr.

V. 45. Nemo.

De Mæcenate intelligendum. Cruq. et Torr.

V. 47. Hunc.

Me. δειϰτιϰως· Lamb.

V. 54. Velis.

Velis me tradere. Ut ſup. V. 44. Garruli verba ſunt. Commentatores Horatium quoque garrulum faciunt, dum hæc et quæ ſup. V. 44, 45. illi tribuunt. Neque Horatio digna Ironia hæc, nec rei vel tempori conveniens. Laborat Horatius. Longè abeſt quòd colloquia jam ſerat. Longiſſimè verò quòd Hominem hunc ſponte accendat.

V. 55. Eoque Difficiles.

Optimè Turnebus. Sicut et in ſuperioribus. Qui ſe facile (inquit) vinci expugnarique ſentiunt, ſe muniunt, &c. Hæc omnia garrulus, difficultates preponderans, minuens. Vid. infra Horatius, V. 60. Hæc dum agit. Ille enim omnia: Horatius nihil, vel ſaltem negativè, et ad diſſuadendum; ut Verſ. 48. Vid. ſup. V. 14.

V. 64. Lentiſſima.

Languida, labentia, quaſi mortua, Prenſationi minimè reſpondentia. Hinc potius prenſare. Quia ſic Candidati et Supplices.

LIB. 2. SAT. 1.

V. 7. Verum nequeo dormire.

Non ſic infra, Sat. 3. V. 1. et Ep. 1. V. 10. et Ep. 2. Lib. 2. V. 20. 25, &c. ad 57. (Hæc ergo Satyra prius ſcripta) Neque idem ardor infra (Sat. 6. V. 17.)

V. 29. Melioris.

Genere, Cenſu, Ingenio, inf. V. 75. Vide et V. 70. Ubi Lucilium Optimum et Divinum planè virum fuiſſe conſtat. Ergo non ſolùm Ingenio ſed Virtute melioris utroque. Et hoc potius intelligo, renuente Torrentio, aliiſque.

V. 53. Imperet.

Apologeticè ad Trebatium Jur. Conſultum. ſcil. quòd coactus Satyram ſcribit.

V. 76. Magnis.

Brutum intelligit, non Auguſtum: quanquam priorem in poſterioris gratiam non nominat. Vid. infr. Ep. 20. V. 23, et ſupra ad Sat. 3. V. 82.

SAT. 2.

Vetus Commentator, Ofellum quendam narrat qui quædam Sectæ Stoicæ e Græco tranſtulit. Alii ergo Stoicum, alii Epicureum, alii Medium, ego ne Philoſophum quidem fuiſſe credo, neque ad examen Dogmatum deſcendiſſe: quippe qui Ruſticus Colonus Abnormis. Horatius vero ipſe loquens, ſententiamque Ofelli explicans jam ſtatim a verſu 53, Philoſophiam ſequitur Epicureæ plane contrariam. Vid. V. 79. Ubi de Divinitate Animæ. Sic de Pietate, Societate, et Amore Patriæ, V. 103, 104, 105, et reverſus iterùm ad ipſa Ofelli verba (ad Philoſophiam paululum detorta) de Proprio et rebus quæ ſunt ϰα εφ' ἡμιν, ut Ep. 2. Lib. 2. V. 158, &c. Talia enim hæc ſunt Nam propriæ Telluris Herum, &c. V. 129, et Nulli Proprius, V. 134. Sequitur Hortatio iſta Vivite Fortes, Fortiaque adverſis, &c. Fortiorem ergo ſeveriorem et ſanctiorem Philoſophiam (Socraticam nempe) Horatius hìc ſequitur iterato curſu ut Od. 34. L. 1. Hæc ergo Satyra non inter priores, ſed poſt Sat. 3^m et 5^m, aliaſque Libri primi. Nihil autem ad rem quicquid Ofellus ſupra de Voluptate, V. 19. Sic enim indocti, imò ipſi Stoici ad indoctos et extra Scholam. Quàm fortiter autem Socraticum agit Horatius etiam Ofelli perſonam planè induens, uti Verſ. 5, 6, 7, videre licet ex Max. Tyrio qui ex iiſdem fontibus iſta hauſit (his equidem ſimillima) Diſſ. 1. ζωα γαρ ϖϵ, ϰαι φυτα, ϰαι λιθοι, ϰαι φωναι, ϰαι θυμοι, ϰ᾽ ὁρμαι, ϰαι σχημαλα, ϰαι χϱοιαι, ὑπο τϒ εθϵς συνεγειϱομενα, ϰαι τῃ ϰαθ᾽ ἡμεϱαν διαῖῃ αναϰϱιναμενα ϖαϱεσϰϵυαϰε τηϒ ψυχηϒ, ϰαι αναϖεπειϰε μηδεν αλλο ἡγεισθαι ειναι ὁτι μῃ ταυλα—ὡσϖεϱ ϵν Συμποσιῳ μεσῳ ϰνισσης ϖολλης, ϰαι οινϒ χεομενϒ, ϰαι αυλων ηχϒ, &c.—Scio equidem Ofellum hæc non dicere. Horatius verò huc ſpectat: et ſuo (i e. Socratico) more, præcepta tradit. Interim notandum eſt ſimpliciùs multo et rudiùs Ofellum dicere, quando in fine iterum redit, V. 112. Atque hâc tertiâ vice Manifeſtior venit, Horatio Hiſtoricum agente et fidelitèr omnia narrante. In tres ergo partes præcipuas diviſa eſt hæc Satyra, ubi ter narrat Horatius; in initio, ſcil. et rurſus, V. 53, et apertiùs denique, V. 112. Ergo V. 53, legendum eſt Diſtabat, ex omnibus ferè M. S. ut fatentur Commentatores: et hinc Marcilii (quem ſecutus eſt Dacierus) eo magis inepta videtur applicatio Lupi et Canis, V. 64. quia hæc a prioribus disjunguntur, et Horatius quaſi de novo Ofelli Sententiam explicat.

Nemo eſt vel paululùm verſatus in Libris Socraticis (Xenophontis præcipuè) qui non ſtatim iſta agnoſcit, unde putas, &c. V. 18. et in ſecundâ parte, V. 80. Alter ubi dicto citius, &c. Tota enim hæc Satyra Civilis, agilis, fortis, pia; non Epicurea vel Ariſtippica. Vid. Ep. 1. V. 16.—Mirum equidem non eſt quòd Horatius in Satyrâ ſequenti (V. 11.) Platonem præcipuè comitem habuiſſe ait. Hos enim Nobiliſſimos Socraticos (Xenophontem ſcil. et Platonem) imitari nunquam deſtitit, non ut Philoſophus ſolùm, ſed ut Poeta. Sic in arte Poeticâ, V. 310. Rem tibi Socraticæ, &c.

V. 10. Indomito.

i. e. Fero. Forti. (Vet. Com.) Equitatum Romanum intelligit, unde vel ſi Romana, &c. Græcari, i. e. Græcanicis Exercitationibus (Pilâ, Diſco) uti. Turn. et Lamb.

Græcari. Non hoc in pejori ſenſu Horatius: abſurdum hoc et indignum. Verum Græcari quid ſit, non comico ſenſu ex Plauto, ſed ex Livio diſce: Ille enim de Scipione, L. 29. "Ipſius etiam Imperatoris non Romanus modo ſed ne militaris quidem cultus jactabatur. Cum Pallio Crepidiſque inambulare in Gymnaſio, of the School of the ſentimental Philoſophy. Of late years, he has been as much depreciated as he was heretofore applauded; and in both caſes the matter has been carried to an naſio, Libellis etiam Palæſtræque operam dare; æquè ſegnitèr molliterque Cohortem totam Syracuſarum amænitate frui!"

V. 11. Pila.

Molliſſimus Homo Mæcenas aſſuetus etiam hoc modo Græcari et pilâ ludere. Sup. Sat. 5. V. 48, 49.

V. 18. Unde putas.

Unde? a Naturali appetitu, Naturam ergo ſequens non Gulæ ſerviens ſuavitèr vives. Huic Unde contrarium eſt illud Unde infra, V. 31. nec rectè disjunxit Cantabrigienſis Noſter, qui alias quidem optimè Periochas diſtinguit.

V. 53. Diſtabit.

Diſtabat, omnes ferè M. S. ſic ſup. V. 2. præcepit. et inf. V. 112, &c. Ofellum novi narrantem, i. e. Narrabat hæc.

V. 55. Alio.

Hæc et ſequentia uſque ad V. 112. Horatius magis ex ſuâ quàm Ofelli perſonâ profert. Confer cum Sat. 2. Lib. 1. V. 24, &c.

V. 64. Hâc.

Inepta mihi videtur Dacieri a Marcilio deſumpta Applicatio Lupi et Canis ad Lupum Tiberinum (Sup. V. 31.) et Avidienum Canem (V. 56.)

V. 67. Albuti.

Non hic Avaritia Luxuriæ opponitur, ſed Elegantiæ Negligentia. Optimè ergo Torrent. et ſic ſupra Horatius (Sat. 2. Lib. 1.) poſt Tigellium et Fuſidium oppoſitos ad Rufillum et Gorgonium tranſit.

V. 73. Sederit.

Quam facilè digreſſeris. Vet. Com. Non quæ placuerit. Hoc enim ad Voluptatem ſpectat, contra Ofelli ſenſum.

SAT. 3.

V. 9. Multa.

Sic Ep. 8. V. 3. Hìc autem de Scriptis, illic de Moribus.

V. 10. Si vacuum.

Sic Epiſt. 7. Lib. 1. V. 10. Quod ſi Bruma, &c. Ubi tamen ſcripta non promittit, ſibi ſtudens et jam ſeneſcens: hâc quidem non Juvenis.

V. 11. Platona.

Signantèr nominavit Platonem, ex hujus enim Alcibiade poſteriore Materia et Seges Satyræ. Theod. M.

V. 92. Vitium.

i. e. Malum Stoicè. Cruq. ſed in utroque ſenſu. quia inf. ſibi nequior. V. 94. Stoicis quidem Dogmatibus omnino in contrarium et perverſè utitur Stertinius, Staberi cauſam agens εἰρωνικῶς. Sic inf. V. 97. Clarus erit.

V. 104. Si quis emat citharas.

Ex Xenophontis Oecon. ut monet Lambin. Vide et Ἀπομν. Lib. 1. in fine.

V. 132. Quid enim.

Nil mutandum cum Lambino. Hic enim το Quid enim? Idem valet quod πως ἂν; vel τι ἂν; uſitatiſſimum in Dialogis (Vid. Arrian.) ubi Philoſophus pro Diſcipulo ſive Adverſario reſpondet vel interrogat μιμικως: quo modo et hic Stertinius pro Parricidâ iſto.

V. 169. Antiquo Cenſu.

Dives antiquo cenſu, i. e. Mediocri non hodierno; quia Privatus illis Cenſus erat brevis, (Od. 15. L. 2.) Hodiè vero Si quadringentis ſex ſeptem millia deſint, Plebs eris (Ep. 1.) inde ſtatim infra, V. 178. Quod ſatis eſt, &c. et Natura coercet. Sic Antiquis Moribus, Antiquâ Fide, &c.

V. 192. Conſulere.

Socratico more. Viciſſim.

V. 223. Circumtonuit.

Vide Lamb. et quid Torr. de Bellonæ fanaticis, et ſic Stoico quidem ſenſu Ambitioſi, et Glorioſi, Fanatici: haud abſimile quod, ſup. Sat. 6. Lib. 1. V. 23. ſed fulgente, &c.

V. 287. Meneni.

In Gente Meneniâ (celebri quidem) Conſulem fuiſſe quendam non ſatis ſanæ mentis ait Lambinus, ex Dion. Halicar. L. 9. Cruquius tamen inveniſſe ſe ait in quibuſd. M. S. Menæci. Sed ridiculè prorſus explicat. Nunquam enim Stoicus vel Pius aut Bonus quiſquam inter Antiquos Menæci factum damnaret. Longè aliter Epictetus apud Arrian. L. 3. C. 20.

V. 308. Ædificas.

Confer hæc cum iis quæ infra in fine, Sat. 7, et Epiſt. 1. et cum Epiſt 8. et Ep. 15. in fine.

V. 310. Corpore.

Vide Ep. 20. V. 24. et Epiſt. Auguſti in Vitâ Horatii. Sed per brevitatem Staturæ, tenuitatem et anguſtias Rei familiaris præcipuè ſignificat (ut ait Lamb.) ad illam tamen alteram Brevitatem alludens.

V. 323. Cultum.

Non ſimpliciter de Veſtitu ſed de omni Vitâ intelligendum; quo ſenſu ſup. Sat. 2. V. 66. Cultum enim appellant interdum Latini Vitæ colendæ Rationem. Lamb. in iſtum locum, ubi exempla poſuit, et inter alia hunc Horatii Verſum. (Horatius autem quanquam lautiùs vixerit, Genioque in Juventute præcipuè indulſerit, in Veſtitu tamen non adeò curioſus. Vid. Epiſt. 1. V. 96. et Sat. 3. L. 1. V. 31.

SAT. 4.

V. 2. Signa.

Vide Heinſium et Arriani præfationem, et locum Platonis in Thæteto a Daciero citatum. Talia ſunt Philoſophorum Ὑπομνηματα (Xenophontis ἀπομνημονευματα) Ἀποσημειωσεις.

V. 94. Fontes.

Hæc cùm dicit Horatius ironicè contra Epicureos, ſeriò innuit fontes ſe adire velle Socraticos, quos ſuis Catius oppoſuit, V. 3. Hanc ergo Satyram inter poſteriores pono.

SAT. 5.

Hanc Satyram inter iſtas pono quarum causâ Horatius dictus erat nimis acer. Sat. 1. L. 2. Vide inf. V. 20. Scriptam ergo Satyram hanc credo ante, Sat. 1. L. 2. et Sat. 4. L. 1.——Satyra hæc Νεκυΐας Homericæ quaſi quoddam ἀποσπασμαΐιον eſt. Ubi enim deſinit Homericus Ulyſſes conſulere Tireſiam, ibi incipit Horatianus. Heinſius.

V. 20. Hoc.

Ingeniosè ſed minùs rectè Dacierus in hunc locum, illud hoc ad Paupertatem referens, non ad Contumeliam illam: quippe indignum (ait) Ulyſſis ut ita ſentiret. Horatius vero antiquiorem potiùs quàm novam et Sanctiorem Comœdiam ſecutus, non modò hìc ſed ubique in hâc Satyrâ abutitur Perſonis Ulyſſis, Penelopes, et Tireſiæ, et eſt in hâc Satyrâ in alios acerrimus et contumelioſus, Vid. Sup. Verſ. 1.

V. 22. Dic.

De Teſtamentis enim nondum dixit, et Ulyſſes hìc quaſi tardus inducitur, ignarus ſcil. morum iſtorum. et hoc etiam ad Comœdiam illam licentiorem facit, et ad Contemptum Ulyſſis.

SAT. 6.

V. 7.

Facturus in futuro, quaſi olim tale aliquid feciſſet. Vid. inf. Sat. ſeq. V. 110. In hanc partem peccare paululum Horatius fortè potuit, in illam non potuit, quia minimè avarus.

V. 9. Denormat.

Normam noſtrates Quadram vocant. Sic Anglicè to break ſquares, et inf. Ep. 6. V. 35.

V. 17. Quid prius.

Scribit adhuc libenter et gaudens Horatius; ardor tamen minor eſt. Vid. ſup. Sat. 1. V. 7.

V. 38. Signa.

Sigillum Auguſti intelligit, cujus cuſtos Mæcenas teſte Dione et Xiphilino.

V. 40. Septimus.

Hoc tempore ergo Horatius circiter 34 annos natus.

V. 42. Duntaxat ad hoc.

Nec mentitur Horatius (ut vult Dacierus) nec Mæcenatem notat vel ludit (ut Vet. Com.) ſed de initio Amicitiæ loquitur. Quàm lentus in hác re Mæcenas. Vide ſup. Sat. 6. L. 1. V. 60.

V. 65.

an extreme. At length, it is to be hoped, that he will find his due place in the ranks of literature; and that, without being extravagantly extolled, he will continue to be read, and in

V. 65. Meique.

i. e. Amici, Familiares, (ut Vet. Com.) non ſervi vernæque procaces, qui libatis dapibus, Herilis menſæ reliquiis paſcebantur, ut ait Lamb. et Torrent. Hìc tamen ſibi non conſtat, cùm illud Meique de ſervis intelligere videtur. Horatium quidem convivas ſervos ipſos eoſdemque procaces dixiſſe vix credibile eſt: nec magis veriſimile in tali Cœtu de Philoſophiâ locutum fuiſſe; adeò ut quæri etiam poſſet anne graviora ſint hæc quàm res convivalis ferat: ut ait Torrentius (ad Verſ. 75, infra) immemor conviviorum Socraticorum et Socratici Horatii.

V. 75. Rectumne.

Planè huic inferiori opinioni favet. et ſic inf. Ep. 16. V. 52, &c.—At non ita olim. Vide ſup. Sat. 3. L. 1. V. 113.

V. 78. Ex re fabellas.

i. e. Ex uſu, utiles, Lambinus. Sed melior Cruquii Explicatio, viz. Ex re natas: hoc eſt ex argumento quod controvertitur a convivis . . . . . ut ſi quis Stoicus Divitias neget cenſendas inter Bona, contrà Peripateticus . . . . hic confeſtim Cervius Apologum, &c.

V. 91. Prærupti.

Optimè Cruquius. Quàm quæſo procul abludit hæc Deſcriptio ab Horatianâ Villâ in ſuperno Tuſculo? ita ut hæc verba Muris Urbani delicati ſunt quaſi Mæcenatis Horatium pellicientis ad Vitam Urbanam, vel potiùs Aulicam.

SAT. 7.

V. 9. Priſcus.

Vid. Ep. 15. V. 26. et ſup. Sat. 3. L. 1. in initio. Priſcus enim hic a Davo pro Horatio ponitur. inde Horatius mox Verſ. 21. Quorſum? Davus, Ad Te —atque inde, V. 53. Tu cum projectis, &c. i. e. Tu Priſce.

V. 19. Levius.

Levius quàm Priſcus ille, i. e. quàm Tu, O Horati!

V. 22. Ad Te.

Ad Te ſcil. quia ut mutabilis et levis ille Priſcus, laudas, &c.

V. 37. Ille.

i. e. Dixerit aliquis ὁ δεινα (Lamb.) modeſtè vel potiùs timidè pro Seipſo. quia ſupra, V. 2. Reformidat. et ſic infr. etiam magis, V. 44 et 116. neque enim Perſonam ſuam planè hic agnoſcit Davus, neque Heri, cum dicit Tu cum ſis quod, ego, &c. V. 40.—et Tu cum projectis, V. 53. Mox verò audacior factus, reſpondente Horatio (vel pro Horatio Davo ipſo) V. 72. palam et ſine ambagibus expoſtulat.

V. 38. Naſum.

Ut inf. V. 102. De ſeipſo enim loquitur Davus. Sic inf. V. 100. Ceſſator Davus, uti hic inerſ.

V. 53. Tu cum projectis.

Vid. ſup. ad Verſ. 9 et 37. Dacierus interim planè aſſerit Auguſtum Horatio et Annuli Equeſtris et Auguſti Clavi jus dediſſe. quâ auctoritate fretus neſcio. Quòd ſi hoc verum eſt, non neceſſe eſt ad Priſcum recurrere (Ut ſup. V. 9.) neque tantam timiditatem Davo tribuere (Ut ſup. V. 37.) qui ſemel tantum perſonam mutat, quando dixit dixerit ille pro ſeipſo. Poſtea magis audacter; jam ſtatim ad V. 40. Tu cum, &c. ut antea, V. 22. Ad Te inquam. Sed cum rurſus infra, V. 60. Quo te demiſit non tam commodè de ipſo Horatio explicavi poteſt (quia potius quid factum, quam quid futurum narrat Davus) ideo et rurſus fortaſſe de Priſco illo, Horatii Perſonam exhibente, intelligendum eſt. Facilis et Naturalis ſemper eſt Poeta Noſter Horatius, et in Compoſitione atque Ordine minimè obſcurus. Vel ergo notiſſima fuit olim iſta Fabula de Priſco; vel ſimile aliquid ſibi eveniſſe aut evenire potuiſſe indicat Horatius jam ſobrius et ſecurus, non ut olim Calidus Juventâ Conſule Planco, Od. 14. L. 3. Mox ergo reſpondet Non ſum Mæchus (V. 72.) Non ſum, in præſenti. Ad iſta, quæ olim facta ſunt, nihil reſpondet.

V. 72. Non ſum.

Quaſi dixiſſet jam non amaſius ſum vel futurus ſum mæchus. quia ſupra Davus Evâſti? Credo metues, &c. ειρωνικως.

V. 75. Rerum.

Stoicè. Sic Arr. L. 3. C. 20. Παυσασθ' ἑαυτους δηλας ποιουντες, πρωτον των πραγματων, ειτα δι' αυτα και των ανθρωπων των ταυτα περιποιειν η αφαιρεισθαι δυναμενων. Et Lib. 3. C. 24. Τον γαρ ὑπ' ανθρωπε μελλοντα ἡττασθαι, πολυ προτερον ὑπο των πραγματων δει ἡττασθαι. Et C. 26. Τα γαρ πραγματα προτερες τετων κυριες ἐχομεν. Hic ergo per Res intelligendum eſt τα πραγματα (Scil. Divitiæ, Honores, aliaque exteriora interioribus oppoſita) infra vero, Ep. 1. V. 19. Τα γινομενα a Providentiâ ſcil. vel Fortunâ. Hìc reluctandum; illic cedendum; ut Libertas nobis contingat.

V. 86. Totus teres.

Virtus enim ex Stoico Dogmate ita ſecum Virtutem trahit ut concatenati Annuli. Cruq.

V. 87. Læve morari.

Perſ. Sat. 1. V. 64. Ut per læve ſeveros effundat junctura ungues. Sic ſup. Sat. 5. L. 2. V. 32. Nec tamen contemnendus Dacierus, qui altiorem ſenſum petit ex Platone, quem cum cæteris Socraticis Horatius ſæpe in animo habet.

V. 101. Veterum.

De hoc Morbo vide Ciceronem in Paradox. Stoicis. C. 5. ubi Lucullum planè innuit, callidum nimis et barbaro iſti L. Mummio nimis contrarium. Vide Plutarchum in Vitâ: ubi et de Mummio et Cethego. Cicero autem, uti Docti et Viri bonè omnes, Lucullum amavit, qui etiamſi his Vitiis detentus, reipublicæ, Philoſophiæ, et huic præcipuè Socraticæ ſive Stoicæ favebat.

V. 118. Opera.

Sic Cuſtodia pro iis ipſis accipitur qui aliquid cuſtodiunt.

SAT. 8.

V. 3. Sic.

Reſpondet Fundanius (Ut inf. V. 19.) More Comico, Sic ut nunquam melius, i. e. jucundius (propter Riſus et res ridiculas) non lautius.

EPIST. LIB. 1.

Ep. 1. Confer cum Epiſt. 7. 10. et Lib. 2. Ep. 2.

V. 10. Ludicra.

Inf. Ep. 14. V. 36.—Ep. 2. L. 2. V. 143.

Carmina ſcil. amatoria, Satyraſque jocoſas (quales ſunt Sat. 5. 7. 9. L. 1.—et 8. L. 2.) et mordentes de quibus. Vid. Sat 1. L. 2. V. 21 et 46, &c.

V. 11. Decens.

Τι καλον και πρεπον. Secundum Stoicos. Jam enim ad Socraticam veram et divinam Sapientiam ab inſanienti illâ (Sup. Od. 34. L. 1.) revertitur Horatius.

V. 16. Agilis—Civilibus.

Πρακτικος και πολιτικος cum Socraticis, Stoicis, &c.—Contra Epicureorum præceptum.

V. 17. Veræ cuſtos rigiduſque.

Sic inf. Veræ Vitæ. Ep. 2. L. 2. V. 144. Vide et Ep. 18. V. 8.—Cuſtos, i. e. nihil præter Virtutem in bonis ducere. Vide Cic. de fin. Bon. et Mal. et quid ibi Cato in initio Libri. Vid. inf. Ep. 6. V. 30.

V. 18. Nunc.

Quaſi dixiſſet pudet fateri. Sed revera alius pudor Horatium urget, dum Mæcenati ſcribit, et Amico molli converſionem ſuam ad ſeveriorem Philoſophiam indicat, et quia olim Ariſtippum tantoperè laudavit. Vid. Ep. 17.

Relabor—quia olim Epicureis et Cyrenaicis renunciavit. Vide Od. 34. L. 1.

V. 19. Subjungere.

Vera lectio. Vide Ciceronem in Acad. Quæſt. Lib. 2. 45. prope finem. " Veruntamen (inquit) video quàm ſuaviter Voluptas ſenſibus noſtris blandiatur. Labor ut aſſentiar Epicuro aut Ariſtippo. revocat Virtus vel potius reprehendit manu; pecudum illos motus eſſe dicit: Hominem jungit Deo, &c."

Horatius noſter melius. Labor (inquit) ut aſſentiar Socrati, Zenoni, &c. revocat Voluptas. in Ariſtippi et Epicuri præcepta relabor, Virtutem veram deſero. Fortunæ non reſponſo (Ut inf. V. 68.) ſed ſubſervio, Deo me nec jungo nec ſubjungo. Majore tento (Ep. 17. V. 24.)

in ſome degree to be admired. This tribute, at leaſt, is due to his "Inquiry concerning Virtue," and to his "Moraliſts;" and in a great meaſure to his "Advice to an Author." But

V. 24.) preſentibus (uti Ariſtippus ipſe) haud æquus. Et mihi res, non me rebus, &c. In hâc ergo Epiſtolâ poſteriorem ſententiam, in illâ 17â. priorem probat. Hìc ſeneſcens, illìc nondum.

Vide ipſa Ariſtippi Verba, Mores, Conatus, in Dialogo iſto Socratico Xenophontis Απομν. L. 2. in initio. et inter alia αλλ' εγω τοι (εφη ὁ Αριστιππος) ουδε εις την δουλειαν αν εμαυτον ταττω. Quæ verba Horatius proculdubio in animo habuit, cùm ſcripſerit ſubjungere. Sic Epictetus apud Arrian.

Vulgatum eſt Philoſophiæ præceptum το συνταττειν vel ὑποταττειν ἑαυτον τοις ὁλοις (Vide Simplicium in Cap. Ench. 78. et Arrian. L. 1. C. 12.) το συναρμοσαι την αυτου βουλησιν τοις γινομενοις. Lib. 2. C. 14. Sic in Enchirid. 77. 18. Sic M. Ant. L. 4. 23. et Lib. 6. 39.—Vid. ſup. Sat. 2. L. 1. V. 76. et infra Ep. 17. 24. Vide et infr. hujus Epiſtolæ, V. 69.—Sic et Eurip. Marco citatus L. 7. 38. Τοις πραγμασι γαρ ουχι θυμωσθαι χρεων· hìc vero potiùs τα γινομενα quàm τα πραγματα· Vid. Sat. 7. L. 2. V. 75.

V. 26. Æquè neglectum.

Morbum fatetur, cujus remedium Philoſophia; pro quâ ſequens Apologia eſt: ut Ep. 2. L. 2. V. 41. De Morbo ergo in ſequentibus agitur. Mæcenas vero ut nec Morbo ſic neque Remedio fidem exhibet. ſic enim in fine Nec Medici credis nec curatoris egere. V. 102.

V. 30. Glyconis.

Glycon vel Lycon Philoſophus. Vide Diog. Laert. et Heinſii Notam.

V. 51. Sine pulvere.

Sine pulvere. Aul. Gell. L. 5. C. 6. impulverea, minus glorioſa. Duplicem ergo pono Interrogationem, viz. Quis contemnat? Et cui, quæſo, ſpes, cui ipſa conditio palmæ ſine pulvere dulcis eſſe poteſt? Philoſophica Horatio uſitata. Sic Arrian. L. 1. 29. Εμε νυν καταπιθηναι, &c. Sic etiam de Hercule, C. 6. et Lib. 4. C. 10. et Lib. 2. C. 11. Labores (inquit) qui pro virtute capiuntur, etiam dulces ſunt: Iſti pro divitiis infructuoſi, miſeri. Ad hos igitur confuge, ut illos devites. Sic Ep. 6. V. 30. Fortis omiſſis Hoc age deliciis. Fortis, i. e. Labores tolerans, amans. φιλοπονος.

V. 52. Vilius argentum.

Editor Noſter Cantabrigienſis novam hìc periocham ponit, quaſi verba hæc ſint Jani, qui concedit Aurum reverà virtutibus vilius eſſe; pecuniam tamen primùm quærendam; quia poſt nummos Virtus comparari poteſt, et Laus. Sine Nummis Laus nulla. Jocosè ſane et more Horatiano.

V. 69. Præſens.

Præſens Philoſophus. Monitor viam monſtrans, exemplo probans, ipſe Vir Bonus, te melior. De quo ſup. V. 48.

Aptat—Aptare idem eſt quod, Sup. V. 19. Subjungere rebus vel fortunæ.

V. 71. Judiciis.

Hoc idem eſt quod Inf. Ep. 2. Lib. 2. V. 154. Monitoribus iiſdem. Hinc ſequens Fabula de leone ægroto, cujus in Antrum (i. e. Aulam ditantem et corrumpentem) qui introitum ſuadet Animalium vel Hominum Vulgus, malè ſuadet et hortatur, malus eſt Judex, Monitor, Medicus. Sup. V. 25. Confer etiam cum Ep. 10. V. 10 et 34.

V. 76. Quid.

Quod Remedium? cùm malum inde non fit levius? (Ut Ep. 2. L. 2. V. 150.) Quod conſilium? cùm omnes diſcrepant, imo Sibi-ipſis non conſentiunt. Sic inf. ſtatim, V. 81, 82.

V. 108. Pituita.

Jocatur proculdubio Horatius: non ſic quaſi ad Ingenium et Dogmata Epicurea rediiſſet, ut ingeniosè Torrentius. Neque enim tam Stoicos quam Seipſum hìc more ſuo irridet Horatius; qui quamvis naturâ Bilioſus potius quam Pituitoſus dici poterit, cùm tamen Pituita (ut aiunt Medici Veteres) cerebrum alit, idcirco non minus Cerebro quam Stomacho tumultum fert, Sat. 2. L. 2. V. 76.—et cerebroſos ſicuti et triſtes efficit, cùm malè affecta et moleſta eſt. Sic Perſius Horatii imitator, Sat. 2. V. 57. Somnia pituitâ qui purgatiſſima mittant. Eſt etiam ſpecies Pituitæ Vitrea: et Perſius de Irâ loquens, Sat. 3. V. 8. turgeſcit vitrea bilis quam noſter ſplendidam bilem dixit, Sat. 3. L. 2. 141. Idem Humor vitreus, ſive pituitoſus, ſive bilioſus, lippitudinis etiam cauſa fuit Horatio. Bilioſis enim ſiccam lippitudinem moleſtam ſcribit Galenus. In duplicem ergo Morbum Oculorum et Cerebri jocatur Horatius, qui aliàs ſæpe et lippum ſe et cerebroſum vel iracundum fatetur. Sapiens vero quocunque modo ad Iras ſive Querelas deſcendens, ſanus non amplius eſt, ſenſu Stoico: Et ſic præcipuè ſanus niſi cum Pituita moleſta eſt. Eodem modo et hodiè abutimur Verbis et Notionibus Medicorum, cum pro Melancholici, Moroſi, et Queruli Hominis affectu ſubſtituimus vulgatum illud Anglicum Spleen et Vapours. Atque hæc, ni fallor, Pituita eſt illa Moleſta jucundiſſimi Horatii. De Melancholico affectu in Sapiente Stoico, Vide Arr. L. 1. C. 18. in fine—et L. 2. C. 17.—et de tertio et perfectiſſimo Loco. L. 3. C. 2. Τριτος εστιν ὁ ηδη τοις προκοπτουσιν επιβαλλων, ὁ περι την αυτων τυτων ασφαλειαν, ἱνα μηδ' εν ὑπνοις λαθη τις ανεξεταστος παρελθουσα φαντασια, μηδ' εν οινωσει, μηδε μελαγχολωντος, &c. Hæc verò inter Myſteria Diſciplinæ: neque intelligunt Commentatores.

EPIST. 3.

V. 29. Si patriæ volumus.

Ad Stoicam ergo non Epicuream Philoſophiam hæc pertinent.

V. 32. At.

Rectius Ac—et ſic interrogationis Notâ non hìc ſed infra ponenda poſt feros.

V. 33. Heu calidus ſanguis, heu rerum, &c.

Cantabrigienſis noſter plurium M. S. lectionem hanc vulgatæ anteponit. rectè equidem. Horatius enim Philoſophum agit, et (uti ſæpe in Sermonibus et Epiſtolis Gravioribus) Stoicum. Stoicis vero Perturbatio omnis ab opinione falsâ: idemque Calidus Sanguis (i. e. Ira) et Inſcitia. Sic ſup. Sat. 3. L. 2. 43.

EPIST. 4.

V. 7. Dederant.

Dederunt M. S. omnes. Nondum enim pauper Tibullus, ſed Juvenis et Dives; Amoribus vero indulgens, et inter Querelas Curaſque Amatorias vitam degens. Sic inf. V. 12.

Fruendi—non diſſipandi; neque talem rem tali nomine unquam deſignaret Horatius. Quem Vide ſup. in Sat. 2. V. 62.—et Sat. 6. L. 2. V. 7.

V. 12. Inter ſpem curamque.

Hæc omnia ad Amores præcipuè, non ad infortunia mutatumve Tibulli ſtatum pertinent. Exprobratio ſanè eſſet talis Commemoratio. Confer hæc cum iſtis ad eundem, Od. 33. L. 1. Vide etiam quæ ad Valgium, Od. 9. L. 2. et quas Amor curas habet (ut Epod. 2.) Vide Od. 4 et 5.—et 8. L. 2. Quas iras——

V. 16. Epicuri.

Epicureos irridens (Ut ſup. Sat. 8. L. 2.) Epicureum tamen ſeipſum profitetur; nondum, ut videtur, reverſus ad fortiorem iſtam Diſciplinam Socraticam (de quâ Vid. ſup. Ep. 1. et inf. Ep. 2. L. 2. V. 45. et Art. Poet. Verſ. 309. atque alibi) quanquam illuc ſpectat, ſup. V. 4 et 5. ideoque tanquam diſcedens hinc parvam Sectæ habet reverentiam. Rectius hoc.

Porcum—ineptus quidam Epicuri fautor Meibonius in Diog. Laert. ad Vitam Epicuri, parcum non porcum legit, ridiculè prorsùs.

EPIST. 6.

V. 1. Nil admirari.

Nil admirari, &c. V. 9. Qui timet, mirabitur et cupiet. Qui cupiet, metuet quoque (Inf. Ep. 16. V. 65.) Neque hoc ſolum: in ipsâ enim admiratione timor (ait) quidam ineſt; ſicuti et ſpes: eodem modo et in timore admiratio; quia pavor (i. e. perturbatio, εκπληξις, εκστασις) utrique affectui communis eſt, et ex utriuſque

But whatever becomes of Lord Shafteſbury's character as a writer, he was excellent as a man. This appears from every teſtimony that remains concerning him. " It muſt be owned,' utriuſque objectis naſcitur. Ex falſis bonis, falſa gaudia, viz. Lætitia, exultatio, quæ et in malis numerantur. Hinc ſtatim infra Gaudeat an doleat—quid ad rem. Paradoxon eſt Stoicum. Vide Ciceron. Tuſc. L. 4. et Laertium in Zenone. Totaque hæc Epiſtola ex Stoicorum, non Epicureorum, Cyrenaicorum, (ut creditur) præceptis deprompta. Hinc illud inf. V. 16. Ultra quam ſatis eſt, &c. i. e. perturbatè, cum iſtâ admiratione et εμπληξει: ad quod pertinet etiam præceptum illud ſeu cautio de uſu ορεξεως Epict. Ench. C. 7. et Arr. L. 3. C. 13. in fine. Hæc omnia Stoicè. Et ſic infr. V. 34. Si Virtus hoc Una poteſt dare. In ſequentibus verò perpetuâ Ironiâ utitur: Si res ſola, V. 47.—Si fortunatum ſpecies, V. 49. Si benè qui cœnat, V. 56.—Notandum eſt perpetuum illud το ſi. Poſtremò Verſu 65. Si Mimnermus, &c. Ubi rursùs Voluptates unàque Voluptatum Præconem Poetam damnat et aſpernatur; minimè verò (ut creditur) laudat, amicove ſuo commendat.

V. 11. Improviſa, &c.

Cic. Tuſc. Quæſt. L. 4. Simul objecta ſpecies cujuſpiam eſt quod Bonum videatur, ad id adipiſcendum impellit ipſa Natura. Id cùm conſtanter prudenterque fit, ejuſmodi Appetitionem Stoici βυλησιν appellant.

Et Seneca, Ep. 77. Stultis Fortunæ credentibus omnis videtur nova Rerum et inopinata Facies, &c.

V. 31. Virtutem verba.

Sic enim Epicurei de Juſto et Pulchro. Ουκ ην τι καθ' ἑαυτο δικαιοσυνη, &c. (Diog. Laert. Epicur.) τοις μη φωναις κεναις ἑαυτες συνταραττεσιν. Sic et illud μηδεν ειναι το καλον η αρα το ενδοξον. Arr. L. 2. C. 22.

V. 65. Vivas.

Ironicè. Jam enim Horatius non amplius ad exemplum Mimnermi amatoria ſcribit. Vid. Ep. 1. 10. et Ep. 2. L. 2. 145, &c. et etiam Epiſt. ſequentem.

EPIST. 7.

V. 3. Sanum.

Annotandum eſt, quòd etiamſi Horatius hìc de Curâ corporis ſolùm loquitur, hæc omnia de Animo debent intelligi. Confer hanc Ep. cum primâ ad Mæcenatem, atque etiam cum 6mâ et 10mâ. Inf. et Lib. 2. 2dâ. Vide etiam Sat. 6. L. 2. V. 18. ubi ſimul et Animi et Corporis Sanitatem ab eâdem causâ ſcil. a ſeceſſu ducit.

V. 12. Leget.

Quanquam tota hæc Epiſtola (uti ſup. prima) Apologia eſt Horatii pro Studiis ſuis et Philoſophiæ amore, cùm tamen neque libros neque Philoſophiam apertè nominat, hoc ſolum leget ad rem nauticam ſpectare credo, leget littora—Confer cum Sat. 3. L. 2. V. 9, 10, 11. De Studiis ergo intelligendum.

V. 12. Contractuſque leget.

Vid. ſupra Annot.—At ſi hoc verbum leget de lecturâ intelligendum eſt (quod ſuadet revera ſimilis locus, L. 1. Sat. 6. Lecto aut ſcripto quod me tacitum juvet, in priori tamen ſenſu το contractus accipiendum eſt, et ad vitam et ſeceſſum referendum, non ad Corpus, neque ad Animum, quo ſenſu Cruquius. Vide Senec. de Tranquil. C. 9. Non poteſt tanta varietas et Iniquitas Caſuum ita depelli, ut non multum procellarem irruat magna Armamenta pandentibus. Sequitur Habitare contractiùs. Huic enim contrarium eſt Vela pandere vel explicare. Sic idem Seneca, Ibid. C. 3. in fine.—Utcunque Fortuna permittet ita aut explicabimus nos aut contrahemus. Vide et ipſum Horat. Od. 10. L. 2. Rectiùs vives, &c. et Sat. 2. L. 2. V. 113. Non latius uſum.

V. 22. Dignis paratum.

i. e. Dignis donis dandis (uti Cruquius) vel Dignis viris largiri liberaliter, ut cæteri Comment.—Ego Horatium credo alludere ad notum aliquod Poetæ vel Philoſophi Dictum, quale in Cebetis Tab. de ſapiente Divite cui mandatur συντομως απειλθειν προς την βεβαιαν κ) ασφαλη δοσιν· non tamen ut ignoret quid diſtent æra, &c. Sapiens enim Fortunæ bona neque ſpernit neque odit. Merens ergo dat. Sic Tu mihi meritum tuum et laudem (i. e. Virtutem) agnoſcenti. Vid. inf. V. 38 et 39.

V. 34. Hâc ego ſi compellor.

Si Tu (Mæcenas) nuperam hanc otii et ſeceſsûs electionem, non, ut profiteor, a vero judicio et Deliciarum contemptu, ſed a plenitudine, copiâ, et indolentiâ ortam credis, ideoque Me tanquam ingratum perſtringis falſumque, quia pauper olim ad Aulam, repleturus me ſcilicet, acceſſi; nunc dives liberalitate tuâ factus, et laborem omnem moramque circa Amicos fugiens recedo; oſtendam contrarium. En! paratus ſum donata reponere, pauperque rurſus fieri, et exemplo monſtrare, me meam libertatem otiumque (Divitiis Arabum cariorem) etiam in pauperrimo Statu amplecti velle. Tenuem me rursùs macrumque videbis; in cumeram vero non facile ſicut antea repentem. Recipe ergo Magis apta Tibi tua dona. Te obſecro et obteſtor (ut olim Philippum Vulteius) vitæ me redde priori. Confer hæc omnia cum Ep. 1. 10. et L. 2. 2.

V. 37. Verecundum.

Non temere ergo in cumeram repſerat (ut ſup. V. 39.) ſed coactus quaſi (ut inf. Vulteius, V. 60.) et dona Mæcenatis larga recuſans ſæpe (ut ſup. Hoſpes) haud ſponte Dives factus eſt.

V. 39. Lætus.

Non dolens, non te incuſans, vel minùs amans, imò laudans, nec verbo parcius. Hoc modo Libertatem meumque vivendi morem ſine invidiâ vel ingratitudinis ſuſpicione retinebo. Sic Dignum me etiam præſtabo. V. 24.

V. 43. Tibi.

Tibi ſcil. Magnati, Aulico, Elegantiarum Arbitro, magis convenientia, non mihi ſimplici viro, inopis et puſilli animi (ut Sat. 4. L. 1.) otium ignobile, ſeceſſum, et ſtudia amanti.

V. 46. Strenuus.

Fabula ſive Hiſtoria hæc prioris Fabulæ (Vulpeculæ ſcil. et Muſtelæ) Epanorthoſis eſt. Oſtendit Horatius ſe non tam ſuâ culpâ quam Mæcenatis dolis in Aulicam Vitam tranſiiſſe et Libertatem perdidiſſe. —Confer hæc cum Fabulâ Murium S. 6. L. 2. et Cervi inf. Ep. 10.

V. 52. Demetri.

Confer hæc cum Sat. 6. Lib. 1. V. 54. Demetrius hìc pro Virgilio et Vario, ut Philippus pro Mæcenate, Vulteius pro Horatio ponitur.

V. 56. Præconem.

Præconem vel Coactorem ut inf. V. 65. Talis fuit Horatii Pater. Nec longè abfuit a tali quæſtu Horatius ipſe poſtquam amiſit paterna bona. Vid. ſup. Sat. 6. L. 1. V. 86.—et Ep. 2. L. 2. V. 50.

V. 78. Laudare.

Si Horatius Aulam Voluptatis.

V. 85. Immoritur ſtudiis.

Vulteius avaritiâ, Horatius Luxuriâ, Amore captus: Vulteius Ruſticis Studiis, Horatius Urbanis, Aulicis Negotiis et Elegantiis, paraſiticis Menſis, Poeticis Laboribus obſtrictus eſt. Vid. Sat. 6. L. 2. —et Ep. 2. L. 2. 50, &c. — uſque ad 145. Vide etiam Sat. 7. Lib. 2. 53.—et Sat. 4. L. 2. in fine.—et inf. Ep. 10. V. 10.

EPIST. 8.

V. 9. Offendar—Iraſcar.

Confer hæc cum Satyrâ 3. L. 2. in initio et fine. Ubi correptus a Damaſippo ridiculo quidem nec verè amico, ſatis tamen et Veturnum hunc ſuum, cæteraque Vitia et aſperitatem erga Monitores explicat, honeſtè quidem et ſimpliciter. Sic Sat. 7. ejuſdem Libri cum Davo. De Irâ hâc ſuâ et Rabie horrendâ (uti amplificat Damaſippus ille Pſeudo-Stoicus, V. 323.) Vide Ep. 20. V. 25. iraſci celerem. et in Sat. illâ ſeptimâ L. 2. V. 34.—et ſequentia, etiam quæ in fine υποκριτικως et quaſi in ſcenâ. Vide etiam Sat. 4. L. 1. V. 135, 6, 7. et Sat. 3. L. 1. V. 29.

EPIST. 10.

V. 10. Liba.

Menſas ſcil. paraſiticas et regias ut in Auguſti Ep. fragmentis: De eodem tædio vitæ Aulicæ, poeticæ, aſſenowned," says Bishop Warburton, "that this Lord had many excellent qualities, both as a man and a writer. He was temperate, chaste, honest, and a lover of his country (u)." There

(u) Dedication to the Divine Legation, ubi supra, p. 28, assentatoriæ, Desiderioque Libertatis et Philosophiæ, Vide Epist. 1. 7. et Lib. 2. 2.—et hanc ipsam inf. V. 33, 34, &c. et Sat. 6. L. 2. V. 80.

V. 11. Pane.

Sic Pers. Sat. 5. Fruge Cleantheâ. et Max. Tyr. Diss. 12. εγω δε ποθω προς την ευωχιων τροφην λογων, &c. Huic opponitur, in ludibrium, το πλακουνταριον, Stoicè pro luxu. Vide Arrianum.

V. 12. Vivere naturæ, &c.

i. e. Vivere seligentem quæ secundum Naturam, &c. Cic. de Fin. Bon. Lib. 3. Stoicè Summum Bonum.

EPIST. 15.

V. 26. Mænius.

Inconstantiam suam fatetur Horatius. Hìc cum Mænio, sup. (Sat. 3.) cum Tigellio se confert. Hoc vitium Horatii perstringit quoque Davus sub Personâ Prisci. Sat. 7. L. 2.

V. 42. Nimirum hic ego sum.

Sic Sat. 7. L. 2. V. 23, &c. et Ep. 8. V. 12.

Talis ergo Horatius hactenus: Posthac magis constans. Vide Ep. 7. V. 44. et Ep. 14. V. 16.

V. 45. Vos.

Non sic postea Horatius. Vide Ep. 10. V. 8.

EPIST. 16.

V. 52. Oderunt.

Sic Stoici: Epicurei verò alitèr; et est quidem hæc Epistola tota Stoica. Vid. inf. V. 65.

V. 54. Sit spes fallendi.

Negabant Epicurei Spem Secreti ullam esse in Furtis: ideoque (non aliâ de Causâ) a furto abstinendum. Contra verò Stoicis spem esse: sed ad Amicitiam et Fidem non Usum sed Rectum nos trahere. (Sup. Sat. 6. L. 2.) Hìc verò contra Epicureos Disputatio est, et quæ sequuntur statim (viz. Damnum est non facinus) omnia Stoica sunt.

EPIST. 17.

V. 24. Ferè præsentibus æquum.

Ægrè quidem se præsentibus rebus et concessis subjungentem (ut sup. Ep. 1. V. 19.) sed majore et splendidiora tentantem, ut sup. V. 20.) Vid. Sat. 2. L. 1. 76.

V. 42. Experiens.

In hâc vitâ atque arte parasiticâ hìc se jactat Horatius, sibi placens. Non ita posthac. Vid. inf. Ep. 18. 86 et 107.—et sup. Ep. 10. 10.—et Ep. 1. L. 1.

EPIST. 18.

V. 86. Inexpertis.

Non immeritò Horatius jam expertus hoc dicit. Scriptam ergo hanc Epistolam post præcedentem credo, ubi se jactat, V. 35.—Paululum equidem distat parasitica hæc potentis Amici cultura ab istâ infami sup. Sat. 5. L. 2. Confer hæc quæ sequuntur cum istis præceptis, præcipuè 90, &c.

V. 107. Ut mihi vivam.

Ut mihi non aliis; potentibus scil. Amicis, divitibus, Aulicis; uti olim Ego, jam Tu. Dulcis enim inexpertis, &c.—Sup. V. 86.—Tibi interim vitam istam parasiticam sequenti, et inexperto, ego expertus Consilium do. Talis est hæc Epistola ad Lollium. In præcedenti, V. 17. ad Scævam, nondum adeo expertus Horatius, Vitam parasiticam laudat.

EPIST. 19.

V. 10. Edixit.

Ennius certè, vel alius aliquis, de quibus supra mentio est. Eodem modo de Poetis, inf. in Arte Poet. V. 295, &c.

EP. 20.

V. 21. Majores.

De Militiâ sub Bruto loquitur. Vide Sat. 6. L. 1. V. 48.—et inf. Epist. 2. V. 50.

V. 23. Me primis, &c.

Bruto scil. postea Mæcenati et Augusto. his domi et in pace, illi in bello.

EPISTOLARUM.

LIB. 2. EP. 1.

V. 145. Fescennina, &c.

Vide et apud Græcos quid simile evenit. Ars Poet. V. 282. Confer etiam cum Aristot. Poet. C. 4.—Ubi de ortu Comœdiæ agit. Obscœna nempè et rustica olim. Etiam suo tempore in quibusdam civitatibus τα φαλλικα permansere. Post illum rursus nova Comœdia politior et emendatior Caput extulit. Lex est accepta, &c. Ars Poet. 283.—Imperfectam esse Comœdiam suo tempore planè sentiebat Philosophus.—Nam quoad Tragœdiam hæc habet: και πολλας μεταβολας μεταβαλουσα ἡ τραγωδια επαυσατο, επει εσχε την ἑαυτης φυσιν. Vide Liv. Lib. 7. C. 2.

V. 168. Creditur.

Τοσουτω δε εν λογω δει μαλλον φιλοπονειν περι αυτων ὁσω εξ ελαττονων βοηθηματων ὁ λογος εστι των μετρων. Arist. Rhetor. L. 3. C. 2.

V. 170. Plautus.

Inf. Ars Poet. V. 270. Negat Plauto in personis repræsentandis illud ηθικον adesse. Heins: sic sup. V. 58. Properare dicitur Plautus, Terentius Arte vincere. Terentio quantum favet Horatius, Vide sup. Sat. 3. L. 2. V. 2, &c. nisi quòd ista omnino Græca sint, et ex Menandri fonte potiùs quam e Terentio sumpta.

V. 173. Dossennus.

Alius Poeta Comicus Romanus: de quo Plinius, L. 14. C. 13.

EP. 2.

V. 20. Dixi, &c.

Justificatio.

V. 26. Luculli, &c.

Excusatio 1ma. a Fortunâ mutata, Libertate adeptâ. Confer hæc cum Epist. 7. V. 29, &c. et cum Annot. —Uti hìc militis sic supra Vulpeculæ sub Imagine Horatius seipsum Fortunasque suas describit. Fortiùs hìc quidem, nec seipsum purgans, aut ab exemplo recedens: quippe hìc Amico Solùm, illic Patrono rem exponit. Neque militis hoc exemplum ferre potuisset, ut diceret, En! Zonam reddo et Tibi tua dona relinquo. Nullum ibi jus relictum Mæcenati, nulla causa postulandi, expostulandive. Zonam enim primam (i. e. rem familiarem paternam) propriam habuit et nulli debitam: etiam secundam illam a Mæcenate datam, laboribus suis (inf. V. 50, &c.) ingenio studiisque non aliter quâm stipendium justum meruit. Sed hoc ne diceret Mæcenati, Modestia prohibuit: aliâ ergo imagine sibi minùs favorabili ad Illum usus est, politè admodum, at non minùs liberè.

V. 45. Academi.

Ep. 4. L. 1. V. 4. Veterem veram et genuinam Academiam intelligit, unde postea ad Epicureos deflexerat, nunc tandem rediit; atque ut supra, Ep. 1. V. 11. Quid verum atque Decens curat, &c. agilis et civilis fit, V. 16. Virtutisque veræ rigidus satelles.

V. 51. Paupertas.

Sic Luculli militem, sup. V. 26. Nunc verò invitanti Floro vel Neroni, imo Mæcenati ipsi et Augusto recusat Noster.

V. 55. Singula.

Excusatio 2da ab Impotentiâ.

V. 58. Denique non omnes.

Excusatio 3tia a Discrepantiâ.

V. 65. Præter cætera.

Excusatio 4ta ab Occupationibus.

V. 87. Frater erat.

Excusatio 5ta ab Adulatione et Invidiâ Poetarum.

V. 106. Ridentur mala.

Excusatio 6ta a Difficultate et Labore operis.

V. 126. Prætulerim Scriptor.

Excusationum Confirmatio, et Conclusio e superioribus

There is a paſſage in one of the Earl of Shafteſbury's Letters to Robert Moleſworth, Eſq; which is worthy of notice. " I am perſuaded," ſays his Lordſhip, " to think no vices will " grow oribus in hunc modum. Poeta, ſi ineptus, Beatus; ſi ſanus, miſer. Ineptus vero fieri quis vult? Miſer quidem nemo ſequitur ergo, V. 141. Nimirum ſapere eſt, &c.

V. 141. Sapere.

Quia priùs dixerat Quam ſapere et ringi. Sed verſus ſcribere, negat omnino ſapientis eſſe. Eſt ergo Epanorthoſis iſtius Dicti, ſup. V. 128.—Nunc verò abjectis nugis et erroribus Poetarum (qui vel inſani vel miſeri) ad Philoſophiam et ſui emendationem ſe convertit Horatius.—Heinſius hæc omnia turbavit, et Epiſtolam perfectiſſimam miſerè in Editionibus ſuis laceravit, eâdem fiduciâ alias contaminans. Vid. infr. in Arte Poet. ad V. 86.

V. 144. Veræ Vitæ.

i. e. Rectè vivere et Naturæ convenienter, ut ſup. Ep. 6. V. 29. et Ep. 10. V. 12. et Ep. 16. V. 17. Hoc nimirum eſt illud Verum atque decens. Το καλον, το πρεπον, ab Epicureis irriſum.

V. 158. Proprium.

Hæc omnia Stoica, viz. Τι εφ' ημιν, τι ουκ εφ' ημιν· τι ημετερον, τι αλλοτριον· V. inf. V. 175.

De Arte Poeticâ.

Quintilianus Epiſtolam hanc ſic vocat. Ab aliis tamen, non ab Horatio ipſo, Nomen datum credo, neque communitèr receptum: ut ex M. S. apparet (Vide Cruq. et Lamb.) Eſt enim Epiſtola Illa ad Auguſtum (1ma ſcil. L. 2.) de Arte Poeticâ, cujus Artis etiam præcepta tradit, in Ep. ad Florum, quæ inter hanc et illam eſt: adeò ut tres ſint de eâdem re. Et in Libris antiquis Epiſtola hæc (rectè ut opinor) tertia Libri. 2di inſcribitur, ſimpliciter, vel addito tantùm ad Piſones, ut Lambinus. Cruquius epiſtolam hanc vocat Co-epiſtolam et Co-hæredem; reſpectu ſcil. ſuperiorum duarum. Meritò tamen de Arte Poeticâ inſcribitur: quia eſt præcipua, neque ut credunt nonnulli imperfecta; ſed omnibus modis ornata, polita, perfecta.

V. 1. Humano, &c. ad V. 37.—Capillo.—Conſtitutio Συστασις.

V. 38. Sumite materiam—ad V. 41.—Ordo.—Materia Υλη·

V. 42. Ordinis—ad V. 45.—Auctor. Ordo Ταξις.—

V. 45. Promiſſi Carminis.

Longi Epici. V. infr. V. 150, 152. et quæ ibi de Homero. et poſtea, V. 360. Horatius enim promittenda carmina jactandaque antequam edita ſint, haud cenſet: quum premi pauciſque ſaltem oſtendi dum componuntur ſuadet, inf. V. 386. et ſup. Epiſt. 2. V. 114. Editoque jam in opere Promiſſorem damnat. V. 138.

V. 46. In verbis—ad V. 100.—Dictio Λεξις.

V. 73. Res geſtæ.

Poema Epicum.—Poſt præcepta familiaria atque obvia, ad Hiſtoriam Poeſeos et Poetarum deſcendit. inde ad graviora τα ηθικα· Vide inf. V. 295.

V. 75. Verſibus.

Elegiacum.

V. 79. Archilochum, &c.

Poema Iambicum.

V. 83. Muſa dedit.—

Lyricum.

V. 86. Deſcriptas ſervare vices, &c.

Dramaticum, ubi ſtatim de Moribus.—De Tragœdiâ hic præcipuè diſſerit Horatius uſque ad V. 130. Poſtea vero V. 153, de Comœdiâ: Vid. infr. V. 114. et Annot.—Hæc omnia turbavit Heinſius, ut ſup. in Ep. 2dâ.—Vide infr. Annot. ad V. 309.

Deſcriptas Vices.—Χαρακτηρας et Mores in Dramatico. Sic Iſocrates ad Dem. χαρακτηρα τοις εργοις εμβαλλειν· et Demoſth. εν δε ταις ομιλιαις ο της ψυχης χαρακτηρ βλεπεται. Sic rurſus infra de Comœdiâ, V. 155. Ætatis cujuſque, &c. Mobilibuſque decor naturis.—Vide et Sat. 10. V. 12. Defendente Vicem modò Rhetoris atque Poetæ. et inf. V. 193. Officiumque virile defendat. Partes defendere, quod idem hìc Servare Vices. Sic Ep. 1. L. 2. V. 171. Partes tueri.

Operumque colores.

i. e. Actionum Affectuum humanorum in Scenis, ubi Res agitur (ut inf. V. 179.) in Satyrâ refertur tantùm. Quare ſup. Sat. 2. L. 2. V. 60. Quiſquis erit Vitæ ſcribam color.

V. 93. Interdum tamen.

Sententiam dicit de Comœdiâ contra illos (ſup. Sat. 4. V. 45.) qui Comœdiam Poema eſſe negaverunt. Ibidem V. 63. alias dicit ſe quæſiturum. unde apparet hanc epiſtolam iſti Satyræ poſteriorem eſſe. Et quia infra de Comœdiâ plura habet (Veluti V. 234.) apparet quidem Horatium inter poemata ponere.

V. 94. Tumido.

Sermone et Verbis Tragicis: quod magis eſt quam quod ſupra dixit Sat. 4. V. 48, 49.—Pater ardens ſævit, &c.

V. 101. Adſunt.

Mores ηθος.

Uti hic in Dramatico, de Tragœdiâ et Comœdiâ, ſic de Moribus communitèr diſſerit Horatius: poſtea vero ſpeciatim et graviter, viz. V. 309, 10, 11, 12, &c.

V. 114. Divuſne.

Vide Annot. et ſup. Verſ. 86. hìc enim de Tragœdiâ diſſerit; de Comœdiâ, inf. V. 153. de utrâque (ſcil. quid interſit Davuſne loquatur an Deus) inf. V. 237.

V. 120. Honoratum.

Scil. a Jove, ut in Homero. Il. L. 2. in initio ὡς Αχιλλα τιμηση, &c.—Quod Thetidi promiſerat, L. 1. in fine.—Sic et rurſus Jupiter, L. 15. in initio.

V. 131. Publica materies.

Hactenùs de Tragœdiâ, nunc de Carmine Epico unde illam deductam vult.

V. 153. Tu quid, &c.

Poſt Graviora Poemata ad Comœdiam ſe convertit.

V. 158. Puer.

Puer hìc et Juvenis (inf. V. 161.) et Vir (V. 166.) et Senex (V. 169.) Comœdiæ ſunt χαρακτηρες et Deſcriptæ Vices, ut ſup. V. 86.—Hæc enim omnia a Verſ. 153 ad 178.—ad Comœdiam ſpectant. Hoc vidit Lambinus, cum dicit in Præfatione Horatium in hâc Epiſtolâ de omni Poeſeos genere diſputare, maximè verò de Comœdiâ et Tragœdiâ. Hoc etiam vidit Vet. Com. et Cruquius ad Terentium referentes in his locis.

V. 179. Aut agitur res.—

Hactenus de Tragœdiâ ſeorſim atque Comœdiâ. Nunc de utráque ſimul: præcipuè verò de Tragœdiâ, et de Satyris qui in Tragœdiis exhibebantur. Vid. inf. V. 235.—Annot.

V. 193. Actoris partes.

Ariſtot. de Arte Poet. και τον χορον δε ενα υπολαβειν των υποκριτων· Lamb. Hinc conſtat legendum Actoris non Auctoris. Sic etiam Vet. Com. et Cruquius ex omnibus M. S. Et ſic Heinſius: qui ſequentia Ariſtotelis Verba ponit viz. και μοριον ειναι τη ὁλη, μη συναγωνιζεσθαι, &c.

V. 235. Amabo.

Ut ſup. V. 25 et 26, laboro, fio: et V. 87. Cur ego, &c. et inf. V. 265. Neque enim de Seipſo, neque de Satyris Suis vel ejuſmodi loquitur. De Seipſo quàm modeſtè, Vide inf. V. 304, &c.

Satyrorum ſcriptor.—Mirum eſt quibuſdam quid cauſæ fuerit Horatio, cur tam accuratè de Satyris hic præcipiat, quum non potuerit ignorare, illos jamdiu a vetuſtiſſimis quibuſque Tragicis Æſchylo, Sophocle, et Euripide, non adhibitos in ipſorum Tragœdiis: quod etiam Ariſtoteles (in Arte) videtur innuere. Itaque conjectare licet ex hâc præſcriptione, Satyros, ab illis priùs quidem excluſos a Tragœdiis, ſed tempore Horatii nudos in Scenam introductos, et in uſum revocatos: ideoque dari hìc præcepta de genere ſermonis, geſtûs, habitûs, quod illos deceat in Tragœdiâ. P. Gualt. Chab. Baſil. 1615.

V. 295. Ingenium.

Tranſitio ab Incuriâ, Ineptiis, et furoribus Poetarum, ad Prudentiam, Sapientiam, Mores, qui in vero Poetâ requiruntur. Vid. V. 309. Annot.

" grow upon me: for in this I have been ever ſincere, to make myſelf as good as I was " able, and to live for no other end (w)." The man who could ſpeak thus concerning himſelf is entitled to the beſt applauſe, the applauſe of the heart.] K.

(w) Letters, &c I. 7.

V. 306. Nil ſcribens ipſe.

Modeſtè, quia neque Dramaticum neque Epicum Carmen (de quibus hìc præcipuè) ipſe ſcripſerat: Satyrarum verò (non Satyrorum) ſcriptor ipſe Poetam inde ſe vocari noluit. Vid. Sat. 4. V. 39, &c. et Sat. 6. L. 2. V. 17.

V. 309. Scribendi rectè.

De Diſtributione et Ordine.—Finitâ Hiſtoriâ Poeticâ, ubi et Poematum Species, ortus, et Poetarum mores, ingenia ſingulatim expoſuit, jam ad veros Mores (de quibus ſup. V. 86—100, &c.) Doctrinam et præcepta generalia deſcendit; et poſt Jocos, Fabulas, Ironias, rem ſeriò ηθικως tractat; ita tamen ut ſuo more jocosè deſinat. Mirus ordo, ſed quem Heinſius adeo non ſentit, ut totum conatus ſit evertere.

V. 310. Socraticæ.

Non jam amplius ergo Epicureus, ſed Socraticus Horatius. Vide Ep. 1. Annot.

V. 317. Exemplar Vitæ.

Quod in Socraticis Chartis habet (ut ſup. 310.) ubi Perſonæ, Characteres, Mores, nimirùm quia Dialogi erant. Vide Ariſt. Poet. C. 1. Σωκρατικους λογους —et Athenæum, L. 2.

V. 319. Locis.

Cicero in Oratore: " nec verò in Dialecticis modò ſit inſtructus, ſed habeat omnes Philoſophiæ notos et tractatos Locos."

V. 364. Judicis.

Confer cum verſu 388—425—436.—Atque inde uſque ad, V. 453. Hìc enim Vafer vitium ridenti Flaccus amico tangit, et Majorem Juvenum Poetæ famam affectantem dehortatur; magnæ molis opus monſtrans, artemque Criticam maximè neceſſariam. V. inf. V. 408.

V. 391. Silveſtris.

Hiſtoria Moralis in honorem Artis, ut inf. V. 406.

V. 406. Ne fortè.

Callidè. quaſi Juveni indulgens, quem tamen reprimit.

Such are the principal notes, which the author of the Characteriſtics partly collected, and in greater part made on the writings of Horace. From theſe Notes (16) we are led to form a right idea of the Poet, taken not " from his precarious and low circumſtances at Court, after the forfeiture of his Eſtate, under the Uſurpation and conqueſt of Octavius, and the Miniſtry of a Mæcenas;" but " from his better condition and nobler employments in earlier days, under the favour and friendſhip of greater and better men, whilſt the Roman State and Liberty ſubſiſted;" and from the latter part of his life, when wearied with the ſervility of dependence, and diſguſted with the degeneracy of Epicurean Philoſophy, he returned to that more ſevere and ſublime Syſtem, which he plainly appears to have thought beſt calculated by its generous principles for the forming of an active Citizen, an accompliſhed Gentleman, a virtuous Man. The Poet's renunciation of Epicurean Errors, and firm though polite language with which he again aſſerts his freedom, inclines us to draw a veil over thoſe years, wherein he could be induced to ſacrifice his very ſentiments to the opinions and practice of his Patron; a conduct this, which however it may be juſtified on conſiderations of mere worldly intereſt, yet muſt it ever appear culpable on the Principles of that Morality, which taught him to be reſigned indeed to the ways of Providence, but to diſdain baſe compliance for the ſake of exterior advantages. But the more grave, ſerious, and dignified ſentiments of his later writings abundantly compenſate the levity of ſome of his earlier Odes, and the time-ſerving maxims inculcated in ſome of his earlier Satires and Epiſtles. And the experience of a Man ſo thoroughly verſed in the Manners of the World cannot fail of being inſtructive to us; for it will teach us, as we value the integrity and peace of our Minds, never to relinquiſh the ways of Rectitude for the fallacious allurements of Error, however great may be the emoluments, which may reward a dereliction of virtuous principle.

(16) See Characteriſtics, vol. iii. Miſc. 5, c. 1.

What the Poet was in his earlier and latter days, that the noble Critic uniformly continued to be through much too ſhort a life. His principles were always on the ſide of liberty, and conſequently, independent, benevolent, magnanimous: his knowledge of Ancient Writers, particularly of the Greek, was extenſive and accurate: his Taſte, formed on the model of Antiquity, was of courſe pure and refined. All theſe excellencies are diſcoverable, not leſs in the above Notes than in his edited works. Nor is it to be wondered at that he was ſo elegant a Scholar, ſo exact a Critic, ſo generous a Philoſopher, ſince he devoted to Study and Meditation thoſe hours, which too many diſſipate in the purſuit of trifling engagements, illiberal amuſements or irrational pleaſures.

I am, Dear Sir, with the greateſt regard,
Your moſt obliged,
and moſt affectionate friend,
G. J. HUNTINGFORD.

OXFORD, NEW COLLEGE, Dec. 20, 1784.

 [Since the article of the firſt Earl of Shafteſbury was printed off, an ingenious publication has appeared, entitled, " Eſſays, Philoſophical, Hiſtorical, and Literary," in which are ſome ſtrictures on Mr. Walpole's Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors. Among other remarks, the Eſſayiſt obſerves, that of Mr. Walpole's ſhort account of the famous Earl of Shafteſbury, much is exceptionable. Mr. Walpole, continues he, relates, upon the authority of Biſhop Burnet, a ridiculous ſtory of Shafteſbury's pretending that Cromwell offered to make him King. " If he " did," ſays Mr. Walpole, " it only proves that " Cromwell took him for a fool." But if Cromwell took Shafteſbury for a fool, it only proves that he made a moſt egregious blunder.—The abilities of Lord Shafteſbury were certainly of the firſt claſs, far above the reach of Burnet's comprehenſion." After comparing the Biſhop's inability to account for the aſcendancy which our eminent Stateſman acquired over the perſons with whom he was connected, to the Judges of the famous Leonora de Galigai, wife of Marſhal D'Ancre, who at her Trial was interrogated by what magical powers ſhe had gained ſo abſolute an influence over the mind of Mary of Medicis, and who nobly replied, that ſhe uſed no other powers than thoſe which a ſtrong mind naturally poſſeſſes over a weak one, the eſſay writer adds as follows: " When " the portrait of ſo great a man as Lord Shafteſbury " is delineated by ſo wretched a dauber as Burnet, " we may expect to find it what in fact it is, miſe- " rably defective in drawing, colouring, and reſemb- " lance (*)." Though we think that Burnet was not a little miſtaken in his repreſentation of the Earl of Shafteſbury's character, we do not give our approbation to ſo ſevere a cenſure of that worthy and learned Prelate.] K.

(*) Eſſays, Philoſophical, Hiſtorical, and Literary, p. 352—354.

 [COOPER

 [COOPER (SAMUEL), a Miniature Painter of diſtinguiſhed excellence, was born in London, in the year 1609 (a). He was bred up, together with an elder brother, named Alexander [A], under the care of John Hoſkins, his uncle [B], by whom he was initiated in the art of painting. He made ſo great a proficiency, that he ſoon excelled his maſter, who found that his nephew's performances were more admired than his own. He, therefore, took him into partnerſhip with him; but the ſuperior reputation which Cooper obtained, exciting ſome jealouſy in his uncle, he diſſolved the partnerſhip (b). Cooper then ſet up for himſelf, and met with ſuch encouragement as his uncommon merit deſerved. He painted miniature portraits of King Charles II. and his Queen, the Duke of York, the Ducheſs of Cleveland, and moſt of the Court. But two pieces of his which were the moſt eſteemed were thoſe of Oliver Cromwell, and of one Swingfield. The latter picture was carried by Cooper to the Court of France, where it was much admired, and where he was employed to paint ſeveral pieces larger than his uſual ſize, and for which his widow received a penſion during her life (c). He travelled into Holland, as well as France, and is ſaid to have been many years abroad (d). In the ſtyle of painting to which he addicted himſelf, he was ſuperior to any of his contemporaries in his own country, and equal to the beſt artiſts of Italy. He had ſtudied the works of Vandyke with great attention, and copied many of them, either to improve himſelf by imitating his manner, or at the deſire of others who rewarded him for his labour. Accordingly he was ſometimes called "the Vandyke "in little," as he reſembled that celebrated maſter in the beauty and clearneſs of his colouring, the agreeable turn of his heads, and the ſpirit and relief of his portraits (e). Mr. Walpole ſays, that 'Samuel Cooper owed great part of his merit to the works of Vandyke, 'and yet may be called an original genius, as he was the firſt who gave the ſtrength and 'freedom of oil to miniature. Oliver's works are touched and re-touched with ſuch careful fidelity, that you cannot help perceiving they are nature in the abſtract; Cooper's 'are ſo bold, that they ſeem perfect nature only of a leſs ſtandard. Magnify the former, 'they are ſtill diminutively conceived: if a glaſs could expand Cooper's pictures to the 'ſize of Vandyke's, they would appear to have been painted for that proportion. If his 'portrait of Cromwell [C] could be ſo enlarged, I don't know but Vandyke would appear 'leſs great by the compariſon (f).'

Notwithſtanding the great merit of Cooper as an artiſt, his pencil was generally confined to a head only; for below that part his drawing was incorrect. But for a face, and its dependencies, the free and natural air of his heads, the ſtrength, relievo, and noble ſpirit, the ſoftneſs and tender livelineſs of fleſh and blood, and the looſeneſs and gentle management of the hair, he was ſo unrivalled, that his works ſold for very high prices, and were in great eſtimation in France, and alſo at Rome and Venice, and in almoſt every part of Europe. Among other excellencies, for which his pieces were admired, was the variety of tints that he introduced, and the clearneſs of his carnations. Mr. Oldys ſays, 'It 'has been affirmed to me, that he would ſteal a face upon his nail, and remember the 'complexion, air, and all other diſtinguiſhments, ſo exactly, as to preſent any perſon with 'their portrait, who never knew they had ſat to him for it (g).' He was intimately acquainted with Butler, the celebrated author of Hudibras, whom he inſtructed in his art. Muſic was alſo cultivated by him, as well as by Butler, and he played extremely well upon the lute. His manners were poliſhed, and he was maſter of ſeveral languages. He died in London, on the 5th of May, 1672, at the age of ſixty-three, and was buried in Pancras-church, where a monument was erected to his memory, on which is the following inſcription:

(a) Graham's Account of Eminent Painters, annexed to Dryden's Tranſlation of Freſnoy, p. 375. ſecond edit.

(b) Eſſay towards an Engliſh School of Painters, annexed to De Piles, p. 365.

(c) Walpole's Anecdotes of Painting in England, vol. iii. p. 113, 114. third edit.

(d) Eſſay towards an Engliſh School, ut ſupra.

(e) Pilkington's Dictionary of Painters, p. 149.

(f) Walpole, ubi ſupra, p. 10.

(g) Oldys's MSS.

[A] An elder brother, named Alexander.] Mr. Pilkington ſays of Alexander Cooper, who was alſo inſtructed in the art of painting by his uncle Hoſkins; that 'although he became a good artiſt in limning, 'yet he was in no degree of competition with his 'brother. He followed his profeſſion in ſeveral cities 'of the Low Countries, and particularly at Amſterdam; from whence he was invited to Sweden, where 'he had the honour of being appointed Limner to 'Queen Chriſtina. He alſo painted landſcapes in 'water-colours extremely well, and was accounted to 'have a correct manner of drawing.(1)'

(1) Dictionary of Painters, p. 149.

[B] Under the care of John Hoſkins, his uncle.] Of this artiſt Mr. Walpole ſays, 'Hoſkins, though ſurpaſſed by his ſcholar, the younger Cooper, was a 'very good painter. There is great truth and nature 'in his heads; but the carnations are too bricky, 'and want a degradation and variety of tints. I 'have a head of Serjeant Maynard by him, boldly 'painted and in a manly ſtyle, though not without 'theſe faults; and another good one of Lord Falkland, more deſcriptive of his patriot melancholy 'than the common prints. It was in the collection 'of Dr. Mead. There is, indeed, one work of 'Hoſkins that may be called perfect. It is a head 'of a man, rather young, in the gown of a maſter of 'arts, and a red ſattin waiſtcoat. The clearneſs of 'the colouring is equal to either Oliver; the diſhevelled hair touched with exquiſite freedom. It is 'in the poſſeſſion of Mr. Fanſhaw, but not known 'whoſe portrait (2).' Another writer ſays of Hoſkins, that 'he was a very eminent Limner in the reign of 'King Charles I. whom he drew, with his Queen, 'and moſt of his Court. He was bred a face-painter 'in oil, but afterwards taking to miniature, he far 'exceeded what he did before. He died in Covent-Garden (3).'

(2) Anecdotes of Painting in England, vol. ii. p. 231, 232. third edit.

[C] His portrait of Cromwell.] Mr. Walpole ſays, 'This fine head is in the poſſeſſion of the Lady 'Frankland, widow of Sir Thomas, a deſcendant of 'Cromwell. The body is unfiniſhed. Vertue engraved it, as he did another, in profile, in the collection of the Duke of Devonſhire (4).']

(3) Eſſay towards an Engliſh School of Painters, annexed to De Piles, p. 389.

(4) Anecdotes of Painting, vol. iii. p. 111.

H. S. E.
SAMUEL COOPER, Armiger,
Angliæ Apelles,
Seculi ſui, et Artis Decus,
In quâ excolendâ
Sicut Neminem, quem ſequeretur, invenit,
Ita nec, qui Eum aſſequatur, eſt habiturus.
Supra omne Exemplum,
Simul ac omne Exemplar,
Minio-Graphices Artifex ſummus,
Summis Europæ Principibus notus,
Et in Pretio habitus;
Cujus porro egregias Animi Dotes,
Ingenium expoliti ſſimum,
Linguarum plurimarum Peritiam,
Mores ſuavi ſſimas,
Ut tam brevis Tabella rite complecti poſſet
Ipſius unice Manu delineanda fuit:
Sed modeſtior ille,
Dum per Ora, Oculoſque omnium Fama volat,
Cineres hic potius ſuos optavit deliteſcere,
Ipſe, in Eccleſiæ Pace, feliciter requieſcens
Chari ſſimâ Conjuge Chriſtianâ
Obiit quinto Die Maii Anno { Ætatis ſuæ 63. / Salutis MDCLXXII (b).

(b) Eſſay towards an Engliſh School p. 360.

The works of Cooper are numerous. Mr. Walpole ſays, 'Seven or eight are in 'Queen Caroline's cloſet at Kenſington; one of them, a head of a monk, is capital, but 'unfiniſhed. Lord Oxford had a head of Archbiſhop Sheldon; and the buſt of Lord 'Chancellor Shafteſbury, on his monument by Ryſbrack, was taken from a picture of 'Cooper (i).' Mr. Oldys ſays (k), that he painted the Duke and Ducheſs of Monmouth, and moſt of the nobility and beauties of the Court; ſeveral of the moſt eminent artiſts of his own profeſſion; together with Sir John Denham, and other celebrated wits of that age. Among the poems of Mrs. Katharine Philips, is one addreſſed to Cooper on his drawing her friend Lucaſia's picture in 1660, in which are the following lines:

(i) Anecdotes of Painting in England, p. 114.
(k) In his MSS.

'A pencil from an angel newly caught,
'And colours in the morning's boſom ſought,
'Would make no picture, if by you not wrought.

'But done by you, it does no more admit
'Of an encomium for the higheſt wit,
'Than that another hand ſhould equal it (l).'

(l) Poems by Mrs. Katharine Philips, the Matchleſs Orinda, edit. folio, 1669, p. 158.

It may not be improper to mention, that Mr. Pope's mother was ſiſter to Cooper's wife. Mr. Walpole ſays, 'Lord Carleton had a portrait of Cooper in crayons, which Mrs. Pope 'ſaid was not very like, and which, deſcending to Lord Burlington, was given by his Lord-'ſhip to Kent. It was painted by one Jackſon, a relation of Cooper, of whom I know 'nothing more, and who, I ſuppoſe, drew another head of Cooper, in crayons, in Queen 'Caroline's cloſet, ſaid to be painted by himſelf; but I find no account of his eſſays in that 'way.'—'I have a drawing of Pope's father, as he lay dead in his bed, by his brother-'in-law Cooper. It was Mr. Pope's (m).' This was probably a drawing of Pope's grandfather; it could not be his father, who ſurvived Cooper many years. If it was his father, it muſt have been done by ſome other hand.] T.

(m) Anecdotes of Painting, ut ſupra.

[COOPER (JOHN-GILBERT), a polite writer of the preſent age, was born in 1723; and was deſcended from an ancient family in the county of Nottingham, whoſe fortune was injured in the laſt century by their attachment to the principles of monarchy. He reſided at Thurgarton Priory in Nottinghamſhire (a), which was granted by King Henry VIII. to William Cooper, one of his anceſtors. This manſion [A] Mr. Cooper inherited from his father, who, in 1739, was High-Sheriff of the county; and tranſmitted it to his ſon, who filled the ſame reſpectable office in 1783 (b). After paſſing through Weſtminſter ſchool under Dr. John Nicoll, along with the late Lord Albemarle, Lord Buckinghamſhire, Major Johnſon, Mr. Geo. Aſhby, and many other eminent and ingenious men, he became in 1743 a Fellow-Commoner of Trinity-College, Cambridge, and reſided there two or three years; but quitted the Univerſity on his marriage with Suſanna the daughter of William Wrighte, Eſq; ſon to the

(a) Thoroton's Nottinghamſhire, p. 305. Tanner's Not. Mon. p. 403.
(b) Anecdotes of Bowyer, p. 273.

[A] This manſion.] In 1726, when S. Buck took a view of it, it belonged to William Draper, Eſq.

Lord

Lord Keeper of that name, and Recorder of Leiceſter 1729—1763 (c). In the year 1745 he commenced Author by the publication of "The Power of Harmony," a poem in 4to; and in 1746 and 1747 he produced ſeveral Eſſays and Poems under the ſignature of Philalethes, in a periodical work called "The Muſeum," publiſhed by Mr. Dodſley. On his eldeſt ſon, who was born July 25, 1749, and died the next day, Mr. Cooper wrote an elegant epitaph, which is placed in the Chancel of St. Margaret's Church in Leiceſter, and ſhall be tranſcribed below [B]. In the ſame year, he came forward as an author, with his name, by a work which received much aſſiſtance from his friend, the Rev. John Jackſon of Leiceſter (d), who communicated ſeveral learned notes, in which he contrived to manifeſt his diſlike to his formidable antagoniſt Mr. Warburton. It was intituled, "The Life of Socrates, collected from the Memorabilia of Xenophon and the Dialogues "of Plato, and illuſtrated farther by Ariſtotle, Diodorus Siculus, Cicero, Proclus, Apuleius, "Maximus Tyrius, Boëthius, Diogenes Laërtius, Aulus Gellius, and others, 1749," 8vo. In this work Mr. Cooper gave evident marks of ſuperior genius; warm, impetuous, and impatient of reſtraint. In ſuch a diſpoſition, we are not to wonder if he was ſometimes led to ſpeak without due deference of preceding writers, whom, not content with confuting, he laſhes and ſpurns like a mercileſs exulting victor, thoughtleſs of the viciſſitudes of war, and regardleſs how ſoon it might be his fortune to fall under the laſh of critics as ſevere as himſelf [C]. Among theſe was Mr. Warburton (e), who then figured high in "the firſt ranks of "learning; a man of vigorous faculties, a mind fervid and vehement, ſupplied by inceſſant "and unlimited enquiry, with wonderful extent and variety of knowledge, which had not "oppreſſed his imagination, nor clouded his perſpicacity." In a note on the "Eſſay on "Criticiſm," the learned Commentator thus takes occaſion to introduce our author (f): "As Ignorance, when joined with Humility, produces ſtupid admiration, on which account "it is ſo commonly obſerved to be the mother of Devotion and blind homage; ſo when "joined with Vanity (as it always is in bad critics) it gives birth to every iniquity of im-"pudent abuſe and ſlander. See an example (for want of a better) in a late worthleſs "and now forgotten thing, called the Life of Socrates; where the head of the Author "(as a man of wit obſerved on reading the book) has juſt made a ſhift to do the office of "a camera obſcura, and repreſent things in an inverted order; himſelf above, and Sprat, "Rollin, Voltaire, and every other author of reputation, below." This ſevere attack produced "Curſory Remarks on Mr. Warburton's new edition of Mr. Pope's Works, in a "Letter to a Friend. By John Gilbert Cooper, Eſq. Author of the Life of Socrates, "1751;" in which Mr. C. appeals to the impartial reader, "whether there is the leaſt "reflection through the whole Life of Socrates, or the notes, upon Mr. W's morals, and "whether he has not confined his criticiſm to Mr. W's practice as an author?" and declares the epithet beſtowed upon him by Mr. W. to be "a downright ſlander [D]." In 1754,

(c) Hiſtory of Hinckley, p. 150.

(d) See art. JACKSON.

(e) Johnſon's Life of Pope, Hawkins's edit. vol. iv. p. 67.

(f) Pope's Works, ed. 1751, vol. i. p. 151.

[B] Which ſhall be tranſcribed below.]

"Hic jacet
Quod mori potuit
HENRICI GILBERTI COOPER,
Infantis deſideratiſſimi,
Filii natu maximi
JOHANNIS GILBERTI COOPER,
De Thurgarton, in agro Nottinghamienſi,
Et SUSANNÆ, uxoris ejus;
Natus 25 Julii, denatus 26, 1749.
Atavis eſſet editus antiquis;
Nulla alia in re claruit,
Nec potuit:
Floſculus enim in ipſa quoque dulcis ætatula,
Prima gemma pullulaturus,
Parcarum heu parcere neſciarum
Fatali afflatu contactus Exaruit.
Mœſtus itaque et mœrens pater
Chariſſimi infantuli ſui memoriæ
Hoc etſi inane munus
Amoris monumentum
Collocavit (1)."

(1) Gent. Mag. 1778, p. 487, where it is facetiouſly and properly burleſqued and ridiculed.

[C] Critics as ſevere as himſelf.] Speaking of his own ſtyle, he ſays, "It is ſuch in every "place, as the ſubject ſeems to require, conciſe "though circumſtantial in the hiſtorical parts, "diffuſed and declamatory in the recapitula-"tion, and cloſe and unaffected in the occaſional "reflections." As to his freedom with other writers, "Some expreſſions," ſays he, "may appear too "harſh, and others too luſory; but all weapons are "not to be uſed alike againſt all adverſaries: for, as "the antient warlike Scythians found, in the ſervile "war, that whips more intimidated the army of "ſlaves, that marched amongſt them, than the ſword, "which had ſo often corrected the pride of nations; "ſo contumely and ridicule will avail againſt thoſe "who are loſt to good manners, candour, and good "ſenſe, when the nobler methods of humanity, rea-"ſon, and learning, would prove ineffectual. The "ſentiments of others, who write like men, are exa-"mined with the ſame ſpirit; and where the author "is obliged to oppoſe their opinions, he does it with "a proper reſpect due to their characters, always diſ-"tinguiſhing between the deſigning deceits of the "heart, and the involuntary errors of a miſled under-"ſtanding. He entered on the work," he adds, "with no ſmall application, for his own inſtruction "and amuſement; and, after being carefully reviſed, "it is now communicated with the honeſt deſign of "making others partake in the ſame ſatisfaction this "enquiry has already afforded him. If this deſire-"able end cannot be obtained, he thinks it is pay-"ing a greater reſpect to mankind to confeſs, that "the failure proceeds from deficiency of abilities, "and not from the want of laudable endeavours.— "Whatever failings the learned may obſerve, the "author has reaſon to expect, ſince all he advances "is intended for the promotion of good-manners, "morality, and true religion, that they would, with "the good-nature becoming ſuch, candidly impute "them to error, inſiſting ſtrongly on the merit of his "deſign, however little he may have in the execu-"tion of it."

[D] A downright ſlander.] "I have undergone (2)," ſays he, "young as I am, too many diſappointments in "life, to wonder much at many things which the mob "of mankind call extraordinary; otherwiſe I might be "ſurpriſed that almoſt a total retirement from the world "would not ſhelter me from the injuries of it, eſpecially "too at an age when few have had any concerns "with it. I thought I might have enjoyed an un-"envied obſcurity in the moſt undiſturbed peace and "tran-

(2) Anecdotes of Bowyer, ut ſupra.

1754, Mr. Cooper publiſhed his "Letters on Taſte," 8vo; an elegant little volume, on which no ſmall ſhare of his reputation is founded [E]; and, in 1755, "The Tomb of "Shakſpeare, a Viſion," 4to; a decent performance, but in which there is more of wit and application than of nature or genius. In 1756 he aſſiſted Mr. Moore, by writing ſome numbers of "The World;" and attempted to rouſe the indignation of his countrymen againſt the Heſſians, at that juncture brought over to defend the nation, in a poem called "The Genius of Britain," addreſſed to Mr. Pitt. In 1758, he publiſhed "Epiſtles to "the Great, from Ariſtippus in Retirement," 4to; and "The Call of Ariſtippus, Epiſtle "IV. to Mark Akenſide, M. D." Alſo, "A Father's Advice to his Son," in 4to. In the Annual Regiſter of the ſame year is his Tranſlation of "An Epiſtle from "the King of Pruſſia to Monſieur Voltaire." In 1759, he publiſhed "Ver Vert; "or, the Nunnery Parrot; an Heroic Poem, in Four Cantos; inſcribed to the Abbeſs of "D; tranſlated from the French of Monſieur Greſſet," 4to; reprinted in the firſt volume of Dilly's "Repoſitory, 1777;" and, in 1764, "Poems on ſeveral Subjects, by the "Author of the Life of Socrates;" with a prefatory Advertiſement by Mr. Dodſley [F]. In this little volume were included all the ſeparate poetical pieces which have been already mentioned, excepting "Ver Vert," which is a ſprightly compoſition. We have only to add to this ſhort narrative, that Mr. Cooper was an active, uſeful magiſtrate; and that he died at his father's houſe in May-Fair, after a long and excruciating illneſs ariſing from the ſtone, April 14, 1769.] N.

 [Though Mr. Gilbert Cooper does not ſtand very high in the rank of Engliſh writers, his abilities and his temporary celebrity were conſiderable enough to entitle him to a place in the Biographia. Beſides, he was of a particular ſchool of literature; and of ſuch ſchools it is the intention of this work to give as full an account as poſſible. The ſchool he belonged to was that of his nameſake, Anthony Aſhley Cooper, third Earl of Shafteſbury. That of this Author Mr. Gilbert Cooper was a moſt zealous admirer and imitator, is apparent from his works in general, and is acknowledged in ſeveral particular paſſages. Hence, likewiſe, he was devoted to other writers who embraced the ſentimental philoſophy, and eſpecially to Hutcheſon and Akenſide. His firſt production, the Life of Socrates, is not now held in much eſtimation. The moſt popular of his proſe works were his Letters on Taſte, which have gone through four editions. To the two laſt editions of them are added nine Eſſays, on various ſubjects. Perhaps Mr. Cooper is not very accurate in his definition of Taſte, and the juſtneſs of his criticiſms may ſometimes be diſputed. Nevertheleſs, the work is an agreeable one upon the whole, and will be read with pleaſure by the lovers of polite literature. The admirers of ſimple and elegant poetry are not a little obliged

"tranquillity, and that CALUMNY was too buſy "about the names of thoſe who were candidates for "fame, to find time to viſit the receſs of one, whoſe "contempt of every advantage of life, but what con-"duced to quiet, ſhould, it was hoped, protect him "from the poiſonous breath of that daughter of "ENVY. But I was greatly miſtaken, it ſeems, in "my humble expectations; for I had ſcarcely begun "to feel the calm comforts which the abſence of "contention yields to a thinking creature, before I "was informed by letters from ſome friends in town, "that Mr. Warburton had, with his uſual humanity "and good manners, very compendiouſly anſwered "the Life of Socrates in the tail of one note, by the "free uſe of thoſe appellations he has indiſcrimi-"nately thrown out upon, not only all thoſe who "have ever had any controverſy with him, but upon "all others too whom he ever ſuſpected to have the "raſhneſs to contradict any of his opinions. How-"ſoever this would have alarmed me heretofore, as "an author, from the pen of any other perſon, it had "no effect upon me then from the writer it came "from; and I ſat down contemptuouſly contented, "without ſo much as being ſolicitous to know what "abuſe he had conferred upon my writings. I ſay, "abuſe, for he never ſpeaks of an opponent without "it. But as indifferent as I was about my charac-"ter as a writer, I cannot ſay I was quite ſo eaſy "when I was afterwards told that he had attacked "it as a man. Upon this I wrote to him, that I "thought he had uſed me very ill, and ſhould take "a proper notice of him for it in publick; in anſwer "to which he tells a friend of mine, 'That he was "ſurpriſed I ſhould think myſelf ill-uſed, for that he "had never mentioned my name or writings in pub-"lic, or in converſation, but with honour, till I had "wrote a book wherein I had treated him through "the whole with a ſcurrility worſe than Billingſgate, "and that he had now taken no other revenge than the "caſual mention of the Author of the Life of Socra-

"tes (without the mention of my name) with a ſlight "joke.' I will aſk any impartial reader, if there is "the leaſt reflection through the whole Life of Socra-"tes, or the notes, upon Mr. W's morals? whe-"ther I have not confined my criticiſm to his prac-"tice as an author? and whether every thing therein "advanced cannot be proved over and over again by "citations from the Divine Legation, and his other "tracts? At the ſame time I deſire one part of the "diſpute betwixt us may be finiſhed by an anſwer to "theſe queſtions: Is not calling a guiltleſs man an "impudent ſlanderer, calumny? and quite a differ-"ent revenge than a ſlight joke? and has not Mr. "Warburtan done that in the note in queſtion (3)?" (3) Curſory Remarks, p. 3—6.

[E] His reputation is founded.] On the firſt appearance of theſe "Letters" it was acutely obſerved by Dr. Johnſon, "that Cooper's genius ſeemed "to ſhine more in deſcription than in definition; that "he had more of imagery than of ſpecula-"tion; that his imagination was the ſtrongeſt "talent of his mind; and that, if he had not at-"tempted to offer any thing new on the ſubject of "Taſte, he was always ſo entertaining, ſpirited, and "ſplendid in his diction, that the reader who is not "inſtructed by him, cannot fail of being pleaſed and "diverted (4)." (4) Literary Mag. 1757, p. 134.

[F] Advertiſement by Mr. Dodſley.] "The follow-"ing Poems having been very favourably received "by the Public when they firſt appeared, at different "times, in detached pieces, the Author has been "prevailed upon to permit me to collect them into "this ſmall volume. When I requeſted him to give "me a preface, he replied, 'That to thoſe to whom "ſuch trifles afforded pleaſure, a formal introduction "would be unneceſſary; that he wrote moſt of them, "when he was very young, for his own amuſement, "and publiſhed them afterwards for my profit; and, "as they had once anſwered both thoſe ends, he was "very little ſolicitous what would be the fate of them "for the future."] N.

[5] Letters Taſte, p. 91, fourth edit.

obliged to the Author for bringing them acquainted with the Song to Winifreda [G] Of Mr. Cooper's poetical writings, the moſt pleaſing are his "Epiſtles to his Friends in "Town, from Ariſtippus in Retirement." They were written in imitation of ſome faſhionable French writers, and particularly of Greſſet. From theſe Epiſtles we ſhall inſert below two paſſages; the firſt relative to our Author's temper of mind, and the ſecond deſcribing the character of his own poetry [H]. His next principal poetical work is his "Power "of Harmony;" in two books. This we do not greatly admire. It is evidently compoſed in imitation of Akenſide's Pleaſures of Imagination, without riſing to the ſame merit; and it abounds with the ſentiments of Shafteſbury, not very perſpicuouſly expreſſed. Mr. Cooper was not deſtitute of fancy; but his fancy was not always under proper regulation, and he ſometimes failed in the preciſion of his ideas. Another fault in him is a ſuperabundance of proſopopeias, which is one of the tricks of modern poetry. His declaration to [G] For bringing them acquainted with the Song to Winifreda.] This beautiful ſong, though it hath made its way into ſeveral collections, our Readers will be glad to ſee here inſerted.

"Away, let nought to love diſpleaſing,
My WINIFREDA, move thy fear,
Let nought delay the heav'nly bleſſing,
Nor ſqueamiſh pride, nor gloomy care.

What tho' no grants of royal donors,
With pompous titles grace our blood,
We'll ſhine in more ſubſtantial honours,
And to be noble, we'll be good.

What tho' from fortune's laviſh bounty,
No mighty treaſures we poſſeſs,
We'll find within our pittance plenty,
And be content without exceſs.

Still ſhall each kind returning ſeaſon,
Sufficient for our wiſhes give,
For we will live a life of reaſon,
And that's the only life to live.

Our name, whilſt virtue thus we tender,
Shall ſweetly ſound where-e'er 'tis ſpoke,
And all the great ones much ſhall wonder,
How they admire ſuch little folk.

Thro' youth and age in love excelling,
We'll hand in hand together tread,
Sweet ſmiling peace ſhall crown our dwelling,
And babes, ſweet ſmiling babes, our bed.

How ſhould I love the pretty creatures,
Whilſt round my knees they fondly clung,
To ſee 'em look their mother's features,
To hear 'em liſp their mother's tongue!

And when with envy time tranſported
Shall think to rob us of our joys,
You'll in your girls again be courted,
And I go wooing in my boys (5)."

(5) Letters on Taſte, p. 91, 92. fourth edit.

[H] From theſe epiſtles we ſhall inſert, &c.] His own temper of mind he thus deſcribes:

"I've oft, MELISSA, heard you ſay,
"The world obſerves I never wear
"An aſpect gloomy or ſevere,
"That, conſtitutionally gay,
"Whether dark clouds obſcure the ſky,
"Or PHOEBUS gilds the face of day,
"In pleaſure's true philoſophy
"I paſs the winged years away."
IN moſt, 'tis true, the human ſenſe
Is ſubjected to ſmiles, or tears,
To ſwelling pride, or trembling fears,
"By ev'ry ſkyey influence."
Cameleon-like their ſouls agree
With all they hear and all they ſee,
Or, as one inſtrument reſounds,
Another's uniſon of ſounds,
Their mutable complexions carry
The looks of anger, hope, and joy;
Juſt as the ſcenes around 'em vary,
Pleaſures delight, or pains annoy.
But I, by philoſophic mood,
Let the wiſe call it happy folly,
Educe from ev'ry evil good,
And rapture e'en from melancholy.
When in the ſilent midnight grove,
Sweet PHILOMELA ſwells her throat
With tremulous and plaintive note,
Expreſſive of diſaſt'rous love,
I with the PENSIVE PLEASURES dwell,
And in their calm ſequeſter'd cell,
Liſten with rapturous delight
To the ſoft ſongſter of the night.
Here ECHO, in her moſſy cave,
Symphonious to the love-lorn ſong,
Warbles the vocal rocks among,
Whilſt gently-trickling waters lave
The oak-fring'd mountain's hoary brow,
Whoſe ſtreams, united in the vale,
O'er pebbled beds loquacious flow,
Tun'd to the ſad melodious tale
In murmurs querulouſly flow.
And, whilſt immers'd in thought I lie,
From ages paſt and realms unſeen,
There moves before the mental eye
The pleaſing melancholy ſcene
Of nymphs and youths unfortunate,
Whoſe fame ſhall ſpread from ſhore to ſhore,
Preſerv'd by bards from death and fate,
Till time itſelf ſhall be no more.
THUS, not by black miſanthropy
Impell'd, to caves or rocks I fly;
But when, by chance or humour led,
My wand'ring feet thoſe regions tread,
Taught by philoſophy ſo ſweet
To ſhun the fellowſhip of care,
Far from the world I go to meet
Such pleaſures as inhabit there.
WITH rebel-will I ne'er oppoſe
The current of my deſtiny,
But, pliant as the torrent flows,
Receive my courſe implicitly (6)."

(6) Poems on ſeveral Subjects, p. 19—21.

Mr. Cooper characterizes his own Poetry in the following lines.

"BUT ſhould you aſk me, why I chooſe,
Of all the laurel'd ſiſterhood
Th' inhabitants of PINDUS' wood,
The leaſt conſiderable muſe,
The vi'lets round the mountain's feet,
Whoſe humble gems unheeded blow,
Are to the ſhepherd's ſmell more ſweet
Than lofty cedars on its brow.
Let the loud EPIC ſound th' alarms
Of dreadful war, and heroes ſprung
From ſome immortal anceſtry,
Clad in impenetrable arms
By VULCAN forg'd, my lyre is ſtrung
With ſofter chords, my MUSE more free
Wanders thro' PINDUS' humbler ways
In amiable ſimplicity:
Unſtudy'd are her artleſs lays,
She aſks no laurel for her brows;
Careleſs of cenſure or of praiſe,
She haunts where tender myrtle grows;
Fonder of happineſs than fame
To the proud bay prefers the roſe,
Nor barters pleaſure for a name.

to his Editor, Mr. Dodſley, that he was very little ſolicitous what would be the fate of his Poems for the future, was probably the reſult of affectation or diſguſt. It is well known to the writer of this addition to his life, that he was much diſguſted on a particular occaſion. He was, for ſome time, a conſtant attendant, and a frequent ſpeaker, at the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, Manufactures, and Commerce*; and it was an object of ambition with him, to be choſen a Vice-preſident of that moſt reſpectable and uſeful Society. Not being elected, his diſſatisfaction was ſo great, that I believe he never appeared there again. Mr. Cooper was a Gentleman of an agreeable appearance, of polite addreſs, and accompliſhed manners. The great room of the Society now mentioned was for ſeveral years the place where many perſons choſe to try, or to diſplay, their oratorical abilities. Dr. Goldſmith, I remember, made an attempt at a ſpeech, but was obliged to ſit down in confuſion. I once heard Dr. Johnſon ſpeak there, upon a ſubject relative to mechanics, with a propriety, perſpicuity, and energy which excited general admiration.] K.

* He was for a little while one of the Chairmen of the Committee of polite Arts.

On NATURE's lap reclin'd at eaſe,
I liſten to her heav'nly tongue,
From her derive the pow'r to pleaſe,
From her receive th' harmonious time,
And what the goddeſs makes my ſong
In unpremeditated rhyme
Melliſluous flows, whilſt young DESIRE,
Cull'd from th' ELYSIAN bloom of ſpring,
Strews flow'rs immortal round my lyre,
And FANCY's ſportive children bring,
From bloſſom'd grove and lilied mead,
Freſh fragrant chaplets for my head.
The moſt, tho' ſofteſt of the NINE,
EUTERPE, muſe of gaiety
Queen of heart-ſoft'ning melody,
Allures my ear with notes divine.
In my retreat EUTERPE plays,
Where SCIENCE, garlanded with flow'rs,
Enraptur'd liſtens to her lays Beneath the ſhade of myrtle bow'rs (7)."

(7) Ibid. p. 29–31.

COOTE (Sir CHARLES) a brave and active Officer in the ſeventeenth Century, created in 1660 Earl of Mountrath, was the eldeſt ſon of Sir Charles Coote [A], who was made a Baronet on the 2d of April 1621 (a). In Jan. 1641-2 he was beſieged in Caſtle-Coote by twelve hundred Iriſh, but he valiantly raiſed the ſiege within a week. Not long after, he defeated Hugh O Connor and his forces: And on the 2d of March encountred Con O Rourk and his followers, who came to plunder Roſcommon; took him priſoner, and killed moſt of his party. Afterwards he gave a total defeat to the rebels, who had formed a Camp at Kregs, and took all their baggage and proviſions. He likewiſe got a conſiderable prey from about Ballyniſlow; and in Eaſter-week relieved Athlone with ſome proviſions and other neceſſaries (b). About the beginning of the year 1644, he was one of the Agents from the Iriſh Proteſtants, who attended King Charles I. at Oxford, in order to treat of a Peace between them and the Catholicks in Ireland (c). In November 1646, having received ſome forces from England, he broke through the army of the Iriſh with a party, and cauſed them to draw farther off from Dublin, which they kept in a manner beſieged (d). In May 1647, he gave them a great defeat, in which a thouſand of them were ſlain (e). Soon after, he had ſeveral ſkirmiſhes with them, in which ſome of the leading Rebels were taken priſoners (f). In October the ſame year, joining his forces with thoſe of Col. Jones and Col. Monk, they took ſeveral Caſtles and places from the Iriſh; and among the reſt, Port Leſter, and Athboy (g). About the end of the next year, marching with the forces he had aſſembled in Connought, from Sligo ſeventy miles into (a) The Iriſh Compendium, &c. by Fr. Nicholls, ed. 1735, p. 107.

(b) Hiſt. of Ireland, &c. by R. Cox, P. ii. p. 97.

(c) Cox, ibid. p. 139.

(d) Memorials of the Engliſh Affairs, &c. by Mr. Whitelock, edit. 1732, p. 228.

(e) Ibid. p. 251.

(f) Ibid. p. 258.

(g) Page 279

[A] Was the eldeſt ſon of Sir Charles Coote.] This Sir Charles Coote was a man of great conſideration in Ireland. Upon the breaking out of the Iriſh rebellion, in 1641, he had a commiſſion for a regiment of foot, and was made Governor of Dublin (1). On the 29th of November he relieved the caſtle of Wicklow, beat a thouſand of the Iriſh, with their commander, Luke Toole, and put them to a ſhameful flight; whereby he became ſo terrible to the Iriſh, that they ſeldom made any reſiſtance where he was (2). In December, the Lords of the Pale, in Ireland, accuſed him of having uttered, at the council-board, ſome ſpeeches, tending to a purpoſe and reſolution of executing a general maſſacre upon the Iriſh Roman Catholicks: but the Lords Juſtices cleared him of that imputation (3). On the 15th of the ſame month he pillaged and burnt the village of Clantarſe, near Dublin (4). The 10th of April, 1642, he was ſent with Sir Thomas Lucas, and ſix troops of horſe, to relieve Bir, and ſome other places. They were to paſs a cauſeway which the rebels had broken, and had caſt up a ditch at the end of it; but Coote made thirty of his dragoons alight, and, in perſon, led them on, and beat off the Iriſh, with the ſlaughter of forty rebels and their captain, and then relieved the caſtles of Bir, Burrous, and Knocknemeaſe; and having ſat almoſt forty-eight hours on horſeback, and loſt and ſpoiled a hundred horſe in this expedition, they returned to the camp on the eleventh, at night, without the loſs of one man. And this was the prodigious paſſage through Mountrath-woods, which indeed is wonderful in many reſpects, and therefore juſtly gave occaſion for the title of Earl of Mountrath to be entailed upon the poſterity of Sir Charles Coote, who was the chief commander in this expedition (5). Some time after he accompanied the Lord Liſle in relieving the caſtle of Geaſhill, and, at the council of war, told the reſt, that if they made haſte they might eaſily paſs the defiles and cauſeways, before the enemy could aſſemble to oppoſe them: whereto another replied, that perhaps it might be ſo, but when the country was alarmed how ſhould they get back? 'I proteſt, ſaid 'Sir Charles Coote, I never thought of that in my 'life; I always conſidered how to do my buſineſs, and 'when that was done, I got home again as well as I 'could, and hitherto I have not miſſed of forcing my 'way:' ſo they relieved that place, and beſides took Philipſtown and Trim; which laſt, three thouſand Iriſh attempting to recover the next night, Sir Charles Coote routed them with a very few forces. But in this rencounter he had the misfortune of being ſhot to death; whether by the enemy, or by one of his own troopers, is uncertain (6). Beſides his other offices and employments, he was one of the council to the Lords Juſtices of Ireland (7). He left ſeveral ſons, namely, Sir Charles his eldeſt ſon and heir, created Earl of Mountrath; Richard, afterwards Baron of Colloony and Earl of Bellamont; Chudleigh; Thomas (8).

(1) The Iriſh Rebellion, &c. by Sir John Temple, edit. 1646, 4to. P. ii. p. 3.

(2) Ibid. p. 17; and Cox's Hiſt. of Ireland, P. ii. p. 83.

(3) Temple, ibid. p. 23, 24.

(4) Ibid. p. 29; and Cox, p. 84, 85.

(5) Cox, ibid. p. 105.

(6) Idem, p. 106, 107.

(7) Temple, as above, p. 26, 28, 51.

(8) Ludlow's Memoirs, Vol. ii. p. 339. See alſo The Iriſh Compendium, p. 107, 119.

into the Rebels county; after a little ſkirmiſh with them, he burned great ſtore of their corn, and brought away a great booty (h). He alſo took Culmore fort (i). At his return, he apprehended Sir Robert Stuart, the King's Commander in thoſe parts, and ſent him into England with an Accuſation againſt him. Upon which occaſion, ſo well did the Parliament approve of his conduct, that they ordered care to be taken of his forces, and ſent him a letter of thanks (k). In 1649 he did not meet with the ſame ſucceſs: for he was ſtraitly beſieged in Londonderry [B] by ſuch of the Iriſh as had declared for King Charles II. and they demanded he ſhould depart the kingdom (l). But having ſome relief from England, he ſallied out, and ſcoured the county for ſeven miles on all ſides of the city, killing many, and taking ſeveral priſoners (m). After this, he concluded a peace with Major-general Owen Row O-neal, in order to preſerve the garriſon of Londonderry, and the Engliſh intereſt in thoſe parts: which the Parliament highly approved of, and ordered him to be ſupplied with proviſions and amunition (n). Accordingly, being ſupplied with them, and reinforced with a thouſand foot, and five hundred horſe, he marched into the country poſſeſſed by King Charles's friends, and having cleared all round Londonderry fourteen miles together, he brought great ſtore of proviſions into that city (o), and kept the field without any conſiderable oppoſition. In December, he routed about four thouſand horſe and foot, that came to the relief of Carrickfergus, then cloſely beſieged by him, and ſlew fourteen hundred men; whereupon Carrickfergus ſurrendered (p). About the beginning of the year 1650, he marched towards Belfaſt, where he found no oppoſition, and ſettled that country (q). Then he reduced Caſtledover (r), and advanced towards Catherlough (s). In April, he reduced many ſmall Forts near Carrickfergus, and took Inniſkilling and ſome other places (t), whereby he became ſo formidable, that the Iriſh army in Ulſter would not engage with him, though he took great booties from them (u). In June, he gave a great defeat to the Biſhop of Clogher [C], who was advancing at the head of four thouſand foot and ſix hundred horſe, to hinder the junction of Sir Charles, and Colonel Venables (w). In September, he was at the ſiege of Athlone: and in May 1651, was ſent to attend the motions of the Iriſh in Connaught (x). In June, he marched thirty miles in a day and night, in order to eſcape the Marquis of Clanrickard who endeavoured to intercept his paſſage; and joining the then Deputy of Ireland, they routed the united forces of the Marquis of Clanrickard and Earl of Caſtlehaven, killing and taking three thouſand of them. Then he went, and ſat down before Galloway (y). Soon after, advancing againſt the remains of the Marquis of Clanrickard's Forces, they abandoned ſeveral paſſes, and a caſtle of conſequence (z); and he alſo took Maſo-caſtle (a). In the beginning of the year 1652, he harraſſed the Barony of Burren [D], which refuſed to pay him contributions (b). And on the 12th of May enſuing, Galloway ſurrendered to him, after a long and tedious ſiege. Whereupon, the Marquis of Clanrickard deſired to enter into a Treaty with him, for putting a period to the war in Ireland, and eſtabliſhing the repoſe of that Nation (c). In June he reduced Sligo (d): and in July marched againſt a party of the Royaliſts in Kerry [E]; whom having beaten from their faſtneſſes, and ſecured the paſſes by planting ſome garriſons, he ſo diſtreſſed them that they could no longer continue in a body; therefore they, and the Marquis of Clanrickard came in and ſubmitted; and he had leave to tranſport himſelf with three thouſand men to any foreign country in friendſhip with England, within the ſpace of three months (e). To enable Sir Charles to carry on the war, he was one of the Commiſſioners of the taxes, exciſe, and cuſtoms, for Ulſter (f). After Ireland was reduced (h) Idem. p. 367.

(i) Hiſt. of Ireland, by R. Cox, P. ii. p. 203.
(k) Whitelock, p. 367.
(l) Ibid. p. 396.
(m) Ibid. p. 414, 420.
(n) Page 422.
(o) Page 425, 426, 427.
(p) Ibid. p. 435, 436.
(q) Ibid. p. 443.
(r) Page 446.
(s) Page 451.
(t) Page 453, 455.
(u) Page 455, 458.
(w) Page 463, 464.
(x) Page 477, 493.
Ludlow's Memoirs, edit. 1698, vol. i. p. 343, 348.
(y) Whitelock, p. 495, 497, 500.
(z) Ibid. p. 507.
(a) Page 516.
(b) Page 521.
(c) Ibid. p. 527, 531, 532. Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. i. edit. 1698, p. 396, &c.
(d) Whitelock, as above, p. 538.
(e) Ibid. p. 540. Ludlow, as above, p. 418.
(f) Ludlow, ibid. p. 338.

[B] For he was ſtraitly beſieged in Londonderry.] During this ſiege, he agreed to ſupply the beſiegers with powder, upon their engaging to furniſh him with ſuch proviſions as he wanted; which was performed on both ſides (9). This ſhows how little Sir Charles was afraid of the beſiegers. But how greatly he was, and had been, diſtreſſed, for want of pay and proviſions, is evident, from a paper of requeſts to Lieutenant-General Cromwell, wherein it was repreſented, in the name of Sir Charles Coote and his forces, that they, being three regiments of horſe, and three of foot, had received but eight months pay in eight years, and a peck of oatmeal a week (10).

(9) Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. i. p. 294.
(10) Whitelock, as above, p. 410.

[C] In June he gave a great defeat to the Biſhop of Clogher.] This battle was fought at Skirfolas, on the 21ſt of June (11); and, after an hour's hot diſpute, with great reſolution on both ſides, the Iriſh were wholly routed. Many of them were killed upon the place, and the execution was ten or eleven miles every way that night (12): but, afterwards, the purſuit was continued farther than ever was heard of before, namely, above thirty miles. So that it was believed, that five hundred of all this army did not eſcape (13). But Sir Charles writes in a letter, that there were at leaſt, in all, three thouſand killed. The Biſhop being taken, much wounded (14), was hanged the next day, by order of the Preſident, and his head ſet up on one of the gates of Londonderry; of which, but the year before, he had aſſiſted Sir Charles Coote in raiſing the ſiege (15).

(11) Hiſt. of Ireland, by R. Cox, P. ii. p. 24.
(12) Whitelock, p. 464.
(13) R. Cox, ubi ſupra.
(14) Whitelock, as above.
(15) R. Cox, as above, p. 24; and Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. i. p. 331.

[D] He harraſſed the Barony of Burren.] Mr. Whitelock informs us, that this Barony hath neither wood, water, nor earth enough to hang, drown, or bury a man (16).

(16) Memorials, p. 521.

[E] And in July he marched againſt a party of the Royaliſts in Kerry.] They had got together a body of about five thouſand men, under the conduct of the Marquis of Clanrickard and Sir Phelim O Neal, with which they had beſieged and taken the fort of Balliſhannon. Whereupon Sir Charles Coote and Colonel Venables drew out what forces they could, and advanced towards them with ſuch expedition, that they were near the place before the enemy had notice of their march; who, finding themſelves ſurprized, retreated to the bogs, leaving a ſmall garriſon in Balliſhannon; but being purſued by the Parliament's forces, who killed and wounded about three hundred of them, (in which number were thirty officers) and took from them ſeven or eight thouſand cows, on whoſe milk they chiefly ſubſiſted; twelve hundred of them came in and laid down their arms; upon which the garriſon they had placed in Balliſhannon ſurrendered upon articles (17).

(17) Ludlow, as above, vol. i. p. 412.

to

to the obedience of the Parliament, he was one of the Court of Juſtice in the province of Connaught (g); of which he was made Preſident by Act of Parliament (h). Being in England at the time of the depoſing of Richard Cromwell, he went poſt for Ireland, to carry the news of that great alteration to his brother Henry Cromwell, and to concert with him what to do in order to maintain themſelves in their poſts (i). At firſt he ſeemed to aim at nothing more, than to keep his Government in Connaught, and to have his Regiment of Foot, and troop of Horſe, continued to him (k) [F]. But when he found that King Charles the Second's intereſt was likely to prevail, he endeavoured to inſinuate himſelf into his favour. For that purpoſe, he ſent over to the Marquis of Ormond, then at Bruſſels, one Sir Arthur Forbes, a Scotiſh Gentleman of good affection to the King, and good intereſt in the Province of Ulſter, where he was an Officer of Horſe, 'To aſſure 'his Majeſty of Sir Charles's affection and duty; and that, if his Majeſty would vouchſafe 'to come into Ireland, he was confident the whole kingdom would declare for him: that 'though the preſent power in England had removed all the ſober men from the govern-'ment of the State in Ireland, under the character of Preſbyterians; and had put Ludlow, 'Corbet, and others of the King's judges in their places; yet they were generally ſo 'odious to the army as well as to the people, that they could ſeize upon their perſons, 'and the very caſtle of Dublin, when they ſhould judge it convenient.' However, the King not chuſing to go to Ireland, diſmiſſed Sir Arthur Forbes with ſuch letters and commiſſions as he deſired: who, upon his return to Ireland, found the ſtate of affairs much altered ſince his departure (l). For Sir Charles Coote, and one or two more, ſo influenced the whole council of Officers, that they prevailed upon them to vote, Not to receive Col. Ludlow as Commander in Chief; and, beſides, made themſelves maſters of Athlone, Drogheda, Limerick, Dublin, and other places for the ſervice of the King (m). Then he ſent to Col. Monk, to acquaint him with the progreſs he had made in ſecuring Ireland; who was ſo pleaſed with it, that he cauſed the cannon at Berwick to be fired in teſtimony of his joy, and ſent back the meſſenger with letters of thanks for the good ſervice, deſiring him and his friends not to reſtore the Commiſſioners of the Parliament, whom they had ſeized, to the exerciſe of their authority (n). Soon after, Sir Charles Coote, and ſome others ſent to the Parliament a charge of high-treaſon, againſt Col. Ludlow, Col. John Jones, Col. Thomlinſon, and Miles Corbet (o). But the oppoſite party reſolved to ſeize him, and his friends: of which having notice, he mounted on horſebrck, and, attended by great numbers of people, rode about the ſtreets of Dublin, and declared for a Free Parliament (p). He likewiſe made himſelf maſter of Dublin-Caſtle, and expelled Sir Hardreſs Waller from the command of the army (q). To recommend himſelf farther to the King, he apprehended John Coke, Chief Juſtice of Ireland, who had been Solicitor-General at the trial of King Charles I (r). Notwithſtanding all that, the Rump thought themſelves ſo

(g) Idem, vol. ii. p. 443.

(h) Ibid. p. 704.

(i) Ibid. p. 642.

(k) Ibid. p. 704.

(l) The Hiſt. of the Rebellion, &c. by Lord Clarendon, ed. 1731, 8*vo*. P. iii. vol. ii. p. 754, 755.

(m) Ludlow, as above, vol. ii. p. 787, 788.

(n) Ibid. p. 798.

(o) Ibid. p. 805, 806.

(p) Ibid. p. 838.

(q) Page 839.

(r) Page 851.

[F] At firſt he ſeemed to aim at nothing more than to keep his government in Connaught, and to have his regiment of foot, and troop of horſe continued to him.] Mr. Ludlow informs us, (if he is altogether to be credited) that he aſſured him of his endeavours, to have all thoſe things confirmed to him by the Parliament, in hopes that he would employ them in the defence and preſervation of that authority under which he had done ſo many great ſervices, and from which he had received ſo many marks of favour. This Sir Charles promiſed to do, and added, that he was fully convinced that his intereſt was wholly involved in the preſervation of the Parliament, all that he enjoyed being derived from their authority; and that as he had oppoſed the late King in his arbitrary deſigns, ſo he would continue to act in conformity to thoſe actions, well knowing, that if the ſon ſhould happen to prevail, the Engliſh intereſt would be loſt in Ireland, and the Iriſh reſtored to the poſſeſſion of their lands, according to an agreement paſſed between them. And this Sir Charles promiſed Ludlow he would do (18).

M.

(18) Ludlow's Memoirs, &c. vol. ii. p. 704, 705.

 [The character of Sir Charles Coote the elder, is drawn by Dr. Leland in a very unfavourable light. "Sir Charles Coote," ſays that hiſtorian, "was a "ſoldier of fortune, trained in the wars of Elizabeth, "moroſe, inſolent, and cruel, provoked, particularly, "by the ravages made in his eſtates, which he ac-"quired by various projects, and impatient to "revenge them on the Iriſh, againſt whom he had "imbibed the moſt illiberal and inveterate prejudices. "This man was employed by the chief governors "to drive ſome of the inſurgents of Leinſter from the "Caſtle of Wicklow, which they had inveſted. He "executed his commiſſion; repelled the Iriſh to their "mountains; and, in revenge of their depredations, "committed ſuch unprovoked, ſuch ruthleſs, and "indiſcriminate carnage in the town, as rivalled the "utmoſt extravagancies of the northerns. The "wanton cruelty, inſtead of terrifying, ſerved to ex-"aſperate the rebels, and to provoke them to ſevere "retaliation (19)."

(19) Hiſtory of Ireland, vol. iii. p. 145, 146.

Sir Charles Coote the younger, the ſubject of the preſent article, ſeems not to have been much more in Dr. Leland's favour. "Coote," ſays he, "and his "father, had engaged in the parliamentarian ſervice, "not from principle, but intereſt (20)." Perhaps the full truth of this aſſertion may be ſomewhat doubtful. For as the Cootes are underſtood to have been zealous Preſbyterians, it is highly probable that they were influenced, in part, by their real ſentiments, civil and religious, and eſpecially by their averſion to popery.

(20) Ibid. p. 404.

It was in one of Sir Charles Coote's expeditions, that a complete and authentic copy was found of that private Treaty of the Earl Glamorgan with the confederated Iriſh Roman Catholics, which excited ſo much noiſe at the time, and hath ſince been the object of ſo much diſcuſſion (21). The ſubject has been conſidered by us under the article of BIRCH.

(21) Ibid. as above.

When Sir Charles Coote determined to exert himſelf in promoting the reſtoration of King Charles the Second, he acted with all the zeal of a new convert. After the Convention and Council of Officers at Dublin had avowed their deſign of reſtoring his Majeſty, one point only remained to be diſcuſſed, which was, whether they ſhould ſtipulate for a confirmation of eſtates to the adventurers and ſoldiers, or whether they ſhould reſtore him without any previous condition. This matter was warmly debated, and Lord Broghill was for proceeding with ſecrecy and caution. But Sir Charles Coote contended for ſubmitting all their intereſts implicitly to the King; and his opinion at length prevailed (22).]

K.

(22) Ibid. p. 407.

ſure of him, that on the 5th of January 1659-60, they approved of what had been done by him and other Officers of the Army in Ireland for the ſervice of the Parliament; and ordered, that the Thanks of the Houſe ſhould be given them for their good ſervice, to be ſigned by the Speaker, and ſealed with the Seal of the Parliament (s). On the 19th of the ſame month, they appointed him one of the Commiſſioners for the management of the affairs of Ireland (t). But, before thoſe Commiſſioners declared for King Charles, they inſiſted upon ſeveral particulars relating to their intereſt as members of that nation (u). On the 6th of September 1660, Sir Charles Coote, on account of his many and great ſervices for the Royal Cauſe, was created Baron and Viſcount Coote, and Earl of Mountrath in the Queen's county in Ireland: and he was alſo appointed one of the Lords Juſtices of Ireland (w). But he did not long enjoy theſe honours, for he died the 18th of December 1661 (x). He was ſucceeded in honour and eſtate by Charles his ſon, the ſecond Earl; anceſtor of Charles-Henry, the ſeventh Earl of Mountrath.

(s) Mercurius Politic. No. 602, p. 1009.

(t) Ibid. No. 604.

(u) Ibid. No. 612.

(w) The Iriſh Compendium, &c. as above, p. 107, 108.

(x) Ibid.

 [CORAM (THOMAS), a name which claims admittance in this Temple of Britiſh Worthies (a), as the Founder of a new ſpecies of public charity, was born about the year 1668; and, taking an early attachment to naval purſuits, ſpent the firſt part of his life as maſter of a veſſel trading to the American Colonies. While he reſided in that part of the metropolis which is the common reſidence of ſea-faring people, buſineſs often obliging him to come early into the city, and return late, he had frequent occaſions of ſeeing young children expoſed, through the indigence or cruelty of their parents. This excited his compaſſion ſo far, that he projected the Foundling Hoſpital; in which humane deſign he laboured ſeventeen years, and at laſt, by his ſole application, obtained in 1739 the royal charter for it. He was highly inſtrumental in promoting another good deſign, viz. the procuring a bounty upon naval ſtores imported from the Colonies; and was eminently concerned in ſetting on foot the Colonies of Georgia and Nova Scotia. A ſhort ſpecimen of his manner of applying for relief to thoſe who were in diſtreſs ſhall be given below (b), in a letter to Sir Hans Sloane [A]. His laſt charitable deſign, which he lived to make ſome progreſs in, but not to complete, was a ſcheme for uniting the Indians in North America more cloſely to the Britiſh intereſt, by an eſtabliſhment for the education of Indian girls. Indeed he ſpent a great part of his life in ſerving the public, and with ſo total a diſregard to his private intereſt, that, towards the latter part of it, he was himſelf ſupported by a penſion of ſomewhat more than an hundred pounds a year, raiſed for him, at the ſolicitation of Dr. Brockleſby [B] and Sir Sampſon Gideon, by the voluntary ſubſcriptions of public-ſpirited perſons; at the head of whom was that truly amiable and benevolent prince, Frederic, late Prince of Wales.—This ſingular and memorable man died, at his lodgings near Leiceſter Square, March 29, 1751, in his 84th year; and was interred, purſuant to his deſire, in the vault under the chapel of the Foundling Hoſpital, where the inſcription tranſcribed below [C] perpetuates his memory, as Hogarth's portrait [D] has preſerved his honeſt countenance.] N.

(a) New and General Biographical Dictionary, 1784.

(b) Sloane's MS. 4041.

[A] To Sir Hans Sloane.]

HONOURED SIR, Oct. 28, 1744.

I requeſt your favour to this pretty girl, who has long had a ſore eye, and has not yet been able to obtain any relief for it. I humbly aſk you pardon for this freedom.

I am, with the greateſt reſpect,
Honoured Sir,
Your Honour's
moſt obedient Servant,
THOMAS CORAM."

[B] Dr. Brockleſby.] On the Doctor's applying to the good old man, to know whether his ſetting on foot a ſubſcription for his benefit would not offend him, he received this noble anſwer: "I have not waſted the little wealth, of which I was formerly poſſeſſed, in ſelf-indulgence or vain expences, and am not aſhamed to confeſs that, in this my old age, I am poor (1)." Upon the death of Coram, this penſion was continued to Leveridge, a worn-out ſinger at the Theatres, who, at the age of ninety, had ſcarce any other proſpect than that of a pariſh ſubſiſtence.

(1) Sir John Hawkins's Life of Johnſon, p. 573.

[C] The inſcription tranſcribed below.]

"Captain THOMAS CORAM, whoſe Name will never want a Monument ſo long as this Hoſpital ſhall ſubſiſt, was born about the year 1668; a Man eminent in that moſt eminent Virtue, the Love of Mankind; little attentive to his private Fortune, and refuſing many Opportunities of increaſing it, his Time and Thoughts were continually employed in endeavours to promote the public Happineſs, both in this Kingdom and elſewhere, particularly in the Colonies of North America; and his Endeavours were many Times crowned with the deſired Succeſs.
His unwearied Solicitations, for above Seventeen
Years together, (which would have baffled the Patience and Induſtry of any Man leſs zealous in doing Good) and his Application to Perſons of Diſtinction of both Sexes, obtained at Length the Charter of the Incorporation
(bearing Date the 17th of October 1739)
FOR THE MAINTENANCE AND EDUCATION OF EXPOSED AND DESERTED YOUNG CHILDREN,
by which many Thouſands of Lives may be preſerved to the Public, and employed in a frugal and honeſt Courſe of Induſtry. He died the 29th of March, 1751, in the 84th Year of his Age, poor in worldly Eſtate, rich in good Works; and was buried, at his own Deſire, in the Vault underneath this Chapel
(the firſt here depoſited)
at the Eaſt End thereof; many of the Governors and other Gentlemen attending the Funeral, to do Honour to his Memory.
Reader, thy Actions will ſhew whether thou art ſincere in the Praiſes thou may'ſt beſtow on him; and if thou haſt Virtue enough to commend his Virtues, forget not to add alſo the Imitation of them."

[D] Hogarth's portrait.] This portrait, which is ſaid to be the beſt that Hogarth ever painted, is a whole-length. The Captain has the ſeal of the charter in his hand. Before him is a globe; at a diſ-tance a proſpect of the ſea. It is thus deſcribed in "The Scandalizade," a ſatire publiſhed about the year 1749:

"Lo, old Captain Coram, ſo round in the face,
"And a pair of good chaps plump'd up in good caſe,
"His amiable locks hanging grey on each ſide
"To his double-breaſt coat o'er his ſhoulder ſo wide," &c (2).

(2) Biographical Anecdotes of Hogarth, p. 261.

A mezzotinto from this portrait, a three-quarters length, was publiſhed by Mac Ardell.—Hogarth, ſo early as 1739, had introduced the good old Captain in an engraved Power of Attorney from the Truſtees of the Foundling Hoſpital to thoſe gentlemen who were appointed to receive ſubſcriptions towards the building (3). In this picture are ſeen ſeveral children of the Hoſpital; the boys with mathematical inſtruments, the girls with ſpinning-wheels. Over the door of the houſe they come out at, are the King's Arms. A porter is bringing in a child followed by Captain Coram, whoſe benevolent countenance is directed towards a kneeling woman.] N.

(3) Ibid. p. 253.

 [The Editor cannot diſmiſs this article without mentioning a few particulars relative to the Foundling Hoſpital. For ſeveral years after its inſtitution, it was an eminently popular object. Numbers of affluent perſons were ardent to encourage it, and the Benefactions to the Hoſpital flowed in, in a very great abundance. It was at length taken under the direction of Parliament, and, from 1756 to 1759, annual and liberal grants were made for its ſupport; in conſequence of which children were poured in from every part of the kingdom. This circumſtance, after ſome time, excited a general alarm. It was ſuggeſted, that the children, being cut off from all intercourſe with their fathers and mothers, would, when they grew up, be aliens in their native land; without any viſible obligations, and conſequently without affections. It was farther ſuggeſted, that they might look upon themſelves as a kind of independent beings in ſociety; and that if they were permitted to increaſe as they had lately done, no one could tell what harm might enſue to the ſtate, when there were ſuch numbers who could ſcarcely be ſaid to be connected with the body politic. Nay, it was aſked, whether they might not, in time, riſe like the ſlaves of Rome, and throw the kingdom into confuſion (4)? Sentiments of this nature were firſt thrown out to the world by a Mr. Maſſie, a political writer of that period. In a pamphlet, entitled, "A Plan for the Eſtabliſhment of Charity Houſes for expoſed or deſerted Women and Girls, and for penitent Proſtitutes," and which was printed in 1758, he introduced ſome obſervations concerning the Foundling Hoſpital, ſhewing the ill conſequences of its receiving a public ſupport. Afterwards, in 1759, he made a ſecond attack upon the Hoſpital, in a Tract written ſolely for that purpoſe. In this Tract, the good man's zeal upon the ſubject led him to ſeveral extravagancies and abſurdities: but his general principles, concerning the evil that might ariſe from bringing up large multitudes of people who were not bound to ſociety by the common ties of private and domeſtic affection, had a powerful influence on the public mind. The indiſcriminate admiſſion of infants into the Hoſpital was put a ſtop to; Parliamentary ſupport was withdrawn; and the inſtitution was left to be maintained by the generoſity of individuals. Perhaps that generoſity has too much abated. The Foundling Hoſpital doth not ſeem, at preſent, to be a favourite child of the public; and yet ſuch a charity, properly reſtricted and regulated, comes recommended by many ſtrong and affecting conſiderations. Mr. Jonas Hanway, whoſe philanthropy we need not celebrate, entered largely into the ſubject, and ſhewed that the Foundling Hoſpital was in itſelf an eſtabliſhment of great importance, and that it only required to be duly modified and directed, in order to render it of real utility.

(4) Monthly Review, vol. xxii. p. 210. 212.

It is natural, on this occaſion, to reflect on the influence of faſhion, with regard to charitable inſtitutions. Of late years, the zeal for the ſupport of public Hoſpitals appears to have declined in a conſiderable degree. The Royal Foundations, though in part dependent on occaſional benefactions and bequeſts, do, indeed, ſtand firm. Guy's Hoſpital, which was founded on the liberality of a ſingle perſon, requires no adventitious aid. St. Luke's is rendered equally firm, by the noble legacies that have been left it, and the funds of which it is hence poſſeſſed. But other Hoſpitals, which principally reſt on voluntary ſubſcriptions, have not retained their former ſplendour. This has been particularly the caſe with reſpect to the St. George's, Weſtminſter, and London Hoſpitals. The two former have received ſome temporary aids from the Muſical Exhibitions; and St. George's Hoſpital, though an immediate ſufferer, will hereafter revive, in conſequence of a large reverſion. It is to be apprehended, that the revival of the proſperity of the Weſtminſter and London Hoſpitals is more doubtful and precarious. One ſource of ſome failure in the encouragement of theſe and other ſimilar eſtabliſhments, may be traced, perhaps, in the burthens and diſtreſſes of the late war. Another and more obvious cauſe is the inſtitution of Diſpenſaries, of which there are ſaid to be twenty-one, in and near the metropolis. That they are very uſeful, I have no intention to deny; and they would appear ſtill more reſpectable, if they never were converted to particular intereſted purpoſes. But, though I am a ſincere well-wiſher to them, I cannot help regretting that any of the old noble eſtabliſhments ſhould be neglected. They are an honour to this country, and it would redound to the credit, as well as to the benefit of the public, to have them maintained in their original luſtre. It is to be lamented, that faſhion ſhould ever have an undue ſway in ſo excellent a thing as Charity.] K.

CORBET (RICHARD), Biſhop of Norwich, and an excellent Poet, was ſon of Mr. Vincent Corbet [A], and born at Ewell in Surrey, towards the latter end of the ſixteenth century, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. He had his education in Weſtminſter School, and thence was ſent to Oxford in Lent Term 1597-8, where he was admitted a Student

[A] He was ſon of Mr. Vincent Corbet.] Our author's filial piety put him upon immortalizing the memory and virtues of his father in an excellent elegy, which begins thus (1):

(1) See Poems, written by the Right Rev. Dr. Richard Corbet, late Lord Biſhop of Norwich, London, 1672, p. 31.

Vincent Corbet, farther known
By Pointer's name than by his own,
Here lies engaged, till the day
Of raiſing bones, and quick'ning clay.

That gentleman's character is beautifully drawn in the following lines:

Years he liv'd were near fourſcore;
But, count his virtues, he liv'd more:
And number him by doing good,
He liv'd the age before the flood.

Again;

Simple he was, and withal
His purſe not baſe nor prodigal;
Poorer in ſubſtance than in friends,
Future and public were his ends.
His conſcience, like his diet, ſuch
As neither took, nor left, too much.
So the made laws needleſs grown
To him, he needed but his own.

The elegy ends with this turn:

Read then, and mourn, whate'er thou art
That doſt hope to have a part
In honeſt epitaphs; leſt being dead,
Thy life be written, and not read.

[B] He

Student of Chriſt-Church. In 1605, he took the degree of Maſter of Arts, being at that time eſteemed one of the moſt celebrated Wits of the Univerſity. Afterwards entering into Holy Orders, he became an eminent Preacher, and was much followed by perſons of taſte and learning. His wit and eloquence recommended him to the favour of King James I. who made him one of his Chaplains in Ordinary, and, in 1620, promoted him to the Deanery of Chriſt-Church; about which time he was Doctor in Divinity, Vicar of Caſſington near Woodſtock in Oxfordſhire, and Prebendary of Bedminſter-Secunda in the Church of Sarum (a). He made verſes, whilſt Dean of Chriſt-Church, on a play acted before the King at Woodſtock [B]. He was elected, the 30th of July 1629, Biſhop of Oxford, in the room of Dr. Howſon tranſlated to the See of Durham; was conſecrated the 19th of October, and inſtalled the 3d of November following. Laſtly, upon the tranſlation of Doctor White to Ely, he was elected Biſhop of Norwich, the 7th of April 1632; and received the Temporalities, the 12th of May following (b). This Prelate married Alice the daughter of Dr. Leonard Hutten, Vicar of Flower in Northamptonſhire (c) [C], by whom he had a ſon named after his grandfather Vincent [D]. In his younger years, he wrote ſeveral pieces of poetry [E], without any intention of their being made public (d); and

(a) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. i. col. 600, 601.

(b) Id. ibid.

(c) Ibid. col. 571.

(d) Id. ubi ſupra, col. 601.

[B] He made verſes on a play acted before the King at Woodſtock.] The play was called Technogamia: or, The Marriage of Arts, and was written by Barten Holiday, the Poet. The ill ſucceſs it met with in the repreſentation, occaſioned ſeveral copies of verſes; among which, to uſe Anthony Wood's words (3), 'Corbet, Dean of Chriſt-Church, put in for one, who 'had that day preached (as it ſeems) before the King, 'with his band ſtarched clean; for which he was re-'proved by the graver ſort, but thoſe who knew him 'well took no notice of it, for they have ſeveral times 'ſaid, that he loved to the laſt boys play very well.'

(3) Ath. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 260.

[C] He married Alice, the daughter of Dr. Leonard Hutten, Vicar of Flower, in Northamptonſhire.] He mentions that village in his Iter Boreale.

Here we paid thanks, and parted, and at night
Had entertainment, all in one man's right,
At Flow're, a village, where our tenant ſhe,
Sharp as a winter morning, fierce, yet free, &c (4).

(4) Poems, &c. p. 2.

It is not improbable, that our author's acquaintance with Dr. Hutten might take it's riſe from that Northern-Trip, and that he might then have had the firſt ſight of the Doctor's daughter, whom he afterwards married.

[D] He had a ſon named Vincent.] Our author's Muſe obeyed the dictates of paternal affection no leſs than of filial piety; for as he wrote an elegy on his own father, ſo he addreſſed the following verſes, fraught with the beſt and kindeſt wiſhes, to his ſon.

What I ſhall leave thee none can tell,
But all ſhall ſay, I wiſh thee well.
I wiſh thee, Vin, before all wealth,
Both bodily and ghoſtly health:
Nor too much wealth, nor wit, come to thee;
So much of either might undo thee.
I wiſh thee learning, not for ſhow,
Enough for to inſtruct, and know;
Not ſuch as gentlemen require,
To prate at table, or at fire.
I wiſh thee all thy mother's graces,
Thy father's fortunes, and his places.
I wiſh thee friends, and one at court,
Not to build on, but to ſupport;
To keep thee, not in doing many Oppreſſions, but from ſuffering any.
I wiſh thee peace in all thy ways,
Nor lazy, nor contentious days;
And when thy ſoul and body part,
As innocent as now thou art (5).

(5) Page 35.

I conjecture, from the laſt line, that Vin was very young when his father wrote theſe.

[E] He wrote ſeveral pieces of poetry.] A collection of them was publiſhed, under the title of Poetica Stromata, in octavo, London, 1647-8 (6). There is another edition of them in a thin duodecimo, London, 1672, dedicated to Sir Edmund Bacon, of Redgrave-Hall, in Suffolk, Baronet. The Editor tells his patron, that the moſt pious of the Clergy have made uſe of the innocent art of poeſy, not only for their pleaſant diverſion, but their moſt fervent devotion. After the dedication follows an advertiſement, in which we are told, that 'Upon reprinting theſe poems, diligent 'ſearch was made to perfect them, which were very 'imperfectly printed before;' and that, 'though in 'this edition there be but few new poems, yet we may 'find many of them more perfect than before; for in 'ſome there are ſix, in others four, and in many two 'lines added out of perfecter copies, which were left 'out in the former impreſſion.' Beſides what has been already cited, I ſhall give the curious reader a farther ſpecimen of Biſhop Corbet's poetical genius, as his works are in but few hands. In his Iter Boreale, or Journey Northward, he has the following humorous deſcription of a Serjeant.

(6) Wood ubi ſupra, vol. i. col. 601.

I'th' interim comes a moſt officious drudge,
His face and gown draw'd out with the ſame budge.
His pendent pouch, which was both large and wide,
Look'd like a letters-patents by his ſide.
He was as awful, as he had been ſent
From Moſes with the eleventh commandement (7).

(7) Poems, &c. p. 3.

In the ſame poem we meet with a fine moral reflection upon the burial-place of King Richard III. and Cardinal Wolſey, who were both interred at Leiceſter.

Is not uſurping Richard buried here,
That King of Hate, and therefore ſlave of fear;
Dragg'd from the fatal Boſworth-field, where he Loſt life, and, what he liv'd for, cruelty?
Search, find his name; but there is none: O Kings,
Remember whence your pow'r and vaſtneſs ſprings;
If not as Richard now, ſo may you be,
Who hath no tomb, but ſcorn and memory.
And tho' from his own ſtore Wolſey might have
A palace *, or a college †, for his grave,
Yet here he lies interr'd, as if that all
Of him to be remembered were his fall.
Nothing but earth on earth, no pompous weight
Upon him, but a pebble or a quoit.
If thou art thus neglected, what ſhall we ‖
Hope after death, that are but ſhreds of thee (8)?

(*) Whitehall.
(†) Chriſt-church.
(‖) Students of Chriſt-church.
(8) Page 6, 7.

The hoſt's pointing out the diſpoſition of the two armies in Boſworth-field affords a very humorous and entertaining picture.

Mine Hoſt was full of ale and hiſtory,
And on the morrow when he brought us nigh
Where the two roſes joined, you wou'd ſuppoſe
Chaucer ne're writ the Romant of the Roſe.
Hear him: ſee ye yon woods? there Richard lay
With his whole army: look the other way,
And lo! where Richmond in a bed of groſſe
Encamp'd himſelf o're night with all his force.
Upon this hill they met. Why, he could tell
The inch where Richmond ſtood, where Richard fell.
Beſides what of his knowledge he could ſay,
He had authentic notice from the play:
Which I might gueſs by's muſtring up the ghoſts,
And policies, not incident to hoſts:

But

and he was one of thoſe celebrated perſons, who, with Ben Jonſon, Sir John Harrington, Dr. Donne, Michael Drayton, and others, wrote Mock-Commendatory verſes on Tom Coryate's Crudities (e). He concurred likewiſe with other Poets of the Univerſity in inviting the celebrated Ben Jonſon to Oxford, where that Poet was created Maſter of Arts (f). There is extant in the Muſæum Aſhmolæum (g) a Funeral Oration in Latin, by Dr. Corbet, on the death of Prince Henry, A. D. 1612. This learned and ingenious Prelate died in the year 1635, and was buried at the upper end of the Choir of the Cathedral Church of Norwich [F]. He was very hoſpitable, and always a generous encourager of public deſigns; and particularly, when St. Paul's Cathedral was repaired, in the year 1634, he not only contributed largely himſelf, but was very diligent in procuring contributions from others (h). I know not why Anthony Wood ſays, he was conſecrated Biſhop of Oxford, though in ſome reſpects unworthy of ſuch an office (i), unleſs it be that he thought the character of a Poet inconſiſtent with that of a Biſhop. It appears by our Author's

(e) Winſtanley's Lives of the Engliſh Poets, Lond. 1697, p. 121.
(f) Wood, ubi ſupra, col. 602.
(g) No. 1153.
(h) Id. ib. col. 601.
(i) Ibid. col. 736.

But chiefly by that one perſpicuous thing,
Where he miſtook a player for a King;
For when he wou'd have ſaid, King Richard died,
And call'd a horſe, a horſe, he Burbage cry'd (9).

(9) Page 17, 18.

Our author appears to have had an excellent genius for Panegyric, by the following lines, which are part of an elegy on the late Lord William Howard, Baron of Effingham, who died the 10th of December 1615.

What did he? Acts of mercy, and refrain
Oppreſſion in himſelf, and in his train?
Was his eſſential table full as free
As boaſts and invitations uſed to be;
Where if his Ruſſet-friend did chance to dine,
Whether his Satten-man wou'd fill him wine?——
Did he ſeek regular pleaſures? was he known
Juſt huſband of one wife, and ſhe his own?
Did he give freely without pauſe or doubt,
And read petitions e're they were worn out?——
Did he attend the court for no man's fall?
Wore he the ruin of no hoſpital?
And when he did his rich apparel don,
Put he no widow, nor an orphan on?
Did he love ſimple virtue for the thing?
The King for no reſpect but for the King?
But above all, did his religion wait
Upon God's throne, or on the chair of ſtate?
He that is guilty of no Quære here,
Out-laſts his epitaph, out-lives his heir.

And a few lines farther;

And therefore I am angry, when a name
Comes to upbraid the world like Effingham.
Nor was it modeſt in thee to depart
To thy eternal home, where now thou art,
E're thy reproach was ready; or to die,
E're cuſtom had prepar'd thy calumny.
Eight days are paſt ſince thou haſt paid thy debt
To Sin, and not a libel ſtirring yet;
Courtiers, that ſcoff by patent, ſilent ſit,
And have no uſe of ſlander, or of wit:
But, which is monſtrous, tho' againſt the tide,
The water-men have neither rail'd nor ly'd.
Of good or bad there's no diſtinction known,
For in thy praiſe the good and bad are one (10).

(10) P. 38, 39, 40.

Nor was his talent for Satire leſs extraordinary, as appears by his verſes upon Mrs. Mallet, an unhandſome gentlewoman that made love unto him.

Have I renounc'd my faith? or baſely ſold
Salvation, or my loyalty for gold?
Have I ſome foreign practice undertook,
By poiſon, ſhot, ſharp knife, or ſharper look,
To kill my King? Have I betray'd the ſtate
To fire or fury, or ſome newer fate,
Which learned murth'rers, thoſe grand deſtinies,
The Jeſuits, have nurs'd? If of all theſe
I guilty am, proceed, I am content
That Mallet take me for my puniſhment.
For never ſin was of ſo high a rate,
But one night's Hell with her might expiate.

Again;

Whether her wit, form, talk, ſmile, fire, I name,
Each is a ſtock of tyranny and ſhame.
But for her breath, ſpectators, come not nigh,
That lays about, God bleſs the company.
The man in a bear's ſkin, bated to death,
Wou'd chuſe the dogs much rather than her breath.
One kiſs of her's, and eighteen words alone,
Puts down the Spaniſh Inquiſition.

He concludes with theſe lines:

No Tyger's like her, ſhe feeds upon man,
Worſe than a Tygreſs or a Leopard can.
Let me go pray, and think upon ſome ſpell,
At once to bid the devil and her farewell (11).

(11) P. 44, 45, 46.

Our author's Epigrammatic turn may be ſeen in the following tetraſtick on Henry Bolings.

If gentleneſs cou'd tame the fates, or wit
Deliver man, Bolings had not dy'd yet:
But one, which over us in judgment ſits,
Doth ſay, our ſins are ſtronger than our wits (12).

(12) Page 88.

And in thoſe verſes, On the birth of the young Prince Charles.

When private men get ſons, they get a ſpoon,
Without eclipſe, or any ſtar at noon.

When Kings get ſons, they get withal ſupplies,
And ſuccours far beyond all ſubſidies.
Welcome God's loan, thou tribute to the ſtate,
Thou money newly coin'd, thou fleet of plate;
Thrice happy child, whom God thy father ſent,
To make him rich without a parliament (13).

(13) Page 108.

I ſhall only add here the following ſenſible and witty reflection in his Elegy upon the death of Queen Anne.

Know henceforth, that grief's vital part
Conſiſts in nature, not in art;
And verſes that are ſtudied,
Mourn for themſelves, not for the dead (14).

(14) Page 126.

Theſe extracts may ſerve to give the reader a taſte of an author, who is but little known at preſent, and whoſe works are not eaſily to be met with.

[F] He was buried——in the Cathedrial Church of Norwich.] Soon after, a large freeſtone, of a ſandy colour, was laid over his grave, and the following inſcription, engraven on a plate of braſs, was faſtened thereon.

Richardus Corbet Theologiæ Doctor, Eccleſiæ Cathedralis Chriſti Oxonienſis primum Alumnus, inde Decanus, exinde Epiſcopus, illinc huc tranſlatus, et hinc in cælum, Julii 28, an. 1635.

In Engliſh.

'Richard Corbet, Doctor of Divinity, firſt ſtudent, 'then Dean, of Chriſt-Church, in Oxford, and 'next Biſhop of that See; from thence tranſlated hi-'ther, and from hence to Heaven, July 28, 1635.

On the ſaid ſtone are the antient arms of the Corbets, of Shropſhire, viz. Or, a raven paſſant ſab. (15).

(15) Wood, ubi ſupra.

[G] He

Author's Poems, that, at ſome time or other of his life, he took a journey to Paris [G]. I ſhall ſubjoin ſome manuſcript verſes in honour of Biſhop Corbet [H].

[G] He took a journey to Paris.] I cannot forbear giving the reader one more ſample of Biſhop Corbet's wit, out of the ballad he made on that journey. It is a ridicule on the ſuperſtitious veneration of the Roman Catholics for relics, and the many forgeries practiſed in that reſpect.

Then to St. Dennis faſt we came,
To ſee the ſights of Notre Dame;
The man that ſhews 'em ſnaffles;
Where, who is apt for to believe,
May ſee our lady's right-arm ſleeve,
And eke her old pantoffles;

Her breaſt, her milk, her very gown
That ſhe did wear in Bethlem town,
When in the inn ſhe lay:
Yet all the world knows that's a fable;
For ſo good cloaths ne're lay in ſtable
Upon a lock of hay.

No Carpenter cou'd by his trade
Gain ſo much coin as to have made
A gown of ſo rich ſtuff;
Yet they, poor fools, think for their credit
They may believe old Joſeph did it,
'Cauſe he deſerv'd enough.

There is one of the croſs's nails,
Which whoſo ſees his bonnet vails,
And, if he will, may kneel:
Some ſay 'twas falſe, 'twas never ſo;
Yet feeling it, thus much I know,
It is as true as ſteel.

There is a lanthorn, which the Jews,
When Judas led them forth, did uſe;
It weighs my weight downright:
But to believe it, you muſt think,
The Jews did put a candle in't,
And then 'twas very light (16).

(16) Poems, &c. p. 129.

[H] Some manuſcript verſes in honour of Biſhop Corbet.] I found them in a blank leaf of his poems.

In flowing wit, if verſes writ with eaſe,
If learning, void of pedantry, can pleaſe;
If much good humour, join'd to ſolid ſenſe,
And mirth accompanied with innocence,
Can give a poet a juſt right to fame,
Then CORBET may immortal honour claim:
For he theſe virtues had, and in his lines
Poetic and heroic ſpirit ſhines;
Tho' bright, yet ſolid, pleaſant, but not rude,
With wit and wiſdom equally indu'd.
Be ſilent, Muſe, thy praiſes are too faint:
Thou want'ſt a pow'r this prodigy to paint,
At once a poet, prelate, and a ſaint. J. C.
B.

 [The extracts from Biſhop Corbet's Poems, ſhew him to have been a man of ingenuity, wit, and humour, and that he was capable of excelling either in panegyric or ſatire. But there is one inſtance in which his ſatirical vein was diſplayed, that muſt be condemned. We mean his verſes upon Mrs. Mallet, an unhandſome Gentlewoman that made love to him. The Lady, no doubt, was very ordinary and diſagreeable; and Corbet, if he did not like her, was under no obligation to comply with her propoſals of marriage. But ſurely her affection did not merit ſo cruel a return. The puniſhment was far beyond the crime, if there be a crime at all in an ugly woman's falling in love; for lines more ſevere can ſcarcely be met with in any ſatire that exiſts in the Engliſh language. Perhaps the manners of the age, which might be leſs offended than ours at a harſhneſs of ſentiment and expreſſion, may furniſh ſome excuſe for Dr. Corbet. At preſent, ſuch verſes, upon ſuch an occaſion, would be deemed equally contrary to politeneſs and humanity.] K.

 [CORYATE (THOMAS), a writer who poſſeſſed no inconſiderable ſhare of learning, but with a ſmall portion of common ſenſe, was the ſon of George [A] Coryate, Rector of Odcombe, in the county of Somerſet, by Gertrude his wife. His family was a very reſpectable one, being related to the Earl of Eſſex in the fourth degree, but whether on the father or mother's ſide we are not informed (a). He was born at Odcombe in the year 1577 (b), and received part of his education at Wincheſter School (c), whence he was removed to Oxford, where, in the year 1596, at the age of nineteen years, he became a Commoner of Gloceſter Hall. Here he continued three years, and attained, by the help

(a) Crudities, 239.
(c) Verſes by Hugh Holland and John Chapman, prefixed to Crudities.
(b) Athen. Oxon. 422.

[A] Was the ſon of George Coryate.] George Coryate was born in the pariſh of St. Thomas, within the city of Saliſbury. He received his education at Wincheſter School, and in the year 1562 was admitted perpetual Fellow of New College, Oxford (1). In the year 1566, on Queen Elizabeth's viſiting the Univerſity, he, together with W. Reynolds, Bachelor of Arts, received her Majeſty and her train at New College; on which occaſion he pronounced an Oration, for which he received great praiſes and a handſome purſe of gold (2). He afterwards took his degree in Arts, and, in June 1570, became Rector of Odcombe on the death of Thomas Reade, and ſometime after Bachelor of Divinity (3). In the year 1594, he was appointed Prebendary of Warthill, in the Cathedral Church of York, and alſo held ſome other dignity, but what we are not informed (4). He died at the Parſonage-Houſe at Odcombe, on the fourth of March 1606. It is aſſerted that his ſon, agreeably to the madneſs of his character, entertained a deſign of preſerving his body from ſtench and putrefaction, and with that view cauſed it to be kept above ground until the 14th of April following, when it was buried in the Chancel of the Church of Odcombe, by his ſucceſſor Gibbs Galiop, M. A. who had formerly belonged to Gloceſter Hall (5). This George Coryate was a perſon much commended in his time for his fine fancy in Latin poetry; and for certain pieces which he had written was honourably quoted by ſeveral eminent writers (6). The only pieces Mr. Wood had ſeen of his compoſition were, 1. "Poemata varia Latina," London 1611, quarto, publiſhed by his ſon after his death, and by him intitled "Poſthuma fragmenta Poematum Georgii Coryate." 2. "Deſcriptio Angliæ Scotiæ et Hiberniæ," written in Latin verſe, and dedicated to Queen Elizabeth (7). It is not ſaid whether this piece was ever printed. In the year 1763 was publiſhed, from a MS. found amongſt the papers belonging to a conſiderable family in one of the weſtern counties, a Latin Poem, which appears to have been written in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, intitled, "Deſcriptio Angliæ et Deſcriptio Londini," being two Poems in Latin verſe, ſuppoſed to be written in the 15th century (8) This pamphlet is imagined to be part of the Poem noticed by Mr. Wood. The mention of only fifteen Colleges at Oxford, fixes the date of the verſes before the year 1571. Beſides this his ſon, George Coryate had two other children, both daughters, by his wife Gertrude (9). She outlived her huſband and ſon many years. Her reſidence continued to be at Odcombe or near it until her death. Dr. Humphy Hody, a native of that place, informed Mr. Wood, that ſhe was buried near the remains of her huſband on the 3d of April 1645 (10). It appears that after her huſband's death ſhe married a ſecond time (11).

(1) Athen. Oxon. 335.
(2) Hiſt. of the Univerſity of Oxford, 4to. 1773. 226.
(3) Athen. Oxon. 335.
(4) Ibid.
(5) Ibid.
(6) John Caſe the Philoſopher. In ſpeculo Moralium, lib. 4. c. 2. James Middendorp. In 8vo. Libro De celeberrimis Acad. Col. Agrip. 1602. p. 450, 451. John Cay, in lib. 1. De Antiq. Acad. Cant. p. 45. & alibi.
(7) Athen. Oxon. 335.
(8) Gough's Topographic Antiquities, 4to. p. 21.
(9) In Antiquitates Sariſburienſes, 1771, p. 227, it is ſaid three daughters.
(10) Athen. Oxon. 335.
(11) Taylor the Water Poet's Works, 1630, p. 82.

of a great memory, to ſome competency in Logic, but more by far in the Greek tongue and human learning. He ſeems to have left Oxford without taking any degree [B]; and it is probable that thence he returned home, as we find him at Odcombe in the year 1606 (d). In that year he aſſembled his neighbours on Whitſunday, and with them went in cavalcade to Ewill, where he made an Oration at the Croſs, to the people of the town, and about two thouſand more who came from many places in the neighbourhood. His deſign in this proceeding, he ſays, was to draw a great company to Odcombe for the benefit of the Church, the whole ſtock of which had been expended. He alſo made another Oration to the ſame people on their coming to Odcombe (e). As his father died ſoon after, perhaps on that event he came up to London, where he was received into the family of Henry, Prince of Wales, who allowed him a penſion (f) and kept him as a ſervant [C]. Until this time he lived in obſcurity; but now he fell into the company of wits, who, as one of his Biographers (g) remarks, finding him little better than a fool in many reſpects, made him their whetſtone, and ſo he became notus nimis omnibus. In the beginning of the year 1608, he commenced his travels through Europe. On the 14th of May, he embarked at Dover, and the ſame day arrived at Calais, where, after a ſhort ſtay, he proceeded to Paris, and reached that city (h) on the twenty-ſecond of the ſame month. Through the whole courſe of his travels, his reſidence at any place (excepting Venice) was confined to a few days. He remained at Paris only until the 28th of that month; but in that time viſited St. Denis, and which he moſt deſired above all other things, and oftentimes wiſhed for before he ſaw the city, he enjoyed the ſight and company of Iſaac Caſaubon, with whom he had much familiar converſation, at his houſe near St. German's Gate within the city. "I found him, ſays he, very affable and courteous and learned in "his diſcourſes, and by ſo much the more willing to give me entertainment by how much "the more I made relation to him of his learned works (i). From Paris he proceeded to Lyons, at which place he arrived on the 3d of June. He ſtayed there two whole days; during which time he chanced to fall into company with a Turk (one of the train of M. de Breves, the French Embaſſador at Conſtantinople) "a notable companion and a "great ſcholler in his kinde; for he ſpake ſix or ſeven languages beſides the Latin, which "he ſpake very well: he was borne in Conſtantinople. I had a long diſcourſe with him "in Latin of many things, and amongſt other queſtions I aſked him whether he were "ever baptized; he tolde me, no, and ſaid he never would be. After that wee fell into "ſpeeches of Chriſt, whom he acknowledged for a great Prophet, but not for the Sonne "of God; affirming that neither he nor any of his country-men would worſhip him, but "the onely true God, Creator of heaven and earth: and called us Chriſtians, Idolaters, "becauſe we worſhipped images; a moſt memorable ſpeech if it be properly applied to "thoſe kind of Chriſtians which deſerve that imputation of idolatry. At laſt I fell into "ſome vehement argumentations with him in defence of Chriſt; whereupon being unwilling to anſwere me, he ſuddenly flung out of my company (k)." Coryate quitted Lyons on the 6th of June, and on the 11th aſcended Mount Senis. On the 12th he arrived at Turin, where he found ſo great a diſtemperature in his body, by drinking the ſweet wines of Piedmont, that it cauſed a grievous inflammation in his hands and face (l). His illneſs, however, did not prevent him from continuing his journey. He left Turin on the 13th, and two days after came to Milan, where he ſtayed only one day. His next ſtage was to the city of Lodi, at which place arriving too late, he could not obtain entrance into the town, but was obliged to repoſe that night in the coach he rode thither in (m). On the evening of the 20th he arrived at Padua, where he was informed of a very extraordinary cuſtom which diſcharged perſons in debt from the obligation of payment (n); a cuſtom which, had it not been noticed by a leſs haſty and more informed traveller (o), might have been ſuſpected for an impoſition by ſome one who had diſcovered the credulity of Coryate's diſpoſition. In this city he ſaw Livy's houſe, of which he gives a long deſcription (p): and here alſo in the Church of St. Anthony he obſerved a monument, which "made me even "lament, ſays he (q), being that" of a certain Engliſh Nobleman, "namely, Edward "Courteney, Earle of Devonſhire, who was buried there in the time of Queen Mary; "he died there in his youth, and was the ſonne of Henry, Earle of Devonſhire, and Marquiſſe of Exceter, who was beheaded by Queen Mary. Truly it ſtrooke great compaſſion and remorſe in me to ſee an Engliſhman ſo ignobly buried. For his body lieth in a "poore woodden coffin, placed upon another faire monument, having neither Epitaph

(d) Crambe.
(e) Ibid.
(f) Fuller.
(g) Athen. Oxon.
(b) Crudities, 20.
(i) Ibid. 51.
(k) Ibid. 65.
(l) Ibid. 82.
(m) Ibid.
(n) Ibid. 136.
(o) Addiſon's Works, 8vo. vol. iv. p. 51.
(p) Crudities, 138.
(q) Ibid. 143.

[B] Without taking any degree.] His friend Lawrence Whitaker, in a note to ſome verſes (12), ſays, he proceeded a Cæſarian Doctor, at the Univerſity of Royſton. To what this alludes may be difficult to diſcover at ſo great a diſtance of time; probably ſome court merriment. It was at Royſton, where King James frequently reſided, that Coryate made an Oration (13) on preſenting to him a copy of his Crudities. He is alſo ſtyled Doctor by Anthony Waſhbourne, in another copy of verſes (14).

(12) Coryate's Crambe, 1611.
(13) It is printed in his Crambe.
(14) Crambe.

[C] And kept him as a ſervant.] It is not known when, nor by whoſe means, he came to be noticed by Prince Henry; but as his name does not occur in either of the Liſts of that Prince's Houſhold, at the ſettlement of it in the years 1603 or 1610 (15), it is to be preſumed he was retained only for the purpoſe of creating mirth. "Sweetmeats and Coryate made "up the laſt courſe at all entertainments. Indeed he "was the Courtiers anvil to try their wits upon, and "ſometimes this anvil returned the hammers as hard "knocks as he received, his bluntneſs repaying their "abuſe (16)."

(15) Birch's Life of Prince Henry, p. 35. 449.
(16) Fuller.

"nor

" nor any other thing to preſerve it from oblivion, ſo that I could not have known it for " an Engliſhman's coffin, except an Engliſh gentleman, my kinde friend, Mr. George " Rooke, of whom I have before ſpoken, had told me of it and ſhewed me the ſame [D]." He remained at Padua three days. On leaving it he proceeded to Venice, where he arrived on the 24th. Of this place he ſpeaks with the utmoſt rapture: " it yieldeth," ſays he, " the moſt glorious and heavenly ſhew upon the water that ever any mortal eye beheld; " ſuch a ſhew as did raviſh me with delight and admiration (r)." Here he reſided ſix weeks, which he declares to have been the ſweeteſt time for ſo much he ever ſpent in his life (s) [E]. As at Lyons he entered into a diſpute with a Turk on the Truth of the Chriſtian Religion, ſo here he engaged in another with a Jewiſh Rabbin, whom he endeavoured to convert; but as the event of this controverſy had nearly terminated in a very ſerious manner, we ſhall relate it in his own words. " After there had paſſed many vehement " ſpeeches to and fro betwixt us, it happened that ſome forty or fifty Jews more flocked " about me, and ſome of them beganne very inſolently to ſwagger with me becauſe I " durſt reprehend their religion. Whereupon, fearing leaſt they would have offered me " ſome violence, I withdrew myſelf by little and little towards the bridge, at the entrance " into the Ghetto, with an intent to flee from them; but by good fortune our noble Am- " baſſador, Sir Henry Wotton, paſſing under the bridge in his gondola at that very time, " eſpyed me ſomewhat earneſtly bickering with them; and ſo incontinently ſent unto me " out of his boate one of his principal gentlemen, Maſter Belford his Secretary, who con- " veighed mee ſafely from theſe unchriſtian miſcreants, which perhaps would have given " me juſt occaſion to forſweare any more comming to the Ghetto (t)." We alſo find him viſiting a Courtezan with a deſign of converting her; and it muſt be owned he gives a very entertaining account of the manners of theſe people. Indeed, whatever cenſure any other parts of his travels are liable to, his deſcription of Venice, and the manners and cuſtoms of the people, may be peruſed with much ſatisfaction by thoſe who wiſh to be acquainted with the particular modes of living in different ages and nations; his account, though prolix, being always to be depended on for its veracity, and in this inſtance being calculated to afford much information. He departed from Venice the 8th of Auguſt, and paſſing through Padua, Vicenza, and Verona, on the 14th arrived at Brixia, where happening to be preſent at the dedication of a new image of the Virgin Mary, he found himſelf tempted to purloin a little waxen idol, in which he ſucceeded, and brought it away undiſcovered (u). His next ſtage was to Bergamo, where he was conſtrained to repoſe in a ſtable among horſes; and this vile lodging he with difficulty obtained, being obliged for it to the curteſy of an Italian Prieſt, who was ſhot the ſame night by a Bravo (w). Intending to go through the Griſons country into Germany, he repaired to a monaſtery in order to obtain ſome information for his conduct in his journey. He was received in a friendly manner by the Monks, who recommended him to a Dominican Friar, from whom he obtained the neceſſary inſtructions; and among others was particularly warned to avoid a certain Caſtle ſeated on the Lake of Como, which was then garriſoned by the Spaniards, who might poſſibly ſeize and impriſon him being an Engliſhman (x). On the 18th he left Bergamo, and on the 26th arrived at Zurich, where he was introduced to Henry Bullinger, nephew of the famous preacher of both thoſe names, who was the ſucceſſor of Zuinglius, in the Eccleſiaſtical function at this place. He deſcribes Bullinger as a " very vigilant " preacher and painefull labourer in the Lord's Vineyard. He ſhewed himſelf," ſays he, " very debonaire and courteous unto me." And our traveller particularly notices that he was led through his library, which was exceedingly well furniſhed with divinity books; and, among other curioſities, he was ſhewn ſome MSS. of Bullinger's grandfather, and alſo an execrable book written by one Joannes Caſa, Biſhop of Beneventum in Italy, in defence of the horrid ſin of ſodomy (y). He ſtayed at Zurich but one day, after which

(r) Crudities, 157.

(s) Ibid. 160.

(t) Ibid. 236.

(u) Ibid. 340.

(w) Ibid. 350.

(x) Ibid. 351.

(y) Ibid. 391.

[D] And ſhewed me the ſame.] It may not be improper to give ſome farther account of this Nobleman, who was the laſt Earl of Devonſhire of the family of Courtney, and not more remarkable for his misfortunes than for his ſingular endowments of body and mind, which were ſuppoſed to have made a deep impreſſion on the hearts of one, if not two Queens, viz. Mary and Elizabeth. He was polite, ſtudious, and learned; an accurate maſter of the languages, and ſkilled in the Mathematics, Painting, and Muſic. He lived a priſoner in the Tower from the age of fourteen to twenty-one years. On Queen Mary's acceſſion to the Throne, he was releaſed, and ſhe conceived an affection for him which he was no ſtranger to; yet ſeemed rather to attach himſelf to the Princeſs Elizabeth, whoſe youth and lively converſation had more prevailing charms than the pomp and power of her ſiſter. This preference not only produced a total change in Mary's ſentiments with regard to the Earl, but was nearly proving fatal to Elizabeth. On ſuſpicion of being concerned with that Princeſs in Wyat's Rebellion, he was impriſoned again in Fotheringay Caſtle, whence on his releaſe he travelled into Italy, and died at Padua at the age of thirty years. Some ſay he was poiſoned (17).

(17) Strype's Ecc. Mem. vol. 3. 338, 339. Warton's Life of Sir Tho. Pope, 62. 100.

[E] Sweeteſt time for ſo much he ever ſpent in his life.] How well ſatisfied he was with Venice, will appear by the following paſſage. " Had there been " an offer made to me, before I tooke my journey " to Venice, eyther that foure of the richeſt Man- " nors of Somerſetſhire (wherein I was borne) ſhould " be gratis beſtowed upon me if I never ſaw Venice, " or neither of them if I ſhould ſee it; although " certainly thoſe Mannors would do me much " more good in reſpect of a ſtate of livelyhood " to live in the world then the ſight of Venice, yet " notwithſtanding I will ever ſay, while I live, that " the ſight of Venice and her reſplendent beauty, " antiquities, and monuments, hath by many degrees " more contented my minde and ſatisfyed my deſires " then thoſe four Lordſhippes could poſſibly have " done (18)."

(18) Crudities, 120.

he

he continued his journey through Badon to the Baths of Hinderhove. Of theſe, together with the cuſtoms of the place, the properties of the waters, and the manners of the inhabitants and viſitors, he gives a very accurate and entertaining account (z). On the 30th he arrived at Baſil, and after remaining there one day he went to Straſbourg, and thence to Lower Baden. At Heidelberg he ſaw the famous veſſel which held 530 hogſheads of Rheniſh wine, worth one thouſand nine hundred and eighty-eight pounds, eight ſhillings (a). His next ſtage was to Spira. On the 10th of September he came to Wormes, having in his way thither had an encounter with a boor, occaſioned by his pulling ſome grapes in a vineyard (b). In two days after his arrival at Wormes, we find him at Mentz, and the next day at Frankfort (c). He was at Colen on the 19th, and thence he proceeded to Fluſhing, where he embarked in a veſſel for London. He arrived at the Cuſtom-Houſe there on the 3d of October, and in this manner concluded the firſt part of his travels, which had employed five months wanting a few days. In this ſhort time he had ſeen forty-five cities (d). The length of his journey was 1975 miles, more than half of which he performed with only one pair of ſhoes. Theſe memorable ſhoes, we are told, were only once mended, and on his return to Odcombe were hung up in the Church there (e). Having thus recited, with a degree of minuteneſs worthy of Thomas himſelf, the ſeveral ſtages of his journey, it will readily occur to the Reader, that had our Traveller been qualified for the taſk of improving his country by his obſervations on the laws, manners, cuſtoms, or government of the ſeveral countries through which he paſſed, the haſty manner in which he made his tour would totally preclude ſuch expectations. And it may be obſerved in his defence that he had no view of that kind. To one who had objected that he had copied out more inſcriptions and epitaphs than any judicious traveller would have done in many years, and thereby had branded him with the note of a tomb-ſtone traveller (e), he anſwers. "But becauſe this objection ſhall not juſtly take hold upon me, "that I am a tombe-ſtone traveller, if God ſhall grant me happy ſucceſſe in my next "journey, I will ſo farre wade into a few matters of policie for the better ſatisfaction of "the Reader, as I may with ſecurity of my life attain unto. Surely I do not a little "wonder that the obſerving of inſcriptions and epitaphes ſhould be objected unto me by "way of diſgrace." He had juſt before obſerved, that being a private man, and no ſtatiſt, matters of policy were impertinent unto him. It may, therefore, be concluded, that accuracy in thoſe things which he profeſſed to diſcuſs, and veracity in relating the circumſtances of his journey, are only to be ſought after in his book; and ſo far as any commendation is due to an Author, in theſe points he is entitled to his reward [F]. It will give ſome ſurprize to thoſe who have not peruſed the account of his journey, and to many who form their judgment on the manners of paſt times by what they ſee at preſent, to be informed that he was the firſt Engliſhman who made uſe of a fork at his meals: as the paſſage ſhews how far behind the Italians we then were in point of delicacy, and is alſo deſcriptive of the manners of the age, it will be ſet down at large in the note [G]. But though his Travels cannot be conſidered as very important to the public, they produced that which the greater number of Travellers have in view. They afforded himſelf much

(z) Crudities, 494.

(a) Ibid. 494.

(b) Ibid. 524.

(c) Ibid. 561.

(d) Crambe.

(e) Verſes prefixed to Crambe.

(f) Epiſtle to the Reader, prefixed to Crudities.

[F] He is entitled to his reward.] A late Author (19) appears not to have done juſtice to our Traveller, when, ſpeaking of the length of William Lithgow's Travels, he ſays, that "here the marvellous "ſeems to riſe to the incredible," and to ſet him in point of veracity below Coryate, "whom it is never-"theleſs certain that he outwalked." It may be obſerved in Coryate's favour, that his minute accuracy not his want of veracity, was what ſubjected him to the ridicule of his contemporaries. Much more juſt is the judgment of Mr. Aubery, cited by the ſame author (20) concerning him, "that though he was not "a wiſe man, he wrote faithfully matter of fact." Another writer, who had ſufficient opportunities of knowing him ſays, that if he had lived to have written his travels—"there might have been very good "uſe of his obſervations; for as he was a very par-"ticular, ſo was he without queſtion a very faithful "relator of things he ſaw; ever diſclaiming that bold "liberty which divers travellers have, and do take "by ſpeaking and writing any thing they pleaſe of "remote parts, when they cannot eaſily be contradict-"ed, taking a pride in their feigned relations to "overſpeak things (21)."

(19) Granger's Supplement, 157.

(20) Granger's Biographical Hiſtory, vol. i. 304.

(21) Terry's Travels, 59.

[G] Set down at large in the note.] "Here I will "mention a thing that might have been ſpoken of "before in diſcourſe of the firſt Italian towne. I "obſerved a cuſtome in all thoſe Italian cities and "townes through the which I paſſed, that is not uſed "in any other country that I ſaw in my travels, nei-"ther doe I thinke that any other nation of Chriſ-"tendome doth uſe it, but only Italy. The Italian "and alſo moſt ſtrangers that are commorant in Italy, "do alwaies at their meales uſe a little forke when "they cut their meat. For while with their knife which "they hold in one hand they cut the meate out of "the diſh, they faſten their forke which they hold in "their other hand upon the ſame diſh, ſo that what-"ſoever he be that ſitting in the company of any "others at meale, ſhould unadviſedly touch the "diſh of meate with his fingers from which all at the "table doe cut, he will give occaſion of offence unto "the company, as having tranſgreſſed the lawes of "good manners, inſomuch that for his error he ſhall "be at leaſt brow beaten if not reprehended in "wordes. This forme of feeding I underſtand is "generally uſed in all places of Italy; their forkes "being for the moſt part made of yron or ſteele, and "ſome of ſilver, but thoſe are uſed only by Gentle-"men. The reaſon of this their curioſity is, becauſe "the Italian cannot by any meanes indure to have "his diſh touched with fingers, ſeeing all men's fin-"gers are not alike cleane. Hereupon I myſelfe "thought good to imitate the Italian faſhion by this "forked cutting of meate, not only while I was in "Italy, but alſo in Germany, and oftentimes in "England ſince I came home, being once quipped "for that frequent uſing of my forke by a certain "learned Gentleman, a familiar friend of mine, one "Mr. Laurence Whitaker, who in his merry hu-"mour doubted not to call me at table furcifer, only "for uſing a forke at feeding, but for no other "cauſe (22)."

(22) Crudities, 90.

enter-

entertainment, indeed ſo much that on his return he declared, that " of all the pleaſures " in the world Travel is the ſweeteſt and moſt delightful," and, that " ſuch is the exu- " berance and ſuperfluity of theſe exoticke pleaſures (ariſing from travelling) that for my " own part, I will moſt truly affirm I reaped more entire and ſweet comfort in five months " travels of thoſe ſeven countries mentioned in the front of my booke, than I did all the " dayes of my life before in England which contayned two and thirty years (g)." On his return to England he immediately began to digeſt his Travels in order for publication; and that he might proceed therein without interruption he retired to his native place Odcombe, where he employed himſelf in that buſineſs, according to Ben Jonſon, five months (h). While on his journey through Europe he had reſolved to viſit many of the places again which he then only imperfectly noticed, particularly Venice (i) and ſome parts of Switzerland (k). But he had not long been in England before he changed his deſign, and determined to enlarge the plan of his future Travels. Having therefore compleated his book, he was deſirous of having it printed at London without delay. To effect which, he applied himſelf, by Letter [H], to Sir Michael Hicks, deſiring his interceſſion with the Earl of Saliſbury then Lord Treaſurer, to obtain a licence. His requeſt was granted, and the next year his work made its appearance under the following affected

(g) Epiſtle to the Reader prefixed to Crudities.

(h) Verſes prefixed to Crambe.

(i) Crudities, 280.

(k) Ibid. 390.

[H] To effect which he applied himſelf by Letter.] This Letter which formerly belonged to James Weſt, Eſq (23); is ſtill extant. It is now in the poſſeſſion of the writer of this article, and having never been printed may not improperly be inſerted here.

(23) Birch's Life of Henry Prince of Wales.

Right Worſhip and generoſe Sir,

Though I feare I ſhall incurre your reprehenſion for preſuming to write unto your worſhip; yet I hope the ſuperficiall acquaintance which I had with you lately at Mr. Ingrams (where it pleaſed you, after a very debonaire and courteous manner, to take notice of me) will in ſome ſort diſpenſe with my bouldneſſe. I write unto you partly by way of deprecation for my error committed at that time at Mr. Ingrams table, which I beſeech you to impute not to any voluntarie malipartneſs of mine, but rather to the merry prompting of that joviall black-bearded Gentleman that ſat next unto me, who you know is ſoe much given to his παρρησία and libertie of ſpeech, that ſometimes he will not ſticke amiciſſimum quempiam perſtringere even to glaunce with ſome exquiſite ſtraine of witte at the deareſt fre'inde he hath: partly alſo for that I am ſoe bould to inſinuate myſelfe unto you with a ſuite, whereunto if it ſhall pleaſe you to condeſcend, not onely I myſelfe ſhall be obliged unto you for it, in the ſtricteſt bonde of true obſervance till I ſuffer the fatall diſſolution of my bodie and ſowle, but perhaps many notable members of other commonwealths may render no ſmall thankes unto you for the ſame. Therefore, without any long introductions to diſcover unto you the ſumme of the matter it is thus; having travelled about two years ſince in theſe ſeven famous countries France, Savoy, Italie, Rhetia, commonly called the Griſons countrie, Helvetia, alias Swicerland, ſome partes of high Germanie, and the Netherlands, I was diſpoſed to turne my microcoſme (a phraſe that a certaine learned Gentleman not long ſince uſed of me) into eyes, I meane to prie into all thinges of chiefeſt remarque that were obvious unto my eyes in every place where I travelled, in ſoe much that by my inceſſant induſtrie and Herculean toyle I wrote ſoe many obſervations in the foreſayd countries as have filled very neere four quires of paper, having in the ſpace of five months ſurvayed forty-ſeven cities; and this my itinerarie I have concealed ſoe long, that it ſeemed cum lineis ac blattis rixari (as eloquent Angelus Politiang writeth of certaine of his bookes, in an epiſtle to Laurentius Medices, Duke of Florence) determining indeed rather Thetidi aut Veneris eas largiri marito, then to evulge them to the light of my countrie before the conſummation of my future travells, which I thinke will be very neere ten yeares hence, but ſome of my deare friendes, eſpecially a certaine learned Gentleman, one Mr. Lawrence Whitaker, hath uſed ſuch importunities of perſuaſions unto me, who, amongſt other things, alledged that excellent proverbiall verſe, (22) Crudities 90.

Πολλὰ μείλαξὺ πείθει κύλικῶν καὶ κείλεσιν ἄκρα.

that I have confidently reſolved, by God's gracious permiſſion, to imprint the obſervations of my paſt travells, for the benefite of my travelling countrie men, before I goe abroad againe, for which cauſe, determining to dedicate them to the Prince, I went lately to his Highneſſe, pronounced an oration unto him before a greate aſſemblie of courtiers, and withal preſented unto him my journall, who ſoe graciouſly accepted it, that he hath promiſed to entertaine the dedication thereof. Since which time I have laboured very much about the licencing of my booke, that it might be printed firſt with the late Archbyſhop of Canterbury, whoſe ſudden death hath much defeated my deſignement, after that with ſome of the High Commiſſioners, and the Byſhop of London, of whom I can not get an approbation, ſeeing it is not in their power to allowe any bookes to be printed (as they affirme) but theologicall, ſoe that the whole ſcope of my ſuite unto your worſhip doth tend unto this, that you would vouchſafe to intercede for me unto my Lorde Treaſurer, that it would pleaſe his Lordſhip to give order it might be printed in London, with ſome expedition: the Prince not onely approving, yea applauding it, together with all thoſe ſelected flowers of gentilitie that flouriſh in his princely courte, but alſo earneſtly expecting it, eſpecially ſince there is not as much as one line contained in my whole journall that maketh againſt other ſtate, or any forraine Prince confederate with us, or againſt religion or good manners, my booke containing principally the moſt remarkable antiquities of thoſe cities that I have deſcribed; yea, and ſo many of them, that I hope you will pardon me, though I think that no man of other nation ſince the incarnation of Chriſt, hath obſerved more for the time, in the foreſayd countries, which I hope you would not hold to be unlikely, if you did but knowe what intolerable paynes I tooke in my travells, both by day and night, ſcarce affording myſelfe two howe'rs reſt ſometimes of the whole twenty-four, in the citie of Venice, by reaſon of my continuall writing, whereupon divers Engliſh men that lay in the ſame howſe with me, obſerving my extreme watchings wherewith I did grievouſly excruciat my bodie, inſtantly deſired me to pittie myſelfe and not to kill myſelfe with my inordinate labours. To conclude, if it ſhall pleaſe your worſhip to gratifie me in this my earneſt ſupplication, you will adde unto me very ſpurres of diligence, and give me wonderfull encouragement to obſerve ſuch thinges in my future travells as I doubt not but ſhall be acceptable to the King and Queen themſelves and all their royall children, as alſo to the greateſt Peers and Nobles of this kingdom; in hope whereof I will commend your worſhip to the gracious clientele of the omnipotent Jehova.

From my chamber in Bowe-lane this 15th November, 1610.

Your Worſhip's moſte ſuppliant Beadſman,

THOMAS CORYATE.

To the Right Worſhipful Sir Michaell Hixe's, Knight, give theſe with all ſpeede.

title, " Coryat's Crudities haſtily gobled up in five months Travells in France, Savoy, " Italy, Rhetia commonly called the Griſons country, Helvetia alias Switzerland, ſome " parts of High Germany, and the Netherlands, newly digeſted in the hungry aire of " Odcombe in the county of Somerſet, and now diſperſed to the nouriſhment of the " travelling Members of this Kingdome." It contains beſides his Travels ſome poſthumous Latin Poems, the productions of his deceaſed father, and many copies of verſes by the moſt eminent Poets [I] of the time, who tickled the Author's vanity, at the ſame time that they made a jeſt of him. We learn that he printed at his own expence (l), and his ſucceſs was in every way anſwerable to his expectation; for whether from the ſingularity of the ſtyle, or the whimſical character of our Traveller, his work at its firſt publication was much read, but the fame of it laſted only a ſhort time, for about two years afterwards it appears to have been little noticed [K]. The Author had however been flattered into ſo high an opinion of the merit of his work, that in anſwer to a writer who had ſaid he would have epitomized it if " he could have melted out of the whole lumpe, ſo much matter " worth the reading as wold have filled four pages [m]," he replies, " I will boldly affirme " for the better juſtification of my obſervations, and by way of oppoſition againſt the ma- " licious cenſure of that hypercriticall Momus, that of the ſixe hundred fiftie and foure " pages, he ſhall find at the leaſt five hundred worthy the reading (n)." And it was his intention to have tranſlated both theſe and his future travels into Latin, for the benefit not only of his own country, but alſo of thoſe he had already, or might hereafter reſolve to travel through (o). A copy of his Crudities, it appears, he preſented to the Bodleian Library; and being expected to viſit Oxford afterwards at the Act, Sir Thomas Bodley deſired the book might be ſent for, and placed for the time in ſome ſuch place in the Library as may ſeem, he adds, to have magnified the Author and the book (p). In 1611 he publiſhed " Coryat's Crambe, or his Colwort twiſe ſodden, and now ſerved in with other " Macaronicke Diſhes as the ſecond courſe to his Crudities," 4*to*. On the 20th of Oct. 1612, after taking leave of his countrymen by an Oration ſpoken at the croſs at Odcombe (q), he proceeded on his farther travels, in which he intended to employ ten years (r). He arrived at Zante on the 13th of January 1613, and there ſaw the Sepulchre of Marcus Tullius Cicero and his wife, " ſuch an obſcene and ignoble grave that I could not but " condole the misfortune of that famous and incomparable Orator, from the inexhauſted " fountaine of whoſe incomparable learning, ſo many excellent Orators have drawn liquor " of Rhetoricall invention, to the great garniſhing and adorning of their polite lucubra- " tions. For it ſtandeth ſub dio in the open aire without any ſepulchrate or Titularie- " ſtone that might teſtifie to the Reader who lieth there, which cannot but ſtrike a kind of " veneration into any man that hath any ſparke of learning (s)." From Zante he proceeded to Syo, and while there made an attempt to viſit the Tomb of Homer, in which he did not ſucceed (t). He then ſailed in an Engliſh ſhip to the Trojan ſhore, on which he landed on the 22d of February (u). He here employed much pains for ſeveral hours in ſearching out the moſt notable antiquities of Troy, which one of his companions, Maſter Robert Rugge, obſerving, " to yield mee ſome kind of guirdon or remuneration for my " paines in a merrie humour drew his ſword out of the ſcabberd, and aſcending to one " of thoſe great ſtones that lye in the open part of this middle gate, knighted mee, that " kneeled upon another ſtone on my right knee, by the name of the firſt Engliſh Knight " of Troy; and on the knighting of mee pronounced thoſe wittie verſes extempore:

(l) Cotton's Compleat Angler, p. 18. ed. 1766. Laquei ridiculoſi, or Springes for Woodcocks, by H. P. (Parrot) 12*mo*. 1613. Epigram 144.

(m) The Odcombian Banquet diſhed forth, &c. 1611, 4*to*. at the end.

(n) Crambe at the end.

(o) Epiſtle to the Reader prefixed to Crudities.

(p) Reliquiæ Bodleianæ, p. 355.

(q) Wood's Ath. Ox.

(r) Terry's Voyage to the East Indies, 58.

(s) 2 Purchaſh Pilgrims, Fo. 1625. P. 1811.

(t) Ibid. 1812.

(u) Ibid. 1815.

Coryate no more, but now a Knight of Troy;
Odcombe no more, but henceforth England's joy:
Brute, Brute of our beſt Engliſh wits commended,
True Trojane from Æneas' race deſcended:
Riſe top of wit, the honour of our nation,
And to old Ilium make a new Oration.

[I] Many copies of verſes by the moſt eminent Poets.] Among theſe we find the names of Ben Jonſon, John Harrington, Dudley Digges, John Donne, Chriſtopher Brooke, John Hoſkins, Inigo Jones, Richard Corbet, John Chapman, John Owen, Thomas Farnabie, Michael Drayton, John Davis, beſides many others. The verſes are alſo in various languages, as Engliſh, Latin, French, Italian, Spaniſh, and even Welch and Iriſh. The Author was ſo little conſcious of the deſign of them, that in the introduction to them he makes a formal apology for their inſertion, deſiring the Reader to aſcribe it not to any ambitious humour in him to obtrude ſo many to the world in praiſe of his book, and aſſuring him that when he ſaw the multitude of them to increaſe to ſo great a number, he reſolved to put above a thouſand of them into an Index Expurgatorius, and to detain them from the preſs. But that Prince Henry, to whom his performance was dedicated, gave a ſtrict and expreſs commandment to print all thoſe verſes which he had read to his Highneſs (24). The Author had the honour of preſenting copies of this his work to the King, the Queen, Prince Henry, the Duke of York, afterwards Charles the Firſt, and the Princeſs Elizabeth afterwards Queen of Bohemia, to each of whom he made an Oration which he afterwards made public (25).

(24) Introduction to the Verſes prefixed to Crudities.

(25) Crambe.

[K] Little noticed.] In the year 1613, two years after the publication of the Crudities, an Epigramatiſt writes thus of it:

Wonder of Writers (for once ſo thou wert)
What pitty 'tis thy fame no longer laſted,
That ſuch of note in travell and deſert,
Like time-leſs bloſſomes ſhould ſo ſoon be blaſted;
For thus farre boldly may thy booke compare,
How ill ſo ever, ſure 'twas paſſing rare (26).

(26) Laquei ridiculoſi Epigram, 192.

" Two

" Two Turks that ſtood but a little way from us when he drew his naked ſword, thought " verily hee meant to have cut off my head for ſome notorious villany which I had per- " petrated. Thoſe verſes I anſwered extempore. Alſo our Muſketeers diſcharged two " volleys of ſhot for joy of my knighthood."

Loe heere with proſtrate knee I doe embrace
The gallant title of a Trojane Knight,
In Priam's court, which time ſhall ne're deface,
A grace unknowne to any Britiſh wight:
This noble knighthood ſhall Fame's trump reſound
To Odcombe's honour, maugre Envie fell
O're famous Albion throughout that iſland round,
Till that my mournfull friends ſhall ring my knell.

After repeating theſe verſes, ſtanding upon a high ſtone at the entrance of the great gate, he pronounced an Oration, which if the Reader ſhould incline to peruſe we muſt refer him to the volume whence this account is extracted (x). On his return to the ſhip, obſerving Mount Ida at the diſtance of two miles, and ſeeing a plowman holding a plough, he with one Mr. Francis Flyer, did the like one after another, " in order," ſays he, " that if wee live to be old men, we may ſay in our old age we had once holden the " plough in the Trojan territorie, eſpecially in that part we ſaw the citie ſtood (y)." With this part of his journey he declared himſelf ſo entirely ſatisfied, that he would not for 500l. but have ſeen thoſe things which were worthy obſervation at Troy; and had he not ſeen them then, he ſhould have taken a journey from England for the ſole purpoſe. We next find him at Conſtantinople, where he reſided ſome time; and during his abode there, received great civilities from Sir Paul Pinder, the Engliſh Ambaſſador, at whoſe houſe he had free acceſs and welcome whenever he pleaſed, and to whom, as uſual, he made an Oration. The time when he arrived at Conſtantinople does not appear; but on the firſt day of April, 1613 (z), being the day preceding Good Friday, he was there, and preſent at midnight at the Monaſtery of Franciſcan Fryers, where after maſs he ſaw a number of ſlaves whip themſelves for an hour and a half without mercy. Theſe wretches were hired by their maſters to undergo this puniſhment as an atonement for ſins confeſſed by their Lords, and were in return rewarded with their liberty (a). While he reſided here he was ſeized with an ague which afflicted him for three days, but by the aſſiſtance of bloodletting it was entirely removed (b). He continued at Conſtantinople until the 21ſt of January in the year following (c), when he proceeded on his journey to Jeruſalem. He embarked in very tempeſtuous weather, attended with much ſnow, and arrived at Gallipoli (d). On the 14th of February he went aſhore at Leſbos, and on the 18th came to Syo. On the 20th, ſailing by the Sanyan Coaſt, he diſcerned Patmos, and paſſed near Coſs, the birth-place of Hippocrates. He ſaw the tops of Ararat, ſaid to be then diſtant ninety-four leagues, on the 23d, and the next day landed at Scanderoon (e); whence he proceeded to Aleppo, travelling thither in four days. While he continued at Aleppo, his countryman, Bart Haggat, Conſul at that place, rode with him to the Valley of Salt mentioned in II. Samuel viii. 13 (f). On the 15th of March, 1613, in company with Henry Allard of Kent, he ſet out on his pilgrimage to Jeruſalem, which place, after paſſing through Damaſcus on the 26th, he entered on the 12th of May, 1614. On Palm Sunday evening he lay in the Temple, in the Upper Gallery, and was rouſed out of his ſleep by the turbulent cries of the Greeks who came forth from their Quire with a very clamorous noiſe, having eleven banners of ſilk and cloth of gold carried before them, each of which had three ſtreamers, and on the top of the ſtaff a gilded croſs. A world of lamps was carried before them; men, women, and children confuſedly crying Kyrie eleeſon. The next day other nations joined with them diſplaying their banners. On the 28th he viſited Jordan (g), and afterwards returned to Aleppo on foot and remained there three months longer (h); after which he departed in a caravan into Perſia, paſſing the river Euphrates, about four days journey beyond Aleppo. Thence in two days he came to Ur, the birth-place of Abraham, and continued there four days. In four more he came to the River Tigris, which he croſſed on foot, it being then no higher than the calf of his leg. He then entered Meſopotamia, and reſided ſix days at Tauris the Metropolis, formerly called Ecbatana. In two days he came to Caſbin, and thence in twenty-three days to Spahan in Parthia, the reſidence of the Perſian King, who was then in Gurgiſtan, ranſacking the poor Chriſtians there with great hoſtility, with fire and ſword. There he remained two months, when he proceeded with a caravan into the Eaſt-Indies, and in four months and odd days arrived at Lahore (i) [K]. From Lahore he had twenty days journey to Agra, and ten more to Aſmere,

(x) Ibid. 1817.
(y) Ibid. 1819.
(z) Ibid. 1820.
(a) Ibid.
(b) Letter from Aſmere.
(c) Purchas, 1829.
(d) Ibid.
(e) Ibid.
(f) Ibid.
(g) Ibid. 1830.
(h) Letter from Aſmere, 11.
(i) Ibid.

[K] Arrived at Lahore.] " About the middle of " the way," ſays he, " between Spahan and Lahore, " juſt about the frontiers of Perſia and India, I met " Sir Robert Shirley and his Lady, travelling from " the Court of the Mogul (where they had been very " graciouſly received, and enriched with preſents of " great value) to the King of Perſia's Court; ſo gallantly furniſhed with all neceſſaries for their travells, " that Aſmere, where the Mogul kept his Court. In this journey, between Jeruſalem and Aſmere, he ſpent fifteen months and odd days, travelling two thouſand ſeven hundred miles, and all the way on foot (k). He expended alſo in his ten months travels, between Aleppo and Aſmere, but three pounds ſterling, "yet ſays he fared reaſonable well every day, victuals "being ſo cheap in ſome countries where I travelled, that I oftentimes lived competently "for a penny ſterling a day: yet of that three pounds I was couſened of no leſs than ten "ſhillings ſterling by certain lewd Chriſtians of the Armenian nation, ſo that indeed I ſpent "but fifty ſhillings in my ten months travels (l)." At Aſmere he remained twelve months and ſixty days, until he had learned the Turkiſh, Moriſco or Arabian languages, ſome good knowledge of the Perſian and Indoſtan tongues, in the acquiſition of which he diſplayed very ſingular talents, and obtained ſuch a command over them as was very uſeful to him during the remainder of his journey (m) [L]. On the 16th of September, 1616, he departed from Aſmere to Agra, where he reſided ſix weeks longer (n). After this we find him ſeveral months with the Embaſſador, Sir Thomas Roe, living at Mandoa, the Mogul's Court, many miles up the country; during which time it appears that he met with ſeveral circumſtances calculated to give him chagrin [M], and began to decline both in health and ſpirits [N]. This became ſo evident, that when he was about to

(k) Ibid. 19.

(l) Ibid. 29.

(m) Terry, 69.

(n) Purchas, i. 599.

"that it was a great comfort unto me to ſee them in "ſuch a flouriſhing eſtate. There did he ſhew me "to my ſingular contentment, both my books neatly "kept, and hath promiſed to ſhew them, eſpecially "mine Itinerarie, to the Perſian King; and to inter-"pret unto him ſome of the principal matters in the "Turkiſh tongue, to the end I may have the more "gracious acceſs unto him after my return thither. "For through Perſia I have determined (by God's "helpe) to return to Aleppo. He adds, "both he "and his Lady uſed me with ſingular reſpect, eſpe-"cially his Lady, who beſtowed forty ſhillings upon "me in Perſian money; and they ſeemed to exult "for joy to ſee me, having promiſed me to bring me in "good grace with the Perſian King, and that they will "induce him to beſtow ſome princely benefits upon me: "this, I hope, will be partly occaſioned by my book, "for he is ſuch a jocund Prince that he will not be "meanly delighted with divers of my facetious Hie-"roglyphicks, if they are truly and genuinely ex-"pounded unto him (27)."

(27) Letter from Aſmere, p. 17.

[L] Very uſeful to him during the remainder of his journey.] He became ſo well acquainted with the Perſian language, that he obtained, without the knowledge of the Engliſh Ambaſſador, acceſs to the Great Mogul, to whom he made an Oration. "After "I had ended my ſpeech, I had ſome ſhort diſcourſe "with him in the Perſian tongue, who amongſt "other things told me, that concerning my trauell "to the Citie of Samarcand, he was not able to doe "me any good, becauſe there was no great amity "betwixt the Tartarian Princes and himſelfe, ſo that "his commendatory Letters would doe me no good. "Alſo he added, that the Tartars did ſo deadly hate "all Chriſtians, that they would certainly kill them "when they came into their country. So that he "earneſtly diſſwaded me from the iourney, if I loued "my life and well fare; at laſt, he concluded his "diſcourſe with me, by a ſumme of money, that he "threw downe from a window, thorow which he "looked out, into a ſheet tied vp by the foure cor-"ners, and hanging very neere the ground, an hun-"dred pieces of ſiluer, each worth two ſhillings ſter-"ling, which counteruailed ten pounds of our Eng-"liſh money: this buſineſſe I carried ſo ſecretly by "the helpe of my Perſian, that neither our Engliſh "Ambaſſadour, nor any other of my countrymen "(ſauing one ſpeciall, priuate, and intrinſicall friend) "had the leaſt inckling of it, till I had throughly "accompliſhed my deſigne: for I well knew that "our Ambaſſador would haue ſtopped and barraca-"doed all my proceeding therein, if he might haue "had any notice thereof, as indeed hee ſignified unto "me, after I had effected my proiect, alleaging this, "forſooth, for his reaſon, why hee would haue hin-"dred me, becauſe it would redound ſomewhat to "the diſhonnour of our nation, that one of our "countrey ſhould preſent himſelfe in that beggerly "and poore faſhion to the King, out of an inſinuat-"ing humour, to craue money of him: But I an-"ſwered our Ambaſſadour in that ſtout and re-"ſolute manner, after I had ended my buſineſſe, "that he was contented to ceaſe nibling at me, "neuer had I more need of money in all my life, "then at that time: for in truth I had but twentie "ſhillings ſterling left in my purſe, by reaſon of a "miſchance I had in one of the Turkes cities called "Emert, in the countrey of Meſopotamia, where a "miſcreant Turke ſtripped me of almoſt all my "monies, according as I wrote vnto you in a very "large letter the laſt yeare, which I ſent from the "Court of this mightie Monarch, by one of my "countrimen that went home by ſea in an Engliſh "ſhip, laden with the commodities of this India, "which letter, I hope, came to your hands long "ſince (28)." In the Indoſtan language he became ſo great a proficient, that a woman, a landreſs belonging to the Embaſſador's houſe, who had ſuch a freedom and liberty of ſpeech, that ſhe would ſcold, brawl, and rail, from ſun-riſing to ſun-ſet, he one day undertook in her own language, and by eight of the clock in the morning ſo ſilenced her, that ſhe had not one word more to ſpeak (29).

(28) Printed in Purchas, vol. i. 598. See Terry, 96.

(29) Terry, 70.

[M] Several circumſtances calculated to give him chagrin.] Among others, Mr. Richard Steel, a Merchant, who in travelling to England had met our Author, informed King James of it, who replied, "Is that fool yet living?" This troubled him much, having expected that the King would have ſpoken more and better of him. At another time when he was ready to depart, the Embaſſador gave him a Letter, and in that a bill to receive 10*l.* at Aleppo. The letter was directed to the Conſul there, who was deſired to receive the bearer with curteſy, as he would find him an honeſt poor wretch. "Our Pilgrim, "ſays Mr. Terry, liked the gift well; but the lan-"guage by which he ſhould have received it did not "at all content him; telling me, That my Lord had "even ſpoiled his curteſy in the carriage thereof; ſo "that if he had been a very fool indeed, he could have "ſaid very little leſs of him than he did, Honeſt poor "Wretch! and furthermore he then told me, that "when he was formerly undertaking his voyage to "Venice, a perſon of honour wrote thus in his be-"half unto Sir Henry Wotton, then and there Em-"baſſador: My Lord, Good wine needs no buſh, "neither a worthy man letters commendatory, be-"cauſe whitherſoever he comes he is his own Epiſtle, "&c. There (ſaid he) was ſome language on my be-"half; but now for my lord to write nothing of me by "way of commendation but honeſt poor wretch, is rather "to trouble me than to pleaſe me with his favour." The letter, to pleaſe him, was altered (30).

(30) Terry, 74.

[N] Began to decline both in health and ſpirits.] He began to be apprehenſive that he ſhould not live to reap the fruit of his travels. "And certainly "(ſays Mr. Terry) he was ſurprized with ſome ſuch "thoughts and fears, (for ſo he told us afterwards) "when upon a time he being at Mandoa with us, "and there ſtanding in a room againſt a ſtone pillar, "where the Ambaſſador was, and myſelf preſent "with them, upon a ſudden he fell into ſuch a "ſwoon, that we had very much ado to recover him "out of it; but at laſt, come to himſelf, he told us to depart, the Ambaſſador deſired him to ſtay longer, but he thankfully refuſed the offer, and ſoon afterwards ſet out for Surat, about three hundred miles diſtant, and lived to arrive there. He was then in a bad ſtate of health and afflicted with a flux, which was increaſed by drinking (though moderately, being very temperate) ſome ſack, which had been brought from England. In a few days he died, in the month of December, 1617, and was buried under a little monument, like one of thoſe uſually made in our church-yards (o). Another Traveller, in 1626, ſays, his grave was to be known but by two poor ſtones (p). His papers appear to have fallen into the hands of Sir Thomas Roe, who gave a few of them to Mr. Purchas, by whom ſome parts, though very imperfectly, were inſerted in his Collection of Travels (q). Of our Author's character ſome traits are inſerted below [O]. His death deprived the wits and minor writers of much entertainment which they had promiſed themſelves on his return to England [P].

(o) Terry, 76.

(p) Herbert's Travels, 35.

(q) Purchas, i. 597.

" that ſome ſad thoughts had immediately before " preſented themſelves to his fancy; which, as he " conceived, put him into that diſtemper, like Fan- " nius in Martial, Ne moriare mori, to prevent death " by dying: for he told us that there were great ex- " pectations in England of the large accounts he " ſhould give of his travels after his return home, " and that he was now ſhortly to leave us; and he " being at preſent not very well, if he ſhould die in " the way towards Surat, whither he was now in- " tended to go (which place he had not as yet ſeen) " he might be buried in obſcurity and none of his " friends ever know what became of him, he travel- " ling now, as he uſually did, alone (31)."

(31) Terry, 75.

[O] Some traits are inſerted below.] " He was, " ſays Mr. Terry, of a very coveting eye, that could " never be ſatisfied with ſeeing, as Solomon ſpeaks, " Eccleſ. i. 8. Though he had ſeen very much; and I " am perſuaded that he took as much content in " ſeeing, as many others in the enjoying of great " and rare things. He was a man who had got the " maſtery of many hard languages (as before I ob- " ſerved) to the Latin and Greek he brought forth " of England with him; in which, if he had obtained " wiſdom to huſband and manage them, as he had " ſkill to ſpeak them, he had deſerved more fame in " his generation. But his knowledge and high at- " tainments in ſeveral languages made him not a " little ignorant of himſelf, he being ſo covetous, " ſo ambitious of praiſe, that he would hear and en- " dure more of it than he could in any meaſure " deſerve; being like a ſhip that hath too much ſail " and too little ballaſt. Yet if he had not fallen " into the ſmart hands of the wits of thoſe times he

(32) Terry, 71.

" might have paſſed better (32). He carried folly " (which the charitable call merriment) in his " very face. The ſhape of his head had no promiſ- " ing form, being like a ſugar-loaf inverted with " the little end before, as compoſed of fancy and me- " mory without any common ſenſe. Such as con- " ceived him fool, ad duo, and ſomething elſe, ad " decem, were utterly miſtaken, for he drave on no " deſign, caring for coin and counters alike; ſo con- " tented with what was preſent, that he accounted " thoſe men guilty of ſuperfluity who had more ſuits " and ſhirts than bodies, ſeldom putting off either

(33) Fuller, 31.

" till they were ready to go away from him (33.)"

[P] On his return to England.] Amongſt others, John Taylor the Water Poet, appears to have been one of our Author's perſecutors. In his works are ſeveral ſatirical pieces ridiculing him for his follies. It appears that at one time our Author made a formal complaint to the King againſt his antagoniſt, which is recorded by the latter in theſe words, " Maſter " Thomas Coriate (on a time) complained againſt " me to King James, deſiring his Majeſty that he " would cauſe ſome heavy puniſhment to be inflicted " upon me for abuſing him in writing, (as he ſaid I had) " to whom the King replied, that when the Lords " of his Honourable Privie Councell had leiſure and " nothing elſe to doe, then they ſhould heare and " determine the differences between Maſter Coriate " the ſcholler, and John Tayler the ſculler: which " anſwer of the King was very acceptable to Maſter " Coriate." Whereupon I made this following pe- tion to the King:

To the King's moſt excellent Majeſtie.

The humble Petition of John Tailor, your Maje- ſties poore Water Poet, Sheweth:

Moſt mightie Monarch of this famous ile,
(Upon the knees of my ſubmiſſive minde)
I begge thou wilt be graciouſly inclin'd,
To reade theſe lines my ruſticke pen compile:
Know (Royal Sir) Tom Coriate workes the wile,
Your high diſpleaſure on my head to bring;
And well I wot, the ſot, his words can file,
In hopes my fortunes head-long downe to fling.
The King, whoſe wiſdom through the world did ring,
Did hear the cauſe of two offending harlots;
So I beſeech the (Great) great Britaine's King,
To do the like for two contending varlots.
A brace of knaves, your Majeſty implores
To heare their ſuites as Solomon heard whores (34).

(34) Wit and Mirth, 200. Taylor's Works.

See alſo " Odcomb's Complaint, or Coryate's Funeral Epicedium, or Death Song upon his late reported drowning." " The Eighth Wonder of the World, or Coryate's Eſcape from his ſuppoſed drowning." " Laugh and be Fat, or a Commentary upon the Odcombian Banket." " Maſter Thomas Coryate, to his Friends in England, ſends greeting, &c." In " The Nipping and Snipping of Abuſes," 4to. 1614, he ſays,

A Poet needs muſt be a Poet borne,
Or elſe his art procures his greater ſcorne,
For why? if art alone made men excell,
Methinks Tom Coryate ſhould write ex'lent well:
For he was born belike in ſome croſſe yeere,
When learning was good cheap, but wit was deare (35).

(35) Taylor's Works, 249.

A Copy of Verſes, in the Somerſetſhire dialect, by our Author, is printed in " Guidott's Collection of Treatiſes concerning Bath Waters," 8*vo.* 1725.]

R.

COSIN (JOHN), a learned Biſhop of Durham in the ſeventeenth century, was the eldeſt ſon of Giles Coſin a citizen of Norwich (a), by Elizabeth his wife, daughter of ——— Remington of Remington-caſtle, a good and ancient family (b). He was born at Norwich November 30, 1594; and educated in the Free-School there, till he came to be fourteen years of age. Then he was tranſplanted into Caius-College in Cambridge, in 1610; of which he was ſucceſſively choſen Scholar, and Fellow; and where he regularly took his degrees in Arts (c). Having diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his learning, diligence, and ingenuity, in the year 1616, when he was about twenty years of age, he had an offer, at the ſame time, both from Dr. Lancelot Andrews then Biſhop of Ely, and from Dr. Overall

(a) But originally of Foxhearth. He was a very rich man, and a perſon of great probity.

(b) See The dead Man's real Speech. A funeral Sermon on Biſhop Coſin, &c. by Iſ. Baſire, 8*vo.* Lond. 1673, p. 38; and Vita Joannis Coſini, Epiſcopi Dunelmenſis. Scriptore Thoma Smitho. Lond. 1707, 4*to.* p. 1.

(c) Dr. Smith, ib. and Dr. Baſire, p. 36, 43.

Overall Biſhop of Lichfield and Coventry, of a Librarian's place. But, by his late Tutor's advice, he accepted of the latter's invitation; who liked him ſo well, that, on account of his knowledge and fair writing, he made him alſo his Secretary (d). At the ſame time he encouraged him to ſtudy Divinity, and ſent him from time to time to keep his Exerciſes in the Univerſity (e). But, in 1619, he loſt his excellent patron, and with him all hopes and proſpect of advancement (f). However, Providence ſoon raiſed him a better Patron in Dr. Richard Neile then Biſhop of Durham, who took him for his domeſtic Chaplain; and in 1624 conferred upon him the tenth Prebend in the Cathedral Church of Durham [A], in which he was inſtalled on the 4th of December that ſame year (g). In the September following, he was collated to the Archdeaconry of the Eaſt-riding in the Church of York, vacant by the reſignation of Marmaduke Blakeſton, whoſe daughter he had married (h): and on the 20th of July 1626, he was collated by his patron Biſhop Neile to the rich Rectory of Branſpeth [B], in the Dioceſe of Durham (i). The ſame year, he took the degree of Bachelor in Divinity (k). About that time, having frequent meetings, at the Biſhop of Durham's Houſe in London, with Dr. William Laud then Biſhop of Bath and Wells, Dr. Francis White ſoon after Biſhop of Carliſle, Dr. Richard Montague, and other learned men, diſtinguiſhed by their zeal for the Doctrine and Diſcipline of the Church of England; he began to be obnoxious to the then Puritans, who looked upon all ſuch Divines as Popiſhly affected (l). This imputation of theirs on Mr. Coſin in particular, was ſufficiently authorized, as they imagined by his 'Collection of Private Devotions,' [C] publiſhed in 1627; wherein many things were thought too much favourable to Popery: but how wrong this imputation was, let his whole conduct teſtify. In 1628 he was concerned, with other members of the Church of Durham, in a proſecution againſt Peter Smart Prebendary there, for a ſeditious Sermon preached in that Cathedral [D]. About the ſame time, he took his degree of Doctor in Divinity;

(d) Smith, p. 1, 2.

(e) Baſire, ubi ſupra.

(f) Biſhop Overall died May 7, 1619, having the year before been tranſlated to Norwich.

(g) Smith, and Baſire, ubi ſupra. See alſo Survey of the Cathedrals of York, Durham, &c. by Br. Willis, Eſq; 4*to*. Lond. 1727, vol. i. p. 273.

(h) Willis, ibid. p. 100.

(i) Smith, and Baſire, as above.

(k) Smith, p. 4.

(l) Ibid.

[A] And, in 1624, conferred upon him the tenth prebend in the Cathedral Church of Durham.] All the while he enjoyed it, which was about ſix and thirty years, he was very conſtant in his reſidences, both ordinary and extraordinary; during which he kept a laudable hoſpitality, according to the ſtatutes of that Church. So that Dr. Baſire teſtifies (1), that upon ſearch of the regiſter of that Cathedral, he could not find one diſpenſation for him in all the time he continued Prebendary.

(1) Ubi ſupra, p. 44, 45.

[B] Was moreover collated by his patron, Biſhop Neile, to the rich Rectory of Branſpeth.] The parochial Church of which he beautified in an extraordinary manner (2).

(2) See The Hiſt. of the Cathedral Church of Durham, by Sir William Dugdale, p. 81, at the end of his Hiſt. of St. Paul's, 2d edit. 1716, fol.

[C] His Collection of Private Devotions.] The title of it was, A Collection of Private Devotions: or, The Hours of Prayer. Dr. Smith informs us (3), that it was written at the command of King Charles I. who obſerving that his Queen's Proteſtant attendants were frequently reading in the Hours of the Virgin Mary, and other popiſh books of devotion, that were ſet, perhaps on purpoſe, about the royal apartments: leſt they ſhould thereby be tainted with ſuperſtition, and other falſe principles, he ordered a Manual of Prayers to be compoſed for their uſe, out of the holy Scriptures, and the ancient Liturgies, which was accordingly done, by Mr. Coſin. Others affirm (4), that it was written at the requeſt of the Counteſs of Denbigh, the Duke of Buckingham's ſiſter. This Lady being then ſomewhat unſettled in her religion, and warping towards Popery, theſe Devotions were drawn up to recommend the Church of England farther to her eſteem, and preſerve her in that communion. This book, though furniſhed with a great deal of good matter, was not altogether acceptable in the contexture; although the title-page ſets forth, that it was formed upon the model of a book of private Prayers, authorized by Queen Elizabeth, in the year 1560 (5). To give the reader ſome part of it: 'After the Calendar, it begins with the 'Apoſtles Creed in twelve articles, the Lord's Prayer 'in ſeven petitions, the Ten Commandments, with 'the duties enjoined, and the ſins forbidden. Then 'follow the precepts of charity, the ſeven ſacraments, 'the three theological virtues, the three kinds of 'good works, the ſeven gifts of the Holy Ghoſt, the 'twelve fruits of the Holy Ghoſt, the ſpiritual and 'corporal works of mercy, the eight beatitudes, the 'ſeven deadly ſins, their oppoſite virtues, and the 'four laſt things. And, after ſome explanatory 'prefaces and introductions, were ſubjoined the 'forms of prayer for the firſt, third, ſixth, and ninth 'hours, and likewiſe for the Veſpers and Compline, 'formerly called the canonical hours.' Next to theſe 'was the litany, the ſeven penitential pſalms, prayers 'preparatory for receiving the Holy Euchariſt, prayers 'to be uſed in time of ſickneſs, and at the approach 'of death, &c.' Though this book was approved by Geo. Mountain, Biſhop of London, and licenſed with his own hand, yet it was ſomewhat ſurpriſing at firſt view; and ſome moderate perſons were ſhocked with it, as drawing too near the ſuperſtitions of the Church of Rome: at leaſt they ſuſpected it as a preparation to further advances. The top of the frontiſpiece had the name of Jeſus, in three capital letters, I. H. S. Upon theſe there was a croſs, incircled with the ſun, ſupported by two Angels, with two devout women praying towards it. This book was ſeverely animadverted upon by Henry Burton, in his 'Examination of Private Devotions: or, The Hours of 'Prayer, &c.' and by W. Prynne, in his 'Brief Survey and Cenſure of Mr. Cozens cozenizing devotions.' Ibid. 1628.

(3) Ubi ſupra, p. 5, 6.

(4) Collier, Eccl. Hiſt. vol. ii. p. 742.

(5) Horarium Regia Authoritate Editum. ann. 1560; and reprinted in 1573, cum privilegio, by Will. Seers.

Lond. 1628, 4*to*.

[D] In 1628 he was concerned, with other members of the Church of Durham, in a proſecution againſt Peter Smart, &c.] This Peter Smart, who had been School-maſter at Durham, was collated Dec. 30, 1609, to the ſixth Prebend in the Church of Durham, and removed July 6, 1614, to the fourth Prebend (6). He had alſo other preferments. Being to preach, July 7, 1628 (7), in the Cathedral Church of Durham, he took for his text Pſalm xxvi. 7. I hate them that hold of ſuperſtitious vanities. From which he took occaſion to make a moſt bitter invective againſt ſome of the Biſhops, charging them with no leſs than Popery and Idolatry. Among other virulent expreſſions he had theſe——p. 11. 'The Whore of Babylon's baſtardly 'brood, doting upon their mother's beauty, that 'painted harlot of the Church of Rome, have laboured 'to reſtore her all her robes and jewels again, eſpe-'cially her looking-glaſs the Maſs, in which ſhe may 'behold her bravery.——The Maſs coming in, brings 'with it an inundation of ceremonies, croſſes, and cru-'cifixes, chalices and images, copes and candleſticks, 'tapers and baſons, and a thouſand ſuch trinckets, 'which we have ſeen in this Church ſince the com-'munion-table was turned into an altar.——p. 26. I 'aſſure you the altar is an idol, a damnable idol as it 'is uſed. I ſay, they are whores and whoremongers, 'they commit ſpiritual fornication who bow their bo-'dies before that idol the altar.—&c.' For this ſermon he was queſtioned firſt at Durham, afterwards in the High-Commiſſioned-Court at London; whence he was removed, at his own deſire, to that at York, where refuſing, with great ſcorn, to recant, he was, for his obſtinacy, degraded, and by ſentence at Common

(6) Willis, as above, p. 266, 268.

(7) Dr. Naſon ſays, by miſtake, it was 1638, p. 518. But he was ſuſpended for his Sermon in 1631.

Divinity; and in 1634, February the 8th, was elected Maſter of Peter-Houſe, in the room of Dr. Matthew Wren, newly made Biſhop of Hereford. In that ſtation, he ſtrenuouſly applied himſelf to promote ſound Religion, and uſeful Learning (m). He ſerved the office of Vice-Chancellor for the Univerſity of Cambridge, in 1640. In the ſame year, King Charles I. to whom he was Chaplain, conferred upon him the Deanery of Peterborough; in which he was inſtalled November 7, 1640 (n). But this dignity he did not long enjoy, or rather he did not quietly enjoy it at all: ſince his troubles began three days after. For on the 10th of November, a petition from Peter Smart againſt him was read in the Houſe of Commons; wherein Smart complained of the Doctor's ſuperſtition, and innovations in the Church of Durham, and of his ſevere proſecution in the High-Commiſſion-Court (o). Whereupon, on the 21ſt of the ſame month, Dr. Coſin was ordered to be ſent for by the Serjeant at Arms, and a Committee appointed to prepare a charge againſt him (p). Soon after, he preſented a Petition to the Houſe, which, on the 28th following, was read, and referred to a Committe (q). On the 3d of December, the Serjeant had leave given him by the Commons, to take bail for Dr. Coſin; which was accordingly done, the 19th of January 1640-1, the Doctor himſelf being bound in two thouſand pounds, and his ſecurities in a thouſand pounds a-piece, for his appearance upon ſummons (r). Three days after, namely, January the 22d, he was, by a vote of the whole Houſe, ſequeſtered from his eccleſiaſtical Benefices; being the firſt Clergyman that was then uſed in that manner (s). On the 15th of March enſuing, the Commons ſent up one and twenty Articles of impeachment againſt him [E] to the Houſe of Lords (*); to which the

(m) Ibid. p. 8, 9, 10.

(n) Ibid. p. 9, 11. and J. Le Neve's Faſti, edit. 1716, p. 241.

(o) Ruſhworth's Hiſtorical Collect. P. iii. vol. i. edit. 1721, p. 41, 53; and Dr. Nalſon, &c. ed. 1682, vol. i. p. 518.

(p) Nalſon, ibid. p. 538.

(q) Ibid. p. 569.

(r) Ibid. p. 651, 728.

(s) Attempt towards recovering an Account of the Numbers and Sufferings of the Clergy, &c. by J. Walker, fol. Lond. 1714, P. ii. p. 58.

(*) Ruſhworth, ubi ſupra, p. 188; and Nalſon, vol. i. p. 789, 790.

mon Law, ſoon after diſpoſſeſſed of his prebend and livings; whereupon he was ſupplied with 400 l. a year by ſubſcription from the Puritan party (8), which was more than all his preferments amounted to. As for Dr. Coſin, he was ſo far from being Mr. Smart's chief proſecutor (as he avers) that after he was queſtioned in the High Commiſſion at Durham, he never meddled in the matter, ſave that once he wrote a letter to the Archbiſhop of York, and the Commiſſioners, in his favour (9).——Mr. Smart's character is not repreſented to any great advantage. One author indeed (10) calls him a man 'of a grave aſpect, and 'reverend preſence.' But another, who knew him better (11), aſſures us, 'That he was an old man of 'moſt froward, fierce, and unpeaceable ſpirit, &c.' He had not preached in the Cathedral Church of Durham, though Prebendary of it for ſeven years, 'till he preached that ſeditious ſermon for which he was queſtioned. And whilſt he held and enjoyed his preferment, and his health too, he ſeldom preached more than once or twice a year.

(8) Out of the peculiar contributions at London and elſewhere, gathered up for ſilenced Miniſters.

(9) This is Dr. Coſin's own account, as publiſhed in Dr. Heylyn's Examen Hiſtoricum, p. 258, &c. Compare it with that in Fuller's Ch. Hiſt. B. xi. p. 173.

(10) Fuller, ibid.

(11) Dr. Coſin, ubi ſupra.

[E] The Commons ſent up one and twenty articles of impeachment againſt him.] They were carried up by one Mr. Rouſe, who introduced them with the following ſpeech. 'My Lords, I am commanded by the 'Houſe of Commons, to preſent your Lordſhips a de-'claration and impeachment againſt Dr. Coſins, and 'others, upon the complaint of Mr. Peter Smart; 'which Mr. Smart was a Proto-Martyr, or firſt Con-'feſſor of note in the late days of perſecution. The 'whole matter is a tree, whereof the branches and 'fruit are manifeſt in the articles of this declaration.' ——Then follow theſe articles againſt Dr. Coſin. 1. That he was the firſt man that cauſed the Communion-table in the Church of Durham to be removed and ſet altar-ways, in the erecting and beautifying whereof, he (being then Treaſurer) expended two hundred pounds (12). 2. That he uſed to officiate at the weſt-ſide thereof, turning his back to the people. 3. That he uſed extraordinary bowing to it. 4. That he compelled others to do it, uſing violence to the perſons of them that refuſed ſo to do: for inſtance, once ſome omitting it, he comes out of his ſeat, down to the ſeat where they ſat, being gentlewomen, called them whores, and jades, and pagans, and the like unſeemly words, and rent ſome of their clothes. 5. That he converted divers prayers, in the Book of Common Prayers, into hymns, to be ſung in the choir, and played with the organ, contrary to the ancient cuſtom of that Church. 6. That whereas it had been formerly a cuſtom in that Church, at the end of every ſermon, to ſing a pſalm; this cuſtom, when Dr. Coſin came thither, was abrogated, and inſtead thereof, they ſung an anthem in the choir, there being no pſalm ſung either at the miniſter's going up into the pulpit, or at his coming down. 7. That the firſt Candlemas-day at night, that he had been in that Church, he cauſed three hundred wax-candles to be ſet up and lighted in the Church at once, in honour of our Lady, and placed threeſcore of them upon and about the altar. 8. That in this Church there were reliques of divers images, above which were remaining the ruins of two Seraphims, with the picture of Chriſt between them, erected in Queen Mary's time, in the time of Popery; all which, when Queen Elizabeth came to the Crown, were demoliſhed by virtue of a commiſſion by her to that intent granted, which ſo continued demoliſhed from that time, 'till Dr. Coſin came to that Church, who, being Treaſurer, cauſed the ſame to be repaired, and moſt glorioufly painted. 9. That all the time he was unmarried, he wore a cope of white ſattin, never officiating in any other, it being reſerved ſolely for him, no man excepting himſelf making uſe thereof, which, after marriage, he caſt off, and never after wore. 10. That there was a knife belonging to the Church, kept altogether in the veſtry, being put to none but holy uſes, as cutting the bread in the Sacrament, and the like; Dr. Coſin refuſing to cut the ſame with any other but that, thinking all others that were unconſecrated, polluted; but that, which he putting holineſs in, never termed but the conſecrated knife. 11. That in a ſermon preached in that Church, he did deliver certain words in diſgrace of the reformers of our Church; for inſtance, the words were theſe, 'The reformers of this Church, when they aboliſhed 'the Maſs, took away all good order, and, inſtead of 'a reformation, made it a deformation (13).' 12. That he ſeldom or never, in any of his ſermons, ſtiled the Miniſters of the word and Sacraments by any other name than Prieſts, nor the Communion-table by any other name than Altar. 13. That by his appointment there was a cope bought, the ſeller being a convicted Jeſuit, and afterwards employed in that Church, having upon it the picture of the inviſible and incomprehenſible Trinity. 14. That whereas it had been formerly a cuſtom in that Church, at five of the clock to have morning-prayers read, winter and ſummer: this cuſtom, when Dr. Coſin came thither, was abandoned; and inſtead thereof was uſed ſinging and playing on the organs, and ſome few prayers read, and this was called firſt-ſervice; which being ended, the people departed out of the Church, returning at nine o'clock, and having then morning-prayers read unto them, and this was called ſecond-ſervice; which innovation being miſliked, and complained of by Mr. Juſtice Hutton, was reformed. 15. That he framed a ſuperſtitious ceremony in lighting the tapers which were placed on the altars, which, for inſtance, was this: a company of boys that belonged to the Church, came in at the choir-door with torches in their hands lighted, bowing towards the altar at their firſt entrance, bowing thrice before they lighted their tapers: having done, they withdrew themſelves, bowing

(12) Mr. Fuller ſays, that it was a marble altar with Cherubins, which coſt 2000 l. with all the appurtenances thereof. See Fuller, ubi ſupra, p. 173.

(13) Dr. Nalſon informs us, that the Doctor's words were, 'That we muſt 'not think that 'when the Bi-'ſhops took a-'way the Maſs, 'they took away 'all religion.' Which he made out by producing his Sermon. Nalſon, ubi ſupra, p. 792.

the Doctor put in his Anſwer upon oath; and ſo fully vindicated himſelf (t), during the five days the affair was depending before the Lords, that moſt of them acknowledged his innocence.

(t) Both by his own ſelf, and by the very witneſs that Smart and his ſon-in-law, produced againſt him. Examen Hiſtoric. p. 286.

ing ſo oft as before, not once turning their back-parts towards the altar, the organs all the time going. 16. That he counſelled ſome young Students of the Univerſity to be imitators and practiſers of his ſuperſtitious ceremonies, who, to ingratiate themſelves in his favour, did accordingly; and being afterwards reproved for the ſame, by ſome of their friends, confeſſed, that Dr. Coſin firſt induced them to that practice, and encouraged them therein. 17. That he uſed, upon communion-days, to make the ſign of the croſs with his finger, both upon the ſeats whereon they were to ſit, and the cuſhions to kneel upon, uſing ſome words when he ſo did. 18. That one ſabbath-day there was ſet up an unneceſſary company of tapers and lights in the Church, which Dr. Hunt, being then Dean, fearing they might give offence, being they were then unneceſſary, ſent his man to pull them down, who did ſo; but Dr. Coſin being thereat aggrieved, came to the fellow, and there miſcalled him in a moſt uncivil manner, and began to beat him in the public view of the congregation, to the great diſturbance of the ſame. 19. That the Dean and Chapter of that Church, whereof Dr. Coſin was one, with many others, being invited to dinner in the town of Durham, Dr. Coſin then and there ſpake words derogating from the King's prerogative: the words were theſe, 'The King hath no more power over 'the Church than the boy that rubs my horſe-heels.' 20. That there being many of the Canons of the ſaid Church preſent at that time, amongſt the reſt there was one took more notice of his words than the reſt, and acquainted one of his Fellow-Canons with them when he came home. This Canon being a friend to Dr. Coſin, told the Doctor that ſuch a man exclaimed of him, and charged him with words that he ſhould ſpeak at ſuch a time: the Doctor preſently ſends for him, and when he came into the houſe the Doctor deſires him to follow him into an inner room, who did ſo; but ſo ſoon as he came in, the Doctor ſhuts the door, and ſets both his hands upon him, calling him rogue and raſcal, and many other names, inſomuch that the man, fearing he would do him a miſchief, cried out; Mrs. Coſin coming in, endeavoured to appeaſe her huſband, and, holding his hands, the other ran away. 21. That the Doctor did ſeek many unjuſt ways to enſnare this man, that ſo he might take a juſt occaſion to put him out of his place; but none of them taking effect, he put him out by violence, having no other reaſon why he did ſo, but becauſe he had no good voice, when he had ſerved the place two years before Dr. Coſin came thither: for inſtance of which unjuſt ways to enſnare this man, Dr. Coſin hired a man and woman to pretend a deſire of matrimony, and to offer a ſum of money to this petty Canon to contract matrimony between them in a private chamber, ſo thereupon to take advantage of his revenge upon him. This plot being confeſſed by the parties, to be firſt laid by Dr. Coſin, and that they were his inſtruments (14).——Beſides the ſeveral particulars mentioned in theſe articles, Mr. Fuller informs us, that Dr. Coſin was accuſed of having bought a cope with the Trinity, and God the Father in the figure of an old man; another with a crucifix, and the image of Chriſt, with a red beard, and a blue cap. And to have made an anthem to be ſung, of the three Kings of Collen, by the names of Gaſper, Balthazar, and Melchior (15).

(14) Nalſon, ubi ſupra, p. 789, 790; and the Diurnall Occurrences, or daily Proceedings of Parliament in 1640; and 1641, Lond. 1641, 4*to.* p. 52, &c.

(15) Fuller, Ch. Hiſt. ubi ſupra.

To theſe articles Dr. Coſin put in his anſwer, upon oath, before the Houſe of Lords, as is above related. But ſeeing afterwards the ſubſtance of them publiſhed in Mr. Fuller's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory (16), he wrote from Paris a letter to Mr. Warren, and Dr. Reves, in his own vindication, dated April 6, 1658, wherein he declares, as he had done before the Lords, 1. That the Communion-table in the Church of Durham (which in the Bill of Complaint and Mr. Fuller's Hiſtory is ſaid to be the marble-altar, with Cherubims) was not ſet up by him [Dr. Coſin], but by the Dean and Chapter, (whereof Mr. Smart himſelf was one) many years before Mr. Coſin became Prebendary of that Church, or ever ſaw the country. 2. That by the public accounts which are there regiſtered, it did not appear to have coſt above the tenth part of what is pretended, appurtenances and all (17). 3. That likewiſe the copes uſed in that Church were brought in thither long before his [Dr. Coſin's] time, and when Mr. Smart, the complainant, was Prebendary there, who alſo allowed his part (as he [Dr. Coſins] was ready to prove by the Act-book) of the money that they coſt, for they coſt but little. 4. That as he never approved the picture of the Trinity, or the image of God the Father, in the figure of an old man, or otherwiſe to be made or placed any where at all; ſo he was well aſſured that there were none ſuch (nor to his knowledge or hearſay ever had been) put upon any cope that was uſed there. One there was that had the ſtory of the Paſſion embroidered upon it, but the cope that he uſed to wear, when at any time he attended the Communion-ſervice, was of plain white ſattin only, without any embroidery upon it at all. 5. That what the Bill of Complaint, called the image of Chriſt, with a blue cap, and a golden beard, (Mr. Fuller's Hiſtory ſays it was red, and that it was ſet upon one of the copes) was nothing elſe but the top of Biſhop Hatfield's tomb (ſet up in the Church, under a ſide-arch there, two hundred years before Dr. Coſin was born) being a little portraiture, not appearing to be above ten inches long, and hardly diſcernible to the eye what figure it is, for it ſtands thirty foot from the ground. 6. That by the local ſtatutes of that Church, (whereunto Mr. Smart was ſworn, as well as Dr. Coſin) the treaſurer was to give order, that proviſion ſhould every year be made of a ſufficient number of wax-lights for the ſervice of the Choir, during all the winter-time; which ſtatute he [Dr. Coſin] obſerved when he was choſen into that office, and had order from the Dean and Chapter, by capitular act, to do it: yet upon the Communion-table they that uſed to light the candles, never ſet more than two fair candles, with a few ſmall ſizes near to them, which they put there of purpoſe, that the people all about might have the better uſe of them for ſinging the pſalms, and reading the leſſons out of the Bibles: but two hundred was a greater number than they uſed all the Church over, either upon Candlemaſs-night, or any other.——7. That he never forbad (nor any body elſe that he knew) the ſinging of the (metre) pſalms in the Church, which he uſed to ſing daily there himſelf, with other company, at morning-prayer. But upon ſundays and holydays, in the choir, before the ſermon, the Creed was ſung, (and that plainly for every one to underſtand) as it is appointed in the Communion-book, and after the ſermon, was ſung a part of a pſalm, or ſome other anthem taken out of the ſcripture, and firſt ſignified to the people where they might find it. 8. That ſo far was he from making any anthem to be ſung of the three Kings of Colen, as that he made it, when he firſt ſaw it, to be torn in pieces, and he himſelf cut it out of the old ſong books belonging to the Choriſter's School, with a pen-knife that lay by, at his very firſt coming to that College. But he was ſure that no ſuch anthem had been ſung in the Choir during all his time of attendance there, nor (for ought that any of the eldeſt perſons of the Church and town could tell, or ever heard to the contrary,) for fifty or threeſcore years before, or more. 9. That there was indeed an ordinary knife, provided and laid ready among other things belonging to the adminiſtration of the Communion, for the cutting of the bread, and divers other uſes in the Church-veſtry. ——But that it was ever conſecrated, or ſo called, otherwiſe than as Mr. Smart, and ſome of his followers had, for their pleaſure, put that appellation upon it; he [Dr. Coſin] never heard, nor believed any body elſe had, that lived at Durham (18). The reſt of the articles mentioned above, Mr. Smart could not prove, and Dr. Coſin gave a very ſatisfactory anſwer to them, remaining upon the Rolls of Parliament. But as Mr. Fuller did not ſpecify them all, the Doctor did not think it neceſſary to repeat in this letter his anſwer to each

(16) B.xi.p.173.

(17) By this it ſeems, that the ſum mentioned in the original articles was 2000*l.* though in the printed ones there is only 200*l.* See above, note (12).

(18) This Letter is printed in Dr. Heylyn's Examen Hiſtoricum, &c. Appendix, p. 283, &c. Dr. Fuller afterwards aſked Dr. Coſin's pardon for what he had ſaid as above, relating to him. See Worthies, in Durham, p. 295.

innocence. Mr. Glover, one of Smart's own Counſel, told him openly at the Bar of the Houſe of Lords, 'That he was aſhamed of him, and could not in conſcience plead 'for him any longer.' Whereupon the Lords diſmiſſed the Doctor, upon his putting in bail for his appearance; but they never ſent for him again (u). About the ſame time, upon a motion made in the Houſe of Commons, 'that he had enticed a young Scholar to 'Popery,' he was committed to the Serjeant at Arms, to attend daily till the Houſe ſhould call him to a hearing. After fifty days impriſonment, and charges of twenty ſhillings a day, he came at length to a hearing; when he made it appear, That being Vice-chancellor of Cambridge, he had moſt ſeverely puniſhed that young Scholar (whom, upon examination, he had found guilty) by making him recant, and expelling him the Univerſity: and to this ſome of the members bore witneſs. However, the Doctor had no manner of reparation made him for his great trouble and expences (w). In 1642, he was concerned, with others, in ſending the Plate of Cambridge Univerſity to King Charles I. then at York; for which a furious ſtorm fell upon ſeveral members of that Univerſity, and particularly upon Dr. Coſin; who having, ſome time before (x), been voted unworthy to be a Head or Governor in either of the Univerſities, or to hold or enjoy any eccleſiaſtical promotion; was ejected from his Maſterſhip by a warrant from the Earl of Mancheſter, dated March 13, 1642-3. So that, as he was the firſt that was ſequeſtred, ſo was he alſo the very firſt of his Univerſity, who was turned out (y). Thus being deprived of all his preferments, and ſtill fearing the worſt that might follow, he thought fit to leave the kingdom, and to withdraw to Paris, in the year 1643. Being ſafely arrived to that place, he did, according to King Charles's order and direction, take under his care, and officiate as Chaplain to, ſuch of Queen Henrietta Maria's houſhold as were Proteſtants. With them, and other Engliſh exiles that were daily reſorting to Paris, he formed a congregation, that aſſembled at firſt in a private houſe, and afterwards in the Chapel of Sir Richard Brown, Embaſſador from the Court of England to that of France. Not long after, he had lodgings aſſigned him in the Louvre, with a ſmall penſion, on account of the relation he bore to Queen Henrietta (z). During his reſidence in this place, he ſhowed, how falſe and groundleſs was the imputation that had been thrown upon him, 'of his being Popiſhly affected.' For, notwithſtanding his great ſtraights, he remained ſteady and unmoved in the profeſſion of the Proteſtant Religion. He kept up the Engliſh Church-Diſcipline, and the form of worſhip appointed by the Common Prayer: he reclaimed ſome that were quite gone over to Popery, and confirmed ſeveral more in the Proteſtant Profeſſion, who by their converſe with Romaniſts, were become wavering, and inclinable to entertain favorable opinions of the Popiſh Tenets (a). He alſo had ſeveral Controverſies and Diſputes with divers Jeſuits and Romiſh Prieſts; particularly once with the Prior of the Engliſh Benedictins at Paris [F]; in which he acquitted himſelf with ſo much learning and ſound reaſoning, that he utterly defeated the ſuſpicions of his enemies, and much exceeded the very expectations of his friends (b). There were made him very great offers of Preferment [G], if he would have been tempted thereby, to alter his Religion; but he ſtood proof againſt them all (c). He compoſed, during his exile, ſeveral learned works, chiefly againſt the Roman Catholics, of which we ſhall give an account below. Though he was extremely zealous for the doctrine and diſcipline of the Church of England, yet he kept a friendly intercourſe and correſpondence with the Proteſtant Miniſters at Charenton [H]; who, on their parts, expreſſed the utmoſt

(u) Walker, ubi ſupra, p. 593 and Smith, p. 10, 11; and Heylyn's Examen Hiſtoricum, p. 286.

(w) Perſecutio Undecima, p. 23. Nalſon, as above, p. 568.

(x) January 22, 1640—41. Nalſon, as above, p. 734.

(y) Walker, ubi ſupra, p. 152.

(z) Smith, p. 12, 13, 14.

(a) See Examen Hiſtoricum, ut ſupra, p. 293.

(b) Fuller, Ch. Hiſt. B. xi. p. 173.

(c) Walker, ubi ſupra, p. 60.

each of them. Upon the whole, therefore, as we cannot, on the one hand, enough wonder at the weakneſs of Dr. Coſin, for inventing and preſſing the obſervance of ſuch ceremonies and inſignificant things, as ſome of thoſe above-mentioned: ſo, on the other hand, who can be ſufficiently amazed at the confidence of P. Smart, in charging the Doctor with things which he could ſo eaſily diſprove?

[F] Particularly once with the Prior of the Engliſh Benedictins at Paris.] The Prior's name was ——— Robinſon. And the controverſy between him and Dr. Coſin was managed both by word and writing. The argument was, concerning the validity of the ordination of our Prieſts, &c. in the Church of England. And the Doctor had the better ſo far, that he could never get from the Prior any reply to his laſt anſwer. This conference was undertaken to fix a perſon of honour then wavering about that point. The ſum of the conference was written by Dr. Coſin to Dr. Morley, afterwards Biſhop of Wincheſter, in two letters, bearing date June 11, and July 11, 1645 (19).

(19) Baſire, ubi ſupra, p. 59, 60.

[G] There were made him very great offers of preferment.] One author ſpeaks upon this point to the following purpoſe (20). Dr. Coſin 'being by the 'violence of the perſecution which was raiſed againſt 'the epiſcopal party, forced to quit his native coun-'try, and ſeek a retreat among the Papiſts in France, 'he continued a moſt unſhaken Proteſtant, and bold 'propugnator of the Reformed Religion, even to the 'hazard of his life; and when the neceſſitous condi-'tion to which he was reduced, and all the advanta-'geous offers imaginable were made him to embrace 'the Roman Communion, yet were not thoſe temp-'tations capable of removing him from his founda-'tion, inſomuch, that deſpairing of ever obliging him 'to change his religion, the Papiſts were ſo inraged 'at him, as, I have heard it from his own mouth, 'frequently to threaten him with aſſaſſination, and 'that he ſhould not eſcape piſtol or ponyard; and in 'revenge, which I have heard him aver was the moſt 'ſenſible affliction that ever befel him in his whole 'life, they inveigled his only ſon from him to become 'a Papiſt (21).' We may add this other teſtimony of Dr. Coſin's attachment to the Reformed Religion. —'Whilſt he remained in France, he was the Atlas 'of the Proteſtant Religion, ſupporting the ſame with 'his piety and learning, confirming the wavering 'therein, yea, daily adding proſelytes (not of the 'meaneſt rank) thereunto (22).'

(20) Nalſon, as above, p. 519.

(21) He was educated in grammar learning in a Jeſuit's ſchool, as were many others of our youths during the Civil War, which corrupted him. Smith, p. 13.

(22) Fuller's Worthies, in Durham, p. 295.

[H] He kept a friendly intercourſe and correſpondence with the Proteſtant Miniſters at Charenton.] One author indeed tells us (23), that 'after getting over 'into France, he neither joined with the Church of 'French Proteſtants, at Charenton, nigh Paris, nor 'with the Papiſts,——but confined himſelf to the 'Church of old Engliſh Proteſtants therein.' But Dr. Coſin, (23) Fuller, ubi ſupra.

utmoſt regard for him; and permitted him ſometimes to officiate in their congregations [I], according to the rites preſcribed by the book of Common-prayer (d). Thus having, during his ſeventeen years exile in France, behaved 'diſcreetly and prudently' even in the judgment of his enemies (e); he returned to his native country at the Reſtoration of King Charles II. and took poſſeſſion again of his preferments and dignities. About the end of July 1660, he came to his Deanery at Peterborough, and was the firſt that read the Common-prayer in that Cathedral, after the late times of confuſion (f). But here he was not ſuffered to reſt; for the King deſigned, a very little while after, to make him Dean of Durham. But reflecting on his ſufferings, and upon his conſtant attendance and ſervices beyond the ſeas, he nominated him Biſhop of that rich See (g). Accordingly, he was conſecrated on the 2d of December 1660 in Weſtminſter-Abbey (h). As ſoon as he could go down into his Dioceſe, he ſet about reforming many Abuſes that had crept in there during the late Anarchy; and by his generous and hoſpitable temper, accompanied with a kind and courteous deportment, he gained an univerſal reſpect and eſteem (i). But he chiefly diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his very great munificence, and charity, and by a public ſpirit. For, conſidering himſelf principally as ſteward of the large revenues belonging to his See, he laid out a great ſhare of them, in repairing or rebuilding the ſeveral edifices belonging to the Biſhopric of Durham, which had either been demoliſhed, or neglected, during the civil wars. For inſtance, he repaired the caſtle at Biſhop's Aukland [K]; and that at Durham, which he enlarged with ſome additional buildings: and repaired the Biſhop's houſe at Darlington, then very ruinous. He alſo enriched his new Chapel at Aukland, and that in the Caſtle of Durham, with ſeveral pieces of gilt plate, books, and other coſtly ornaments, to remain to his ſucceſſors in the Biſhopric for ever: the charge of all which buildings, repairs, ornaments, &c. amounted to no leſs than twenty ſix thouſand pounds (k). He likewiſe built and endowed two Hoſpitals; the one at Durham for eight poor people, the other at Aukland for four; the annual revenue of the firſt being ſeventy pounds, and of the other thirty pounds: and near his Hoſpital at Durham he rebuilt the School-Houſes, to the charge of three hundred pounds. He alſo built a Library near the Caſtle of Durham; the charge whereof, and pictures wherewith he adorned it, amounted to eight hundred pounds; and gave books thereto, to the value of two thouſand pounds; as alſo an annual penſion of twenty marks for ever to a Library-keeper. The College of diſſolved Prebends at Aukland, purchaſed by Sir Arthur Haſelrigg, and by him forfeited to the King, which King Charles II. gave to Biſhop Coſin, in fee, he gave to his ſucceſſors, Biſhops of Durham for ever; the value thereof being three hundred and twenty pounds. He rebuilt the Eaſt end of the Chapel at Peterhouſe in Cambridge, which coſt three hundred and twenty pounds; and gave in books to the Library of that College, a thouſand pounds. He founded eight Scholarſhips in the ſame Univerſity, namely five in Peter-houſe, of ten pounds a year, each; and three in Gonvill and Caius College of twenty nobles a-piece per Annum; both which, together with a proviſion of eight pounds yearly, to the common cheſt of theſe two Colleges reſpectively, amounted to two thouſand five hundred pounds. He likewiſe made an augmentation of ſixteen pounds a year to the vicarage of St. Andrews at Aukland (l). The reſt of his numerous Benefactions we ſhall give an account of in the note [L]. In a word, this generous Biſhop, during the eleven years

(d) Smith, ubi ſupra, p. 19, 20. Examen Hiſtoricum, p. 291, 292.

(e) See D. Neal's Hiſtory of the Puritans, vol. ii. ed. 1733, p. 388. Mr. Neal adds, that the Doctor was 'ſoftened in 'his principles 'by age and ſufferings.'

(f) See Mr. Simpſon Gunton's Hiſt. of Peterburgh, Supplement, p. 39.

(g) Baſire, p. 49.

(h) Regiſter and Chronicle Eccleſiaſtical and Civil, &c. by Biſhop Kennet, edit. 1728, fol. p. 323. Dr. Sandcroft preached the Conſecration Sermon. Vid. Smith, p. 21.

(i) Smith, p. 21, 22, 23. In 1661, he was one of the Commiſſioners at the Savoy Conference, where he yielded to ſome moderating conceſſions. See Life of R. Baxter, fol. l. i. Part ii. p. 305.

(k) Dr. Smith ſays, it was only near ſixteen thouſand pounds. Vita, ut ſupra, p. 24, 25.

(l) Smith, ubi ſupra, p. 25.

Coſin, in oppoſition to the former part of that aſſertion, declared to all the world, that he never refuſed to join with the Proteſtants there, or any where elſe, in all things wherein they joined with the Church of England (24). And that he was conſtant in the ſame opinion, appears by a letter of his, dated from Paris, Feb. 7, 1650, to one Mr. Cordel, then at Blois, who ſeemed ſhy to communicate with the Proteſtants there, upon the ſcruple of their inorderly ordination: in which letter he has this paſſage,—'To ſpeak my mind 'freely to you, I would not wiſh any of ours abſolutely 'to refuſe communicating in theyre Church, or de-'termine it to be unlawful, for fear of a greater 'ſcandal that may thereupon ariſe, than we can tell 'how to anſwer or excuſe—(25).'

(24) In his Letter, inſerted in Heylyn's Examen Hiſtoricum, p. 283, &c.

(25) See Baſire, p. 58, 59; and note [P] No. 2.

[I] And permitted him ſometimes to officiate in their congregations.] Where he baptized, married, and had even ſome perſons ordained Prieſts and Deacons by Engliſh Biſhops, according to the ſeveral forms in the book of Common Prayer. With their conſent likewiſe he did, in the year 1645, 'ſolemnly, in his 'prieſtly habit, with his ſurplice, and with the office 'of burial uſed in the Church of England, inter, at 'Charenton, the body of Sir William Carnaby, Knt. 'not without the troubleſome contradiction aud 'contention of the Romiſh Curate of that pariſh (26).'

(26) Baſire, p. 58; and Smith, p. 19. See particularly Examen Hiſtoricum, p. 291, 292.

[K] He repaired the caſtle at Biſhop's Aukland.] This (the chief country-ſeat of the Biſhops of Durham,) was, upon the ſeizure of the Biſhop's land, beſtowed upon Sir Arthur Haſelrigg; who deſigning to make it his principal ſeat, and not liking the old-faſhioned building, reſolved to erect a new and beautiful fabric, all of one pile, according to the moſt elegant faſhion of thoſe times. To fit himſelf therefore with materials for this his new houſe, he pulled down a moſt magnificent and large chapel, built by Anthony Bek, Biſhop of Durham, in the time of King Edward I. with the ſtone whereof, and an addition of what was deficient, he erected his new fabrick in a large court, on the eaſt-ſide of the caſtle. But Biſhop Coſin, ſoon after his conſecration, taking notice that the greateſt part of the materials, uſed in that building, were taken from the above-mentioned conſecrated chapel, he not only refuſed to make uſe of it for his habitation, though it was commodiouſly contrived, and nobly built, but took it wholly down, and with the ſtone thereof built another beautiful chapel on the north ſide of that great court; and, under the middle iſle thereof, cauſed a convenient vault to be made for his own ſepulture (27).

(27) Dugdale, ubi ſupra, p. 82.

[L] The reſt of his numerous benefactions, &c.] They were as follows. He gave to the Cathedral at Durham a fair carved Lectern, and Litany-deſk, with a large ſcalloped ſilver patten, gilt, for the uſe of the communicants there, which coſt forty-five pounds.—Upon the new-building of the Biſhop's Court, Exchequer, and Chancery, and towards the erecting of two Seſſions-houſes at Durham, he gave a thouſand pounds.

years he ſate in the See of Durham, is ſaid to have ſpent above two thouſand pounds a year, in pious and charitable uſes (m). For the two laſt years of his life he enjoyed but a very indifferent ſtate of Health, being very much afflicted with the ſtone. At length the roaring pains of that diſtemper, as he uſed to call them, together with a pectoral Dropſy, put an and to his moſt valuable life (n), at his houſe in Pall-Mall, Weſtminſter, on the 15th of January 1671-2, when he was ſeventy-ſeven years, one month, and ſixteeen days old (o). In his Will, dated December 11, 1671, he made a large and open declaration of his Faith [M]. About the year 1625, he married Frances daughter of Marmaduke Blakeſton, M. A. (p) by whom he had a ſon, whom he diſinherited on account of his embracing Popery [N]; and four daughters, one married to Sir ——— Burton, Bart. another to Sir ——— Burton, Bart. and the youngeſt to Dr. Denys Granville, brother to the Earl of Bath, and afterwards Dean of Durham (q). As for the Biſhop's body, it was for ſome time depoſited in a vault in London; and in April, 1672, conveyed to Biſhop's Aukland in the dioceſe of Durham; where on the 29th of that month, it was buried in the Chapel belonging to the Palace, under a tomb of black marble, with an inſcription [O] prepared by the Biſhop in his life-time (r). We ſhall give an account of his works in the note [P]. As to his perſonal qualifications; the Biſhop was tall and

(m) Baſire, ubi ſupra, p. 79, 80.

(n) Ibid. p. 86, 87.

(o) Smith, ubi ſupra, p. 27, 28.

(p) Archdeacon of the Eaſt Riding, and Prebendary of York and Durham, &c. See Willis, ubi ſupra, p. 100, 180, 269; and Baſire, as above, p 39.

(q) Smith, p. 26; and from private information.

(r) Smith, p. 28. Willis, ubi ſupra, p. 251. The Burial Service was read by Guy Carleton, Biſhop of Briſtol and Prebendary of Durham; and Dr. If. Baſire preached the funeral Sermon. Smith, ibid.

pounds.——Moreover, he gave towards the redemption of Chriſtian captives, at Algiers, five hundred pounds.——Towards the relief of the diſtreſſed loyal party in England, eight hundred pounds.——For repairing the banks in Howdenſhire, a hundred marks.——Towards the repair of St. Paul's Cathedral, in London, fifty pounds. By his Will he bequeathed to the poor of his hoſpitals at Durham and Aukland, to be diſtributed at his funeral, ſix pounds.—To the poor people of the country, coming to his funeral, twenty pounds.—To poor priſoners detained for debt, in the goals of Durham, York, Peterborough, Cambridge, and Norwich, fifty pounds.—To the poor people within the precincts of the Cathedral at Norwich, and within the pariſh of St. Andrew's there, in which he was born and educated in his minority, twenty pounds.—To the poor of Durham, Aukland, Darlington, Stockton, Gateſhead, and Branſpeth, (all in the Biſhoprick of Durham) thirty pounds.—To the poor in the pariſhes of Cheſter in the Street, Houghton le Spring, North-Allerton, Creike, and Howden, (all lordſhips belonging to the Biſhops of Durham) forty pounds.—Towards the re-building of St. Paul's Cathedral, in London, when it ſhould be raiſed five yards from the ground, a hundred pounds.—To the Cathedral of Norwich, whereof the one half to be beſtowed on a marble-tablet, with an inſcription, in memory of Dr. John Overall, ſome-time Biſhop there, (whoſe Chaplain he had been) the reſt for providing ſome uſeful ornaments for the Altar, forty pounds.—Towards the re-edifying of the north and ſouth-ſides of the College-chapel at Peterhouſe, in Cambridge, ſuitable to the eaſt and weſt ends, already by him perfected, two hundred pounds.—Towards the new building of a Chapel at Emanuel-College, in Cambridge, fifty pounds.—To the children of Mr. John Heyward, late Prebendary of Litchfield, as a teſtimony of his gratitude to their deceaſed father, who, in his Lordſhip's younger years, placed him with his uncle, Biſhop Overall, twenty pounds a-piece.—To the Dean and Chapter of Peterborough, to be employed for the uſe of the poor in that town, a hundred pounds.—To the poor of Durham, Branſpeth, and Biſhop's Aukland, to be diſtributed as his two daughters (the Lady Gerard, and the Lady Burton) ſhould think beſt, a hundred pounds.—To ſome of his domeſtick ſervants he gave a hundred marks, to ſome fifty pounds, and to the reſt half a year's wages, over and above their laſt quarter's pay (28).

(28) Dugdale, ubi ſupra, p. 83, 84, 85; and Smith, p. 25, 26, 27.

[M] In his Will——he made a large and open declaration of his Faith.] Wherein, after repeating the ſubſtance of the Apoſtles and Nicene Creeds, he condemns and rejects whatſoever hereſies or ſchiſms, the ancient catholic and univerſal Church of Chriſt, with an unanimous conſent, had rejected and condemned; together with all the modern fautors of the ſame hereſies; ſectaries, and phanatics, who, being carried on with an evil ſpirit, do falſely give out, they are inſpired of God. As the Anabaptiſts, new Independents, and Preſbyterians of our country, a kind of men hurried away with the ſpirit of malice, diſobedience, and ſedition.——'Moreover, (adds he) I do profeſs, 'with holy aſſeveration, and from my very heart, that 'I am now, and ever have been from my youth, al-

(27) Dugdale, ubi ſupra, p. 82.

'together free and averſe from the corruptions and 'impertinent new-fangled, or papiſtical, ſuperſtitions 'and doctrines,—long ſince introduced, contrary to 'the Holy Scripture, and the rules and cuſtoms of the 'ancient Fathers. But in what part of the world ſo-'ever any Churches are extant, bearing the name of 'Chriſt, and profeſſing the true Catholic Faith and 'Religion, worſhipping and calling upon God the 'Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghoſt, with one 'heart and voice, if I be now hindered actually to 'join with them, either by diſtance of countries, or 'variance amongſt men, or by any hindrance what-'ſoever; yet always in my mind and affection I join 'and unite with them: which I deſire to be chiefly 'underſtood of Proteſtants, and the beſt Reformed 'Churches, &c.' This part of his Will was written in Latin, and the latter part, containing his benefactions, in Engliſh (29).

(29) See Baſire, p. 111, &c. Smith, p. 55, &c.

[N] He had a ſon, whom he diſinherited on account of his embracing Popery.] See above, note [G] of this article. He was prevailed upon, not only to embrace Popery, but alſo to take Religious Orders in the Church of Rome; and though Dr. Coſin uſed all the ways imaginable, and even the authority of the French King, which, by his intereſt, he had procured, to regain him out of their power, and from their perſuaſion, yet all proved ineffectual. Whereupon he diſinherited him, allowing him only an annuity of one hundred pounds (30). He pretended to turn again, but relapſed before the Biſhop's deceaſe.

(30) Nalſon, as above, p. 519; and Smith, p. 13, 26.

[O] With an inſcription.] Which runs thus.

In non morituram memoriam.
JOHANNIS COSIN
Epiſcopi Dunelmenſis,
Qui hoc Sacellum conſtruxit,
Ornavit, & Deo conſecravit
Ann. M,DC,LXV.
In Feſto S. Petri.
Obiit XV die Menſis Januarii
Anno Domini, MDCLXXI.
Et hic ſepultus eſt, expectans
Felicem corporis ſui Reſurrectionem,
Ac vitam in coelis æternam.
Requieſcat in pace.

Round a marble-ſtone on the floor, are alſo theſe words engraved.

Beati mortui
Qui moriuntur in Domino,
Requieſcunt enim
A laboribus ſuis (31).

(31) Smith, ubi ſupra, p. 28; and J. le Neve's Monumenta Anglicana, from 1650 to 1679, p. 171.

i. e. To the never-dying memory of John Coſin, Biſhop of Durham, who built and adorned this Chapel, and conſecrated it to God in 1665, June 29. He died the 15th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1671, and is buried here, waiting for the happy reſurrection of his body, and eternal life in heaven. Let him reſt in peace. Bleſſed are the dead which die in the Lord, for they reſt from their labours.

[P] We ſhall give an account of his works, &c.] erect, erect, and had a grave and comely preſence. He had a ſound underſtanding, well improved with all kinds of uſeful learning. And, as for his hoſpitality, generoſity, and charity,

Beſides his Collection of Private Devotions, mentioned above, he publiſhed, 'A Scholaſtical Hiſtory of the 'Canon of the Holy Scripture: or, The certain and 'indubitable Books thereof, as they are received in 'the Church of England.' London, 1657, 4*to*. reprinted in 1672. This hiſtory is deduced from the time of the Jewiſh Church, to the year 1546, that is, the time when the Council of Trent corrupted, and made unwarrantable additions to, the ancient Canon of the Holy Scriptures. Conſequently it was directed againſt the Papiſts, and was written by the author during his exile at Paris. He dedicated it to Dr. M. Wren, Biſhop of Ely, then a priſoner in the Tower. Dr. P. Gunning had the care of the edition (32). ——Since the Biſhop's deceaſe the following books and tracts of his have been publiſhed. I. 'A Letter 'to Dr. Collins, concerning the Sabbath,' dated from Peterhouſe, Jan. 24, 1635 (33). In which, ſpeaking firſt of the morality of the ſabbath, he affirms, that the keeping of that particular day was not moral, neither by nature binding all men, nor by precept binding any other men but the Jews, nor them farther than Chriſt's time. But then, adds he, whether one day of ſeven, at leaſt, do not ſtill remain immutably to be kept by Us Chriſtians, that have God's will and example before, and by virtue of the rules of reaſon and religion, is the queſtion? And for this he decides in the affirmative. Then he proves, that the keeping of our Sunday is immutable, as being grounded upon divine inſtitution, and Apoſtolical Tradition, which he confirms by ſeveral inſtances. Next he ſhews, that the Schoolmen were the firſt who began to diſpute, or deny, this day to be of Apoſtolical Inſtitution, on purpoſe to ſet up the Pope's power, to whom, they ſaid, it belongeth, either to change or abrogate the day. Towards the end, he lays down theſe three poſitions againſt the Puritans: 1. 'The 'obſervation of the Sunday in every week is not 'commanded us by the fourth commandment, as 'they ſay it is. 2. Nor is our Sunday to be obſerved 'according to the rule of the fourth commandment, 'as they ſay it is. 3. Nor hath it the qualities and 'conditions of the Sabbath annext to it, as they ſay 'it hath.' II. There is publiſhed, A Letter from 'our author to Mr. Cordel, dated Paris, Feb. 7, '1650.' See above note [H]. It is printed at the end of a pamphlet, intitled, 'The Judgment of the 'Church of England, in the caſe of Lay-baptiſm, 'and of Diſſenters baptiſm (34).' III. Regni Angliæ Religio Catholica, priſca, caſta, defoecata: omnibus Chriſtianis Monarchis, Principibus, Ordinibus, oſtenſa. Anno MDCLII. i. e. A Short Scheme of the ancient and pure doctrine and diſcipline of the Church of England (35). Written at the requeſt of Sir Edward Hyde, afterwards Earl of Clarendon (36). IV. Hiſtoria Tranſubſtantationis Papalis. Cui præmittitur, atque opponitur, tum S. Scripturæ, tum Veterum Patrum, & Reformatarum Eccleſiarum Doctrina Catholica, de Sacris Symbolis, & præſentiâ Chriſti in Sacramento Euchariſtiæ. i. e. The Hiſtory of Popiſh Tranſubſtantiation, &c. written by the author at Paris, for the uſe of ſome of his countrymen, who were frequently attacked upon that point by the Papiſts. It was publiſhed by Dr. Durrell, at London, 1675, 8*vo*. and tranſlated into Engliſh in 1676, by Luke de Beaulieu, 8*vo* (37). There is a Second Part ſtill in manuſcript (38). V. 'The differences in the chief points of 'religion, between the Roman Catholics and us of 'the Church of England; together with the agree-'ments which we, for our parts, profeſs, and are 'ready to embrace, if they, for theirs, were as ready 'to accord with us in the ſame. Written to the 'Counteſs of Peterborough (39).' VI. 'Notes on 'the Book of Common-Prayer.' Publiſhed by Dr. William Nicholls, at the end of his Comment on the Book of Common-Prayer, Lond. 1710, fol. VII. 'Account of a Conference in Paris, between Cyril, 'Archbiſhop of Trapezond, and Dr. John Coſin.' Printed in the ſame book.——The following pieces were alſo written by Biſhop Coſin, but never printed, 1. 'An Anſwer to a Popiſh Pamphlet, pretending, 'that St. Cyprian was a Papiſt. 2. An Anſwer to 'four queries of a Roman Catholic, about the Proteſtant Religion.' 3. 'An Anſwer to a paper deli-'vered by a Popiſh Biſhop to the Lord Inchequin.' 4. 'Annales Eccleſiaſtici, imperfect.' 5. 'An Anſwer 'to Father Robinſon's Papers, concerning the vali-'dity of the Ordinations of the Church of England.' See above, note [F]. 6. 'Hiſtoria Conciliorum, im-'perfect.' 7. 'Againſt the forſakers of the Church 'of England, and their ſeducers in this time of her 'tryal.' 8. 'Chronologia Sacra, imperfect.' 9. 'A 'Treatiſe concerning the abuſe of auricular confeſ-'ſion in the Church of Rome (40).' By all which learned works, as one obſerves (41), and his abilities, quick apprehenſion, ſolid judgment, variety of reading, &c. manifeſted therein; he hath perpetuated his name to poſterity, and ſufficiently confuted, at the ſame time, the calumnies induſtriouſly ſpread againſt him, of his being a Papiſt, or Popiſhly inclined (42); which brought on him a ſevere perſecution, followed with the plunder of all his goods, the ſequeſtration of his whole eſtate, and a ſeventeen years exile. M.

 While the integrity, the learning, and, above all, the munificence of this eminent Prelate entitle his name to reſpect, it muſt, at the ſame time, be acknowledged, that he was of a ſuperſtitious turn of mind. Of this ſufficient proofs may be collected from the preceding article, though written with a very favourable pen. The ſtory related in note [K], ſays a valuable correſpondent, "is an inſtance of the "weakneſs and vain ſcrupulouſneſs of the Biſhop. "I ſhall grant, that it is unlawful to convert a Church "or Chapel to ſecular uſe. But the preſent caſe is "different. The Chapel had been deſtroyed, the "materials ſeparated, and part of them applied to "the building of another fabric. This was, in the "ſenſe of the law, a ſort of ſpecification; and all "that could have been demanded of Sir Arthur "Haſelrigg, and all that could be expected of the "Biſhop of Durham, was, that a Chapel, not infe-"rior to the one deſtroyed, ſhould be rebuilt. The "Biſhop did otherwiſe: he built a Chapel indeed, "but he alſo deſtroyed a houſe. This laſt, I am con-"fident, he had no authority to do; and his heirs "would have been obliged to compound with his "ſucceſſor for the waſte committed wantonly and "fooliſhly. It may alſo here be obſerved, that Dr. "Smith ſays, this Chapel had been deſtroyed by "gunpowder during the civil war; ſo that it is "probable that Haſelrigg only employed the ſtones "of the ruined Chapel, and did not deſtroy the "Chapel."

In the third volume of the Clarendon State Papers, lately publiſhed, we find a letter, written, in 1658, to the Lord Chancellor Hyde, by Dr. Coſin, which affords a farther proof that, notwithſtanding his ſuperſtition and his fondneſs for the pomp of external worſhip, he was ſteadily attached to the Proteſtant Religion. In this letter, ſpeaking of the Queen Dowager Henrietta and Lord Jermyn, he ſays, "they "hold it for a mortal ſin to give one penny towards "the maintenance of ſuch heretics as Dr. Coſin is." Again, "The Ducheſs of Richmond hath been ſick "in her chamber a whole month together, and I "have gone daily hence fifteen days to attend her "there. She promiſeth to be firm in Religion, for "which purpoſe, I wiſh the King would now and "then put a line in his Majeſty's letters to her; for "ſhe is and will be more affected with what his "Majeſty writes to her, than what all the Doctors "of the world can ſay beſides (43)."

Some few of Dr. Coſin's letters are extant, among Dr. Birch's Collections, in the Britiſh Muſeum. One of theſe letters, which contains ſeveral curious particulars concerning Antonio de Dominis, Archbiſhop of Spalato, and Biſhop Overall, will have due notice taken of it hereafter (44).

From Mr. Granger we learn, that the Biſhop's "Scho-"laſtical Hiſtory of the Canon of the holy Scripture" is a book ſtill in eſteem (45).

It

(32) Baſire, p. 66; and Smith, p. 17.

(33) And printed in Bibliotheca Literaria, &c. Lond. 1723, 4*to*. No. v. p. 33, &c.

(34) 2d edit. Lond. 1712, 8*vo*.

(35) Printed at the end of Dr. Smith's Life of Biſhop Coſin.

(36) Smith, p. 15.

(37) Ibid. p. 16, 17.

(38) Baſire, p. 67.

(39) Printed at the end of The Corruptions of the Church of Rome, by Biſhop Bull.

(40) Baſire, p. 67, 68.

(41) Fuller's Worthies, in Durham, p. 294.

(42) Therefore, as Dr. Smith obſerves, Erubeſcant jam Schiſmaticorum filii de parentum avorumque conciliis, mendaciis, & calumniis, in Coſinum, p. 18.

(43) State Papers collected by Edward Earl of Clarendon, vol. iii. p. 418.

(44) Birch's Life of Tillotſon, p. 170.

(45) Biographical Hiſtory of England, vol. iii. p. 234.

charity, they were so very conspicuous and extensive, that he is justly reckoned to have been one of the most munificent, if not the most munificent, of all the Bishops of Durham (s). Among many other services he did to his See, one was, the obtaining a release (in compensation of the loss that See suffered by taking away the Court of Wards and Liveries,) of the annuity, or pension, of one thousand pounds (t), charged upon that Bishopric, ever since Queen Elizabeth's day (u).

(s) See Basire, p. 37—103.
(u) See Willis, ubi supra, p. 228, 811. This 1000 l. was for keeping a garrison at Berwick, against the Scots.
(t) Or, eight hundred and fourscore pounds. Basire, p. 56.

It is justly observed, by the authors of the new universal, historical, and literary Dictionary, that, though Dr. Cosin was not, in his impeachment, convicted of any thing Papistical, he was found active in inventing and pressing vain and insignificant ceremonies, and that in this respect he answered to the character of Laud, being one of the Divines of his School (49).

(49) New Dictionary, vol. iv. p. 141.

Since the preceding part of this note was sent to the press, we have seen Mr. Hutchinson's "History and Antiquities of the County Palatine of Durham;" in which there is a full account of a contest between Bishop Cosin and the people of his palatinate, concerning their right to representatives in Parliament. In Cromwell's time they had been admitted to that privilege; and it was a privilege which they were not willing to relinquish. Accordingly, the Grand Jury, at the general Quarter Sessions of the Peace, held at Durham, on the third day of October, 1666, presented a petition to the Court, in the names and on the behalf of the Freeholders of the said county, setting forth, "That they do not enjoy the privilege of sending Members to Parliament, as all other counties of the kingdom do;" and expressing their hope, that the "Justices will take the same into their serious consideration, and nominate and send up to London, with all convenient speed, such persons as they shall think fit, for the effectual prosecution of this great concernment of the country, that they may petition the Parliament to grant this just and reasonable request, that they may have Knights and Burgesses to represent them in Parliament, like all other counties in the kingdom." This petition being read, the Bishop entered his protest against it, in which he was joined by Dr. Sudbury, Dean of Durham, Dr. Basire, Thomas Cradocke, Samuel Davison, and William Blakiston, Esquires, five of the Justices then present in Court. But Sir Nicolas Cole, Bart. Henry Lambton, John Tempest, Anthony Byerley, Ralph Davison, Cuthbert Carr, Lodwicke Hall, Robert Clavering, Ralph Carr, John Morland, and Christopher Sanderson, Esquires, eleven Justices then also present in Court, did approve of the said petition, and give their assent to the same. After this, the Freeholders published the reasons on which they grounded their request that there might be Knights and Burgesses for the County Palatine of Durham. These reasons our Prelate answered at large, and contended earnestly for the accustomed rights and privileges of his Bishopric. His opposition was successful during his own life. But two years after his decease, and one year before Bishop Crew was translated from Oxford to Durham, the Gentlemen of the county renewed their efforts, and obtained an Act, in 1673, by which the county and city were enabled to send four representatives; two for the county, and two for the city (50).] K.

(50) Hutchinson's History and Antiquities of the County Palatine of Durham, vol. i. p. 539—548.

 [COSTARD (George), A Clergyman of the Church of England, and Author of several learned works, was born about the year 1710 (a). He was educated at Wadham College, Oxford, of which he was admitted a member in 1726, if not earlier; and on the 28th of June, 1733, he took the degree of Master of Arts (b). He also became a Tutor, and Fellow of his College; and, indeed, seems to have spent a great part of his life there, though the Fellows of Wadham College hold their fellowships only for a limited number of years. The same year in which he took the degree of Master of Arts, he published, in 8*vo*. 'Critical Observations on some Psalms.' The first ecclesiastical situation in which he was placed, was that of Curate of Islip in Oxfordshire (c). Part of a letter written by him to Mr. John Catlain, containing an account of a fiery meteor seen by him in the air, on the 14th of July, 1745, was read at the Royal Society on the 7th of November in that year, and published in the Philosophical Transactions, No. 477. The following year he published, at London, in 8*vo*, 'A Letter to Martin Folkes, Esq; President of the 'Royal Society, concerning the rise and progress of Astronomy amongst the Ancients.' In this very learned letter he endeavoured to prove, that the Greeks derived but a very small portion of their astronomical knowledge from the Egyptians or Babylonians [A]. He says, that 'though the Egyptians and Babylonians may be allowed, by their observations of the heavens, to have laid the foundation of astronomy; yet, that, as long as it 'continued amongst them, it consisted of observations only, and nothing more; and that 'in this state it lay, even amongst the Greeks, for some time [B]; till geometry being improved

(a) Nichols's Anecdotes of Bowyer, p. 627.
(b) Ibid.
(c) Ibid.

[A] Derived but a very small portion of their astronomical knowledge from the Egyptians or Babylonians.] Mr. Costard admits, that the Chaldeans were diligent observers of the heavens, and that they carefully marked every phænomenon that could come to their knowledge. But he is of opinion, that the observations on eclipses, spoken of as made by the Chaldeans, were nothing more than mere registers of what had been observed. 'That the theory of the moon's 'motions was at all known so early as this, or that 'the Chaldeans were ever capable of calculating and 'predicting an eclipse, is more,' he says, 'than can 'be made appear from any good authority now extant (1).'

(43) State Papers collected by Edward Earl of Clarendon, vol. iii. p. 418.
(44) Birch's Life of Tillotson, p. 170.
(45) Biographical History of England, vol. iii. p. 234.
(1) Letter to Martin Folkes, Esq. p. 22.

The Babylonians, he remarks, confessed, that their knowledge of the heavens was brought to them from the Egyptians (2); and he says, that 'the Pole, the 'Gnomon, and the Division of the day into twelve 'parts,' were the only things that the Greeks 'confessedly learnt of the Babylonians (3).'

(2) Ibid. p. 50.
(3) Ibid. p. 58.

[B] In this state it lay, even amongst the Greeks, for some time.] He says, that it is from the time of Thales that we may properly date all that truly deserves the name of astronomy (4). Thales, he remarks, was the first Greek that went to Egypt for improvement; and his scholar and successor was Anaximander. In tracing the progress of astronomy among the Greeks, Mr. Costard proceeds to observe, that, 'in Pythagoras's time, the Greeks had begun 'to compare the distances of the planets, the sun, 'and moon, with each other. But, when the distance of the sun from the earth was made only three 'times, or, at most, six times the distance of the 'moon from it, it is plain that this part of astronomy was but in its very childhood. It is, farther, 'a convincing proof, that they had not as yet any 'tables

(4) Ibid. p. 88, 89.

'proved by them, and them alone, into a ſcience, and applied to the heavens, they became 'the true and proper authors of every thing deſerving the name of aſtronomy (d).'

(d) Letter to Martin Folkes, Eſq; p. 156.

In 1747, Mr. Coſtard publiſhed, in 8*vo*, 'Some Obſervations tending to illuſtrate 'the Book of Job [C]; and in particular the words, I know that my Redeemer liveth, &c.'

To

'tables for calculating the motions of the moon, or 'the diameters of the earth's ſhadow in lunar eclip-'ſes, or determining the parallaxes in ſolar ones; 'without which tables, in the judgment of the beſt 'aſtronomers, neither the times nor quantities of 'eclipſes can be inveſtigated (5).'

(5) Ibid. p. 122.

'That the ſyſtem, called the Pythagorean, grew 'up amongſt the diſciples of that philoſopher is highly 'probable; but that he himſelf delivered it to them, 'in the form we now have it, ſeems to be by no 'means fact (6).'—'What time the planets began to 'be obſerved, is not known; but that they were all 'diſcovered at the ſame time, is hardly probable. 'They were at firſt, no doubt, conſidered only as 'fixed ſtars; by degrees they were found to have a 'motion of their own; and, at laſt, their periods 'came to be taken notice of and ſettled. But this, 'we are aſſured by Seneca, was not ſo early as the 'time of Democritus, that is, about 500 years before 'Chriſt. Thoſe of the planets Jupiter and Mars 'ſeem, if conjecture may be allowed, to have been 'the firſt that were ſo. The ſtations and retrogreſ-'ſions indeed of Jupiter and Mars would extremely 'perplex their theories; but as their motions are ſoon 'diſcernible, and they come in oppoſition to the ſun, 'they ſeem more likely to have been obſerved than 'Saturn; whoſe retrogreſſions, though not ſo large 'as thoſe of the other two, yet the ſlowneſs of whoſe 'motion, and the weakneſs of his light, would all 'contribute to make him leſs diſtinguiſhed from the 'fixed ſtars about him. The planet Venus was 'known to Homer by the name of Heſperus; but 'Pythagoras, if Laertius and Pliny may be credited, 'or elſe Parmenides, was the firſt that ſaid, Phoſpho-'rus and Heſperus were the ſame, i. e. I ſuppoſe, 'diſcovered the circular motion of that planet. 'When Mercury began to be conſidered, as having 'a regular motion of his own, is uncertain; but it is 'probable not till afterwards, as he is ſo ſeldom ſeen, 'his greateſt elongation being only about 22° 46'.

(6) Ibid. p. 123.

'From this time, however, it is probable, their 'motions began to be obſerved, and geometry to be 'applied to the purpoſes of aſtronomy: a thing, as 'far as appears, unattempted by the Egyptians and 'Babylonians: and yet without this it could never 'be reduced to a ſcience. About the time we are 'now ſpeaking of, lived Cleoſtratus, who, according 'to Pliny, formed the ſigns of the Zodiac; unleſs he 'means only the conſtellations Aries and Sagittary, 'concerning which, he ſays, he compoſed a treatiſe. 'He formed the Kids likewiſe, according to Hyginus; 'the conſtellation Heniochus being probably formed 'before. By ſuch eaſy gradations did that people 'proceed, and from ſuch ſmall beginnings; 'till, in 'the time of Eudoxus, or the year before Chriſt 363, 'there might be read in the heavens the antient hiſ-'tory of their moſt illuſtrious families during the 'poetical ages. This philoſopher was an aſtronomer, 'phyſician, and lawgiver. He learned geometry of 'Archytas, and was recommended by Ageſilaus to 'Nectanebo, King of Egypt, and by him to the 'prieſts; with whom he ſtaid a year and four months, 'and wrote his Octaeteris, according to Laertius. 'For there it was that he learned, that the ſun finiſhed 'his courſe in 365 days and 6 hours; a thing which, 'it ſeems, was hitherto unknown to the Greeks. He 'wrote, amongſt other things, a treatiſe on the con-'ſtellations, which is loſt, all but a few fragments that 'are preſerved by Hipparchus on Aratus, whoſe 'ſphere, according to him, is the very ſame with 'that of Eudoxus (7).'

(7) Ibid. p. 126—134.

'About the year of Rome 542, or 211 before 'Chriſt, flouriſhed the great Archimedes; who, be-'ſides that he was an excellent mathematician, was, 'in the proper ſenſe of the word, as good an aſtro-'nomer. That he obſerved the ſolſtice, is certain 'from Hipparchus; and Macrobius tells us, that he "aſſigned the diſtance of the moon from the earth, "Mercury from the moon, Venus from Mercury, "the ſun from Venus, Mars from the ſun, Jupiter "from Mars, and Saturn from him, in Stadia; as "likewiſe the diſtance from the orbit of Saturn to "the fixed ſtars."

'About the 150th olympiad, or 175 years before 'Chriſt, flouriſhed Hipparchus, who obſerved the 'autumnal equinox, A. V. C. 592, according to 'Ptolemy; and the vernal equinox, A. V. C. 626; 'ſo that he ſeems to have continued his obſervations 'for 34 years together. Geometry having now been 'taken in to the aſſiſtance of aſtronomy, and the 'Pythagoreans having invented the 32d propoſition 'of the firſt book of Euclid, this philoſopher was 'enabled in a more correct manner to attempt the 'Parallax of the ſun; and a noble attempt in-'deed it was. But, though it diſcovers a vaſt com-'prehenſion of thought, and the uncommon ſkill of 'the contriver, yet it ſuppoſes too great an accuracy 'of obſervation ever to be admitted into practice (8).'

(8) Ibid. p. 144, 145, 146.

—'He firſt began to make a catalogue of the fixed 'ſtars, a thing highly celebrated by Pliny, as a taſk 'for a God; and diſcovered the præceſſion of the 'Equinox, as Ptolemy informs us. He is ſaid to have 'calculated eclipſes, both of the ſun and the moon, 'for 600 years to come.'—'And this brings us down 'to the year 140 after Chriſt, when Ptolemy ob-'ſerved the Equinox, and compoſed his excellent 'work; a work that conveys very extraordinary con-'ceptions of its author; but at the ſame time hardly 'permits us to imagine, that the Egyptians, his 'countrymen, or the Babylonians, ever knew the 'true ſyſtem, as the world has been ſince obliged with 'it by Copernicus. Different parts of it, indeed, lie 'ſcattered in the different writings of the Pythago-'rean philoſophers, and others; but that it was never 'reduced to one conſiſtent form, and admitted as the 'genuine one, ſeems apparent from Ptolemy's em-'bracing a worſe. If others were acquainted with 'what is now called the Pythagorean ſyſtem, it is 'certain it was loſt, or obſcured by the ſuperior au-'thority of Ptolemy's. It was this that was publicly 'taught, and privately explained and commented on. 'It was tranſlated at laſt into the Arabic language, 'and by that people ſtudied and admired. The 'knowledge of the Almageſt was by them looked 'upon as the ne plus ultra of ſcience; and though 'many of them were very diligent and accurate ob-'ſervers, yet not one of them pretended to call in 'queſtion its principles, or to prefer any other ſyſtem 'before it. In Europe, indeed, during this interval, 'aſtronomy was in a manner unknown, or entirely 'loſt. What little there was confined itſelf almoſt 'wholly to the Moors in Spain. At laſt, about the 'year 1230 after Chriſt, at the command of the 'Emperor Frederick, Ptolemy's Almageſt was tranſ-'lated out of Arabic into Latin.

'From this time aſtronomy may date its ſecond 'birth, being gradually improved, by the concurrent 'labours of 500 years, to the perfection it is now 'arrived at. For, about the year 1250, flouriſhed 'the famous Alphonſus, King of Caſtile, celebrated 'for his Aſtronomical Tables. He was ſucceeded, 'about the year 1507, by the incomparable Coper-'nicus, the author of the ſyſtem now admitted for 'the true one, as being moſt agreeable to the laws 'of gravitation, and the beſt obſervations. Amongſt 'theſe laſt, the principal place is due to thoſe of 'Tycho Brahé; as by the help of which the ingenious 'Kepler was enabled to lay down the true laws of 'motion that obtain among the heavenly bodies. 'No ſooner was that diſcovery made, than this ſci-'ence took very haſty ſtrides towards perfection, by 'the unwearied diligence and ſagacity of many able 'aſtronomers and mathematicians, particularly our 'own countrymen, Ward, Flamſteed, Halley, and, 'above all, Sir Iſaac Newton (9).'

(9) Ibid. p. 149—155.

[C] Obſervations tending to illuſtrate the book of Job.] Mr. Coſtard obſerves of this book, that it is 'an ex-'alted and regular piece of Eaſtern poetry, and of 'the

To which was annexed, 'The third chapter of Habakkuk, paraphraſtically tranſlated into 'Engliſh verſe.' The ſame year a curious letter written by him to the Rev. Dr. Shaw, principal of St. Edmund Hall, relative to the Chineſe chronology and aſtronomy, was read at the Royal Society, and publiſhed in the Philoſophical Tranſactions, No. 483. In this letter he took notice, that it had been the affectation of ſome nations, and particularly of the Babylonians and Egyptians, to carry up their hiſtories to ſo immoderate a height, as plainly to ſhew thoſe accounts to be fictitious, and without foundation. This alſo was the caſe with the Chineſe; and Mr. Coſtard urged a variety of arguments to prove, that the mathematical and aſtronomical knowledge of the Chineſe was inconſiderable, and that little dependance was to be placed on the pretended antiquity of their hiſtory (e). The following year he publiſhed, at Oxford, in 8*vo*, 'A farther Account of the Riſe and 'Progreſs of Aſtronomy among the Antients, in three Letters to Martin Folkes, Eſq.' Of theſe letters the firſt treats of the aſtronomy of the Chaldeans; the ſecond is an elaborate inquiry concerning the conſtellations ſpoken of in the book of Job [D]; and the fourth is on the Mythological aſtronomy of the antients. In theſe letters, he has diſplayed a conſiderable extent both of oriental and of Grecian literature.

(e) Vid. Abridgment of the Philoſ. Tranſactions, vol. x. p. 1231, &c.

His next publication, which appeared in 1750, in 8*vo*. was 'Two Diſſertations: I. 'Containing an Inquiry into the meaning of the Word Keſitah, mentioned in Job, ch. 'xlii. ver. 11. In which is endeavoured to be proved, that though it moſt probably there 'ſtands for the name of a coin, yet that there is no reaſon for ſuppoſing it ſtamped [E] 'with 'the dramatic kind. The perſons ſpeaking are 'Eliphaz, Bildad, and Zophar; who regularly take 'their turns in the debate, which is upon a queſtion 'no leſs important than how—" to vindicate the "ways of God to men." What methods are purſued by them, in order to this, doth not at preſent 'fall under my deſign to obſerve. 'Tis apparent, 'however, that their ſeveral anſwers to Job's pleas 'may be looked on as three diſtinct acts. Theſe 'replications and rejoinders continue to the 32d 'chapter, where Elihu begins the ſhare he takes in 'the conference. This brings us to the 38th chapter, which concludes the fourth act, when the 'Deity appears, and cloſeth the ſcene in the fifth. 'I will not ſay, that this is the firſt Tragedy that 'we know of as extant in the world, or that any 'Eaſtern productions of this nature laid the foundation of the Greek ſtage. It may not be improper 'to obſerve, however, that two rules laid down by a 'very great maſter of the art of poetry are exactly 'maintained. It is not, as was ſaid,

'—— quinto productior actu;

'nor is God introduced, till it becomes

'—— dignus vindice nodus.

'The narration at the beginning and end may be 'looked on as the Prologue and Epilogue; and the 'part aſſigned Job's wife ſeems intended for a ſhort 'and refined ſatire on thoſe that, without proper 'accompliſhments or abilities, impertinently interpoſe their judgments in points of the higheſt importance, and which it is impoſſible they ſhould 'underſtand. But if this is a proper repreſentation 'of the caſe, will it not be a farther proof of the 'lateneſs of the compoſition? Poetry, no doubt, ſuch 'as it was, muſt have been of very antient original. 'But then it ſeems to have been confined for a long 'time to ſongs, ſhort hymns, panegyricks, and the 'like; rather taught and treaſured up in the memory, 'like thoſe of the Druids, than committed to writing. 'Regular poems muſt have been owing to leiſure, 'education, and the eſtabliſhment of ſchools and 'academies (10).' He was of opinion, that the book of Job was not older than the time of the Jewiſh captivity at Babylon.

(10) Nichols, ubi ſupra.

[D] Inquiry concerning the conſtellations ſpoken of in the book of Job.] In this letter, among other things which he endeavours to prove, one is, that the authors of the ſeptuagint verſion did not underſtand the original, in thoſe paſſages in which the conſtellations are mentioned. He thinks it probable, that 'thoſe 'whom Ptolemy employed to tranſlate the Hebrew 'writings knew nothing of aſtronomy, or the original 'names by which the conſtellations were firſt called 'by the old Chaldean or Egyptian obſervers;' and that this led them to 'apply, with uncertainty and 'confuſion, the fabulous names given them by the 'Greeks, and which in their time had univerſally 'taken place of the other (11).'

(11) Farther Account of the Riſe and Progreſs of Aſtronomy, p. 44, 45.

[E] No reaſon for ſuppoſing it ſtamped.] In the firſt of theſe Diſſertations, Mr. Coſtard obſerves, that whoever would prove the book of Job to be older than Moſes from the Keſitah being mentioned in it, muſt take upon them to prove, 'that it was a coin 'out of uſe in Job's country ever ſince the time of 'that lawgiver; and muſt likewiſe aſſert, that the 'writer, in order to give his poem the air of antiquity, could not introduce the mention of ſuch a 'coin, though laid aſide, he knew, many hundreds 'of years before he was born (12).' He alſo takes notice, that Buxtorf ſays, the piece of money called the Keſitah was ſo named, 'becauſe it had the figure 'of a Lamb ſtamped upon it, and his authority hath 'been implicitly followed by many of the moderns 'without examination. But if Keſitah never ſignifies a Lamb, as Bochart very rightly obſerves, then 'that could not be the reaſon of the appellation, 'whatever elſe was (13).' Upon the whole, Mr. Coſtard was of opinion, 'that the word Keſitah moſt 'probably ſignifies a coin of ſome ſort or other, yet 'that it neither appears to have been ſtamped, nor 'can be proved to have been a Jewiſh one; that it is 'more reaſonable to think it was a piece of Canaanite money; that it had, therefore, no connection 'with the law of Moſes; nor conſequently was ſet 'aſide by it (14).'

(12) Two Diſſertations, p. 1, 2.

(13) Ibid. p. 17, 18.

(14) Ibid. p. 36.

Mr. Coſtard remarks, that 'who was the original 'author of ſtamped money is uncertain. But it is 'probable, it came into uſe among different people, 'at different times, according as they improved in 'arts and ſciences, trade, and commerce. In Italy, 'if we believe Macrobius, the firſt coiner of money 'was Janus. But as his age is uncertain, as well as 'upon what authority Macrobius, a later writer, 'aſſerts this, or before him Athenæus, nothing farther can be ſaid upon the ſubject. That ſilver was 'very ſcarce among the Romans, in much later times, 'ſeems evident; ſince we are told, that their money, 'before Numa, conſiſted only of bits of leather. 'This Prince is ſaid to have introduced into that 'ſtate braſs money, which, however, was not ſtamped, but delivered out by weight. Servius Tullus, according to Pliny, was the firſt among them 'that ſtamped this braſs coin, which he did, it ſeems, 'with the figure of an animal, an ox or a ſheep. 'This, according to Pliny, was the only coin they 'had till A. U. C. 485, in the Conſulſhip of Q. 'Fabius, and five years before the firſt Punic war. 'That war broke out in the year before Chriſt 261, 'and Fabius was Conſul in the year before Chriſt '265. And it was ſixty-two years later ſtill before 'they had any gold money, or the year before Chriſt '203. What impreſs they uſed upon theſe coins is

'with any figure at all; and, therefore, not with that of a lamb in particular. II. On the 'ſignification of the word Hermes; in which is explained the origin of the cuſtom, among 'the Greeks, of erecting ſtones called Hermæ; together with ſome other particulars 'relating to the mythology of that people.' Theſe diſſertations were inſcribed to his friend Dr. Hunt, then Profeſſor of the Hebrew and Arabic languages in the Univerſity of Oxford. At the concluſion of them, Mr. Coſtard ſays, 'The ſtudy of the oriental 'languages ſeems to be gaining ground in Europe every day; and provided the Greek 'and Latin are equally cultivated, we may arrive in a few years at a greater knowledge 'of the ancient world, than may be expected, or can be imagined. But without this 'foundation, I may venture to pronounce, from the little experience I have had, that all 'will be darkneſs and perplexity. It is beginning at the wrong end, which can never be 'attended with ſucceſs in any thing. It may not, perhaps, be improper to add, before I 'have done, that for ſuch reſearches as theſe I have here been ſpeaking of, few places, if 'any, in Europe, are ſo well adapted as the Univerſity of Oxford (f).'

(f) Nichols, ut ſupra, p. 628.

In 1752, he publiſhed, in 8*vo*, at Oxford, 'Diſſertationes II. Critico-Sacræ, quarum 'prima explicatur Ezek. xiii. 18. Altera vero, 2 Reg. x. 22.' The ſame year a tranſlation was publiſhed of the latter of theſe diſſertations, under the following title: 'A 'Diſſertation on 2 Kings x. 22, tranſlated from the Latin of Rabbi C——d, with a dedi-'cation, preface, and poſtſcript, critical and explanatory, by the tranſlator.' In the preface and dedication to this publication, it is attempted to place Mr. Coſtard in a very ludicrous light (g). On the 25th of January, in the year following, a letter written by Mr. Coſtard to Dr. Bevis, concerning the year of the eclipſe foretold by Thales, was read at the Royal Society, and was afterwards publiſhed in the Philoſophical Tranſactions (h); as was alſo another letter written by him to the ſame gentleman, concerning an eclipſe mentioned by Xenophon (i). At the cloſe of the ſame year, another letter written by Mr. Coſtard, and addreſſed to the Earl of Macclesfield, concerning the age of Homer and Heſiod, was likewiſe read at the Royal Society, and afterwards publiſhed in the Philoſophical Tranſactions for the year 1754 (k). In this letter Mr. Coſtard ſtates the ages of Homer and Heſiod much lower than the ordinary computations. He endeavours to make it appear, from aſtronomical arguments, that Homer and Heſiod both probably lived about the year before Chriſt 580; which is three centuries later than the computation of Sir Iſaac Newton, and more than four later than that of Petavius. In 1755, he wrote a letter to Dr. Birch, which is preſerved in the Britiſh Muſeum (l), reſpecting the meaning of the phraſe Sphæra Barbarica [F]. Some time after this, he undertook to publiſh a ſecond edition of Dr. Hyde's Hiſtoria Religionis veterum Perſarum, eorumque Magorum; and which was accordingly printed, under his inſpection, and with his corrections, at the Clarendon Preſs at Oxford in 4*to*. in 1760. Mr. Coſtard's extenſive learning having now recommended him to the notice of Lord Chancellor Northington, he obtained, by the favour of that nobleman, in June, 1764, the Vicarage of Twickenham, in Middleſex (m); in which ſituation he continued till his death. The ſame year he publiſhed, in 4*to*, 'The Uſe of 'Aſtronomy in Hiſtory and Chronology, exemplified in an Inquiry into the Fall of the 'Stone into the Ægoſpotamos, ſaid to be foretold by Anaxagoras. In which is attempted 'to be ſhewn, that Anaxagoras did not foretell the fall of that ſtone, but the ſolar eclipſe in 'the firſt year of the Peloponneſian war. That what he ſaw was a comet, at the time of 'the battle of Salamis: and that this battle was probably fought the year before Chriſt '478; or two years later than it is commonly fixed by chronologers.'

(g) Id. ibid.

(h) Vol. xlviii. part i. p. 17.

(i) Ibid. p. 155.

(k) Vol. xlviii. part ii. p. 441.

(l) Birch's MSS. No. 4440—580.

(m) New and Gen. Biog. Dict. 8*vo*. vol. iv. p. 142. edit. 1784.

In

'uncertain; but the learned now ſeem to be agreed, 'that the practice of ſtriking heads upon them, in 'the manner that is now ſeen on thoſe called Conſu-'lar, did not begin till about the times of Marius 'and Sylla, or the year before Chriſt 107.

'How ſoon the Greeks became acquainted with 'the art of ſtriking money, is yet more uncertain. 'But probably not till either commerce began to 'flouriſh among them, or they had occaſion to pay 'large armies abroad. If this laſt was the caſe, that 'was not till the time of Darius Hyſtaſpes, or about 'the year before Chriſt 520.'—'The oldeſt Greek 'coin extant, according to F. Hardouin, in his 'Chronology of the Old Teſtament, is one of Amyntas, 'the ſixth in his order of Macedonian Kings. But 'this learned Jeſuit afterwards publiſhed a gold one 'of Cyrene, which the authors of the notes in the 'Science des Medailles take to be as old as the time of 'Cyrus.

'The firſt people that coined gold and ſilver 'money, according to Herodotus, were the Lydians. 'But what impreſs they uſed, or whether indeed any 'at all, he hath not told us. Nor can we know at 'preſent, as none of their coin that we can be cer-'tain of, is preſerved in any of the cabinets of 'Europe. The Medes their neighbours, we know, 'ſtruck theirs with the effigies of their Prince ſhoot-'ing, and kneeling with one knee on the ground. 'Theſe were called Darics, from the Prince that 'probably firſt coined them. Xenophon uſeth that 'name for a coin extant in Cyrus's time, and Suidas 'ſays, they were ſo called, not from Darius Hyſtaſ-'pes, but one elder than him. Perhaps Darius, the 'ſon of that Ahaſuerus, who was King of the Medes 'at the taking of Babylon by Cyrus. That the firſt 'ſtamping of money, with an effigie in Aſia, is to be 'placed ſomewhere about this time, is not impro-'bable. But that ſilver unſtamped was in uſe long 'before, is certain. At the time of the Jews capti-'vity by Nebuchadnezzar, or the year before Chriſt '616, according to my computation, Jeremiah pur-'chaſed his couſin's land for ſeven ſhekel and ten che-'ſeph, or ſilverlings (15).'

(15) Ibid. p. 12.

[F] The meaning of the phraſe Sphæra Barbarica.] Mr. Coſtard ſays, that the moſt obvious and natural meaning of the words Sphæra Barbarica, which are uſed by Julius Firmicus in his Aſtronomicon, by Scaliger in his Notes on Manilius, and by other writers, 'ſeems to be conſtellations as delineated, or 'deſcribed, by other nations beſides the Greeks, to-

In 1767, he publiſhed, in one volume, 4*to*, 'The Hiſtory of Aſtronomy, with its 'application to Geography, Hiſtory, and Chronolgy; occaſionally exemplified by the 'globes.' This work was chiefly intended for the uſe of ſtudents, and contains a full and diſtinct view of the ſeveral improvements made in geography and aſtronomy. Mr. Coſtard has ſhewn, 'by a gradual deduction, at what time, and by whom, the principal diſcoveries 'have been made in geography and aſtronomy, how each diſcovery has paved the way to 'what followed, and by what eaſy ſteps, through the revolution of ſo many ages, theſe very 'uſeful ſciences have advanced towards their preſent ſtate of perfection (n).' The following year he publiſhed, in 4*to*, "Aſtronomical and Philological Conjectures on a Paſſage in "Homer [G]:" but theſe conjectures appear to be fanciful and ill-grounded. About this time a correſpondence took place, between the learned Jacob Bryant, Eſq; and Mr. Coſtard, concerning the land of Goſhen [H], which has been lately publiſhed by Mr. Nichols, in his "Miſcellaneous Tracts by Mr. Bowyer (o)." We do not find that from this period

(n) Monthly Review, vol. xxxviii. p. 324.

(o) 4*to*. 1785.

'gether with the names by which they diſtinguiſhed 'them.' But, he adds, that the phraſe may mean 'what Beroſus and his Chaldeans taught concerning 'perſons born when ſuch or ſuch a particular con-'ſtellation roſe, or what events might be expected to 'attend them throughout their life-time after (16).'

(16) Birch's MSS. No. 4440 p. 580.

[G] Conjectures on a paſſage in Homer.] The paſſage in queſtion is that in which Thetis tells Achilles, that ſhe cannot ſpeak to Jupiter in his behalf, becauſe he is gone to an Ethiopian feaſt, from which he will not return till the end of twelve days. In order to explain this, Mr. Coſtard, contrary to the general ſenſe of antiquity, endeavours to prove, that Jupiter means the ſun, and that a day ſignifies a month (17).

(17) Monthly Review, vol. xxix. p. 402, 403.

[H] Concerning the land of Goſhen.] Mr. Coſtard endeavoured to prove, that Goſhen was 'the Delta 'of the Greeks in general, at leaſt that part of it 'which was habitable in the time of Joſeph (18).' —'The particular ſpot inhabited by the Iſraelites,' he ſays, 'was called the Land of Rameſes (Gen. 'xlvii. 11.) from a city of that name which, pro-'bably, was the capitol of that diſtrict. And it was 'from that city that the Iſraelites began their march '(Exod. xii. 37.)' He adds, 'Wherever Goſhen 'is to be placed, it could not be at a very great diſ-'tance from the Red Sea, and the nearer the better; 'for the Iſraelites croſſed it in the night of the third 'day from their ſetting out from Rameſes. And 'Rameſes is expreſsly ſaid, Gen. xlvii. 6. to be in 'or belong to that diſtrict. For though Goſhen, 'from the name, ſeems as if it lay between the 'branches of the Nile, yet the territory might extend 'without it to the Eaſt, where I conjecture Rameſes 'was ſituated (19).' He thought that Rahab, Goſhen, and Delta, meant the ſame country and diſtrict; and that Zoan, Goſhen, Rahab, and Delta, were only different names given at different times to one and the ſame country. Mr. Bryant differed from Mr. Coſtard upon this ſubject. 'There is reaſon to think, ſays he, 'that not a part only, but the whole of Delta 'was habitable in the time of Joſeph: for the Caph-'torim had made their migration to Philiſtine before 'the days of Abraham; and their original eſtabliſh-'ment is ſuppoſed by moſt learned men to have been 'about Peluſium and Sethron: and if the ſea coaſts 'were inhabited, we may readily admit that the 'higher lands were ſo likewiſe, for they muſt have 'been firſt occupied. Both this ſettlement in Egypt, 'and migration from it, are mentioned by the pro-'phets. Have I not brought up Iſrael out of the land 'of Egypt, or Miſraim, and the Philiſtines from Caph-'tor? Amos ix. 7. The Lord will ſpoil the Philiſtines, 'the remnant of the country, or rather of the iſle, of 'Caphtor. Jer. xlvii. 4. The Caphtorim, we find, 'are put into oppoſition to the Miſraim; the former 'inhabited one of the iſland provinces near the ſea, 'the latter were in poſſeſſion of the other parts of 'Delta. The region of the former being unwhole-'ſome and inconvenient for its marſhy and barren 'ſoil, probably induced them to quit it very early; 'for before the time of Abraham's ſojournment in 'Canaan, they had driven the Avim from their ſet-'tlements in that country, and ſeized them to their 'own uſe. Gen. xx. xxii. 33, 34. See Bochart, I. '293. But waving this, and allowing to Delta what 'extent you pleaſe, yet Goſhen and Delta can never 'be eſteemed ſynonimous, and the ſame, without 'perplexing the Moſaic account, and making it in 'many places inconſiſtent with itſelf. The wonders 'exhibited in Egypt are ſaid to have been diſplayed 'in Rahab and in Zoan. Pharaoh confeſſedly re-'ſided in thoſe parts; and they muſt neceſſarily 'have been occupied by many of the Miſraim, and 'the Naphtuhim, as the upper regions of Egypt were 'poſſeſſed by the ſons of Pathros. Let us then, as 'Goſhen and Delta are to be eſteemed ſynonimous, 'uſe them in that manner, putting one for the other, 'as ſhall ſeem beſt to us, and attend the conſequence. 'In the plague of flies, the cities and houſes of the 'Miſraim were to be full of them, and alſo the ground 'on which they ſtood was to be covered: but, ſays 'the Lord, I will ſever in that day the land of Go-'ſhen, in which my people dwell, that no ſwarms of flies 'ſhall be there, Exod. viii. 21, 22. The land of 'Goſhen was to be ſevered: it is plain, therefore, 'that it was a detached province. If, inſtead of 'Goſhen, you put Rahab or Delta, every circum-'ſtance will be contradictory. The land will, with-'out any limitation, be ſaid to be affected, and at 'the ſame time not to be affected, with this curſe 'from heaven. Again, Ch. ix. ver. 24, 25, 26, we 'read of the plague of hail, where fire was mingled 'with the hail. It is ſaid to have been grievous over 'all the land of Egypt; there was none like it in all 'the land of Egypt or Miſraim ſince it became a na-'tion; and the hail ſmote throughout all the land of 'Egypt, or Miſraim, &c. only in the land of Goſhen 'there was no hail. If then the land of Goſhen was 'Rahab and Delta, there could be no hail in Delta 'and Rahab, nor in Zoan; for they are by you ſup-'poſed to be the ſame, yet they were the places of all 'others which were moſt afflicted by it. As then the 'Scripture plainly ſays, that in the land of Goſhen, 'where the children of Iſrael dwelt, none of theſe 'plagues were felt; it is manifeſt, that the land of 'Goſhen was a particular and ſeparate diſtrict; and 'never could comprehend all Rahab or Delta, of 'whatever dimenſions they may be ſuppoſed to have 'conſiſted (20).' After ſome farther arguments in ſupport of his opinion, which appear to be concluſive, Mr. Bryant adds, that the Land of Goſhen was a particular diſtrict 'at the very point of Delta, above 'Heliopolis, and called the Arabian Nome by the 'Greeks; but originally termed Cuſha and Cuſhan, 'and by the Miſraim Guſhan. Its ſituation may be 'exactly defined, as it lay at the extreme point of 'Delta, nearly between Babylon and the Pyramids, 'which latter were a ſmall matter above; which 'Cuſha was in proceſs of time called by different 'nations Caſa, Kaiſa, Geeſha: and it is demonſtra-'ble from its ſituation, that the modern Geeza is the 'very place; for it lies exactly in the ſame direction 'between the Hill of Arabia, where ſtood Babylon 'and the Pyramids before-mentioned (21).' Mr. Coſtard had partly ſupported his opinion by etymological arguments; but Mr. Bryant ſays, 'I know 'nothing more fallacious than etymological proofs: 'and I have made it a rule, never to admit them 'ſingly and unſupported; on the contrary, to make 'etymology dependent upon hiſtory, and not to ren-'der hiſtory blindly ſubſervient to etymology (22).' But though Mr. Bryant differed from Mr. Coſtard upon this ſubject, he profeſſed a due eſteem of his parts and learning, and acknowledged, that in what he had written relative to it, he had diſplayed much curious erudition (23).]

(18) Nichols's Miſcellaneous Tracts by Mr. Bowyer, p. 681.

(19) Ibid. p. 686.

(20) Ibid. p. 689, 690.

(21) Ibid. p. 691.

(22) Ibid. p. 693.

(23) Id. ibid.

our author printed any work for ſome years; but in 1778, he publiſhed, in 8vo, "A Letter to Nathaniel Braſſey Halhead, Eſq; containing ſome Remarks on his Preface "to the Code of Gentoo Laws." This appears to have been the laſt of his publications: it contains ſome criticiſms, which were intended to invalidate the opinion, which Mr. Halhead had conceived, concerning the great antiquity of the Gentoo laws, and ſome arguments againſt a notion which had been adopted by ſeveral writers, drawn from the obſervation of natural phænomena, that the world is far more antient, than it is repreſented to be by the Hebrew chronology. Mr. Coſtard died on the 10th of January, 1782 (p). He was a man of uncommon learning, and eminently ſkilled in Grecian and Oriental literature. But he dealt too much in conjectures; and appears to have been poſſeſſed of more erudition than judgment. His private character was amiable; and he was much reſpected in the neighbourhood in which he lived, for his humanity and benevolence. From ſome paſſages in his writings, he appears to have been ſtrongly attached to the intereſts of public freedom. He had a great veneration for the antient Greeks; of whom he ſays, that 'Tis to the happy genius of that once glorious people, and that people alone, 'that we owe all that can properly be ſtyled aſtronomy (q).' And in another place, he ſays of the Greeks, that 'their public ſpirit and love of liberty claim both our admiration 'and imitation. How far the ſciences ſuffer, where oppreſſion, ſuperſtition, and arbitrary 'power prevail, that once glorious nation affords at this day too melancholy a proof (r).' Mr. Coſtard's library, oriental manuſcripts, and philoſophical inſtruments, were ſold by auction by Mr. Samuel Paterſon, in March, 1782 (s).] T.

(p) Nichols, ut ſupra, p. 629.

(q) Letter to Martin Folkes, Eſq. p. 22.

(r) Ibid. p. 137.

(s) Nichols, ut ſupra.

COTES (Roger), a celebrated Mathematician and Plumian Profeſſor of Aſtronomy and Experimental Philoſophy in the Univerſity of Cambridge in the eighteenth Century. He was the ſon of the Reverend Mr. Robert Cotes, Rector of Burbage in Leiceſterſhire, which was alſo the place of his nativity (a) [A]. He was born there July the 10th, 1682, and received his firſt education at Leiceſter ſchool, where, when he was between eleven and twelve years of age, he ſhewed a ſtrong inclination to the mathematics, which being obſerved by his uncle the Reverend Mr. John Smith, father to the worthy Dr. Robert Smith, his ſucceſſor as Plumian Profeſſor in the Univerſity of Cambridge, he gave him all imaginable encouragement, and prevailed upon his father, to ſend him for ſome time to his houſe in Lincolnſhire, that he might aſſiſt him in thoſe ſtudies, where he laid the ſolid foundation (b) of that deep and extenſive knowledge in thoſe ſciences, for which he was afterwards ſo deſervedly famous. He removed thence to London, and was ſent to St. Paul's ſchool, where under the care of Dr. Thomas Gale, and Mr. John Poſtlethwait, ſucceſſive Maſters, he made a great progreſs in claſſical learning, and yet found ſo much leiſure as to keep up a conſtant correſpondence with his uncle, not only in Mathematics, but alſo in Metaphyſics, Philoſophy, and Divinity (c). His next remove was to Cambridge, where, April 6th, 1699, at the age of ſeventeen, he was admitted Penſioner of Trinity-College in that Univerſity, and at Michaelmas 1705 was choſen Fellow of his College (d). He was at the ſame time Tutor to Anthony Earl of Harold, and the Lord Henry de Grey ſons to the then Marquis, afterwards Duke of Kent, to which moſt noble family Mr. Cotes had the honour to be related (e). In January following he was appointed Profeſſor of Aſtronomy, and Experimental Philoſophy, upon the foundation made by Thomas Plume, Doctor in Divinity, Archdeacon of Rocheſter, being the firſt that enjoyed that office, to which he was choſen for his great learning and eminent abilities (f). He took the degree of Maſter of Arts in 1706, and in 1713 he entered into Holy Orders. The ſame year, at the deſire of Dr. Richard Bentley, he publiſhed at Cambridge the ſecond edition of Sir Iſaac Newton's Mathematical Principles of Natural Philoſophy, with all the improvements which the author had made to that time, to which he prefixed a moſt excellent preface (g). This added greatly to the high reputation he had already acquired for his profound knowledge in the abſtruſeſt parts of the mathematics, amongſt the greateſt men of the age. He wrote alſo a deſcription of the great Meteor, that was ſeen on the 6th of March 1715-6, which was publiſhed in the Philoſophical Tranſactions (h) [B]. Theſe

(a) From the information of Dr. Robert Smith, Maſter of Trinity College in Cambridge.

(b) From the information before-mentioned.

(c) A fact often mentioned by the late Profeſſor Saunderſon.

(d) From the information of Dr. Smith.

(e) Collins's Peerage, vol. ii. p. 38.

(f) Knight's Life of Dr. Colet, Dean of St. Paul's, p. 432.

(g) This was the ſecond edition of that moſt valuable Work, and the Preface is conſidered as a maſterpiece in its kind.

(h) No. 369.

[A] Which was alſo the place of his nativity.] The little town of Burbage, or rather Burbach, lying in Sparkenhoe-hundred, in Leiceſterſhire, and at the diſtance of about ſix miles from Leiceſter; is remarkable for its once having had an Earl for its Rector (1). This noble and reverend perſon was Anthony de Grey, the eighth Earl of Kent, who was Miniſter there at the time that ancient title deſcended to him, in 1639, and to his honour be it remembered, that he did not think himſelf obliged to alter his manner of living in the leaſt. He kept a very hoſpitable houſe before, and was always glad of the company of his brethren, in which courſe he continued, excuſing his attendance in parliament, on account of his age and infirmities, which, however, he would not ſuffer to excuſe him from the duties of his function, preaching conſtantly as long as it was poſſible for him to be carried up into the pulpit (2). He was great grandfather to the late Henry, Earl, Marquis, and at length Duke of Kent, to whom, as deſcended from a daughter of Major Farmer, in the ſame county, our author, Mr. Cotes was, nearly related.

(1) Knight's Life of Dean Colet, p. 429, 430.

(2) Fuller's Worthies, in Durham, p. 299.

[B] Which was publiſhed in the Philoſophical Tranſactions.] This curious account is contained in a letter to Robert Dannye, D. D. Rector of Spofferth, in Yorkſhire; which though it went out of his hands in his life-time, and might be very probably tranſmitted to the Royal Society before his death, yet it was in ſome reſpect a poſthumous work, ſince it did not appear 'till after our author's deceaſe. There are two things in

These were the only fruits of his learned and laborious ſtudies, that appeared in his lifetime; but he left behind him ſeveral admirable and judicious Tracts, part of which, after his deceaſe, his learned kinſman and worthy ſucceſſor in his profeſſorſhip, Dr. Robert Smith, gave to the public, which were received with univerſal approbation [C]. He died, in it very remarkable, the firſt is the clearneſs and conciſeneſs with which the facts are deſcribed, the other the plainneſs and perſpicuity of the manner in which he accounts for them; the reader will not be diſpleaſed to have a taſte of both (3). 'It was, ſays he, after ſeven 'before I had notice of this uncommon ſight. At firſt 'I ſaw only two or three of the triangular ſtreams to-'wards the north and north-weſt: Theſe were not of 'long duration, but were ſucceeded by others, which 'appeared, and vaniſhed again by turns, ariſing from, 'and aſcending up to places in the Heavens of very dif-'ferent altitudes above the Horizon. From the time 'I began to view them, they continued to aſcend more 'and more copiouſly, being propagated ſtill farther and 'farther from the north towards the weſt and eaſt, 'and directed always to the heads of Gemini, 'till at 'length when they ſeemed almoſt to meet at the point 'of convergence, they began to aſcend up towards it 'from the ſouthern parts alſo, and all round it; inſo-'much that at a quarter after ſeven we had a perfect 'canopy of rays over us: the bottom of this canopy 'did no where reach down to the horizon; for near the 'north, where it deſcended the moſt, its altitude was 'about ten or fifteen degrees, and near the ſouth 'where it deſcended the leaſt, its altitude was about 'forty degrees, It remained in this ſtate about two 'minutes, during which time we ſaw ſeveral colours, 'ſome fainter and more permanent, others brighter, 'but quickly vaniſhing. Thus in the weſt I obſerved 'the rays to be tinged for ſome conſiderable time, 'with an obſcure and heavy red; and in one of the 'brighteſt ſtreams, at another time there ſuddenly 'broke out a very vivid red, which was inſtantly 'and gradually ſucceeded by the other priſmatic co-'lours; all vaniſhing in about a ſecond of time. 'Theſe colours affected the ſenſe ſo ſtrongly, that I 'thought them to be more intenſe than thoſe of the 'brighteſt rainbow I had ever ſeen. A ſmall time be-'fore the appearance loſt its perfection, we were ſur-'prized to obſerve a ſhaking and trembling of the 'ſtreams, chiefly in their upper parts; during which 'their convergence was confounded, and the whole 'Heaven ſeemed to be in a convulſion. At the ſame 'time I could perceive waves of light towards the 'north, which moved upwards, and in their motion 'croſſed the ſtreams lying parallel to the horizon. 'Theſe waves were different from thoſe broad ones, 'which you mention, and which I alſo took notice of: 'Their breadth ſeemed to be about a degree, their 'length about ninety degrees, and I can compare them 'to nothing better, than to thoſe ſlender waves upon 'the ſurface of ſtagnant waters, which are made by 'caſting in a ſmall ſtone.——An irregular guſt of 'wind blowing upon and ſhaking the columns, was I 'ſuppoſe the cauſe of that trembling which appeared 'in the triangular ſtreams; and the cauſe alſo which 'deſtroyed that fine appearance of the canopy. The 'ſlender circular waves ſeen at the ſame time, might 'alſo be explained from the ſame cauſe. I need not 'detain you any longer by endeavouring to make out 'ſome other particulars of this unuſual appearance: 'I fear I have been already too tedious. However, 'I will not omit to mention a very eaſy contrivance by 'which the thing may be tolerably well repreſented to 'view. Take a hoop and round about it faſten ſe-'veral ſtreight ſticks parallel to each other, but all in-'clined to the plane of the hoop; hold this plane pa-'rallel to the horizon, and in that poſture move it 'with ſticks over a candle, the ſhadows of the ſticks 'upon the ceiling of your room, will converge to a 'point not directly over the candle (as they would have 'done had the ſticks been perpendicular to the plane 'of the hoop) but to the point in which a line drawn 'from the candle parallel to the ſticks, ſhall interſect 'the plane of the ceiling.'

(3) Philoſophical Tranſactions, vol. xxxii. No. 385. p. 66.

[C] Were received with univerſal approbation.] The title of this work at large runs thus. HARMONIA MENSURARUM, ſive Analyſis & Syntheſis per rationum angulorum menſuras promotæ: accedunt alia Opuſcula Mathematica: per Rogerum Coteſium. Edidit et auxit Robertus Smith, Collegii S. Trinitatis apud Cantabrigienſes ſocius, Aſtronomiæ & Experimentalis Philoſophiæ poſt Coteſium profeſſor. Cantabrigiæ 1722, 4*to*. That is The Harmony of Meaſures: or Analyſis and Syntheſis advanced by the meaſures of Ratio's and Angles. To which are added other Mathematical pieces by Roger Cotes. Publiſhed and augmented by Robert Smith, Fellow of Trinity College in Cambridge, and ſucceſſor to the ſaid R. Cotes, as Profeſſor of Aſtronomy and Experimental Philoſophy. This work is dedicated by the learned editor to Dr. Richard Mead. He next proceeds to give us, in a very elegant and affectionate Preface, a copious account of the performance itſelf; the pieces annexed to it, and of ſuch other of the author's works as are yet unpubliſhed. He tells us how much this work was admired by the judicious Profeſſor Saunderſon, and how dear the author of it was to the late learned Dr. Bentley, to whom he gives the higheſt, that is the juſteſt, commendations. This book conſiſts of three parts. In the firſt, called Logometria, the author's chief deſign is to ſhew how that ſort of problems, which are uſually reduced to the quadrature of the Hyperbola and Ellipſis, may be reduced to the meaſures of Ratio's and Angles, and afterwards be ſolved more readily by the canon of Logarithms, Sines, and Tangents. He defines the meaſures of Ratio's to be quantities of any kind, whoſe magnitudes are analogous to the magnitudes of the Ratio's to be meaſured. In this ſenſe any canon of Logarithms is a ſyſtem of numeral meaſures of the Ratio's of the abſolute numbers to an Unit: The parts of the aſymptote of the Logiſtic line intercepted between its ordinates, are a ſyſtem of linear meaſures of the Ratio's of thoſe ordinates: The areas of an hyperbola, intercepted between its ordinates to the aſymptote, are a ſyſtem of plane meaſures of the Ratio's of thoſe ordinates: And ſince there may be infinite ſyſtems of meaſures, according as various kinds of quantities are made uſe of; ſuch as number, time, velocity, and the like; or according as the meaſures of any one ſyſtem may be all increaſed or diminiſhed in any given proportion; in ſuch variety, much confuſion may poſſibly ariſe, as to the kind and abſolute magnitudes of particular meaſures, which happen to fall under conſideration. Our author very happily removes this difficulty, by ſhewing, that the nature of the ſubject points out the meaſure of a certain immutable Ratio, for a modulus in all ſyſtems whereby to determine the kind and abſolute magnitudes of all other meaſures in each ſyſtem. The firſt propoſition is to find the meaſures of any propoſed Ratio. This he conſiders in a way ſo ſimple and general, as naturally leads to the notion and definition of a modulus; namely, that it is an invariable quantity in each ſyſtem, which bears the ſame proportion to the increment of the meaſure of any propoſed Ratio, as the increaſing term of the Ratio bears to its own increment. He then ſhews that the meaſure of any given Ratio is as the modulus of the ſyſtem from whence it is taken, and that the modulus in every ſyſtem is always equal to the meaſure of a certain determinate and immutable Ratio, which he therefore calls the Ratio modularis. He ſhews that this Ratio is expreſſed by theſe numbers 2,7182818, &c. to 1, or by one, to 0,3678794, &c. ſo that in Briggs's canon, the Logarithm of this Ratio is the modulus of that ſyſtem: In the Logiſtic line, the given ſubtangent is the modulus of that ſyſtem. In the hyperbola, the given parallellogram contained by an ordinate to the aſymptote, and the abſciſs from the center, is the modulus of that ſyſtem, and in other ſyſtems the modulus is generally ſome remarkable quantity. In the ſecond propoſition, he gives a conciſe uncommon method, for calculating Briggs's canon of Logarithms, together, with rules for finding intermediate Logarithms, and numbers, even beyond the limits of the canon. In the third propoſition, he conſtructs any ſyſtem of meaſures by a ca-died, to the regret of the Univerſity in general, and more eſpecially of ſuch as were addicted to mathematical ſtudies, in the prime of his life, in the thirty-third year of his age, June the non of Logarithms, not only when the meaſure of ſome one Ratio is given, but alſo without that datum, by ſeeking the modulus of the ſyſtem by the rule abovementioned. In the 4th 5th and 6th propoſitions, he ſquares the hyperbola, deſcribes the logiſtic line, and equiangular ſpiral, by a canon of Logarithms; and ſhews ſome curious uſes of theſe propoſitions in their ſcholia. Take an eaſy example of the logometrical method in the common problem for finding the denſity of the atmoſphere. Suppoſing gravity uniform, every one knows that if altitudes are taken in any arithmetical progreſſion, the denſities of the air in thoſe altitudes will be in a geometrical progreſſion, that is, the altitudes are the meaſures of the Ratio's of the denſities below, and in thoſe altitudes; and ſo the difference of any two altitudes is the meaſure of the Ratio of the denſities in theſe altitudes. Now to determine the abſolute or real magnitude of theſe meaſures, the author ſhews à priori, that the modulus of the ſyſtem is the altitude of the atmoſphere, when reduced every where to the ſame denſity as below. The modulus therefore is given (as bearing the ſame proportion to the altitude of the mercury in the barometer, as the ſpecific gravity of mercury does to the ſpecific gravity of air) and conſequently the whole ſyſtem is given. For ſince in all ſyſtems the meaſures of the ſame Ratio's are analogous among themſelves, the Logarithm of the Ratio of the air's denſity in any two altitudes, will be to the modulus of the canon (that is to the Logarithm of the Ratio modularis defined above) as the difference of thoſe altitudes is to the aforeſaid given altitude of the homogeneous atmoſphere. He concludes the Logometria with a general ſcholium, containing great variety of elegant conſtructions, both logometrical and trigonometrical, ſuch as give the length of curves, either geometrical or mechanical, their area's and centers of gravity, the ſolids generated from them, and the ſurfaces of theſe ſolids, together with ſeveral curious problems in Natural Philoſophy, concerning the attraction of bodies, the denſity and reſiſtance of fluids, and the trajectories of planets. Several of theſe problems have two caſes, one conſtructed by the meaſure of a Ratio, and the other by the meaſure of an angle. The great affinity and beautiful harmony of the meaſures in theſe caſes have given occaſion to the title of the book. The meaſures of angles are defined to be quantities of any kind, whoſe magnitudes are analogous to the magnitudes of the angles. Such may be the arcs or ſectors of any circle, or any other quantities of time, velocity, or reſiſtance, analogous to the magnitudes of the angles. Every ſyſtem of theſe meaſures has likewiſe its modulus, homogeneous to the meaſures in that ſyſtem, and may be computed by the trigonometrical canon of ſines and tangents, juſt as the meaſures of Ratio's by the canon of Logarithms; for the given modulus in each ſyſtem, bears the ſame proportion to the meaſure of any given angle, as the Radius of a circle bears to an arc, which ſubtends that angle, or the ſame as this conſtant number of degrees 57,29577 95130 bears to the number of degrees in the ſaid angle. Upon the whole our author expreſſes himſelf thus. 'From theſe examples it will lie 'wholly in the power of able Geometricians to form 'a judgment of our method, which if they ſhall approve, they may carry it ſtill farther, and thereby 'conſiderably extend its uſes. A vaſt field lies open, 'in which they may exert their abilities; but eſpecially if they add to Logometrics, the aſſiſtances that 'may be derived from trigonometry; for that there is 'a wonderful affinity and connection between theſe, 'I ſhall plainly make appear. I can hardly believe 'that any principles can be deviſed more general 'than theſe; as mathematics contain ſcarcely any thing 'elſe within its compaſs, than the theory of angles 'and ratio's. Neither will any one deſire a more 'commodious method, who conſiders the facility in 'theſe matters, derived to us from thoſe extenſive 'tables, as well of the logarithms of whole numbers, as 'of ſigns and tangents, which were the valuable 'effects of our predeceſſors laudable induſtry. To 'this end I have added ſome theorems both logome-'trical and trigonometrical, &c.' The reaſon which induced the author to aſſert his principles to be ſo general, will appear farther by an inſtance or two. In the problem already mentioned, he meaſures the ratio of the air's denſities in any altitudes, by the altitudes themſelves, making uſe of the altitude of an uniform atmoſphere for the modulus. So likewiſe when he conſiders the velocities acquired, and the ſpaces deſcribed, in given times, by a body projected upwards or downwards, in a reſiſting medium with any given velocity; he ſhews that the times of deſcent added to a given time, are the meaſures of ratio's to a given modulus of time; whoſe terms are the ſum and difference of the ultimate velocity and the preſent velocities that are acquired, that the times of aſcent taken from a given time are the meaſures of angles to a given modulus of time, whoſe radius is to their tangents in the ratio of the ultimate velocity to the preſent velocities; and laſtly, that the ſpaces deſcribed in deſcent or aſcent, are the meaſures of ratio's to a given modulus of ſpace, whoſe terms are the abſolute accelerating and retarding forces ariſing from gravity and reſiſtance taken together at the beginning and end of thoſe ſpaces. This general account may ſuffice to illuſtrate what I am going to ſay, that ſince the magnitudes of ratio's, as well as their terms, may be expounded by quantities of any kind, the mathematician is at liberty, upon all occaſions, to chuſe thoſe which are fitteſt for his purpoſe, and ſuch are they without doubt that are put into his hand by the conditions of the problem. He may indeed repreſent theſe quantities by an hyperbola, or any other logometrical ſyſtem, were not his purpoſe anſwered with greater ſimplicity by the very ſyſtem itſelf which occurs in each particular problem. And the ſame may be ſaid for the ſyſtems of angular meaſures, inſtead of recurring upon all occaſions to elliptical or circular areas. As to the convenience of calculating from our author's conſtructions; he ſhews that the meaſures of any ratio's or angles are always computed in the ſame uniform way, by taking from the tables the logarithm of the ratio, or the number of degrees in the angle, and then by finding a fourth proportional to three given quantities, for that will be the meaſure required. The ſimpleſt hyperbolic area may indeed be ſquared by the ſame operation taught in the author's fourth propoſition, but the ſimpleſt elliptic area requires ſomewhat more: Thoſe that are more complex in both kinds, which generally happens, require an additional trouble to reduce them to the ſimpleſt: to ſquare them by infinite ſeries is ſtill more operoſe, and does not anſwer the end of Geometry. Upon the whole therefore it may deſerve to be conſidered; for what purpoſe ſhould problems be always conſtructed by conic areas, unleſs it be to pleaſe or aſſiſt the imagination. The deſign of theoretical Geometry differs from problematical: the former conſiſts in the diſcovery and contemplation of the properties and relations of figures, for the ſake of naked truth, but the deſign of the latter is to do ſomething propoſed, and is beſt executed by the leaſt apparatus of the former. The Logometria was firſt publiſhed by the author himſelf, in the Philoſophical Tranſactions. But his logometrical and trigonometrical theorems abovementioned were not publiſhed till after his deceaſe. Theſe theorems make the ſecond part of the book, and are calculated to give the fluents of fluxions reduced to 18 forms by meaſures of ratio's and angles, in ſuch a manner that any perſon may perfectly comprehend their conſtruction and uſe, though altogether unacquainted with curvilinear figures as expreſſed by equations. And this circumſtance alſo renders the ſpeedy application of them to the analyſis and conſtruction of problems extremely eaſy. Of this kind the author has given a great many choice examples both in abſtract and phyſical problems, which make up the third and laſt part of the book. The editor has publiſhed the author's own ſolution of a very difficult problem in fluxions by meaſures of ratio's and angles, and upon this foundation has conſtructed new tables of logometrical and trigo-the 5th, 1716, and was buried in the Chapel of Trinity-College Cambridge, his memory being honoured with an inſcription by the elegant pen of the moſt learned Dr. Bentley, Maſter of that College, his conſtant friend and patron (i).

(i) See this inſcription at the end of Dr. Smith's Preface to the Harmonia Menſurarum.

trigonometrical theorems for the fluents of fluxions, reduced to ninety-four forms, part rational and part irrational. He has likewiſe added ſeveral notes upon the chief difficulties in the book, together with a method of compoſing ſynthetical demonſtrations of logometrical and trigonometrical conſtructions, illuſtrated by various examples.

The firſt treatiſe in the miſcellaneous works is concerning the eſtimation of errors in mixt Mathematics. It conſiſts of twenty-eight theorems, to determine the proportion among the leaſt contemporary variations of the ſides and angles of plane and ſpherical triangles, while any two of them remain invariable. An example will ſhew their great uſe in aſtronomy. The time of the day or night is frequently to be determined by the altitude of ſome ſtar. Let it then be propoſed to find the error that may ariſe in the time from any given error, in taking the altitude. By applying the 22d theorem to the triangle formed by the complement of the ſtar's altitude and declination, and by the complement of the pole's elevation, the author ſhews that the variation of the angle at the pole, and conſequently the error in time, will be as the error in the altitude directly, as the ſine complement of the pole's inverſely, and as the ſine of the ſtars azimuth from the meridian inverſely. Conſequently if the error in the altitude be given, under a given elevation of the pole; the error in time will be reciprocally as the ſine of the azimuth contained by the meridian, and the vertical which the ſtar is in. This error therefore will be the ſame, whatever be the altitude of the ſtar, in the ſame vertical, and will be leaſt when the vertical is at right angles to the meridian. But will be abſolutely the leaſt in the ſame circumſtance if the obſerver be under the equator. In which caſe, if the error in the altitude be one minute, the error in the time will be four ſeconds. If the obſerver recedes from the equator towards either pole, the error will be increaſed in the proportion of the radius to the ſine complement of the latitude: So that in the latitude of 45 degrees it will be $5\frac{2}{3}$ ſeconds, and in the latitudes of 50 and 55 it will be $6\frac{2}{9}$ and $6\frac{37}{88}$ ſeconds reſpectively. If the ſtar be in any other vertical oblique to the meridian, the error will ſtill be increaſed in the proportion of the radius to the ſine of that oblique angle. Laſtly, if the error in the altitude be either bigger or leſs than one minute, the error in time will be bigger or leſs in the ſame proportion. Much after the ſame manner may the limits of errors be computed in other caſes which ariſe from the inaccuracy of obſervations, and hence the moſt convenient opportunities for obſerving are alſo determined. The ſecond treatiſe is concerning the differential method. The author having written it before he had ſeen Sir Iſaac Newton's treatiſe upon that ſubject, has handled it after a manner ſomewhat different. The name of the third treatiſe is CANONOTECHNIA: or concerning the conſtruction of Tables by differences. It conſiſts of ten propoſitions, moſtly admirably contrived for expeditious computation of intermediate terms in any given ſeries. The laſt propoſition, which contains a general ſolution of the whole deſign, is this. 'Some of the equidiſtant 'terms being given of any ſeries, the intervals of 'which are divided into any number of equal parts, 'let it be propoſed to find the intermediate terms.' The book concludes with three ſmalls tracts concerning the Deſcent of Bodies, the motion of Pendulums in the Cycloid, and the motion of Projectiles, delivered in a very natural and eaſy manner. Theſe tracts, as the editor informs us, were all compoſed by Mr. Cotes, when he was very young. He wrote alſo a Compendium of Arithmetic, of the Reſolutions of Equations, of Dioptricks, and of the nature of curves; all which pieces the learned editor declared his intention of publiſhing. Beſides theſe which were in Latin, he compoſed a courſe of Lectures in Engliſh, which were publiſhed by Dr. Smith in 1737; ſince which time there has been a ſecond edition; the title of which we ſhall give at large for the reader's ſatisfaction.

HYDROSTATICAL and PNEUMATICAL LECTURES, by Roger Cotes, M. A. late Profeſſor of Aſtronomy and Experimental Philoſophy at Cambridge, the ſecond Edition by Robert Smith, D. D. Maſter of Trinity College Cambridge 1747, 8*vo*. The firſt edition was printed as is before obſerved in 1737, and both are inſcribed to his Royal Highneſs William Duke of Cumberland. C.

 [When Dr. Plume founded a new Profeſſorſhip for Aſtronomy and Experimental Philoſophy, in the Univerſity of Cambridge, Mr. Whiſton was one of the Electors. Beſides Mr. Cotes, there was another candidate, who had been a Scholar of Dr. Harris's. As Mr. Whiſton was the only Profeſſor of Mathematics who was directly concerned in the choice, the reſt of the electors naturally paid a great regard to his judgment. At the time of election, Mr. Whiſton ſaid, that he pretended himſelf to be not much inferior to the other Candidate's Maſter, Dr. Harris; but he confeſſed that he was but a child to Mr. Cotes (4). The votes were unanimous for Mr. Cotes; and it ſhould be remembered, that he was then only in the twenty-fourth year of his age.

(4) Whiſton's Memoirs of his own Life and Writings, p. 116.

In 1707, Mr. Whiſton and Mr. Cotes united together in giving a courſe of Philoſophical Experiments at Cambridge. Among other parts of the undertaking, certain hydroſtatic and pneumatic Lectures were compoſed. They were in number twenty-four, of which twelve were written by Mr. Cotes, and twelve by Mr. Whiſton. But Mr. Whiſton eſteemed his own Lectures to be ſo far inferior to thoſe of Mr. Cotes, that he could never prevail upon himſelf to reviſe and improve them for publication (5).

(5) Ibid. p. 118, 119.

The early death of Mr. Cotes is always ſpoken of with regret by every mathematician, and every philoſopher; ſince, if his life had been continued, he would undoubtedly have proved one of the greateſt men which this country has produced.

We cannot refuſe ourſelves the pleaſure of inſerting Dr. Bentley's elegant inſcription to the memory of Mr. Cotes.

H. S. E.
ROGERUS ROBERTI Filius COTES
Collegii hujus S. Trinitatis Socius
Aſtronomiæ et experimentalis Philoſophiæ
Profeſſor Plumianus:
Qui
Immatura Morte præreptus,
Pauca quidem Ingenii ſui Pignora reliquit,
Sed egregia, ſed admiranda,
Ex inacceſſis Matheſeos Penetralibus,
Felici Solertia tum primum eruta.
Poſt magnum illum Newtonum
Societatis hujus Spes altera
Et Decus gemellum.
Cui ad ſummam Doctrinæ Laudem
Omnes Morum Virtutumque Dotes
In Cumulum acceſſerunt;
Eo magis ſpectabiles amabileſque,
Quod in formoſo Corpore gratiores venirent.
Natus Burbagii in Agro Leiceſtrienſi
Jul. 10, 1682, obiit Jun. 5, 1716 (6).] K.

(6) New general Biographical Dictionary, vol. iv. p. 148.

COTTON (Sir ROBERT), a moſt eminent Antiquary, was born at Denton [A], near Connington in Huntingdonſhire, January 22, 1570 (a). His father was Thomas Cotton, Eſq; [B], the fourth of the name, and his mother Elizabeth daughter of Francis Sherley

(a) Vita D. Rob. Cottoni Scriptore T. Smitho, p. 1, col. 1.

[A] Was born at Denton.] The ancient ſeat of the Family was Connington; but Sir Robert's Grandfather being alive at the time of his Father's marriage, the young married couple went and lived at Denton (1).

(1) Vita Cottoni, ubi ſupra, p. 1. col. 1.

[B] His Father was Thomas Cotton, Eſq; &c.] The Cotton family has for many years flouriſhed in England,

Sherley of Stanton in the County of Leiceſter, Eſq. Where this worthy perſon laid the foundation of that great knowledge of Antiquities he afterwards acquired, or what School he was educated in, is unknown. However, when he was fit for the Univerſity, he was admitted into Trinity-College in Cambridge (b), where he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1575 (*). From thence he went and lived ſome time in the country with his Father. But finding that he wanted in that retired condition ſeveral opportunities of improvement, which he could have in a more public place, he came to London; and having ſoon made himſelf known, was admitted into a Society of Antiquaries (c), which was compoſed of ſeveral very learned and eminent perſons [C]. Here, following the natural bent of his genius, he proſecuted the ſtudy of Antiquities with the utmoſt alacrity, and with uncommon ſucceſs: and, improving the favourable circumſtances that were preſented to him [D], he began in the eighteenth year of his age (d) to gather together ancient Records, Charters, and other Manuſcripts; and left at his death the choiceſt Collection of this kind that ever was ſeen in any Age or Nation. In 1599, or 1600 (e), he accompanied Mr. Camden to Carliſle, who acknowledges to have received from his ſingular courteſy great light in thoſe obſcure and intricate matters which he treats of in his Britannia: and, probably, then it was that Mr. Cotton brought from the Picts-Wall, ſeveral Roman Monuments ſtill to be ſeen at Connington (f). In the ſame year 1600 he wrote a Brief Abſtract of the Queſtion of Precedencie between England and Spaine (g), which was occaſioned by Queen Elizabeth's deſiring the thoughts of the Society of Antiquaries on that point, upon her ſending Sir Henry Nevill Embaſſador to Boulogne to treat of a peace with Archduke Albert (h). Having, in Queen Elizabeth's reign, rendered himſelf eminent for merit and learning, and being highly in favour with the Lord Henry Howard, afterwards Earl of Northampton; he was, at the acceſſion of King James I. to the throne of England, created a Knight (i). During this whole reign he was very much courted, admired, and eſteemed by the greateſt men in the nation, and conſulted, as an Oracle, by the Privy-Counſellors, and the reſt of the Miniſters, upon every difficult point relating to our Conſtitution: As, namely, about the Union of England and Scotland—the Dignity and precedency of the Knights of the Bath—the Laws of England before the Conqueſt—about embaſing the Coin—the taxes granted from time to time to our Kings, &c (k). In 1608, he was appointed one of the Commiſſioners to enquire into the State of the Navy, which had lain neglected ever ſince the death of Queen Elizabeth (l); and drew up a Memorial of their Proceedings, to be preſented to the King (m). In 1609 he wrote 'a Diſcourſe of 'the lawfulneſs of Combats to be performed in the preſence of the King, or the Con-'ſtable and Marſhal of England (n): and, 'An anſwer to ſuch Motives as were of-'fered by certain Military men to Prince Henry, to incite him to affect arms more than 'peace.' Compoſed at the command of that Prince (†).' For, ſeveral perſons that were about him, knowing his enterpriſing genius, were endeavouring to ſtir up in him an

(*) From the Univerſity Regiſter and ſome of the College-books.

(b) See Camden's Ann. ad ann. 1600; and Memorials, &c. publiſhed by E. Sawyer, vol. i. p. 186, &c.

(i) Vita R. Cot. ubi ſupra, p. 10. col. 2.

(k) Printed at Lond. 1651 and 1672.

(b) Ibid. p. 4. col. 2. The old College-books being loſt, the exact time of his admiſſion cannot be known.

(c) Ibid. p. 7, 8, 9. Life of W. Camden. Sir H. Spelman's Pref. to his Law-Terms.

(d) Vita R. Cottoni, ubi ſupra, p. 7. col. 1.

(e) Ibid. p. 9. Life of Camden.

(f) Camden's Britannia, col. 506, edit. 1720.

(g) It is in Cotton, Libr. Julius, C. IX. 21. See Caſley's Catal. p. 325.

(h) Ibid. p. 13.

(l) Ibid. p. 14. col. 1.

(m) It is in Cot. Libr. Julius, F. III.

(†) It is in Cotton. Libr. Cleopatra, F. VI. 1.

England, even long before the time of King Edward III. They took their ſurname from Cotton in the County Palatine of Cheſter; and from William de Cotton, who lived in that county, are derived all the eminent families of that name in England. From this William was deſcended, in the fourth degree, William who married Agnes daughter and heir of Walter de Redware in the county of Stafford. His ſon was John, who, 12 Henry IV. married Iſabella daughter and heir of William Falconer of Thurcaſton in the county of Leiceſter. They had Richard who married Elizabeth, ſiſter and coheir of Sir Hugh Venables, Knt. Their SECOND ſon was William, who, in the reign of Henry VI. married Mary daughter and heir of Robert Weſenham, Eſq. This William being ſlain at the battle of St. Alban's May 23, 1455, left his only ſon and heir Thomas great-great-grand-father of Sir Robert Cotton. Mary juſt now mentioned, was grand-daughter of Agnes daughter and coheir of John Brus (or Bruce) of Connington and Exton, Eſq; and by her was the Connington Eſtate brought into the Cotton family. This John Brus was lineally deſcended from Bernard ſecond ſon of Robert Brus Lord of Annandale in Scotland, and Iſabella daughter and coheir of David the ſecond Earl of Huntingdon. From this Robert and Iſabella was the Royal Family of Scotland deſcended; and by this means the Cotton-Family came to be related to the Kings of Scotland and England. On which account King James was wont to call Sir Robert Cotton Couſin; and Sir Robert uſed frequently to write his own name Robert Cotton Bruce (2).

(2) Ibid.

[C] A Society of Antiquaries, &c.] The firſt riſe of this Society was 1590, when ſeveral ingenious Lovers of Antiquities agreed to meet every Friday in Term-time, at Derby-Houſe, where the Herald's Office is now kept. Two Queſtions were propoſed at every meeting, which were to be handled at the next. But many of the chief Supporters of it either dying, or removing from London, it was diſcontinued for about twenty years. At laſt in 1614, it was revived by Sir James Ley Attorney of the Court of Wards, afterwerds Earl of Marlborough, Sir Robert Cotton, Sir John Davis his Majeſty's Attorney for Ireland, Sir Richard St. George Norroy, William Hackwell the Queen's Solicitor, Mr. Camden, Sir Henry Spelman: To whom may be added ſuch of the old Foundation as were ſtill living, viz. Arthur Agard, Lancelot Andrews, Henry Bourchier, Richard Broughton, Richard Carew, William Dethick, Sir John Dodderidge, ——— Doyley, William Fleetwood, Abrah. Hartwell, Michael Heneage, Joſeph Holland, Thomas Lake, Francis Leigh, ——— Oldworth, William Patten, John Stow, Thomas Talbot, Francis Thynne, James Whitlock, &c. They met at the ſame place as the former.—The firſt Society petitioned Queen Elizabeth, to be incorporated into a Society, or Academy, for the ſtudy of Antiquities and Engliſh Hiſtory: but for fear That ſhould be prejudicial to our two Univerſities, their Petition was rejected; as it was alſo in the next reign. At laſt the ſuſpicious Court of King James I. taking umbrage at their Meetings, they diſſolved themſelves of their own accord (3). What Subjects they handled, the curious Reader may ſee in Sir Robert Cotton's Life, by Dr. T. Smith, prefixed to his Catalogue of the Cottonian Library, p. ix. (See article AGARD (ARTHUR).

(3) Vita D. Rob. Cottoni, ubi ſupra, p. 7, 8, 9. Sir H. Spelman's Preface to Law-Terms.

[D] And, improving the favourable circumſtances that were preſented to him, &c.] For there were many ſuch MSS. diſperſed about, which had been taken out of the Libraries belonging to the Monaſteries, that were then but newly diſſolved, incli-

inclination to military affairs; which was not at all agreeable to the King his father's peaceable and timorous temper. But, what moſtly employed Sir Robert's thoughts were the Collections he was ordered to make relating to the Revenue of the Crown, and the 'Manner and Means how the Kings of England have from time to time ſup-'ported, and repaired their eſtates (o).' For King James having prodigally exhauſted his Treaſury, new Projects (as they were then called) were to be contrived to fill it up again. Accordingly, our ancient Hiſtories and Records were ſearched, to find out means and methods to repair the King's Revenue, and to diſcover the Courſes uſed by our Kings in raiſing Money (p). But of all the methods ſet down by Sir Robert and others, none proved ſo agreeable to the King, as the creating a new order of Knights, called Baronets [E]. Sir Robert Cotton, who had done great ſervice in that affair (q), was choſen to be one, being the twenty-ninth Baronet that was created. He was, ſoon after, employed by the ſame King, to write Animadverſions upon Buchanan's and Thuanus's Accounts of the Behaviour and Actions of Mary Queen of Scots, and to give a different turn to them from what had been done by thoſe two famous Hiſtorians (r). What he drew up on that ſubject is ſuppoſed to be interwoven in Camden's Annals of Queen Elizabeth, or elſe printed at the end of Camden's Epiſtles. In 1616 the ſame King, who was always a favourer of the Papiſts, and never cared to put the laws againſt them in execution, finding the Nation uneaſy on account of their ſwarming in the Kingdom, ordered Sir Robert to examine, Whether, by the laws of the land, they ought to be put to death, or impriſoned? which Sir Robert performed with great learning (s), and wrote upon that occaſion, 'Twenty-four Arguments, whether it be more expedient to ſuppreſs Popiſh prac-'tices againſt the due allegiance of his Majeſty, by the ſtrict executions touching Jeſuits 'and Seminary Prieſts? or, to reſtrain them to cloſe priſons, during life, if no refor-'mation follows (*).' Probably then, likewiſe, he compoſed 'Conſiderations for the 'repreſſing of the encreaſe of Preeſts, Jeſuits, and Recuſants, without drawinge of 'blood (t).' He was alſo employed by the Houſe of Commons, when the match between Prince Charles and the Infanta of Spain was in agitation, to ſhow, by a ſhort examination of the treaties between England and the Houſe of Auſtria, the Unfaithfulneſs and Inſincerity of the latter, and to prove, that in all their Tranſactions they aimed at nothing but univerſal Monarchy (u). In 1621, at the requeſt of the Lord Montague of Boughton, he compiled 'A Relation to prove, That the Kings of England have been pleaſed to con-'ſult with their Peeres in the Great Councell and Commons in Parliament, of Marriage, 'Peace and War [F].' He wrote likewiſe a Vindication of our Eccleſiaſtical Conſtitution, againſt the Innovations that were attempted to be brought in by the Puritans; in 'An 'Anſwer to certain Arguments raiſed from ſuppoſed Antiquity, and urged by ſome mem-'bers of the lower Houſe of Parliament, to prove that eccleſiaſtical lawes ought to be 'enacted by Temporal men (w).' Being a Member of the firſt Parliament of King Charles I. he joined in the Complaints of the Grievances which the Nation was then ſaid to groan under. But, however, he was always for mild remedies; and intended the King's Honour and Safety, and the Nation's Advantage [G], as appeared by the honeſt Advice he gave in 1627. For, being called before the King and Council, to deliver his Opinion, in point of Hiſtory and Law, upon the juncture of affairs then, he declared (x), 'That 'thoſe Engliſh Princes, who had moſt oppoſed [the growing Power of the Houſe of 'Auſtria,] had always the affections and hearts of their People: That this was the buſineſs 'of the preſent reign, and the deſire of the Engliſh Nation: That to carry on this de-'ſign the King muſt have Money; and no way to get money with ſpeed, aſſurance, and 'ſatisfaction but by grant of Parliament: No way to diſpoſe a Parliament to ſuitable Grants 'but by removing all Jealouſies, eſpecially thoſe relating to Religion and Liberties: And 'nothing more plauſible than for the Duke of Buckingham to be the firſt adviſer of calling 'ſuch a Parliament (y).' He was alſo conſulted about the Impriſonment of thoſe Gentlemen, who had refuſed to contribute to the Loan (z); and about a Project then ſet on foot, to enhance the value of the Coin, in order to raiſe money for the King, when he could not obtain any from his Parliaments. This Project Sir Robert oppoſed to the utmoſt of his power, and ſhowed in a Speech before the Privy-Council, Sept. 2, 1626, what a Diſhonour ſuch an Alteration would be to his Majeſty, and how great a Loſs and Prejudice to the Sub-

(o) Extant, ibid. and in Cottoni Poſth.

(p) Vita R. Cottoni, p. 14, 15, 16.

(q) Ibid.

(r) Ibid. p. 16, 17.

(s) Vita, ut ſupra, p. 17, 18.

(*) Printed at London, among Cottoni Poſthuma, 1672, p. 309.

(t) It is in the Royal Library 18, B. xxiv. 4. See D. Caſley's Catal.

(u) Vita, ut ſupra, p. 19. It is printed among Cottoni Poſthuma, p. 91, under the title of A Remonſtrance of the Treaties of Amity, &c.

(w) Ibid. p. 21. See Cottoni Poſthuma, p. 202, &c.

(x) This ſeems to be the ſubſtance of the treatiſe, intituled, 'The dan-'ger wherein 'this kingdom 'now ſtandeth, 'and the reme-'dy.' Cottoni poſthuma, p. 308, &c.

(y) Ruſhworth's Hiſtor. Collect. vol. i. p. 467.

(z) See Ruſh. ibid. p. 422, 428. Vita R. Cotton, p. 23.

[E] Of all the methods —— none proved ſo agreeable to the King, as the creating a new order of Knights, called Baronets.] By which he could eaſily raiſe a hundred thouſand pounds; as each Baronet was to pay, at three payments, as much as would maintain for the ſpace of three years, thirty foot Soldiers, to ſerve in the Province of Ulſter in Ireland, at 8d. a day, which amounted to 1095 l. This Title was not unknown in our Records, for 13 Edward III. it was granted to William de la Pole, and his heirs; and mention is made of it in an Agreement between King Richard II. and ſeveral Earls, Barons, and Baronets, &c (4).

(4) Cotton. Libr. Nero D. VI. 16, & Vita Cotton. p. 16. col. 1.

[F] A relation to prove, &c.] This was printed at London in 1651: and 1672 among Cottoni Poſthuma, and in 1679, under the Title of 'The 'Antiquity and Dignity of Parliaments,' fol. but it is extremely full of faults. There are good and exact Copies of it extant in manuſcript.

[G] Intended the King's honour and ſafety, and the Nation's advantage.] A certain writer obſerves, 'That he was no great friend to the Prerogative (5),' that is, he was not inclined to come into all the violent Meaſures of the Court. The Speech he delivered in the lower Houſe of Parliament aſſembled at Oxford, is printed in Cottoni poſthuma (*).

(5) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. i. col. 616. edit. 1721.

(*) Page 273.

ject.

ject (a). He wrote Books upon ſeveral other ſubjects, that remain in manuſcript; namely, (b) Of Scutage—Of Encloſures, and converting arable Land into paſture—The Antiquity, authority, and office of the High-Steward and Marſhall of England—The antiquity, etymology, and privileges of Caſtles—and of Towns—Of the meaſures of Land—The Antiquity of Coats of Arms—Curious Collections—about military affairs—and Trade—Collections out of the Rolls of Parliament, different from thoſe printed under his name [H]. He likewiſe made collections for the Hiſtory and Antiquities of Huntingdonſhire: and had formed this noble Deſign, To write an Account of the ſtate of Chriſtianity in theſe Iſlands, from the firſt reception of it here, to the Reformation. The firſt part of this deſign was executed by the learned Archbiſhop Uſher, in his book, De Britannicarum Eccleſiarum primordiis, compoſed probably at the requeſt of Sir Robert Cotton; who left eight Volumes of Collections for the continuation of that work (c). J. Speed's Hiſtory of England owes moſt of its value, and its ornaments, to Sir Robert Cotton. For he put in order ſome of the author's indigeſted materials, adding many curious obſervations of his own: As his fine Collection of Seals, Medals, &c. and furniſhed it with thoſe Coins and Seals wherewith it is adorned (d): and Mr. Camden acknowledges (e), to have received thoſe Coins that are in his Britannia, out of the Collection of the famous Sir Robert Cotton; who, it ſeems, intended to have written an account and explanation of them; but was unhappily hindered. To Richard Knolles, author of the Turkiſh Hiſtory, he communicated authentic Letters of the Maſters of the Knights of Rhodes; and the Diſpatches of Edward Barton, Embaſſador from Queen Elizabeth to the Porte: To Sir Walter Raleigh, Books and Materials for the ſecond Volume of his Hiſtory, never publiſhed: And the ſame to Lord Verulam, for his Hiſtory of Henry VII (f). The famous J. Selden was greatly indebted, for his learning and reputation, to the books and inſtructions of Sir Robert Cotton, as he thankfully acknowledges in more places than one (g). In ſhort, this great and worthy man was the generous Patron of all lovers of Antiquities, and his Houſe and Library were always open to ingenious and inquiſitive perſons. Incredible is the ſervice that hath been done to Learning, eſpecially to the Hiſtory of theſe three Kingdoms, by his ſecuring, as he did, his valuable Library for the uſe and ſervice of poſterity [I]. Witneſs the Works of Sir Henry Spelman, Sir William Dugdale, the Decem Scrip-

(a) Vita, &c. ubi ſupra. See the whole Speech in Cottoni Poſthuma, p. 285, &c.

(b) Vita, &c.

(c) Ibid. p. 24. They are in Cotton Libr. Cleopatra E.

(d) Vita, &c. p. 24.

(e) Britannia, under the title Romans in Britain, at the end.

(f) Vita R. Cotton, p. 24, 25.

(g) Dedicat. Analector. Britan. and of Hiſtory of Tithes.

[H] Collections out of the Rolls of Parliament, &c.] In 1657 William Prynne, Eſq; publiſhed, An exact Abridgment of the Records of the Tower of London, from the Reign of King Edward II. unto King Richard III. of all the Parliaments holden in each King's reign, and the ſeveral Acts in every Parliament, &c. collected by Sir Robert Cotton, Kt. and Bart. Lond. fol. 1657, (reprinted again 1679).——— which the ſaid Mr. Prynne did reviſe, rectify in ſundry miſtakes, and ſupply with a Preface, marginal Notes, ſeveral omiſſions, and exact Tables. Tho', after all, it was not done by Sir Robert Cotton, but by Mr. Bowyer, Keeper of the Tower Records in the latter end of Queen Elizabeth's reign and beginning of King James the firſt's, as Mr. Tyrrel aſſerts in the Preface to his 3d vol. of the Hiſt. of England (p. ix.)———The other works of Sir Robert Cotton, not already mentioned, are as follows, I. 'A relation of the Proceedings againſt Ambaſſadors 'who have miſcarried themſelves, and exceeded their 'Commiſſion.' II. 'That the Sovereign's perſon is 'required in the Great Councells, or Aſſemblies of the 'State, as well at the conſultations as at the con'cluſions.' III. 'The argument made by the com'mand of the Houſe of Commons (out of the Acts of 'Parliament, and authority of Law expounding the 'ſame) at a conference with the Lords, concerning 'the Liberty of the perſon of every Freeman.' IV. 'A brief Diſcourſe concerning the power of the Peeres 'and Commons of Parliament in point of Judicature.' Theſe four are printed in Cottoni poſthuma. V. 'A 'ſhort view of the long Life and Raigne of Henry the 'third, King of England: Written in 1614, and pre'ſented to King James I.' Printed 1627, 4*to*. and reprinted in Cottoni poſthuma. VI. 'Money raiſed by 'the King without Parliament from the Conqueſt untill 'this day, either by Impoſition or free Gift, taken 'out of Records, or ancient Regiſters' Printed in the Royal Treaſury of England, or General Hiſtory of Taxes, by Capt. J. Stevens, 8*vo*. There is alſo publiſhed under his name, 'A Narrative of Count 'Gondamor's Tranſactions during his Embaſſy in 'England, London 1659, 4*to*.' In the Epiſtle Dedicatory, the Publiſher, John Rowland, ſays —— 'It bears in the frontiſpiece the name of that ever'famous Antiquary, Sir Robert Cotton, who was 'never wont to treaſure up any thing but what was 'rare; nor can I certainly ſay, whether it were penn'd 'by Himſelf or not. I inſiſt the more upon him, be'cauſe it was my chance to be one whom he vouch'ſafed to take by the hand a little before his death, I 'being ſent to him by my Lord Privie-Seal, to 'acquaint him that by my Lord's mediation, the King 'was reconciled to him: but his Anſwer was, That 'his heart was broken, and that it was now too late: 'whereby it appears, that Princes are ſometimes 'abuſed, and miſinformed, to the ruin of the beſt 'men.'——We find, moreover, that he wrote the following things —— 'An Abſtract or memorial of 'ſuch courſes as have been uſed in military affairs both 'at land and ſea, under 35 heads (5).—Extracts about 'Commerce, imperfect (6).—Short Memoranda from '1548 to 1553 (7).—Extracts about the Rights of the 'Crown and the Parliament (8).—Hiſtorical paſſages 'taken out of Letters from the year 1551 to 1573 (9). '—And the Notes and Collections for the reign of 'King Henry VIII. in Speed's Chronicle (10).

(5) Cotton, Libr. Julius C. IV.
(6) Ibid. F. VI. 48.
(7) Ibid. Titus B. VI. 13. fol. 45.
(8) Ibid. F. 162.
(9) F. 177.
(10) A. Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. i. col. 530.

[I] He ſecured his Library for the uſe and ſervice of poſterity.] For he ordered in his will, That it ſhould not be ſold, but paſs to his Family, &c. As it was this valuable and curious Library that has rendered Sir Robert Cotton moſt famous, and is likely to perpetuate his name, it will be proper to give a larger Account of it. It conſiſts wholly of Manuſcripts; many of which being in looſe ſkins, ſmall Tracts, or very thin Volumes, when they were purchaſed, Sir Robert cauſed ſeveral of them to be bound up in one Cover. They relate chiefly to the Hiſtory and Antiquities of Great-Britain and Ireland, tho' the ingenious Collector refuſed nothing that was curious or valuable in any point of Learning. He lived indeed at a time when he had great opportunities of making ſuch a fine Collection: when there were many valuable Books yet remaining in private hands, which had been taken from the Monaſteries at their Diſſolution, and from our Univerſities and Colleges at their Viſitations: when ſeveral learned Antiquaries, ſuch as Joſceline, Noel, Allen, Lambarde, Bowyer, Elſinge, Camden, &c. died, who had made it their chief buſineſs to ſcrape up the ſcattered Remains of our Monaſtical Libraries; and, either by legacy or purchaſe, he became maſter of all that

Scriptores, Dr. Gale, Biſhop Burnet's Hiſtory of the Reformation, Strype's Works, Rymer's Fœdera, ſeveral pieces put out by T. Hearne; and every Book almoſt that hath been that he thought valuable in their ſtudies (11). This Library was placed by Sir Robert Cotton in his own Houſe at Weſtminſter, near the Houſe of Commons, and was very much augmented and enlarged by his ſon and grand-ſon, Sir Thomas and Sir John Cotton. In the reign of King William (12), an Act of Parliament was made for the better ſecuring and preſerving that Library in the name and Family of the Cottons, for the benefit of the public; that it might not be ſold, or otherwiſe diſpoſed, and embezzled. Sir John, great-grand-ſon of Sir Robert Cotton, having ſold Cotton-Houſe to the late Queen Anne, to be a repoſitory for the Royal as well as the Cottonian Library, an Act was made (13) for the better ſecuring of her Majeſty's purchaſe of that Houſe; and both Houſe and Library were ſettled and veſted in Truſtees: After which the Books were removed into a more convenient Room, the former being very damp; and Cotton-houſe was ſet apart for the uſe of the King's Library-keeper, who had there the Royal and Cottonian Libraries under his care. Some years after, the Cottonian Library was removed into a houſe near Weſtminſter-Abby, purchaſed by the Crown of the Lord Aſhburnham; where a Fire happening October 23, 1731, one hundred and eleven Books were loſt, burnt, or entirely defaced, and 99 rendered imperfect (14): And it was thereupon removed to the new Dormitory, and afterwards to the old Dormitory belonging to Weſtminſter-School. M.

(11) Chamberlayne's Preſent State of Great Britain, p. 217, 218. edit. 1735.

(12) 12 William III. c. 7.

(13) 5 Anne, c. 30.

(14) Addit. to Catalog. of Cotton Library, by D. Caſley, p. 313—317.

 [The moſt extraordinary and intereſting circumſtance in Sir Robert Cotton's Life had not come to the knowledge of our learned Predeceſſor. Indeed, it was not generally known till the year 1767, when the following papers, taken from original manuſcripts, were publiſhed in the Gentleman's Magazine.

" Letter from Dr. Samuel Harſnett, Archbiſhop of York, to Sir Henry Vane, Ambaſſador at the Hague, dated London, Nov. 6, 1629.

" On Saturday in the evening there were ſent Mr. " Vice-chamberlain and others to ſeal up Sir Robert " Cotton's Library, and to bring himſelf before the " Lords of his Majeſty's Council. There were found " in his cuſtody a peſtilent tractate, which he had " foſtered as his child, and had ſent it abroad into " divers hands; containing a project how a Prince " may make himſelf an abſolute tyrant. This " pernicious advice he had communicated by copies " to divers Lords, who, upon his confeſſion, are " queſtioned and reſtrained; my Lord of Somerſet " ſent it to the Biſhop of London; the Lord Clare " to the Biſhop of Wincheſter; and the Lord Bed- " ford I know not well to whom. Cotton himſelf " is in cuſtody. God ſend him well out!

" I am, &c."

" The Same, to the Same, dated Nov. 9.

" Yeſterday his Majeſty was pleaſed to ſit in " Council with all the Board, and commanded that " deviliſh project found upon Sir Robert Cotton to " be read over unto us. For my own part, I never " heard a more pernicious diabolical device, to breed " ſuſpicious, ſeditious humours amongſt the people. " His Majeſty was pleaſed to declare his royal plea- " ſure touching the Lords and others reſtrained for " communicating that project; which was, to pro- " ceed in a fair, moderate, mild, legal courſe with " them, by a bill of information preferred into the " Star-chamber, whereunto they might make their " anſwer by the help of the moſt learned Council " they could procure. And though his Majeſty " had it in his power moſt juſtly and truly to reſtrain " them till the cauſe was adjudged, yet, out of his " princely clemency, he commanded the board to " call them, and to ſignify unto them to attend their " cauſe in the Star-chamber. They were perſonally " called in before the Lords (the King being gone) " and acquainted by the keeper with his Majeſty's " gracious favour. Two never ſpoke a word, ex- " preſſing thankfulneſs for his Majeſty's ſo princely " goodneſs; two expreſſed much thankfulneſs, which " were my Lord of Bedford, and Sir Robert Cotton. " St. John and James are ſtill in priſon; and farther " than unto theſe the paper reacheth not in direct " travel, ſave to Selden, who is alſo contained in the " bill of information. I fear the nature of that con- " tagion did ſpread farther; but as yet no more ap- " peareth. I am of opinion it will fall heavy on the " parties delinquent.

" I am, Sir, &c."

" Sir Symonds D'Ewes's account of this affair, in his manuſcript Life, written by himſelf, and ſtill preſerved among the Harleian MSS. will give farther light to this very intereſting fact.

" Amongſt other books," ſays he, " which Mr. " Richard James lent out, one Mr. St. John, of " Lincoln's-Inn, a young ſtudious gentleman, bor- " rowed of him, for money, a dangerous pamphlet " that was in a written hand, by which a courſe was " laid down, how the Kings of England might op- " preſs the liberties of their ſubjects, and for ever " enſlave them and their poſterities. Mr. St. John " ſhewed the book to the Earl of Bedford, or a copy " of it; and ſo it paſſed from hand to hand, in the " year 1629, till at laſt it was lent to Sir Robert " Cotton himſelf, who ſet a young fellow he then " kept in his houſe to tranſcribe it; which plainly " proves, that Sir Robert knew not himſelf that the " written tract itſelf had originally come out of his " own library. This untruſty fellow, imitating, it " ſeems, the ſaid James, took one copy ſecretly for " himſelf, when he wrote another for Sir Robert; " and out of his own tranſcript ſold away ſeveral " copies, till at laſt one of them came into Went- " worth's hands, of the North, now Lord Deputy " of Ireland. He acquainted the Lords, and others " of the Privy-Council, with it. They ſent for the " ſaid young fellow, and examining him where he " had the written book, he confeſt Sir Robert Cot- " ton delivered it to him. Whereupon, in the be- " ginning of November, in the ſame year 1629, Sir " Robert was examined, and ſo were divers others, " one after the other, as it had been delivered from " hand to hand, till at laſt Mr. St. John himſelf was " apprehended, and, being conceived to be the author " of the book, was committed cloſe priſoner to the " Tower. Being in danger to have been queſtioned " for his life about it, upon examination upon oath, " he made a clear, full, and punctual declaration, " that he had received the ſame MS. pamphlet of " that wretched mercenary fellow James, who by " this means proved the wretched inſtrument of " ſhortening the life of Sir Robert Cotton: for he " was preſently thereupon ſued in the Star-chamber, " his Library locked up from his uſe, and two or " more of the Guards ſet to watch his houſe conti- " nually. When I went ſeveral times to viſit and " comfort him, in the year 1630, he would tell me, ' they had broken his heart, that had locked up his " Library from him.' I eaſily gueſſed the reaſon, " becauſe his honour and eſteem were much impaired " by this fatal accident; and his houſe, that was " formerly frequented by great and honourable per- " ſonages, as by learned men of all ſorts, remained " now upon the matter deſolate and empty. I un- " derſtood, from himſelf and others, that Dr. Neile " and Dr. Laud, two Prelates that had been ſtigma- " tized in the firſt Seſſion of Parliament, in 1628, " were his ſore enemies. He was ſo outworne, " within a few months, with anguiſh and grief, as " his face, which had been formerly ruddy and well- " coloured (ſuch as the picture I have of him ſhews) " was wholly changed into a grim blackiſh paleneſs, " near to the reſemblance and hue of a dead viſage. " I heard it certainly affirmed that the young fellow " whom Sir Robert kept in his houſe, and had em- " ployed to tranſcribe the ſaid written tractate, was " his baſtard; which ſhews God's admirable juſtice, been ſince publiſhed, relating to the Hiſtory and Antiquities of Great Britain and Ireland. So valuable a Perſon, we may imagine, muſt have had many Friends and Acquaintance. The

" to cauſe the ſpurious iſſue of his fatal luſt to prove " the inſtrument of his final ruin. I, at one time, " adviſed him to look into himſelf, and ſeriouſly " conſider, why God had ſent this chaſtiſement upon " him; which, it is poſſible, he did; for I heard from " Mr. Richard Holdeſworth, a great and learned " divine, that was with him in his laſt ſickneſs, a " little before he died, that he was exceeding peni- " tent, and was much confirmed in the faithful ex- " pectation of a better life (15)."

(15) Gentleman's Magazine, vol. xxxvii. p. 335—337. New General Biographical Dictionary, vol. iv. p. 151—154. Bibli. Top. Brit. p. 47—50.

Thoſe of our Readers who are not already acquainted with this tranſaction, will be ſurprized that ſuch men as Sir Robert Cotton, the Earl of Bedford, and Mr. Selden, who were known to be always well affected to the liberties of the ſubject, ſhould be charged either with having written or diſſeminated a Tract, the intention of which was to ſhew how a Prince might make himſelf an abſolute tyrant. In fact, the accuſation was totally groundleſs. It was indeed aſſerted, in the Attorney General's information againſt Sir Robert Cotton, " that the diſcourſe or project was framed and contrived within five or ſix months paſt here in England;" but the truth of the caſe was, that it had been drawn up in the year 1613, by Sir Robert Dudley, commonly called Earl of Warwick and Duke of Northumberland (16). Of this Sir Henry Foulis gave evidence upon oath, in the courſe of the proſecution; in conſequence of which, Sir Robert Cotton and the reſt of the Gentlemen were releaſed. The Tract in queſtion, which was the cauſe of ſo much trouble to Sir Robert, was entitled, " A propoſition for his Majeſty's ſervice, to " bridle the impertinency of Parliaments;" and the deſign of the author, who lived in exile at Florence, was to ingratiate himſelf with King James the firſt, and by that means to prepare the way for his return to his own country.

(16) Biographia Britannica, firſt edit. vol. iii. p. 1810.

It hath been ſaid, that Sir Robert Cotton had his Library reſtored to him, ſoon after his releaſe from confinement (17). But there is ground for believing that this was not the caſe; for in a Letter which mentions his death in 1631, it is aſſerted, that before he died, he requeſted Sir Henry Spelman to ſignify to the Lord Privy Seal, and the reſt of the Lords of the Council, that their ſo long detaining his books from him, without rendering any reaſon for the ſame, had been the cauſe of his mortal malady. Upon this meſſage, the Lord Privy Seal went to Sir Robert, to comfort him from the King, when it was too late. The Earl of Dorſet, likewiſe, within half an hour after Sir Robert's death, came to his Son, Sir Thomas Cotton, to condole with him on that occaſion; and to aſſure him from his Majeſty, that to him would be continued the love which the King had for his father. It is added in the Letter, that Sir Robert had entailed, as far as law could do it, his Library of books upon his ſon, who made no doubt of obtaining the ſame. " But, ſays the writer, for all theſe Court " Holy-waters, I, for my part, for a while ſuſpend " my belief." Hence it appears, that the Government was not only in poſſeſſion of Sir Robert Cotton's Library at the time of his deceaſe, but that it was then thought doubtful whether it would be reſtored to his poſterity. Another inſtance is related in which he came under the perſecution of the Crown. In the Paper Office, is a warrant for his commitment, ſo early as the year 1615. He was ſuſpected of holding a correſpondence with the Spaniſh Ambaſſador, that was prejudicial to the affairs of Government, and on this occaſion his Library was ſhut up. It is probable, however, that it was ſpeedily reſtored, as there can be no doubt but that the ſuſpicion entertained of him was wholly groundleſs (18). Thus to be twice unjuſtly impriſoned, twice to have his Library taken from him, and the laſt time with ſuch circumſtances as ſhortened his life, was the treatment which a man who had deſerved ſo well of his country met with, from the arbitrary Princes of the Houſe of Stuart.

(17) Gentleman's Magazine, ubi ſupra.

(18) Gentleman's Magazine, vol. xxxvii. p. 388, 389. New General Biog. Dictionary, ubi ſupra.

That the young fellow whom Sir Robert Cotton kept in his Houſe was his baſtard, might poſſibly be the calumny of the day. As to Mr. Richard James, who likewiſe makes ſo conſiderable a figure in the preceding narration, he was born at Newport, in the Iſle of Wight, and admitted a Scholar of Corpus Chriſti College, Oxford, on the 23d of Sept. 1608, being then about ſixteen years of age. On the 30th of September, 1615, he became Probationer Fellow of his College. Having entered into Holy Orders, he preached frequently, and arrived to the degree of Bachelor in Divinity. Upon what occaſion we know not, he travelled abroad, and was in Ruſſia, in 1619, a tour to which country was very uncommon in thoſe days. He was eſteemed to be well verſed in moſt parts of learning, and was noted, among his acquaintance, as a good Grecian and Poet, an excellent Critic, Antiquary, and Divine. Beſide all this, he was admirably ſkilled in the Saxon and Gothic languages. As for his preaching, it was not approved of by any of the Univerſity excepting by ſome of the graver ſort. Of three Sermons, delivered by him before the Academics, one of them, concerning the obſervation of Lent, was without a text, according to the moſt ancient manner; another was againſt it, and a third beſide it; " ſhewing himſelf thereby, ſays Anthony " Wood, a humourous perſon." Selden was much beholden to him for the drudgery he did for him when he compoſed his Marmora Arundeliana, and acknowledges him, in the Preface to that Book, to be Vir multijugæ Studiique indefatigabilis. Mr. James's diligence and trouble were very great in ordering, diſpoſing, and ſettling Sir Robert Cotton's Library. Nothing was wanting to him, and to the encouragement of his ſtudies, but a ſinecure or a Prebend; if he had obtained either of which, the labours of Hercules would have ſeemed to be a trifle. Several Latin and Engliſh Sermons were publiſhed by him; and he was the Author of Poemata quædam in Mort. clariſs. Viri Roberti Cottoni et Thomæ Alleni. With theſe Poems he printed Sir Thomas More's Epiſtle to the Univerſity of Oxford, for the embracing of the Greek Tongue. He tranſlated, alſo, into Engliſh, the Octavius of Minutius Felix. Mr. James died of a Quartan Fever, at the houſe of Sir Thomas Cotton, in Weſtminſter, in the beginning of December, 1638; and, on the ſeventh of the ſame month, was buried in St. Margaret's Church. He left behind him ſeveral manuſcripts of his own compoſition, and others collected by him from various authors, all of which are written with his own hand. Theſe are now depoſited in the Bodleian Library. Among the reſt of the manuſcripts of Mr. James's compoſition, are a Ruſſian Dictionary, with the Engliſh to it; Obſervations made in his Travels through ſome parts of Wales, Scotland, on Shetland, Greenland, &c. and Obſervations on the Country, Manners, and Cuſtoms of Ruſſia, or Ruſland (19). Sir Symonds D'Ewes has given a very unfavourable character of Mr. James; having deſcribed him as an atheiſtical profane Scholar, but otherwiſe witty and moderately learned. " He had ſo ſcrewed himſelf," adds Sir Symonds, " into the good opinion of Sir Robert " Cotton, that whereas at firſt he only permitted " him the uſe of ſome of his books; at laſt, ſome " two or three years before his death, he beſtowed " the cuſtody of his whole Library on him. And he " being a needy ſharking companion, and very ex- " penſive, like old Sir Ralph Starkie when he lived, " let out, or lent out, Sir Robert Cotton's moſt pre- " cious manuſcripts for money, to any that would " be his cuſtomers; which," ſays Sir Symonds, " I " once made known to Sir Robert Cotton, before " the ſaid James's face (20)." With regard to the charge brought againſt Mr. James, of his being an atheiſtical profane Scholar, I may obſerve, that it does not comport with Wood's account of him, who expreſsly aſſerts that he was a ſevere Calviniſt. As to the other part of the accuſation, it is undoubtedly a ſtrong circumſtance in Mr. James's favour, that he continued to be truſted, protected, and ſupported, by the Cotton Family to the end of his days. This learned and laborious man fell a victim to intenſe ſtudy, and too abſtemious and mortified a courſe of living (21).

(19) Athenæ Oxonienſes, vol. i. col. 615—617.

(20) Bibli. Top. Brit. No. XV. p. 47, note.

(21) Athenæ Oxonienſes, ubi ſupra.

To

The chief of them in the Britiſh Dominions, were, Henry Earl of Northampton, Thomas Earl of Arundel, Archbiſhop Uſher, Henry Earl of Bath, Edward Earl of Mancheſter,

To return to Sir Robert Cotton; it is greatly to his honour, that he was not, like ſome eminent men of that age, ſo devoted to the prerogative of the Crown, as to be unfriendly to the rights and liberties of the ſubject. At the ſame time, when he ſpoke in favour of a redreſs of grievances, he did it with diſtinguiſhed prudence and temper. Of this he exhibited a proof in the ſpeech which was made by him in the Parliament of 1625 (22). The advice which he gave to the Lords of the Council, when, in conſequence of the diſtracted ſtate of public affairs, and the national diſcontents, he was ſummoned to deliver his opinion concerning the proper methods to be purſued for the general welfare, reflects ſo much credit on his integrity and wiſdom, that I ſhall make no apology for preſerving it in this place.

(22) Parliamentary Hiſtory, vol. vi. p. 367—372.

" My Lords,

" As ſoon as the Houſe of Auſtria had incorporated itſelf into the Houſe of Spain, and, by their new diſcoveries, gotten to themſelves the wealth of the Indies; they began to affect, and have ever ſince purſued, a fifth Monarchy.

" The Emperor Charles would firſt have laid the foundation thereof in Italy, by ſurprizing Rome: but from this he was hindered by the force and reſpect of religion, Henry VIII. being made Caput Fœderis againſt him.

" He then attempted it in High-Germany, practiſing by faction and force, to reduce thoſe petty States to his abſolute power. In this Henry VIII. again prevented him, by tying the Lutheran Princes under his confederacy and aſſiſtance.

" His ſon, Philip II. purſued the ſame ambition in the Nether-Germany, by reduction whereof he intended to make his way further into the other. This the late Queen of England interrupted, by ſiding with the afflicted people on the one part, and making herſelf head of the Proteſtant league with the Princes on the other ſide; drawing in, as a ſecret of State, the countenance of France, to give the more reputation and aſſiſtance to them, and ſecurity to herſelf.

" Spain ſeeing his hopes thus fruitleſs by theſe Unions and Sleights, began firſt to break, if he might, the amity of France and England: but finding the common danger to be ſo faſt a tie, he raiſeth up a party in that kingdom of his own, by the which the French King was ſo diſtreſſed, that, had not the Engliſh Council and aſſiſtance relieved him, Spain had there removed that next and greateſt obſtacle of his ambition.

" His Council now tells him, from theſe examples, that the way to his great work is impaſſable, ſo long as England lies a lett in his Way; and adviſeth him that the removal of that obſtacle be the firſt of his intents. This drew on thoſe often ſecret practices againſt the perſon of the late Queen, and his open fury, in the year 1588, againſt the body of the State; for which ſhe, following the advice of a free Council, would never after admit of peace; winning thereby the hearts of a loving people, who ever found hands and money for all occaſions at home; and by keeping ſacredly her alliances abroad, ſecured her confederates, all her time, in freedom from fear of Spaniſh ſlavery; and ended her old and happy days in great glory.

" Spain then, by the wiſdom and power of that great Lady, deſpoiled ſo of his means to hurt, though not of his deſire, makes up, with her peaceful ſucceſſor of happy memory, the golden league; that (diſarming us at home by opinion of ſecurity, and giving them a power in our Council by believing their friendſhip and pretended marriage) gave them way to cheriſh amongſt us a party of their own; and bereft of power abroad, to lead in jealouſy, and ſow a diviſion between us and our confederates; by which, we ſee, they have ſwallowed up the fortune of our Maſter's brother, with the reſt of the Imperial States, diſtreſſed the King of Denmark by that quarrel, diverted Sweden's aſſiſtance by the wars with the Pole, and moving of him now with the offers of the Daniſh crown; and now, whether from that plot, or our fatality, it hath caſt ſuch a bone between France and us, as hath gotten themſelves, by our quarrel of religion, a faſt confederate, and us a dangerous enemy: So that now we are left no other aſſurance againſt their malice and ambition, but the Netherlands; where the tye of mutual ſafety is weakened by daily diſcontents, bred and fed between us from ſome ill-affected to both our ſecurities: ſo that, from the doubtfulneſs of friendſhip, as we now ſtand, we may rather expect, through our own domeſtic faction, if they grow too furious, they will ſooner follow the example of Rome in her growing; (that held it equally ſafe, honourable, and more eaſy, dare regem, than ſubjugare Provinciam) conſidering the power they have in their hands, than give any friendly aſſiſtance to ſerve the preſent condition of our State. You may ſee therefore in what terms we ſtand abroad; and, I fear, at home, in no better.

" There muſt be, to withſtand a foreign invaſion, a proportion both of ſea and land-forces; for to give an enemy an eaſy paſſage, and a port to relieve him in, is no leſs than to hazard all at one ſtake. And it is to be conſidered, that no march by land can be of that ſpeed to make head againſt the landing of an enemy, nor no ſuch prevention as to be maſter of the ſea. To this point of neceſſary defence there can be no leſs than 240,000*l.*

" For the land-forces; if it were for an offenſive war, the men of leſs livelihood were the beſt ſpared, and were uſed formerly to make ſuch war, purgamento Reipublicæ, if we made no further purchaſe by it: but, for ſafety of a Common-Wealth, the wiſdom of all times did never intruſt the public cauſe to any other than ſuch as had a portion in the public adventure. And this we ſaw in the year 1588, when the care of the Queen and Council did make the body of that large army no other than of Trained-bands, which, with the auxiliaries of the whole realm, amounted to no leſs than 34,000 men. Neither were any of thoſe drawn out of their countries, and proper habitations, before the end of May, that they might be no long aggrievance to the public; ſuch diſcontentments being ever to us a more fatal enemy than any foreign force.

" The careful diſtribution and direction of the ſea and land-forces, being more fitting for a Council of war, than a private man to adviſe of, I paſs over; yet ſhall ever be willing and ready, when I ſhall be called, humbly to offer up ſuch obſervations, as I have formerly gathered by the like occaſions of this realm.

" There are two things requiſite to make up this preparation, money and affections; for they cannot properly be ſevered. It was well and wiſely ſaid by that great and grave Counſellor, Lord Burleigh, in the like caſe, to the late Queen, Win their hearts, and you may have their hands and purſes. And I find of late, that diffidence having been a defect in the one, it hath unhappily produced the ſame in the other.

" In gathering of money for this preſent need, there are required three things, ſpeed, aſſurance, and ſatisfaction: and the way to gather, as others in the like caſes have done, muſt be by that path, which hath been formerly called Via Regia, being more ſecure and ſpeedy; for, by unknown and untroden ways, it is both rough and tedious, and ſeldom ſucceedeth well. The laſt way, although it took place as it were by ſupply at firſt, and received no general denial; yet, ſince, it hath drawn many to conſider with themſelves and others of the conſequence; and is now conceived a preſſure on their liberties, and againſt law. I much fear, if now again it be offered, either in the ſame face, or by Privy-ſeal, that it will be refuſed wholly. Neither find I that the reſtraint of thoſe recuſants hath produced any other effect, than a ſtiff reſolution in them and others to forbear. Beſides, though it went at firſt with ſome aſſurance, yet, when we conſider the commiſſions, and other forms incident to ſuch like ſervices; as alſo how long

it

ſter, Henry Lord Boughton, James Montague Biſhop of Wincheſter, Sir John Dodderidge, Sir John Davis, David Powell, Hugh Holland, Arthur Agard Deputy Chamberlain

it hung in hand, and how many delays there were, we may eaſily ſee that ſuch a ſum, granted by Parliament, is far ſooner and more eaſily gathered.

" If any will make the urgency of times an inevitable neceſſity for enforcing the levy, whether, in general, by exciſe or impoſition; or, in particular, upon ſome ſelect perſons, which is the cuſtom of ſome countries; and ſo conclude it, for the public State, ſuprema Lege, he muſt look for this to be told him: that if neceſſity muſt conclude always for gathering money in the moſt ſpeedy way, (which cannot be fitter than by Parliament) the conſequence may be, that the humours of the heedleſs multitude, who are full of jealouſy and diſtruſt, and ſo unlike to comply to any unuſual courſe of levy, will not ſubmit but by force; which if uſed, the effect is fearful, and hath been fatal to the State: whereas that by Parliament reſteth principally on the regal perſon, who may, with eaſe and ſafety, mould them to fit his deſire, by a gracious yielding to their juſt petitions.

" If a Parliament then be the moſt ſpeedy, aſſured, and ſafe way, it is fit to conceive what is the beſt way to act and work it to the preſent need.

" Firſt, if the time of the uſual ſummons, reputed to be 40 days, be too large for the preſent neceſſity, it may be ſhortened, ſince it is againſt no poſitive law; ſo that care be had that there may be one county day, after the Sheriff hath received the writ, before the time of ſitting.

" If then the ſum to be levied be once agreed on, then, for the advance of time, there may be, in the body of the grant, an aſſignment made to the Knights of every county reſpectively; who, under ſuch aſſurance, may ſafely give ſecurity proportionable to the receipts, to ſuch as ſhall, in preſent, advance to the public ſervice any ſums of money.

" The laſt and weightieſt conſideration (if a Parliament be thought fit) is, how to remove or compoſe the differences between the King and ſubject in their mutual demands. What I have learned amongſt the better ſort of the multitude, I will freely declare, that your Lordſhips may be the more enabled to remove thoſe diſtruſts, that either concern religion, public ſafety of the King and State, or the juſt liberties of the Common-Wealth.

" For religion, a matter that lies neareſt to their conſcience, they are led by this ground of jealouſy to think ſome practiſe againſt it.

" Firſt, for that the Spaniſh match, which was broken by the grateful induſtry of my Lord of Buckingham, out of his religious care, as he there declares, that the articles there demanded might lead in ſome ſuch ſufferance as might endanger the quiet, if not the ſtate of the Reformed Religion here: yet there have (when he was a principal actor in the conditions with France) as hard, if not worſe, (to the preſervation of our religion) paſſed than thoſe with Spain: and the ſuſpicion is ſtrengthened by the ſtrict obſervance of this agreement, in that point, there concluded.

" It is no leſs an argument of doubt to them of his affections; in that his mother and others, and many of his ſervants of near employment about him, are ſo affected.

" They talk much of his advancing men papiſtically devoted; ſome placed in the camp, of neareſt ſervice and chief command; and that the Recuſants have gotten, theſe late years, by his power, more courage and aſſurance than before. If, to clear theſe doubts, (which perhaps are worſe in fancy than in truth) he took a good courſe, it might much advance the public ſervice, againſt thoſe ſqueamiſh humours that have more violent paſſion than ſettled judgment, and are not the leaſt of the oppoſite number in the Common-Wealth.

" The next is, the late misfortunes and loſſes of men, munition, and honour in our late Undertakings abroad; which the more temperate ſpirits impute to want of counſel, and the more ſublime wits to practice.

" They begin with the Palatinate, and by the fault of the loſs there, or the improved credit of Gondomar; diſtruſting him for the ſtaying of ſupplies to Sir Horace Vere, when Colonel Cecil was caſt on that employment; by which the King of Spain became maſter of the late King's childrens inheritance.

" And when Count Mansfield had a royal ſupply of forces, to aſſiſt the Princes of our part, for the the recovery thereof, either plot or error defeated the enterprize from us, to Spain's great advantage.

" That Sir Robert Manſel's expedition to Algier's ſhould purchaſe only the ſecurity and guard of the Spaniſh coaſts: to ſpend ſo many hundred thouſand pounds in the Cadiz voyage, againſt the advice of Parliaments, only to warn the King of Spain to be in a readineſs, and ſo to weaken ourſelves, is taken for a ſign of ill-affection in him amongſt the multitude.

" The ſpending of ſo much munition, victuals, and money, in the Lord Willoughby's journey, is conceived an unthrifty error in the director of it; to diſarm ourſelves in fruitleſs voyages; nay, to ſome over-curious, ſeems a plot of danger, to turn the quarrel of Spain, our antient enemy, that the Parliament petitioned and gave ſupply to ſupport, upon our ally of France; and ſoon after, a new and happy tie gave much talk, that we were not ſo doubtful of Spain as many wiſh; ſince it was held, not long ago, a fundamental rule of their ſecurity and ours, by the old Lord Burleigh, that nothing can prevent an univerſal Spaniſh monarchy, but a faſtneſs of thoſe two Princes whoſe amity gave countenance and courage to the Netherlands and German Princes, to make head againſt his ambition. And we ſee, by this diſunion, a fearful defeat hath happened to Denmark and that party, to the great advantage of the Auſtrian family.

" And thus far of the waſte of public treaſure in fruitleſs expeditions: an important cauſe to hinder any new ſupply in Parliament. Another fear that may diſturb the ſmooth and ſpeedy paſſage of the King's deſires in Parliament, is the late waſte of the King's livelihood; whereby is like, as in former times, to ariſe this jealouſy and fear, that when he hath not of his own to ſupport his ordinary charge, (for which the lands of the Crown were ſettled unalterably, and called ſacrum Patrimonium Principis) that then he muſt of neceſſity reſt upon thoſe aſſiſtances of the people, which ever were collected and conſigned, only, for the Common-Wealth. From hence it is like there will be no great labour or ſtiffneſs to induce his Majeſty to an act of reſumption; ſince ſuch deſires of the State have found an eaſy way in the will of all the Princes from Henry III. to the laſt. But that which is like to paſs deeper into their diſputes and care, is the late preſſures they ſuppoſe to have been done upon the public liberty and freedom of the ſubject; in commanding their goods without aſſent of Parliament; confining their perſons without ſpecial cauſe declared; and that made good againſt them by the judges lately; and pretending a writ to command their attendance in a foreign war: all which they are likely to enforce, as repugnant to many poſitive laws and cuſtomary immunities of this Common-Wealth.

" And theſe dangerous diſtruſts are not a little improved by this un-exampled courſe, as they conceive, of retaining an inland army in winter ſeaſon; when former times of greateſt fear, as that of 1588, produced no ſuch; and makes them, in their diſtracted fears, to conjecture, idly, it was raiſed wholly to ſubject their fortunes to the will of power, more than of law; and ſo make good ſome further breaches upon their liberties and freedoms at home, rather than defend us from any force abroad.

" How far ſuch jealouſies, if they meet with an unuſual diſorder of lawleſs ſoldiers, or an apt diſtemper of the looſe and giddy multitude, may eaſily turn them away, upon any occaſion in the State that they can ſide withal, to a glorious pretence of religion and public ſafety; when their true intent will be only rapine of the rich, and ruin of all, is worthy your provident and preventing care!

" I have thus far delivered, with that freedom you pleaſed to admit, ſuch difficulties as I have taken lain of the Exchequer, Roger Doddeſworth, Richard Carew, William Burton, Sir James Ware, &c. And in foreign parts, Janus Gruterus, Francis Sweertius, Andrew Ducheſne, John Bourdelot, Peter Puteanus, Nicholas Fabricius Peireſkius, &c(h). Sir Robert Cotton having lived reſpected and eſteemed both at home and abroad, died of a fever, in his houſe at Weſtminſter, May 6, 1631, aged ſixty years, three months, and fifteen days; and was buried in the ſouth Chancel of Connington-Church. He married Elizabeth, one of the daughters and co-heirs of William Brocas of Thedingworth in the county of Leiceſter, Eſq; by whom he left one only ſon, Sir Thomas Cotton, Bart.

(h) Vita R. Cottoni, ut ſupra, p. xxvi. xxvii.

up amongſt the multitude, as may arreſt, if not remove, impediments to any ſpeedy ſupply in Parliament at this time: how to facilitate which may better become the care of your Lordſhips judgments, than my ignorance. Onely I could wiſh, that, to remove away a perſonal diſtaſte of my Lord of Buckingham amongſt the people, he might be pleaſed, if there be a neceſſity of Parliament, to appear a firſt adviſer thereunto; and what ſatisfaction it ſhall pleaſe his Majeſty, of grace, to give at ſuch time to his people, (which I wiſh to be grounded by precedent of his beſt and moſt fortunate progenitors, and which, I conceive, will largely ſatisfy the deſires and hopes of all) if it may appear in ſome ſort to be drawn down from him to the people, by the zealous care and induſtry that my Lord of Buckingham hath of the public unity and content; by which there is no doubt that he may remain, not only ſecure from any further quarrel with them, but merit an happy memory amongſt them of a zealous patriot: for to expiate the paſſion of the people, at ſuch a time, with ſacrifice of any of his Majeſty's ſervants, I have ever found it (as in Edward II. Richard II. and Henry VI.) no leſs fatal to the Maſter, than the Miniſter in the End (23)."

(23) Ibid. p. 330—338.

The conſequence of this advice was, that the King and Council were induced to believe that the calling of a Parliament was the beſt method which could be adopted for promoting the general good of the nation.

In the collection of curious diſcourſes written by eminent Antiquaries, are printed nine ſhort Diſſertations, by Sir Robert Cotton, on various ſubjects relative to Engliſh Antiquities.

It is ſcarcely neceſſary to inform our Readers, that in 1753 the Cottonian Library was removed to the Britiſh Muſeum, and now conſtitutes a moſt uſeful and important part of that noble repoſitory. The merit of Sir Robert Cotton, in forming his collection, is well repreſented in the Preface to the Harleian Catalogue. "Bodley's great contemporay, Sir Robert Cotton, had been equally diligent in collecting ancient Manuſcripts. The ſtudy of Antiquities, particularly thoſe of this kingdom, had engaged his attention, though he always ſhewed a high regard for every part of philological learning, in all which he was extremely converſant. He had obſerved with regret, that the hiſtory, laws, and conſtitution of Britain, were in general very inſufficiently underſtood; and being fully convinced, that the preſervation of ſuch monuments of antiquity, and other documents, as were conducive to render the knowledge of them, and their deductions from their primary ſtate, more accurate and univerſal, would neceſſarily redound to the advantage of the public, he had, in an expenſive and indefatigable labour of upwards of forty years, accumulated thoſe numerous and ineſtimable treaſures which compoſe the Cottonian Library, and now remain an indiſputable teſtimony of his benevolent diſpoſition towards his native country. But, happily, theſe Patrons of Literature lived in an age peculiarly favourable to the completion of their reſpective purpoſes, and more eſpecially to thoſe of the latter. The late general diſſolution of religious houſes had diſperſed an infinite number of curious manuſcripts. Many of theſe were ſecured by the nobility and gentry; but no inconſiderable number falling into the hands of peaſants, mechanics, and other perſons ignorant of their importance, and totally inattentive to their preſervation, were eaſily to be purchaſed. From this ſource Sir Robert Cotton had ſupplied his Library with a multitude of rare Manuſcripts; and to them Mr. Camden, Mr. Lambard, Dr. Dee, and Sir Chriſtopher Hatton had kindly contributed their Stores (24)."

(24) New general Biographical Dictionary, vol. iv. p. 155. note.

That the name of Sir Robert Cotton muſt always be mentioned with honour; and that his memory cannot fail of exciting the warmeſt ſentiments of gratitude, while the ſmalleſt regard for learning ſubſiſts among us, is the teſtimony of Dr. Samuel Johnſon (25).] K.

(25) Ibid. p. 148.

 [COTTON (CHARLES), an ingenious Writer, and eminent for his talents in Burleſque Poetry, was the ſon of Charles Cotton, Eſq; of Beresford [A], in Staffordſhire, and was born on the 28th of April, 1630 (a). He was educated at the Univerſity of Cambridge [B]; and Mr. Granger ſays, that 'he was eſteemed one of the ornaments of that Univerſity (b).' He is ſaid afterwards to have travelled into France, and other foreign countries (c). But the place of his reſidence, during the greater part of his life,

(a) Life of Char. Cotton, Eſq; prefixed to the ſecond part of Sir John Hawkins's edition of the Compl. Angler, p. 5. ed. 1784.

(b) Biog. Hiſt. of England, vol. iv. p. 50. 2d. edit.

(c) Biog. Dram.

[A] Son of Charles Cotton, Eſq; of Beresford.] Of this Gentleman, who was the ſon of Sir George Cotton, Knt. the following character is given by Lord Clarendon: 'Charles Cotton was a Gentleman 'born to a competent fortune, and ſo qualified in his 'perſon, and education, that for many years he continued the greateſt ornament of the town, in the 'eſteem of thoſe who had been beſt bred. His natural parts were very great, his wit flowing in all the 'parts of converſation; the ſuperſtructure of learning not raiſed to a conſiderable height; but having paſſed ſome years in Cambridge, and then in France, 'and converſing always with learned men, his expreſſions were ever proper and ſignificant, and gave 'great luſtre to his diſcourſe upon any argument; ſo 'that he was thought by thoſe who were not intimate 'with him, to have been much better acquainted 'with books than he was. He had all thoſe qualities which in youth raiſe men to the reputation of 'being fine Gentlemen; ſuch a pleaſantneſs and 'gaiety of humour, ſuch a ſweetneſs and gentleneſs 'of nature, and ſuch a civility and delightfulneſs in 'converſation, that no man in the court, or out of 'it, appeared a more accompliſhed perſon; all theſe 'extraordinary qualifications being ſupported by as 'extraordinary a clearneſs of courage, and fearleſſneſs of ſpirit, of which he gave too often manifeſtation. Some unhappy ſuits in law, and waſte of his 'fortune in thoſe ſuits, made ſome impreſſion upon 'his mind; which being improved by domeſtic afflictions, and thoſe indulgencies to himſelf, which 'naturally attend thoſe afflictions, rendered his age 'leſs reverenced than his youth had been; and gave 'his beſt friends cauſe to have wiſhed, that he had 'not lived ſo long (1).'

(1) Continuation of the Life of Lord Clarendon, vol. iii. p. 32. edit. 8vo. 1759.

[B] Educated at the Univerſity of Cambridge.] Sir John Hawkins ſays, that 'he had for his Tutor 'Mr. Ralph Rawſon, once a Fellow of Brazen-noſe 'College, Oxford, but who had been ejected from his 'Fellowſhip by the Parliament viſitors, in 1648. 'This perſon he has gratefully celebrated in a tranſlation of an Ode of Johannes Secundus (2).' The ſame writer alſo obſerves, that at 'the Univerſity he 'improved his knowledge of the Greek and Roman 'Claſſics, and became a perfect maſter of the French 'and Italian languages (3).'

(2) Life, ut ſupra, p. 5.

(3) Ibid.

was at the family ſeat at Beresford. In 1656, he married Iſabella, daughter of Sir Thomas Hutchinſon, Knt. of Owthorp, in the county of Nottingham (d). This Lady was a diſtant relation; and at the time of his marriage he was twenty-ſix years of age. He had not engaged in any profeſſion, and was wholly dependent upon his father. But by the death of his father, about two years after, he became poſſeſſed of the family eſtate; though this was probably much encumbered. In 1663, he publiſhed "the Moral Philoſophy of the "Stoics," tranſlated from the French of Monſ. de Vaix, Preſident of the Parliament of Provence (e). He is ſaid to have made this tranſlation in compliance to the will of his father [C]. In the year 1665, he tranſlated from the French the Horace of Corneille. The plot of the original piece is taken from the ſtory of the Horatii and Curiatii. It is ſaid by the author of the Biographia Dramatica (f) to be a very good tranſlation of this Tragedy; but it was not at firſt intended for publication, being only written for the amuſement of his ſiſter. It was, however, printed at London, in 4*to*. in 1671, and dedicated to his ſiſter, Mrs. Stanhope Hutchinſon, the Lady for whoſe uſe it was originally written. The year before, he had publiſhed, in folio, and dedicated to Archbiſhop Sheldon, a tranſlation of the "Hiſtory of the Life of the Duke d'Eſpernon (g)." It was at this period of his life, when his affairs ſeem to have been much embarraſſed, and he had received a Captain's commiſſion in the army, that he went over into Ireland; and he has recorded ſome of his adventures in a Burleſque Poem, in three Cantos, called a "Voyage "to Ireland [D]." In 1674, he publiſhed "the Fair one of Tunis," a Novel, tranſlated from the French; and alſo a tranſlation of "the Commentaries of Blaiſe de Montluc, "Marſhal of France." The following year he publiſhed, in 8*vo*. 'the Planter's Manual, 'being Inſtructions for cultivating all ſorts of fruit-trees (h).' In 1678, he publiſhed at London, in 8*vo*, his moſt celebrated performance, under the following title: 'Scarronides, 'or Virgil Traveſtie; a Mock Poem, on the firſt and fourth Books of Virgil's Æneis, in 'Engliſh Burleſque.' This has paſſed through many editions. The eighth was publiſhed in 1700, and the fifteenth in 1771. It has been remarked, that though the title of this piece ſeems to imply, that 'his poem was in imitation of Scarron, who has tranſlated eight 'books of Virgil in the ſame manner, yet they, who will compare both theſe pieces, will 'poſſibly find, that he has not only exceeded the French, but all thoſe who have made 'any attempts in that kind of poetry, the incomparable author of Hudibras excepted (i).' There is, undoubtedly, a great degree of humour in the Virgil Traveſtie of Cotton; but it muſt at the ſame time be confeſſed, that there is too much indelicay and indecency. He likewiſe publiſhed, in 12*mo*, 'Burleſque upon Burleſque; or the Scoffer ſcoffed; being 'ſome of Lucian's Dialogues newly put into Engliſh Fuſtian.' Theſe dialogues have been much read, the eighth edition having been printed in 1771. In point of merit, they may be ranked with his Virgil Traveſtie; they have the ſame humour, and the ſame licentiouſneſs.

(d) Hawkins, ut ſupra.

(e) Ibid.

(f) Vol. ii. p. 156.

(g) Hawkins, ut ſupra.

(h) Ibid.

(i) Cibber's Lives of the Poets, vol. iii. p. 302.

At what time Mr. Cotton loſt his firſt wife, we meet with no account; but it appears that his ſecond marriage was with the Counteſs Dowager of Ardglas, who poſſeſſed a jointure of fifteen hundred pounds a year, and who ſurvived him (k). One of his favourite recreations was angling [E], which occaſioned a very intimate friendſhip between him and Mr. Iſaac Walton, whom he called his father. His houſe, as he informs us himſelf, was ſituated "upon the margin of one of the fineſt rivers (l) for trouts and grayling in "England (m)." Here he alſo built a little fiſhing-houſe dedicated to anglers, over the door of which the initial letters of his own name, and Iſaac Walton's, were placed together in a cypher. This edifice is ſtill ſtanding, and has been lately thus deſcribed. 'It is of 'ſtone, and the room on the inſide a cube of about fifteen feet: it is paved with black and 'white marble. In the middle is a ſquare black marble table, ſupported by two ſtone 'feet. The room is wainſcotted, with curious mouldings that divide the panels up to 'the cieling: in the larger panels are repreſented in painting ſome of the moſt pleaſant of 'the adjacent ſcenes, with perſons fiſhing; and in the ſmaller, the various ſorts of tackle 'and implements uſed in angling. In the farther corner, on the left, is a fire-place, with 'a chimney; and on the right, a large beaufet, with folding-doors, whereon are the portraits of Mr. Cotton, with a boy-ſervant, and Walton, in the dreſs of the time: under-

(k) Hawkins, ut ſupra, p. 15.

(l) The river Dove, which divides the counties of Derby and Stafford.

(m) Complete Angler, P. ii. p. 7.

[C] In compliance to the will of his father.] Sir John Hawkins ſays, that 'his father, being a man 'of bright parts, gave him themes and authors 'whereon to exerciſe his judgment and learning, even 'to the time of his entering into the ſtate of matri-'mony; the firſt fruit of which exerciſes was, as it 'ſeems, his Elegy on the gallant Lord Derby (4).'

(4) Ibid. p. 6.

[D] A Burleſque Poem, &c. called "a Voyage to Ireland."] 'In this poem he relates, with ſingular 'pleaſantry, that at Cheſter, coming out of church, 'he was taken notice of by the Mayor of the city for 'his rich garb, and particularly a gold belt that he 'then wore, and by him invited home to ſupper, and 'very hoſpitably entertained (5).'

(5) Ibid. p. 9.

[E] One of his favourite recreations was angling.] In one of his poems are the following lines:

'O my beloved nymph! fair Dove,
'Princeſs of rivers, how I love
'Upon thy flow'ry banks to lie,
'And view thy ſilver ſtream,
'When gilded by a ſummer's beam!
'And in it all thy wanton fry
'Playing at liberty,
'And with my angle upon them,
'The All of Treachery
'I ever learn'd, to practiſe and to try (6).'

(6) Poems, p. 136.

"neath

'neath is a cupboard, on the door whereof the figures of a trout, and alſo of a grayling, 'are well pourtrayed (n).' When four editions had been publiſhed of Walton's Complete Angler, Mr. Cotton wrote "Inſtructions how to angle for a Trout or Grayling, in a clear "ſtream." Theſe have ever ſince been publiſhed as a ſecond part of Walton's book [F], and have been obſerved to be "a judicious Supplement" to that work (o).

(n) Notes to the Compl. Angler, 21. edit. 1784.

(o) Hawkins, ut ſupra.

In 1681, Mr. Cotton publiſhed a poem, called, "the Wonders of the Peak;" which is a performance of little merit; but in 1685, he publiſhed, in three volumes, 8*vo*, an excellent tranſlation of Montaigne's Eſſays [G], which has ſince paſſed through ſeveral editions. He is ſuppoſed to have died in the year 1687, in the pariſh of St. James's, Weſtminſter. He appears to have died inſolvent, as Elizabeth Bludworth, his principal creditor, adminiſtered to his effects, his widow and children having previouſly renounced the adminiſtration (p). After his death, in 1689, a collection of his "Poems on ſeveral occaſions" was publiſhed in one volume, octavo. This collection conſiſts of tranſlations, imitations of Horace, ſongs [H], ſonnets, and epigrams, ſome humorous and ſarcaſtic pieces, and a few of a more ſerious nature [I]. A volume in 12*mo*. has been ſeveral times printed (q), entitled, "the Genuine Poetical Works of Charles Cotton, Eſq;" but this does not contain half the poetical productions of Mr. Cotton; it including only his Virgil Traveſtie, his Burleſque of Lucian, and the Wonders of the Peak; and not comprehending any of the poems in the collection publiſhed in 1689. Beſides the pieces already mentioned, he tranſlated "Memoirs of the Sieur De Pontis," which were publiſhed by his ſon, Mr. Beresford Cotton, in 1694 (r).

(p) Ibid.

(q) The ſixth edit. was publiſhed in 1771.

(r) Hawkins, ut ſupra.

He was a man of conſiderable abilities, and appears to have been an elegant ſcholar, and much diſtinguiſhed by his polite and engaging manners. But many of his productions are too licentious in their tendency, and the imprudence of his conduct brought him into a variety of difficulties. Mr. Granger ſays, that 'he was ſociable, hoſpitable, and generous; 'but as he was far from being an oeconomiſt, he, in the latter part of his life, was much

[F] Publiſhed a ſecond part of Walton's book.] Sir John Hawkins obſerves, that 'the ſecond part of the 'Complete Angler is apparently an imitation of 'the firſt. It is a courſe of dialogues between the 'author, ſhadowed under the name of Piſcator, and 'a traveller, the very perſon diſtinguiſhed in the 'firſt part by the name of Venator, and whom Walton 'of a hunter has made an angler; in which, beſides 'the inſtructions there given, and the beautiful 'ſcenery of a wild and romantic country therein diſ-'played, the urbanity, courteſy, and hoſpitality of a 'well-bred country Gentleman, are repreſented to 'great advantage (7).'

(7) Life, ut ſupra, p. 10.

[G] An excellent tranſlation of Montaigne's Eſſays.] This is ſo good a tranſlation, that it has been thought to be fully equal to the original, and ſome have even ſuppoſed it to be ſuperior (8). He dedicated it to George Saville, Marquis of Halifax; and that Nobleman expreſſed his eſteem for the tranſlator, and admiration of the performance, in the following letter:

(8) Life, ut ſupra, p. 12.

'Sir,

'I have too long delayed my thanks to you for 'giving me ſuch an obliging evidence of your re-'membrance: that alone would have been a welcome 'preſent, but when joined with the book in the world, 'I am the beſt entertained with, it raiſeth a ſtrong 'deſire in me to be better known, where I am ſure 'to be ſo much pleaſed. I have till now thought wit 'could not be tranſlated, and do ſtill retain ſo much 'of that opinion, that I believe it impoſſible, except 'by one whoſe genius cometh up to that of the 'author. You have ſo kept the original ſtrength of 'his thought, that it almoſt tempts a man to believe 'the tranſmigration of ſouls; and that he being uſed 'to hills is come into the moorlands to reward us 'here in England, for doing him more right than his 'country will afford him. He hath by your means 'mended his firſt edition: to tranſplant and make 'him ours, is not only a valuable acquiſition to us, 'but a juſt cenſure of the critical impertinence of 'thoſe French ſcribblers, who have taken pains to 'make little cavils and exceptions, to leſſen the re-'putation of this great man, whom nature hath made 'too big to confine himſelf to the exactneſs of a 'ſtudied ſtile. He let his mind have its full flight, 'and ſheweth, by a generous kind of negligence, 'that he did not write for praiſe, but to give to the 'world a true picture of himſelf and of mankind. 'He ſcorned affected periods, or to pleaſe the miſta-'ken reader with an empty chime of words. He 'hath no affectation to ſet himſelf out, and depend-'eth wholly upon the natural force of what is his 'own, and the excellent application of what he 'borroweth.

'You ſee, Sir, that I have kindneſs enough for 'Monſieur de Montaigne to be your rival, but no 'body can now pretend to be in equal competition 'with you. I do willingly yield, which is no ſmall 'matter for a man to do to a more proſperous lover; 'and if you will repay this piece of juſtice with an-'other, pray believe, that he, who can tranſlate ſuch 'an author without doing him wrong, muſt not only 'make me glad, but proud of being his

'Moſt humble ſervant,

HALIFAX (9).'

(9) Lives of the Poets, vol. iii. p. 303, 304.

[H] Songs.] Among his bacchanalian Songs, is one that is well known, and of which the following is the firſt ſtanza:

'Come let's mind our drinking,
'Away with this thinking;
'It ne'er, that I heard of, did any one good;
'Prevents not diſaſter,
'But brings it on faſter,
'Miſchance is by mirth and by courage
'withſtood (10).'

(10) Poems, p. 74.

[I] A few of a more ſerious nature.] From one of theſe, called the Retirement, written in irregular ſtanzas, and addreſſed to Mr. Iſaac Walton, we ſhall ſelect the following lines:

'O ſolitude, the ſoul's beſt friend,
'That man acquainted with himſelf doſt make,
'And all his Maker's Wonders to intend;
'With thee I here converſe at will,
'And would be glad to do ſo ſtill;
'For it is thou alone that keep'ſt the ſoul awake.

'How calm and quiet a delight
'It is alone
'To read, and meditate, and write,
'By none offended, nor offending none;
'To walk, ride, ſit, or ſleep at one's own eaſe,
'And pleaſing a man's ſelf, none other to diſ-
'pleaſe (11).'

(11) Ibid. p. 135.

'involved in debt, and perpetually harraſſed with duns [K], attornies, and bailiffs (s).' It is ſaid, that a report is current in the neighbourhood in which he lived, that by ſome ſarcaſtic lines in his Virgil Traveſtie, wherein he had made mention of a ſingular ruff, worn by a grandmother, or, as ſome ſay, an aunt of his, who lived in the Peak, he ſo exceedingly offended the old Lady, that ſhe revoked a clauſe in her will, whereby ſhe had bequeathed to him an eſtate of four or five hundred pounds a year (t): but this ſtory ſeems not to be well-grounded [L]. He had ſeveral children by his firſt Lady, but none by his ſecond. His ſon, Beresford Cotton, had a company given him in a regiment of foot, raiſed by the Earl of Derby, for the Service of King William; and one of his daughters was married to Dr. George Stanhope, Dean of Canterbury (u).'] T.

(s) Biog. Hiſt. of England, vol. iv. p. 51.

(t) Vid. Life, ut ſupra, p. 153 and Biog. Dram. vol. i. p. 100.

(u) Hawkins, ut ſupra.

[K] Involved in debt, and perpetually harraſſed with duns, &c.] In the ſecond Canto of his Voyage to Ireland in Burleſque, are the following lines, as a part of the account which he gave of himſelf to the Mayor of Cheſter:

'I anſwer'd, my country was fam'd Staffordſhire;
'That in deeds, bills, and bonds, I was ever writ
'ſquire;
'That of land, I had both ſorts, ſome good, and
'ſome evil,
'But that a great part on't was pawn'd to the 'Devil (12).'

(12) Ibid. p. 186.

In his Epiſtle to Sir Clifford Clifton, ſpeaking of himſelf, are alſo the following lines:

'He always wants money, which makes him
'want eaſe,
'And he's always beſieg'd, tho' himſelf of the peace,
'By an army of duns, who batter with ſcandals,
'And are foemen more fierce than the Goths or
'the Vandals (13).'

(13) Ibid. p. 329.

[L] This ſtory ſeems not to be well grounded.] The lines referred to muſt be the following:

'And then there is a fair great ruff,
'Made of a pure and coſtly ſtuff,
'To wear about her highneſs' neck,
'Like Mrs. Cockaney's in the Peak (14).'

(14) Virgil Traveſtie, p. 53. edit. 1700.

But we do not find that he had either aunt, or grandmother, whoſe name was Cockaney. In the collection of his Poems, publiſhed after his death, we meet with an Epitaph on "his dear aunt, Mrs. Anne "Stanhope," whom he ſpeaks of as the beſt of kindred, and of friends, and the beſt of women (15).]

(15) Poems, p. 352.

COVEL (JOHN), a very learned Divine, in the ſeventeenth, and beginning of the eighteenth Century, was born at Horningſhearth in Suffolk, in the Year 1638 (a) being the ſon of William Covel of that place (b). He was educated in Grammar-learning at St. Edmund's Bury, under Mr. Stephens; and on the 31ſt of March 1654, in the ſixteenth year of his age, admitted into Chriſt's College in Cambridge, of which he was afterwards choſen Fellow (c). In the year 1657, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, and that of Maſter in 1661 (d). Afterwards entering into Holy Orders, he had the advantage of going, in 1670, as Chaplain to Sir Daniel Harvey (e), Ambaſſador from King Charles II. to the Ottoman Porte; where he ſerved, in that quality, both him, and his ſucceſſor, Sir John Finch, for the ſpace of ſeven years (f). Some time after his return to England he was created Doctor in Divinity, namely in 1679 (g); and the ſame year was choſen Lady Margaret's Preacher in the Univerſity of Cambridge (h). On the 5th of March 1680, he had inſtitution to the Sine-cure-Rectory of Littlebury in Eſſex, to which he was preſented by Dr. Gunning Biſhop of Ely (i): and, on the 9th of November 1687, he was inſtalled into the Chancellorſhip of York, conferred upon him by the King, during the vacancy of that See (k). On the 7th of July 1688 he was elected Maſter of Chriſt's College (l), in which ſtation he behaved as a good and prudent Governor. He was alſo Rector of Kegworth in Leiceſterſhire (m). In the year 1708, he ſerved the office of Vice-chancellor in the Univerſity of Cambridge (n). At length, after having led a kind of itinerant life, [as he himſelf informs us (o),] at York, in Holland, and elſewhere; he arrived at his long Journey's end, on the 19th of December 1722, in the 85th year of his age; and was buried in the Chapel of Chriſt's College, where there is an Epitaph to his memory [A]. He gave a Benefaction of Three pounds a year to the poor of the pariſh of Littlebury above-mentioned (p). Having, during his ſeven years reſidence at Conſtantinople, had an opportunity of informing himſelf well of the ancient and preſent ſtate of the Greek Church, and collected ſeveral curious obſervations and notices relating thereto; he digeſted them, during the remainder of his Life, into a curious and uſeful Book, publiſhed not long before his deceaſe. It is intituled, 'Some Account of the preſent Greek Church, with Re-'flections on their preſent Doctrine and Diſcipline; particularly in the Euchariſt, and the 'reſt of their ſeven pretended Sacraments, compared with Jac. Goar's Notes upon the

(a) This appears from his age at the time of his death, as mentioned below.

(b) From Memoirs communicated to us.

(c) From the College-Regiſter.

(d) From the Univerſity Reg.

(e) Sir Dan. Harvey was appointed Ambaſſador to Conſtantinople in Aug. 1668. The Hiſtorian's Guide, 8vo. edit. 1688, p. 72.

(f) See ſome Account of the preſent Greek Church, &c. by J. Covel, D.D. Camb. 1722, fol. in the Dedicat. p. 3; and Pref. p. 1.

(g) From the Univerſity Regiſt.

(h) See Catalogue of Preachers at Cambridge, prefixed to the Lady Margaret's Funeral Sermon, republiſhed by T. Baker, B.D. Lond. 1708, 8vo.

(i) Repertorium Eccleſ. &c. by R. Newcourt, vol. ii. p. 394.

(k) Survey of the Cathedrals of York, &c. by Br. Willis, Eſq; vol. i. p. 81. See ibid. p. 59.

(l) J. Le Neve's Faſti, edit. 1716, fol. p. 432.

(m) Br. Willis, ibid.

(n) J. Le Neve, ubi ſupra, p. 409.

(o) Dedication to Account of the preſent Greek Church, as above.

(p) Hiſt. and Antiq. of Eſſex, by N. Salmon, p. 134.

[A] Where there is an Epitaph to his memory] As follows.

Lector,

Hic Sepultas habes, beatam Reſurrectionem expectantis, Reliquias venerabilis & eruditiſſimi Viri Johannis Covel, S. T. P. nuper hujus Collegij Cuſtodis ſive Magiſtri, nec non Eccleſ. Cathedr. Eborac. Cancellarij.

Obiit Dec. XIX. A°. D. MDCCXXII.
Ætat. LXXXV.

i. e. Here lye buried, in hopes of a bleſſed Reſurrection, the remains of that venerable and moſt learned man John Covel, D.D. late Maſter of this College, and Chancellor of the Cathedral Church of York.

He died December 19, 1722, in the 85th Year of his Age.

Greek

'Greek Ritual, or ΕΥΧΟΛΟΓΙΟΝ.' Cambridge MDCCXXII. fol. [B]. As for the Author's

[B] Some account of the preſent Greek Church, &c.] The chief occaſion of that work, was the great Controverſy which for ſeveral years was hotly debated in the laſt Century, by two of the moſt eminent Divines of France, Monſieur Arnauld Doctor of the Sorbonne, on the ſide of the Papiſts; and Monſ. Claude Miniſter of Charenton, in behalf of the Proteſtants. The former, not being content to ſay, That the Church in all ages believed Tranſubſtantiation, did alſo poſitively affirm, That all the Eaſtern Churches do at this very day believe it, in the ſame ſenſe as it was defined by the Council of Trent. Mr. Claude, in his anſwer to him, brought moſt authentic proofs of the contrary. Whereupon Arnauld ſet all the Miſſionaries of the Eaſt on work to procure Teſtimonies for him: Which, by bribes and other indirect means, they obtained in ſuch numbers, that there was, ſoon after, a large Quarto in French printed at Paris, full of the names of Patriarchs, Biſhops, and Doctors of thoſe Churches, who all approved the Roman Doctrine (1). But Monſ. Claude having had moſt certain Information, by means of a French Gentleman at Colchis, that ſome of thoſe Teſtimonies were mere Fictions; and others quite otherwiſe than they were told; he ſent ſome Queries into the Eaſt, and deſired the Engliſh Clergymen reſiding there, to enquire of the Greeks, and other Eaſtern Chriſtians of the beſt note, who had no correſpondence with the Romaniſts, nor were Emiſſaries of the Court of Rome, or retainers to them: 'Whether Tranſubſtantiation (μετουσίωσις) i. e. the real 'and natural change of the whole ſubſtance of the 'Bread into the ſame numerical ſubſtance as the 'body of Chriſt which is in heaven, be an article of 'Faith amongſt them, and the contrary be accounted 'heretical and impious,' &c (2). This ſet therefore Dr. Covel upon examining thoroughly into that point. But, after all, he declares, that the Greeks, and Eaſterlings, are ſo far from being learned and well verſed in that Controverſy, that he never met with one amongſt them, who ever pretended fully to underſtand, much leſs ever offered to clear that matter. 'I have, ſays he, here and there met with an Eaſt-'erling brought up in the College de propaganda 'fide at Rome, or elſewhere in Italy, who would 'ſometimes venture at a Solution to ſome difficulties 'about tranſubſtantiation; but it was ever done only 'by ſome ſcraps of the common evaſions and jargon 'of the Schools, and never with any ſatisfactory or ſo-'lid reaſon. But from a native Greek, or Eaſterling, 'who was never out of his country, (though he was 'there a man of ſome dignity) I never could meet 'with any tolerable reaſoning or anſwer towards the 'clearing of the point. Many of my acquaintance 'would avoid any ſet diſcourſe about theſe matters. 'Some few who had picked up any ſcattered notions 'in the Eaſt, or elſewhere, from the Romiſh emiſ-'ſaries, would offer them very imperfectly, and as ill 'apply them. But as for the bulk of their Clergy '(the far greateſt part of their Prelates and topping 'Miniſters) I do poſitively aſſert, that they are in ge-'neral profoundly ignorant in theſe points; and not 'one of a thouſand amongſt the ordinary Prieſts knows 'any thing of the matter. They have no books to 'read, but their Hours of Prayer, and common 'Church Offices, which are very numerous; and in 'Country-Churches you will rarely find any of theſe, 'except their common Euchologium, their ordinary 'Prayers and Liturgies: and theſe, like parrots, they 'commonly mumble and hurry over by heart, and 'uſe them very imperfectly with ſtrange variety and 'confuſion (3).' Afterwards he obſerves, 'That 'we need not wonder at the want of Learning among 'the Greeks, and other Eaſterlings, ſince they have 'no Academies or Schools for inſtructing Students in 'any points of Philoſophy, Divinity, Mathematics, 'or any other part of the polite Literature of 'Europe (4).' Upon the whole therefore, we may eaſily judge, how incompetent Judges ſuch ignorant perſons are in that and other religious matters; and how little their teſtimonies are to be depended upon. Nor can it be really believed, that their Subſcriptions 'contained in them the real Faith or Sentiments of the 'whole Eaſtern Church, or the poſitive, firm, and 'clear belief of every particular Subſcriber (5).'

In order to trace this point to its fountain and original Head, and to place it in a true light, our Author wrote the Account of the preſent Greek Church, now before us. He divides the whole into two Books, whereof the Firſt contains five chapters, and the Second but two. In the 1ſt Chapter, 'he gives his private thoughts 'concerning the Chriſtian Communion in general;' And ſhews, how ſolemn, but withal how ſimple and plain, the celebration of the Euchariſt was in the Primitive Church. In the 2d Chapter, he explains, 'How the familiar and primitive way, of breaking 'bread, and drinking wine together like brethren, 'joined with plain and known Forms of Prayer and 'Thankſgiving, in a devout remembrance of Chriſt, 'hath been loaded and clogged with amuſing Rites and 'empty Ceremonies.' And here he repreſents in figures the chief Ceremonies uſed by the Greeks at the adminiſtration of the Euchariſt; and gives an Engliſh tranſlation of their form of celebrating it, from St. Chryſoſtome's Liturgy, printed in their Euchologium, or Prayer-Book. The 3d Chapter contains 'ſome 'Notes upon that Liturgy, which is attributed to 'St. Chryſoſtome.' In the 4th he gives his conjecture, 'How the plain and familiar way of the firſt 'adminiſtration of the Euchariſt came to be turned 'into the preſent Greeks practice of conſecrating, and 'partaking of, only a few little bits and mites of 'bread, [μερίδες or portions] and of giving to the 'Laity only a little Spoonful of wine.' The 5th Chapter contains 'ſome Obſervations concerning the 'firſt riſe of that new doctrine of Tranſubſtantiation, 'and the endeavours uſed to propagate it over the 'whole Chriſtian world.' Under which he ſhews, That it was not introduced into the Greek Church, till after the taking of Conſtantinople by the Turks; that is, till after the Year of Chriſt 1453.——The 1ſt Chapter of the Second book treats of 'the Greeks 'ſeven Myſteries or Sacraments:' namely, 1. Confirmation; 2. Prieſthood; 3. Orders; 4. Matrimony; 5. Penance; 6. Auricular Confeſſion; and 7. Extreme Unction. The 2d and laſt Chapter, is, 'Con-'cerning Images, and the worſhip of Saints.'——The author intermixes throughout curious accounts of the Jewiſh and Mahometan cuſtoms and Ceremonies. He tells us for inſtance, that 'all over Turkey where 'he happened to travel, the common bread is not 'much unlike our thicker ſort of Pancakes, being very 'ſoft, and ſeldom above a day old; ſo as you may 'wind it round your finger. This flat loaf, or rather 'cake, is round, and about the breadth of one of our 'plates, and about an inch thick at moſt. When we 'eat at an ordinary man's houſe, (be it Turk, Greek, 'Armenian, Jew, &c.) the maſter, or chief of the 'family, or ſome friend by his appointment, takes 'as many of theſe loaves, or cakes, as he thinks ſufficient for the preſent company, and with his hands 'breaks, or rather pulls them into pieces of moderate 'bigneſs, and ſtrews them all upon the table, or what-'ever elſe they eat upon.'——'Moreover, the 'common food in Turkey, be it boiled or roaſted, is 'never cooked in whole joints, but in ſmall morſels; 'ſo that there is no uſe of knives at the table, but 'every one takes a bit of the bread, and dipping it in 'the diſh, he takes up with it a morſel of meat between his thumb and his two fore fingers, and ſo puts 'all into his mouth together. If theſe morſels be 'boiled (as they often are with their Churbaw, or 'Potage) they firſt eat the potage with a wooden ſpoon, 'or ſop it up with bits of the bread, and then take up 'the more ſolid morſels remaining, and eat them (6).' The concluſion of the whole work is written with ſuch an excellent Spirit, that we cannot forbear laying it before the Reader—'I have ſincerely and impartially, and I hope candidly, ſet down only my own 'private thoughts, and I would not willingly be judged 'an abſolute ſlave to any party, but as I really am, a 'compaſſionate lover of every good Chriſtian who heartily deſires to ſerve our God in Spirit and in truth. I 'muſt verily think with myſelf that thoſe great 'Churches, which perfectly differ from us, have in 'many

(1) Preface to ſome Account of the Greek Ch. p. 11.

(2) Ibid. p. 2. 5, &c.

(3) Ibid. p. 6, 7.

(4) Ibid. p. 8.

(5) Ibid. p. 20.

(6) Account of the preſent Greek Church, &c. p. 1.

Author's Character; we are informed, that he was 'a perſon noted for polite and curious 'Learning, ſingular humanity, and knowledge of the World (q).'

(q) T. Baker, ubi ſupra.

'many things, left their firſt Love, and have hewn out 'unto themſelves many broken ciſterns that can hold no 'water. But God forbid that I ſhould raſhly return 'upon them their extravagant anathema's, or peremp- 'torily damn them, that is, deliver them unto Satan and 'adjudge them all to Hell-fire, as they ſerve us; who am 'I (poor, private, obſcure creature) that I ſhould 'judge another's ſervant? For my part I will leave 'them to the righteous Judge of all the world, before 'whoſe Judgment-Seat we ſhall all one day ſtand.'

The Author having made uſe of ſeveral curious (and before, unknown) Manuſcripts, he took care, for the Reader's ſatisfaction, to depoſite them in the late Earl of Oxford's Library, at Wimpole near Cambridge.

M.

COVERDALE (MILES), Biſhop of Exeter in the reign of Edward VI. and author of ſeveral Tracts [A], was born in Yorkſhire, in the reign of Henry VII [B], and, being educated in the Romiſh religion, became an Auguſtin Monk. Afterwards, embracing the Reformation, he entered into Holy Orders (a) [C]. He aſſiſted William Tindal in the Engliſh Verſion of the Bible, publiſhed in 1537, and afterwards reviſed and corrected the edition of it in a larger volume, with notes, in 1540 (b). On the 14th of Aug. (c) 1551, he ſucceeded Dr. John Harman in the See of Exeter, being promoted propter ſingularem ſacrarum literarum doctrinam, moreſque probatiſſimos (d), i. e. 'on account of his 'extraordinary knowledge in Divinity, and his unblemiſhed character (e).' The Patent for conferring this biſhoprick on him, though a married man, is dated Auguſt 14, 1551, at Weſtminſter (f). Upon the change of religion in Queen Mary's reign, Biſhop Coverdale was ejected from his See, and thrown into priſon; out of which he was releaſed at the earneſt requeſt of the King of Denmark, and, as a very great favour, permitted to go into baniſhment. Soon after Queen Elizabeth's acceſſion to the throne, he returned from his exile, but refuſed to be reſtored to his biſhoprick. He died, in a good old age, at London, and lies buried in the Church of St. Bartholomew-Exchange (g) [D].

(a) Baleus, de Script. Brit. Cent. 9. n. 61.
(b) Collier's Eccleſ. Hiſt. vol. ii. p. 183.
(c) Godwin, ubi infra, ſays the 20th.
(d) 1 Pat. 5 Ed. VI. p. 1.
(e) Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. i. col. 680.
(f) Rymer's Fœdera, &c. vol. xv. p. 283.
(g) Godwin, de Præſul. Angl. inter epiſc. Exon. an. 1551.

[A] He was author of ſeveral Tracts.] He wrote I. The Chriſtian Rule or ſtate of all the worlde from the higheſt to the loweſt: and how every man ſhulde lyve to pleaſe god in hys callynge. II. The Chriſten ſtate of Matrymonye, wherein huſbandes and wyfes maye lerne to keepe houſe together with loue. The Originall of holy wedloke: whan, where, how, and of whom it was inſtituted and ordeyned: what it is: how it ought to procede: what be the occaſions, frute, and commodities thereof: contrarywyſe how ſhamefull and horrible a thinge whoredome and aduoutry * is: how one ought alſo to choſe hym a mete and convenient ſpouſe to kepe and increace the mutual loue, trouth and dewtye of wedloke: and how married folkes ſhulde bring up theyer chyldren in the feare of god. III. A Chriſten Exhortation to cuſtomable Swearers. What a ryghte and lawfull othe is: whan, and before whome it oughte to be. IV. The maner of ſayenge grace, or gywyng thankes to god, after the doctrine of holy ſcrypture. IV. The old Fayth: an evident probacion out of the holy ſcrypture, that the Chriſten Faith (which is the ryghte, true, olde, and undoubted fayth) hath endured ſens the beginnyng of the worlde. Herein haſt thou alſo a ſhort ſumme of the whole Byble, and a probacion, that al vertuous men have pleaſed god, and wer ſaved through the Chriſten fayth. Theſe four pieces are printed together in a ſmall duodecimo, and a black letter, an. 1547. V. A faythfull and true Pronoſtication upon the year M.CCCC. xlix. and perpetualy after to the worldes ende, gathered out of the prophecies and ſcryptures of god, by the experience and practiſe of his workes, very comfortable for all Chriſten hertes; devided into ſeven chapters. VI. A Spirituall Almanacke, wherein every Chriſten man and woman may ſee what they ought daylye to do, or leaue undone. Not after the doctrine of the Papiſtes, not after the lernynge of Ptolomy, or other heythen Aſtronomers, but out of the very true and wholſome doctryne of god our almighty heavenly father, ſhewed unto us in his worde by his prophetes, apoſtles, but ſpecyaly by his dere ſonne Jeſus Chriſt: and is to be kept not onely this newe yeare, but contynually unto the daye of the lorde's comyng agayne. Theſe two were printed in a thin duodecimo, and a black letter, at London by Richard Kele, 'dwellynge at the longe ſhoppe in the Poultry 'under ſaynt Myldreds church, cum privelegio ad im- 'primendum ſolum.' Bale aſcribes ſome other pieces to our author; particularly, A Confutation of John Standiſh, a tract on the Lord's Supper, A Concordance to the New Teſtament, A Chriſtian Catechiſm; and ſome tranſlations from Bullinger, Luther, Oſiander, Johannes Campenſis, and Eraſmus (1).

(*) Adultery.

(1) Baleus, de Script. Brit. Cent. 9. n. 61.

[B] Born in the reign of Henry VII.] This I infer from his dying an old man in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. For, ſuppoſing him to have died about the ſeventieth year of his age, and not many years (as is moſt probable) after Queen Elizabeth's acceſſion in 1558, the year of his birth will fall ſomewhere between 1490 and 1500. But Henry VII. began his reign in 1485, and died in 1509.

[C] Went into holy Orders.] Bale tells us (2), he was one of the firſt, who, upon the revival of the Church of England, together with Dr. Robert Barns, taught the purity of the Goſpel, and dedicated himſelf wholly to the ſervice of the reformed religion. Ex primis unus erat, qui renaſcente Anglorum eccleſia, cum Roberto Barnſo, ſuæ profeſſionis doctore, Chriſtum pure docuit. Alii partim, hic ſe totum dedidit ad propagandam evangelii regni Dei Gloriam.

(2) Ibid.

[D] Lyes buried in the Church of St. Bartholomew-Exchange.] Upon his Grave-ſtone is the following Inſcription (3):

(3) Maitland's Hiſtory of London, p. 377.

Hic tandem requiemque ferens finemque laborum
Oſſa Coverdali mortua tumbus habet:
Exoniæ qui præſul erat digniſſimus olim,
Inſignis vitæ vir probitate ſuæ.
Octoginta annos grandævus vixit et unum,
Indignum paſſus ſæpius exilium.
Sic tandem variis jactatus caſibus iſte
Excipitur gremio, terra benigna, tuo.

I have been obliged to make ſome alterations in this Epitaph, which ſeems to have been faultily tranſcribed in my author: for in the third line he has put Oxoniæ for Exoniæ; in the ſixth, indigni for indignum; in the ſeventh, jactabam for jactatus, and iſta for iſte; and in the laſt line excepitur for excipitur, and ſuo for tuo.

B.

 [The following farther particulars relative to Biſhop Coverdale, have obligingly been communicated by Mr. Brooke, Somerſet Herald, from a manuſcript in his poſſeſſion.

" He (Coverdale) was Almoner to Queen Cathe- " rine Parr, the laſt wife of King Henry the Eighth, " a Lady who much favoured the reformed religion; " and as ſuch, officiated at her funeral in September " 1548, in the Chapel at Sundeley-Caſtle in Glou- " ceſterſhire, the ſeat of her third huſband, Thomas, " Lord

" Lord Seymour of Sudley; and took that opportu" nity of declaring his ſentiments on religion in the " ſermon he preached, which, my author ſays, was " very good and godlie, and in one place thereof he
" toke occaſion to declare unto the people howe that
" there ſhulde none there thinke, ſeye nor ſpread
" abrode, that the offeringe which was there don,
" was don anye thing to proffytt the deade, but for
" the poore onlye; and alſo the lights which were
" caried and ſtode abowte the corps, were for the
" honnour of the parſon, and for none other entente
" nor purpoſe; and ſo wente thorowghe with his
" Sermonde, and made a godlye Prayer, &c."

Our Predeceſſor ought to have mentioned the reaſon of Dr. Coverdale's refuſing to be reſtored to his Biſhopric, which was his attachment to the principles of the Puritans. He had aſſiſted at the conſecration of Queen Elizabeth's firſt Archbiſhop of Canterbury; but, becauſe he could not comply with the ceremonies and habits, he was neglected, and for a time had no preferment of any kind. However, when he was become both old and poor, Grindal, Biſhop of London, gave him the ſmall living of St. Magnus, at the Bridge foot. Here he preached quietly about two years; but not coming up to the terms of conformity then required, he was obliged to relinquiſh his pariſh a little before his death. He was very much admired by the Puritans, who flocked to him in great numbers, while he officiated at St. Magnus's Church, which he did without the habits. When he was deprived of his living, his followers were obliged to ſend to his houſe on Saturdays, to know where they might hear him the next day. At this the Government took umbrage; ſo that the good old man was under the neceſſity of telling his friends, that he durſt not inform them any more of his preaching, for fear of offending his ſuperiors (4).

Dr. Richardſon, in his noble edition of Godwin de Præſulibus Angliæ, ſays that Coverdale died on the 20th of May, 1565 (5); but Mr. Neal aſſerts, that his death happened on the 20th of May, 1567, when he was eighty one years of age (6).] K.

(4) Neal's Hiſt. of the Puritans, vol. i. p. 185. 229, 230, 8*vo.* edit.
(5) P. 417, note p.
(6) Neal, ubi ſupra, p. 185.

 [COURAYER (PETER FRANCIS), a learned Divine of the Church of Rome, who was long reſident in England, was born at Vernon, in Normandy, in the year 1681 (a). Being brought up and educated for the Church, he became Canon regular and Librarian of the Abbey of St. Genevieve. This muſt have been a ſituation extremely favourable to the proſecution of his ſtudies, as the Library of which he had the care is a very conſiderable one [A]. Among other theological inquiries, he engaged in one, which was productive of very important conſequences reſpecting his future life. Having been employed in reading Abbé Renaudot's Memoire ſur la Validité des Ordinations des Anglois, inſerted in Abbé Gould's La veritable Croyance de l'Egliſe Catholique, he was induced to enter into a farther examination of that ſubject (b). Accordingly he drew up a memoir upon it, for his own ſatisfaction only, but which grew inſenſibly into a treatiſe; and at the inſtance of ſome friends to whom it was communicated, he was at length prevailed with to conſent to its publication [B]. He, therefore, made the uſual application for permiſſion to print it; and obtained the approbation of Monſ. Arnaudin [C], the Royal Licenſer of the Preſs. Some perſons, however, afterwards found means to prevail on the Chancellor to refuſe to affix the Seal to the approbation of the Licenſer. Terms were propoſed to Father Courayer, to which he could not accede, and he gave up all thoughts of publiſhing (c). Some of his friends, however, being in poſſeſſion of a copy, reſolved to print it; and this obliged him to acquieſce in the publication. When he firſt wrote his Treatiſe, all his materials were taken from printed authorities, and he had no acquaintance or correſpondence in England. But ſundry difficulties, which occurred to him in the courſe of

(a) Nichols's Anecdotes of Bowyer, p. 84.
(b) Obſervations in a Journey to Paris, by Way of Flanders, in 1776, vol. ii. p. 154.
(c) Ibid, p. 156, 157.

[A] The Library of which he had the care is a very conſiderable one.] It is repreſented as large and curious; and a late traveller, ſpeaking of the building, ſays, 'This Library is a grand room in the form of a 'croſs, about three hundred feet in length and 'breadth, with a dome finely painted in the center. 'Toward the end of one of the arms of the croſs, a 'door opens into a range of apartments, which are 'furniſhed with antiquities and natural curioſities. 'The collection of minerals and foſſils is very conſiderable (1).'

(1) Obſervations in a Journey to Paris by Way of Flanders, in 1776, vol. ii. p. 19.

[B] Prevailed with to conſent to its publication.] In the Preface to his Diſſertation on the Validity of the Engliſh Ordinations, he ſays, 'If the writings of the 'Engliſh, in favour of their Miniſtry, were better 'known, I ſhould not have troubled the public with 'a book, which it would have then but little need of; 'yet I hope that I ſhall be indulged in ſome meaſure 'in favour of a queſtion ſo important, and ſo little 'examined among us, as this I now propoſe to treat 'of. The thing in queſtion is no leſs, than to know 'if the Church of England formerly ſo illuſtrious, and 'even now alſo ſo recommendable for the brightneſs 'of her Prelates, and the erudition of her Clergy, be 'without a ſucceſſion, without an hierarchy, without 'a miniſtry. A great many of our divines maintain 'this, and the Engliſh divines deny it (2).'

(2) P. 3, 4.

[C] Obtained the approbation of Monſ. Arnaudin.] It is publiſhed in the ſecond volume of the Relation Hiſtorique et Apologetique des Sentimens et de la Conduite du P. le Courayer; and the following is a tranſlation of it. 'I have read, by order of my Lord Chancel-'lor, a Manuſcript which has for its title Diſſertation 'ſur la Validité des Ordinations des Anglois et ſur la 'Succeſſion des Eveques de l'Egliſe Anglicane. This 'Diſſertation, of which the matter is as curious as it 'is intereſting, is written with regularity and with 'preciſion. The arguments, made uſe of by the 'learned author, are ſo perſuaſive, and ſo convinc-'ing, that they may juſtly be conſidered as amount-'ing to full demonſtration. Such is the force of 'theſe arguments, that I am perſuaded the Abbé 'Renaudot would himſelf have been convinced by 'them, if death had not taken him from us. That 'great man, who was ſo converſant in every branch 'of literature, always did himſelf the honour to be 'overcome by the truth, and that he would have 'found in this performance. I have ſubſcribed it ſo 'much the more willingly, becauſe the opinion which 'is maintained in it, reſpecting the ordination of the 'Biſhops of England, is the ſame with that of the 'illuſtrious Monſ. Boſſuet, Biſhop of Meaux, whoſe 'juſt taſte in good theology, profound ſcience, and 'extenſive erudition, are known throughout the 'whole Chriſtian world. There is nothing in this 'Diſſertation contrary to the faith of the Church; 'and I am even convinced, that the doctrine con-'tained in this learned and ſolid work, may greatly 'contribute to promote a re-union between the 'Church of England and the Church of Rome, 'which would be a moſt happy event. It would be 'a juſt ſubject of extreme joy to ſee re-entered into 'its boſom a Church, which hath been the mother of 'ſo many conſiderable ſaints, and which yet poſſeſſes 'ſo many learned Biſhops, and ſo great a number of 'fine geniuſſes, who cultivate polite literature and 'the ſciences with diligence and with ſucceſs.

'Paris, Oct. 1, 1721.

D'ARNAUDIN.'

his

his inquiries, ſuggeſted to him the propriety of writing to England, in order to obtain clearer information on ſome points; and knowing that a correſpondence had been carried on between Dr. Wake, then Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Dr. Dupin, on the project of re-uniting the Churches of England and France, he took the liberty, although entirely unknown to that prelate, to deſire his information reſpecting ſome particulars. The Archbiſhop anſwered his inquiries with great readineſs, candour [D], and politeneſs; and many letters paſſed between them on this occaſion. His application to the Archbiſhop appears to have been made upon the very firſt apprehenſion of any difficulty reſpecting his publication: for his Grace's firſt letter to him was dated September 16, 1721. Father Courayer's book was at length publiſhed in 1723, in two volumes, ſmall 8*vo*, under the following title: "Diſſertation ſur la Validité des Ordinations des Anglois, et ſur la Suc-" ceſſion des Eveſques de l'Egliſe Anglicane: avec les preuves juſtificatives des faits " avancez dans cet ouvrage." It was printed at Nancy [E], though it was ſtated in the title to have been printed at Bruſſels. It was afterwards tranſlated into Engliſh, by the Rev. Mr. Daniel Williams, and publiſhed at London, in one volume, 8*vo*. under the following title: "A Defence of the Validity of the Engliſh Ordinations [F], and of the Suc-" ceſſion of the Biſhops in the Church of England: together with proofs juſtifying the " facts advanced in this treatiſe." Father Courayer's work was immediately attacked by ſeveral Popiſh writers, particularly by Father Le Quien, and Father Hardouin. But in 1726, he publiſhed, in four volumes, 12*mo*. "Defenſe de la Diſſertation ſur la Validité " des Ordinations des Anglois, contre les differentes Réponſes qui y ont été faites. Avec " les Preuves juſtificatives des faits avancez dans cet Ouvrage. Par l'Auteur de la Diſſer-" tation." An Engliſh tranſlation of this alſo was afterwards publiſhed at London, in two volumes, 8*vo*. under the following title: "A Defence of the Diſſertation on the " Validity of the Engliſh Ordinations, againſt the ſeveral Anſwers made to it [G], with " proper Vouchers for the Facts advanced in that Work."

But

[D] The Archbiſhop anſwered his Inquiries with great readineſs, candour, &c.] Father Courayer thus expreſſed himſelf concerning the manner in which Archbiſhop Wake anſwered his Inquiries: 'I owe eſpecially to my Lord Archbiſhop of Canterbury this 'honourable teſtimony, that he has ſpared no pains, 'nor no applications, in order to procure for me the 'means of elucidating theſe facts; and that which is 'infinitely more eſtimable, of having manifeſted in 'his own reſearches ſo great a love of truth, and 'ſhewn himſelf ſo deſtitute of all prejudices in favour 'of his own party, that I cannot too much applaud 'his impartiality, his knowledge, and his humanity (3).'

(3) Obſervations, &c. ubi ſupra, p 159.

[E] Was printed at Nancy.] Of this we are informed by himſelf. He ſays, Quoi qu'imprimée à Nanci ſur l' approbation du Sieur D'Arnaudin et la permiſſion tacite du magiſtrat, le libraire crut devoir degviſer le lieu de l' impreſſion, et la fit paroître ſous le nom de Bruxelles (4).

(4) Relation hiſtorique et apologetique, tom. i. p. 9.

[F] A Defence of the Validity of the Engliſh Ordinations] In the Preface to the Tranſlation of this Work, Mr. Williams ſays, 'What the Reader is 'here to expect is, a juſt and rational vindication of 'our Church, from the ridiculous ſtory of a ludicrous conſecration of our Biſhops in Queen Elizabeth's time, at the Nag's-Head in Cheapſide: a 'calumny, firſt invented to ſupport a weak cauſe, and 'continued by perſons as weak and injudicious as the 'firſt inventors of it. The ſucceſſion of our Biſhops 'in general is demonſtrated, and the validity of our 'ordinal is alſo vindicated, with a great deal of 'learning, as well as judgment. The powers of a 'national Church are aſſerted; and it is fully proved, 'that in the alterations made by our Church, ſhe did 'not act in the buſineſs of ordinations inconſiſtently 'with thoſe powers (5).'

(5) Pref. p. 9.

In a letter to Mr. Williams, Father Courayer expreſſed his acknowledgments to that Gentleman for the fidelity of his tranſlation of his work; and he added, 'If my work be reliſhed in England, I doubt 'not, but that I ſhall be partly indebted for it to the 'goodneſs of your tranſlation. In making me ſpeak 'your language, you procure me the approbation of 'a knowing and a learned nation; and you in a 'manner naturalize me among a people eſteemed by 'all the learned men in Europe. This is an obligation which I ſhall be ſcarcely able ſufficiently to 'acknowledge, and which I can only repay by a 'deſire ſo ſee an end put to the ſchiſm and diviſion. 'I wiſh the ſeeds of peace and re-union, which I have 'ſown in this treatiſe, may in time grow up to the 'advantage of your Church, and the joy of ours. 'The return of the Church of England to Catholic 'unity, would quickly draw after it that of all the 'Proteſtant Churches, who ſeem to be more ſenſible 'than ever, of the deficiency of their Government, 'and the exceſſes of their firſt reformers (6).'

(6) Letter from Father Courayer to Mr. Williams, prefixed to the ſecond edition of the Defence of the Engliſh Ordinations, p. 18, 20.

It appears, however, that when Father Courayer wrote the above letter, he had ſeen only ſome ſheets of the tranſlation in manuſcript; and he afterwards complained, that in the impreſſion the manuſcript was caſtrated; though this is ſtated to have been contrary to the intention of the Tranſlator (7).

(7) Pref. to the Defence of the Diſſertation on the Validity of the Engliſh Ordinations, p. 14.

Of the method in which Father Courayer executed his work, ſome idea may be formed from the following extract from his Preface: 'In order to treat this 'ſubject more methodically, I ſhall firſt ſet forth the 'changes that happened in the Church of England, 'with regard to the ſucceſſion of their Biſhops, and 'their ordination. I ſhall afterwards prove, that 'notwithſtanding the changes introduced by Edward 'the VIth. in the Ordinal, there was nothing eſſential omitted in Parker's conſecration, who is the 'ſource and origin of the Engliſh Miniſtry, as it 'ſubſiſts at this day. I ſhall in the chapters that follow prove the truth of Barlow's conſecration, upon 'which that of Parker depends: and I ſhall endeavour to refute all the arguments brought againſt it. 'In fine, in diſcuſſing ſome general difficulties propoſed againſt the validity of the new ordinations, 'I ſhall lay down principles and maxims which may 'ſerve, not only to eſtabliſh the Engliſh ordinations, 'but alſo to examine other facts that might happen 'of the ſame kind. I ſhall moreover carefully examine, what authority a national Church can challenge, in what concerns the adminiſtration of Sacraments: and I hope to make it very evident, that 'the Church of England has not exceeded the 'bounds of her power in thoſe alterations ſhe thought 'fit to make in her rites (8).'

(8) P. 6, 7.

In another part of this Preface, Courayer likewiſe makes an obſervation reſpecting the Church of England, which the generality of Proteſtants will hardly conſider as a compliment to it, though the good Father certainly intended it for ſuch. 'Of all 'the Churches which have broken the unity,' ſays he, 'the Church of England has kept neareſt to us. 'She has retained moſt of our cuſtoms and ceremonies (9).'

(9) Ibid. p. 4.

[G] A Defence of the Diſſertation on the Validity of the Engliſh Ordinations, &c.] Beſides what he had ſaid

But Father Courayer was not only attacked by thoſe writers who publiſhed books againſt him. He was likewiſe cenſured both by the mandates and by the aſſemblies of ſeveral Biſhops, and particularly by Cardinal de Noailles, Archbiſhop of Paris [H], and the ſaid in general in defence of the Engliſh ordinations, Father Courayer had given great offence to many zealous Catholics by what he had ſaid reſpecting Tranſubſtantiation, and the ſentiments of the Clergy of the Church of England concerning the doctrine of the real preſence. It was maintained by Courayer's opponents, that the Engliſh Clergy did not acknowledge the Euchariſt to be a Sacrifice, as the Catholics did; that the offering of ſacrifice was the chief function of the Chriſtian prieſthood; that the ritual of King Edward VI. made no mention of the ſacrifice, nor of the power given to the Prieſt to offer it; and that, of conſequence, all ordinations made conformably to that ritual were null and void. Father Courayer, on the contrary, contended, that particular churches were in poſſeſſion of a right to draw up their own form for the adminiſtration of the Sacraments; and though this form ſhould not agree with others, except only as to the ſubſtance, yet no body ought, for that reaſon, to conclude either this or that form to be invalid. He affirmed, that this was an avowed and eſtabliſhed principle of the Gallican Church. 'It 'is a known maxim in France,' ſaid he, 'and a fun-'damental principle of our laws and liberties, that 'every Church is miſtreſs of her own diſcipline, and 'even that the authority of a general Council can-'not oblige her to give them up; and that notwith-'ſtanding ſuch decrees, ſhe ought to maintain her 'own uſages. It is upon this principle that we have 'ever oppoſed, in France, the reception of the de-'crees of the Council of Trent upon the ſubject of 'diſcipline, though as to the matter of doctrine, this 'Council is received as a general council (10).' It followed, he ſaid, 'that the Church of England, as 'well as any other, might compoſe her own prayers, 'regulate her own liturgy, and direct the manner of 'the adminiſtration of her own Sacraments accord-'ing to her own mind; and, in a word, make what 'changes ſhe thought fit, provided they were com-'patible with the eſſential parts of the inſtitutions, 'which are common to all Churches, and practiſed 'in all ages (11).' He maintained farther, that the omiſſion of the form, in the Engliſh ordinal, relative to the "power to ſacrifice," could not prejudice the Engliſh prieſthood, 'becauſe they made no difficulty 'to own the ſacrifice in the ſame ſenſe with moſt of 'the antient Fathers, and of our moſt judicious con-'troverſial writers; that is to ſay, a Repreſentative 'and Commemorative Sacrifice, which is not different 'from that of the croſs, and which bears the name, 'becauſe it is the image and memorial of it, and be-'cauſe the ſame victim is offered (12).' He alſo affirmed, that "Jeſus Chriſt became preſent by the "conſecration of the Engliſh, as really as by that of "the Catholics (13)." In this laſt poſition there are many, who have but little faith in prieſtly claims, who will very readily concur in ſentiment with the learned Father.

(10) Defence of the Validity of the Engliſh Ordinations, p. 174.

(11) Ibid. p. 182.

(12) Ibid. p. 247.

(13) Defence of the Diſſertation, vol. ii. p. 133.

Courayer likewiſe endeavoured to prove, that it was never required, that the forms of Sacraments ſhould diſtinctly expreſs their principal function or chief effect; that the antient forms of ſacerdotal ordination frequently omit mentioning the ſacrifice; that nothing eſſential was omitted in the ritual of King Edward the Sixth; that though Jeſus Chriſt be really preſent under the ſymbols of the Euchariſt, the Fathers and Divines draw the idea of the ſacrifice in the Euchariſt, not from that preſence, but from the repreſentation and remembrance of his death; and that even though the preſence be ſuppoſed neceſſary, that which the Engliſh Church admits would be ſufficient for a Spiritual Sacrifice, as is that of the Catholic Church; that the ſtory of Archbiſhop Parker being ordained at a Tavern is fabulous in all its circumſtances; that there was no want of conſecrated Biſhops at that time for the conſecration of Parker; that there is as much certainty of his being ordained at Lambeth as there can be of any hiſtorical fact; and that there has been no interruption in the ſucceſſion of the Biſhops of the Church of England, nor of their ordination.

[H] Particularly by Cardinal de Noailles, Archbiſhop of Paris.] In a mandate iſſued by the Cardinal, and dated at Paris, Aug. 18, 1727, his eminence obſerves, that ſickneſs having prevented him from examining Father Courayer's books himſelf, he had enjoined ſeveral able Theologians to peruſe them with all poſſible attention; and upon their report it was found, that 'in many places they contained 'doctrine, or expreſſions, contrary to what the Church 'taught, as to the ſacrifice of the maſs, the real pre-'ſence, the prieſthood, the form of the Sacraments, 'and the notions they inſtil as to the rites and cere-'monies of the Church, its authority, the Pope's 'ſupremacy, and other important points.' The Cardinal adds, 'We do not pronounce upon the 'ground of the queſtion about the validity of the or-'dinations of the Engliſh, and the ſucceſſion of their 'Biſhops, which is the Author's ſcope in his works; 'but we will only tell him, that a Catholic Theolo-'gian ought to ſpeak with more reſpect of the com-'mon practice of the Church, to propoſe to her with 'modeſty his doubts and reflections, to wait her de-'ciſion with a ſubmiſſive diſpoſition, and not to pre-'ſcribe laws to her in a preſumptuous manner, nor 'to call ignorance and prejudice whatever is contrary 'to his opinion.

'We are willing to believe, as he has aſſured us, 'that he propoſed to himſelf no other view, than to 'facilitate the re-union of the Engliſh to the Catho-'lic Church and its head; but his deſire to favour 'thoſe whom he had a mind to reclaim, ought not 'to carry him ſo far as to juſtify errors, expreſſions, 'and abuſes, which every Catholic ought to reject, 'and the Church will never approve.

'What would we not do for bringing back to the 'faith of their anceſtors, and to the Catholic unity, 'a people ſo conſiderable, and a nation formerly ſo 'ſubmiſſive to the Holy See, that has brought forth 'ſo many great men, and Holy Biſhops, and for 'whoſe ſalvation we could wiſh, in the ſenſe of St. 'Paul, to become an anathema? But God forbid, 'that for ſo great a good we ſhould ſuffer the ſenti-'ments of the Church to be diſguiſed, or errors, 'which ſhe condemns, to be approved (*).'

(*) Hiſtorical Regiſter, vol. xiv. p. 37, 38.

The Cardinal added farther, that having heard the report, and the advice of the Theologians, appointed by him to examine Father Courayer's books, 'after 'a mature conſideration, and the invocation of God's 'holy name, we condemn the ſaid writings, as con-'taining a doctrine falſe, erroneous, ſcandalous, in-'jurious to the Church and the Holy See, favouring 'ſchiſm and hereſy, and even contrary in many 'points to the Catholic Doctrine.' And he prohibited, 'under the known penalties, all the people of 'his dioceſe from reading the ſaid books.'

The French Court having alſo referred Courayer's books to the examination of ſeveral Biſhops and Divines, they declared, that he had 'advanced a great 'many propoſitions equally contrary to the points of 'the doctrine, in relation to ſeveral eſſential articles 'of religion and diſcipline, as well as to the autho-'rity of the Church and the Pope's ſupremacy, which 'had induced them to condemn them as reſpectively 'falſe, raſh, captious, ill-ſounding, ſcandalous, in-'jurious to the Church and the Holy See, favouring 'ſchiſm and hereſy, erroneous, already condemned 'by the holy Council of Trent, and heretical.' This cenſure having been preſented to the French King, an Arret of the Council of State was iſſued three days after, by which it was declared, that Father Courayer's books ſhould be ſuppreſſed; and it was required, that 'all perſons, who had the ſame books, 'ſhould deliver them to the Regiſter-Office of the 'Lieutenant-General of the Police, upon ſevere 'penalties (†).'

(†) Hiſtorical Regiſter, vol. xiv. p. 37, 38, 39, 40.

the Biſhop of Marſeilles (d). During the time that he underwent this ſpecies of perſecution, he retired from Paris into the country, but was recalled by his ſuperior to reſide at the Priory of Hennemonte, four leagues from Paris. Here he received a diploma for the degree (*) of Doctor in Divinity from the Univerſity of Oxford, which was dated Aug. 28, 1727; and from hence he returned his thanks to the Univerſity, in an elegant Latin letter, dated Dec. 1, the ſame year; both of which he afterwards printed (e). But though his book had procured this honourable teſtimonial of his merit from an Engliſh Univerſity [I], the animoſity which it had excited againſt him in France did not abate. The enemies of Father Courayer were not ſatisfied with publiſhing cenſures, and iſſuing epiſcopal mandates againſt him, but proceeded to meaſures for compelling him to recant what he had written, and to ſign ſuch ſubmiſſions as were inconſiſtent with the dictates of his conſcience. In this critical ſtate of things, he reſolved to quit his native country, and to ſeek an aſylum in England. He was the more inclined to embrace this reſolution, in conſequence of the warm and friendly invitations which he had received from Archbiſhop Wake, who had conceived a great regard for him. After having ſpent four months very diſagreeably at Hennemonte, he obtained leave to remove to Senlis; but, inſtead of going thither, he took the road to Calais in the common ſtage-coach, and from thence got ſafely over to Dover. "I arrived peaceably," ſays he, "in England, without "any other inconveniencies, than thoſe which are naturally attendant on a long journey "in winter, and which were ſomewhat encreaſed by my being detained three days at "Calais by contrary winds (f)." This ſtay at Calais, he obſerves, would have been a very unfavourable circumſtance for him, if any ſuſpicion had been formed of his deſign to quit France; but he had conducted the meaſures for his departure with ſo much ſecrecy and prudence, that his enemies were wholly ignorant of his intentions; and had, therefore, taken no ſteps to prevent his ſecuring a retreat in England. He arrived in London on the 24th of January, 1728 (g).

He was well received in England: the Marquis of Blandford made him a preſent of fifty pounds (h); and he obtained a penſion of one hundred pounds a year from the Court. In 1729, he publiſhed, at Amſterdam, in two volumes, 12*mo*, "Relation Hiſtorique et "Apologetique des Sentimens et de la Conduite du P. le Courayer, Chanoine Regulier "de Ste. Geneviéve: avec les Preuves Juſtificatives des Faits avancez dans l'Ouvrage "[K]." In this work he entered into a farther juſtification of his ſentiments and of his conduct,

(d) Relation Hiſtorique et Apologetique des Sentimens et de la Conduite du P. le Courayer, tom. i. p. 86, 147, &c.

(*) Catalogue of Oxford Graduates, p. 83.

(e) In the ſecond vol. of his Relation Hiſtorique et Apologetique, &c.

(f) Relation Hiſtorique et Apologetique, ubi ſupra, p. 312.

(g) Obſervations in a Journey to Paris, ubi ſupra, p. 31.

(h) Id. ibid.

(f) Id. ibid.

(m) Id. ibid.

(n) Ib. p. 34,

(o) Nichols, ſupra.

The enemies of Father Courayer having given out that he had been converted by Cardinal de Noailles, and that he had, in conſequence, made a recantation of his errors, he wrote a letter to his eminence upon that ſubject before he quitted France, in which he ſays, 'I ought, my Lord, for my own ſake, and for 'the ſake of the public, to diſown a pretended ſubmiſſion, more diſgraceful to me than all the imaginary hereſies, which they ſeek out in my writings 'without finding them.' In the ſame letter, ſpeaking of his determination to leave his native country, Father Courayer ſays, 'By adherence to the Catholic 'Church in a foreign land, I will convince all Europe, 'that nothing but the reaſon of a juſt defence, and 'the neceſſity of freeing myſelf from an unjuſt vexation, could force me to take a ſtep ſo contrary to 'my inclinations. Being always ready to reſume 'my former condition, as ſoon as I have a reaſonable 'aſſurance, that there is no longer any deſign of 'undoing me, and that I ſhall be at full liberty to 'go about my juſtification, I ſhall be the firſt in longing for a State which I leave with the greateſt uneaſineſs. I ſhall carry every where a love of unity, 'a fondneſs for my profeſſion, and a reſpect for thoſe 'very perſons who condemn me unjuſtly.

'Being free enough to own the abuſes that prevail 'in the Church, and not to ſubmit to that multitude 'of opinions with which our Creed is enlarged, by a 'continual creation of new articles of faith, I ſhall 'never depart from a due ſubmiſſion to thoſe Catholic truths which have been tranſmitted to us by our 'fathers, and to the uſages conſecrated by the practice of the Church. But I ſhall neither be ſo ſuperſtitious as to place a vain confidence in them, nor 'ſo fond of our obſervances and ceremonies, as to 'believe that a Church cannot change them, without 'renouncing religion, and the glorious title of 'Church of Jeſus Chriſt.

'It is with ſuch diſpoſitions, my Lord, that I leave 'France, and that a foreign kingdom ſhall ſee the 'ſpectacle of a man calumniated and perſecuted, for 'being ſo bold as to aſſert the falſity of a romance, 'transformed into a hiſtory by our prejudices; and 'becauſe, notwithſtanding his adherence to the Catholic doctrines, he cannot ſubmit to the unintelligible jargon of our ſchools (*).'

(*) Ibid. p. 42, 48, 49.

Though this letter was written by Father Courayer before he quitted France, it was probably not delivered to the Cardinal till after he had left the kingdom.

[I] Honourable teſtimonial of his merit from an Engliſh Univerſity.] Voltaire was of opinion, that the Engliſh nation paid no regard to the ſubject of Father Courayer's book. Speaking of one of his opponents, Father Le Quien, he ſays, 'He was a 'Dominican, and a man of great learning. He 'applied himſelf greatly to the ſtudy of the Eaſtern 'Churches, and that of England. He in particular 'wrote againſt Courayer upon the validity of the 'ordinations of the Engliſh Biſhops. But the Engliſh pay no more regard to theſe diſputes than the 'Turks do to diſſertations upon the Greek Church '(14).' With reſpect to a great part of the Engliſh nation, Voltaire was certainly right. They regarded the ſubject of the controverſy as a matter of not the leaſt conſequence. But that there were many of the Engliſh Clergy, as well as others, who conſidered Father Courayer as having rendered an eſſential ſervice to the Church of England by his publication, is manifeſt from the degree that was conferred on him by the Univerſity of Oxford, the penſion that was granted him, and the favourable reception that he met with in England. The number of thoſe who would think highly of the importance of the ſubject of Courayer's book, are, however, probably much leſſened, ſince the time that his work firſt made its appearance.

(14) Age of Lewis XIV. vol. ii. p. 371, 372. Eng. Tranſla. ed. 8*vo*. 1752.

[K] Relation Hiſtorique et Apologetique des ſentimens, &c.] In this work Father Courayer makes ſome general obſervations relative to his religious ſentiments: 'Born,' ſays he, 'a Chriſtian and a Catholic, 'I have always endeavoured to inſtruct myſelf in 'religion, with the ſame zeal and the ſame freedom, 'that I ſhould have believed myſelf under an obligation to do, if I had taken a part in any other 'affair which I had conceived to be of the utmoſt import-conduct, and ſhewed the neceſſity that he was under of quitting France, from the virulence and power of his enemies. In 1733, he was at Oxford, and was preſent in the Theatre at the Public Act that year, and made a ſpeech there upon the occaſion, which was afterwards printed both in Latin and Engliſh (i). In 1736, he publiſhed at London, in two volumes, folio, a Tranſlation, in French, of Father Paul's Hiſtory of the Council of Trent; with notes critical, hiſtorical, and theological. He dedicated this work to Queen Caroline, and ſpeaks of it as having been undertaken by her command; and he expreſſes, in the ſtrongeſt terms, his gratitude to her Majeſty for her patronage, and for the liberality which ſhe had manifeſted towards him [L]. A liſt of ſubſcribers is prefixed, in which are found the names of the Prince of Wales, the Duke of Cumberland, the Prince and Princeſs of Orange, the Princeſſes Amelia and Caroline, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor, Lord Hardwicke, then Chief Juſtice of the King's Bench, Sir Robert Walpole, and many of the nobility, and other perſons of diſtinction. By the ſale of this work he is ſaid to have gained fifteen hundred pounds; and the Queen alſo raiſed his penſion to two hundred pounds per Annum (k). He gave ſixteen hundred pounds to Lord Feverſham, for an annuity of one hundred pounds per Annum, which he enjoyed forty years (l). By theſe means he came into very eaſy circumſtances, which were rendered ſtill more ſo by the reception which his agreeable and inſtructive converſation procured him, among perſons of rank and fortune, with many of whom it was his cuſtom to live for ſeveral months at a time. He wrote ſome other works in French, beſides thoſe that have been mentioned (m); and, in particular, he tranſlated into that language Sleidan's Hiſtory of the Reformation. His exile from his own country was probably no diminution of his happineſs upon the whole; for he appears to have paſſed his time in England very agreeably, and he lived to an uncommon age. Even in his latter years, he was diſtinguiſhed for the chearfulneſs of his temper, and the ſprightlineſs of his converſation. He died in Downing-ſtreet, Weſtminſter, after two days illneſs, on the 17th of October, 1776, at the age of ninety-five. Agreeably to his own deſire, he was buried in the Cloiſter of Weſtminſter-Abbey, by Dr. Bell, Chaplain to the Princeſs Amelia (n). In his Will, which was dated Feb. 3, 1774, he declared, "That he died a "Member of the Catholic Church, but without approving of many of the opinions and "ſuperſtitions which have been introduced into the Romiſh Church, and taught in their "ſchools and ſeminaries, and which they have inſiſted on as articles of faith, though to "him they appeared to be not only not founded in truth, but alſo to be highly improba-"ble (o)." It is ſaid, that ſoon after he came to England, he went to a Prieſt, of the Romiſh Church, for confeſſion, and acquainted him who he was. The Prieſt would not

(i) Nichols's Anecdotes of Bowyer, p. 834.

(k) Obſervations, ubi ſupra, p. 314.

(l) Id. ibid.

(m) Id. ibid.

(n) Ib. p. 34, 36.

(o) Nichols, ut ſupra.

'importance. Convinced of the exiſtence of a God, 'to whom we are indebted for our being, and who 'merits on that account our adoration and our gra-'titude; and perſuaded that we are created for ano-'ther life; I have never regarded but with horror 'that indifference, with which the greater part of 'mankind live reſpecting a point, the deciſion of 'which is of ſo much conſequence to our tranquility. 'From the worſhip of God, and the hope of another 'life, it was eaſy to paſs to the approbation of Chriſ-'tianity, which more than any other religion hath 'illuſtrated theſe truths, and furniſhed us with the 'means of employing them for our ſanctification. 'The more I have ſtudied the Goſpel, the more 'worthy it has appeared to me of approbation, and 'the more worthy of being adhered to. Nothing is 'ſo pure as the worſhip that it propoſes, nothing ſo 'exact as the rules that it preſcribes, nothing ſo holy 'as the life that it enjoins, nothing ſo noble as the 'recompenſe that it leads us to hope for, nothing is 'ſo proper to render men and ſocieties happy; ſince 'that in ſubduing the paſſions to reaſon and to reli-'gion, it takes away even the ſource of our miſeries 'in taking away that of our diſorders. It ſuppoſes 'all natural truths, and deſtroys none. It reforms 'all vices, and conducts us to the practice of all 'virtues. It re-eſtabliſhes in the minds of men thoſe 'ideas of juſtice, of charity, of temperance, of mo-'deſty, and of piety, which the author of nature had 'formed in us, and which ſin had deſtroyed. Nothing 'is ſo true as that which is ſaid by St. Paul, that 'Jeſus Chriſt hath made all things new, and, by a 'kind of ſecond creation, hath rendered us again 'capable of righteouſneſs and true holineſs. The 'Goſpel is a new miſſion, in which religion is no 'more confined within the limits of a people or of a 'province; and in which all men, having the ſame 'Creator, are recalled, without diſtinction, to the 'ſame laws, and to the ſame hopes. It is a new 'worſhip, in which we are taught, that there is no 'other which is agreeable to him, but that which is 'in ſpirit and in truth. It is a new morality, which 'does not confine itſelf to the repreſſing thoſe out-'ward actions which are ſinful; but which teaches 'us to dry up the ſource of evil actions, in condemn-'ing even evil thoughts and deſires. It operates 'upon us by new hopes, and new fears; and it is no 'more the expectation of temporal good, or the fear 'of temporal evil, by which we are excited to prac-'tiſe virtue, and to avoid vice. Whatever is con-'fined to the preſent life only appears unworthy of 'us: and man, better inſtructed in the grandeur of 'his origin, and of his end, cheriſhes no thoughts 'but thoſe which relate to eternity, for which he 'perceives that his ſoul was deſtined (15).'

[L] His gratitude to her Majeſty for her patronage, and for the liberality, &c.] He ſays in this dedication, 'Exiled into your Majeſty's dominions by thoſe 'enemies which the love of truth alone procured me, 'and the defence of a Church which you have ever 'honoured with your eſteem and protection, your 'goodneſs has been my aſylum in diſgrace, ſuſtained 'me under my afflictions, relieved my neceſſities, and 'ſupplied all my wants; oft-times preventing and 'exceeding my occaſions; while, to crown the gran-'deur of your beneficence, you have ſcarcely ſuffered 'me to thank you for thoſe favours, which you 'deemed inconſiderable, though the weight of them 'overwhelmed me. Delighted with the conſciouſ-'neſs of well-doing, more than with all the elogies 'that naturally attend your benevolence, you refuſe 'to admit even the juſteſt acknowledgments; and to 'ſave thoſe you ſuccour, as far as poſſible, the pub-'liſhing their misfortunes, by the recital of your 'grace and clemency, you ſeek only the divine ſatis-'faction of ſolacing the unhappy, without bartering 'your liberality for applauſe (16).'

(15) Relation Hiſtorique et Apologetique, tom. i. p. 431, 432, 433.

(16) Nichols, ubi ſupra, p. 84.

venture

venture to take his confeſſion, becauſe he was excommunicated; but adviſed him to conſult his ſuperior of St. Genevieve. Whether he made any ſuch application, or what was the reſult, we are not informed: but it is certain, that, when in London, he made it his practice to go to maſs; and, when in the country at Ealing, he conſtantly attended the ſervice of the pariſh Church, declaring, at all times, that he had great ſatisfaction in the prayers of the Church of England (p). In diſcourſing on religious ſubjects he was reſerved and cautious, avoiding controverſy as much as poſſible. He left 500*l.* to the pariſh of St. Martin, and gave, in his life-time, his books to the library there, which was founded by Archbiſhop Teniſon, and of which they make even at this day a conſiderable part. He bequeathed 200*l.* to the pariſh of St. Margaret, Weſtminſter, and a handſome ſum of money to the poor of Vernon, in Normandy; and, after many legacies to his friends in England [M], the remainder to two nephews of his name at Vernon (q). During his life-time, he was occaſionally generous to ſome of his relations in France; and in England, was very liberal to the poor [N]. He had two ſiſters who were nuns; and lately had a brother living at Paris, in the profeſſion of the law, to whom he gave a handſome gold ſnuff-box, which had been preſented to him by Queen Caroline (r).

(p) Obſervations, &c. ubi ſupra, p. 35.

(q) Nichols, ut ſupra.

(r) Obſervations, &c. ubi ſupra, p. 32, 35.

In 1787 was publiſhed, in 8*vo*. by the Rev. William Bell, D.D. Prebendary of Weſtminſter, "Declaration de mes derniers ſentimens ſur les differens dogmes de la Religion. Par "feu Pierre François le Courayer, Docteur en Theologie, &c." An Engliſh tranſlation of this has been ſince publiſhed. The original manuſcript, which was given by Father Courayer to the Princeſs Amelia, who had a great eſteem for him, was written in 1767, which was about nine years before his death. The Princeſs Amelia left this manuſcript by Will to Dr. Bell; who publiſhed it, as being of opinion, that the laſt ſentiments of a writer of Dr. Courayer's reputation, and whoſe ſituation was ſo peculiar, were calculated to excite the attention of the learned, and of thoſe who were zealouſly attached to the intereſts of religion: and, indeed, it appears to have been the wiſh of the Author himſelf that it ſhould be publiſhed, though not till after his death. The whole of this piece of Father Courayer's is too long to be here inſerted; but we ſhall make ſome extracts from it, that our readers may be enabled to form the more accurate judgment of his theological opinions.

His Declaration begins in the following manner: "On the point of appearing before "God, both to fulfil the duty of ſincerity, and to furniſh all, into whoſe hands this writing "may fall, with a teſtimony which every perſon living owes to truth; urged moreover by "my conſcience, to declare my thoughts on the doctrines of Chriſtianity, and the differ-"ences which divide Chriſtian ſocieties; I proceed to do it with that ſimplicity which "becomes integrity, and from which the near approach of death will not ſuffer me to "deviate."

It is obſervable, that Dr. Courayer's ſentiments, reſpecting the doctrine of the Trinity, were not conformable to thoſe which are generally reputed orthodox. "I believe," ſays he, "not only that there is a God; but, moreover, that there is but one. I deteſt the "error of two principles, maintained by ſo many antient heretics; and while I aſcribe to "God the glory of all good, I believe that I can only have recourſe to the will of man, "for the diſcovery of the original of moral evil."—"The doctrine of the Unity of God, "ſo true, and ſo evident, has ſerved for a pretext to many, to try to inſpire an averſion to "Chriſtianity, as if it affected this truth by the doctrines of the Trinity and the Incarna-

[M] After many legacies to his friends in England.] He ſeemed ſolicitous to bequeath ſomething to all by whom he had at any time been benefited; and, among others, he left legacies even to his waſherwoman, and his barber. This appears from his will, as preſerved in the Prerogative Office, Doctor's Commons. There are ſeveral codicils to his will; and the Gentleman firſt appointed his executor, John Palairet, Eſq; died before himſelf.

[N] In England, was very liberal to the poor.] In an "Account of Dr. Courayer," prefixed to the Engliſh tranſlation of his "Declaration of his laſt "ſentiments on the different doctrines of Religion," it is obſerved, that, by degrees, "he got into very "affluent circumſtances, and was in the receipt of "very much more money yearly, than his frugal "mode of living required. He did not, however, "hoard up the overplus of his annual income, or "ſuffer his ſtudious ſavings to accumulate. His "dreſs, though always remarkably neat, was not "coſtly, not even when he appeared in the habit of "a layman, and wore a ſword, which he ſometimes "did, it is ſaid, very aukwardly. He kept no houſe, "he was in no one article of living expenſive, and "the indigent partook very freely in his good for-"tune. Poor priſoners were favourite objects of his "charitable diſpoſition, and ſhared very liberally in "his bounty. From the firſt payment of his pen-"ſion, it was certainly his cuſtom, and the writer is "well aſſured, that it was not unuſual for him, to "pay from fifty to eighty pounds a year, at a time, "for their benefit. It is well known, and well at-"teſted, that he was wont to reſtrict his expenditure "on himſelf, to a very moderate weekly ſum; and "all that he could poſſibly ſave out of his own al-"lotment, with the remainder of his income, never "forgetting his charities, he religiouſly appropriated, "to ſupply the neceſſities, and to add to the com-"forts, of two nun-ſiſters, and an elder brother, "whom he left behind him in France (17)."

(17) Account of Dr. Courayer, p. 29, 30, 31.

In the ſame account, ſome particulars are mentioned of his reception when he firſt arrived in England. "On his landing at Greenwich, Lord Vi-"count Percival, afterwards Earl of Egmont, ſent "his coach with ſix horſes to convey him to his "houſe, which he deſired the Doctor to conſider, and "to uſe, as his own; after dinner his Lordſhip made "him a handſome preſent. Next day, Dr. Wake, "then Archbiſhop of Canterbury, had him to dine "at his Palace at Lambeth, and made him a like "preſent. Biſhop Hare, Biſhop Sherlock, and ſe-"veral other prelates, treated him with ſimilar "generoſity (18)."

(18) Ibid. p. 34.

"tion.

" tion. The writings of ſome of the Fathers, and the wretched philoſophy of the ſchools, " may, in fact, have given ground to ſome people to draw ſuch a conſequence: but there is " nothing in the goſpel which does not tend, on the contrary, to confirm us more and " more in the knowledge and worſhip of One God; and nothing is leſs oppoſite to this " truth, than the doctrines which are thought to deſtroy it effectually."

" Of all the modes of explaining the doctrine of the Trinity, I know of none more " contrary to the true doctrine of Chriſtianity, than that which ſuppoſes in the Deity the " exiſtence of three diſtinct natures, or ſubſtances, whether collateral, or ſubordinate. " This is, according to my apprehenſion, to re-eſtabliſh Polytheiſm, under the pretence of " explaining a myſtery. The Unity of God is the foundation of the goſpel; and every " thing that may in any way affect this truth is dangerous. As Jeſus Chriſt and his " apoſtles have laboured, on the one hand, to reclaim the Gentiles from the belief and " from the worſhip of many Gods, and have ſuppoſed, on the other hand, that the Jews " thought ſoundly in the article of the Deity, in which they never diſtinguiſhed different " ſubſtances; it ſeems to me a departure from the ſimplicity of the goſpel, and a volun- " tary inclination to corrupt the idea of a clear truth, by ſingular explications, which it " becomes neceſſary to abuſe at leaſt, in order to combat.

" I believe, therefore, that there is but only one God; that his Spirit is not a ſubſtance " diſtinct from him; and that Jeſus Chriſt, to whom divinity was very intimately united, " is his Son in virtue of that union. This is all the Trinity that I find in the Goſpel; " and I cannot conceive that any other Trinity can accord with the Unity of God. I " know that many ancient writers have had recourſe to the multiplications of ſubſtances, " to give us an idea of this myſtery; and others have imagined other ſyſtems, more philo- " ſophical than evangelical, that have leſs ſerved to clear up this matter than to obſcure it. " But I diſtinguiſh theſe ſyſtems from that of the Goſpel: and, in as much as I find this " laſt worthy of reſpect, it therefore appears to me little eſſential to adopt notions which " often have much obſcurity, and ſometimes are even involved in contradiction.

" The Incarnation has nothing any more contrary to the doctrine of the Unity of God, " than the Trinity. Accordingly, it is extremely remarkable, that neither Jeſus Chriſt " nor his apoſtles have ever repreſented to us theſe myſteries as including incomprehenſi- " ble things, and which it was impoſſible to reconcile to reaſon. God, willing to draw " men from their errors, and to purify them from their ſins, filled Jeſus Chriſt with his " wiſdom, inveſted him with his power, communicated to him his authority, and gave him
(t) Joel iii. 34. " his Spirit (t), not by meaſure, as to the prophets, but united himſelf ſo intimately with him, " that Jeſus Chriſt appeared in the form of God (u); that he was made Lord and Chriſt (v); (u) Phil. ii. 6. (v) Acts ii. 36.
(w) Acts v. 31. " Prince and Saviour (w); that he was filled with wiſdom and with grace (x); that all the fullneſs (x) Luke ii. 40.
" of the Godhead reſided corporeally in him (y); and that he received the glory, the honour, (y) Coloſſ. ii. 9.
" the virtue, the ſtrength, and the bleſſing, of his Father (z); who, by the participation (z) Apoc. v. 12.
" which he gave him of his power and authority, made him enter, at the ſame time, into " a participation of his glory, in ſuch a manner, that he who honours the Son honours
(a) Jo. v. 23. " the Father who ſent him (a). Thus God, referring always every thing to himſelf, and " not terminating in Jeſus Chriſt, who is no otherwiſe regarded than as the organ and the " inſtrument of the mercy of his Father, is always God alone, who is the object of our " adorations; and there is nothing that ſhocks us in conceiving, that he can communicate " himſelf to a man as fully, and as intimately, as he judges it neceſſary for his own glory,
(b) French Orig. p. 1—7. Engl. Tranſl. p. 9—20. " and for the ſalvation of mankind (b)."

" When one has once acknowledged the truth and the holineſs of the Goſpel, all this " doctrine concerning the perſon of Jeſus Chriſt appears to me ſo ſimple, that I cannot " conceive how it was poſſible to corrupt it by ſo many explications, which are good for " nothing, but to make Chriſtianity appear leſs reaſonable, and full of contradictions. In " conſequence of a continual deſire to find new myſteries, an infinitude of imaginations " have been conſecrated; and it is ſtill more lamentable, that theſe imaginations are be- " come a part of religion, by the authority of ſome, and by the acquieſcence of others; " ſo that a man paſſes for an unbeliever, or an irreligious perſon, if he does not ſubſcribe " to the predominant ſyſtem, and if he happens to have too much underſtanding to ſubmit " to received prejudices, or too much fortitude to be overawed by violence.

" It is not ſo much the perſon of Jeſus Chriſt, as his doctrine, that is the object of " the Chriſtian religion; and though we ought to honour the Son as we honour the " Father, becauſe he had his miſſion, and was cloathed with his authority, it is, however, " to God only that Jeſus Chriſt reclaims our attention; and he aſſumes no other conſe- " quence to recommend himſelf to the Jews, than as having been ſanctified by his Father, " to come and announce his doctrine, and to inſtruct us in truths unknown to the Gentiles, " and very much altered by the Jews."

Dr. Courayer alſo makes ſome obſervations relative to the apocryphal books, and to inſpiration; and he diſapproves of the deciſion of the Council of Trent, concerning the apocryphal writings. " It is," ſays he, " incumbent upon us, to endeavour to diſcriminate " the true Scriptures, from thoſe which are falſely given as genuine. Now we have no " other rule for this diſcrimination, but tradition. If it be uniform, and come to us from " the fountain-head, there would be irreligion and temerity in rejecting it; but if it be " divided, there is little reaſon in a diſpoſition to obtrude books, as divine, upon an autho" rity which, in every other caſe, would not be ſufficient to warrant our receiving as certain,

" facts, concerning which there was ſimilar diverſity. The Council of Trent ought not,
" therefore, to have run the hazard of declaring the deutero-canonical or apocryphal
" books, of the ſame authority as the canonical, ſince there was not for them the ſame
" concurrence, or the ſame uniformity of teſtimonies. For this Council had not received
" new light concerning theſe apocryphal writings; and ſince the Jews, who tranſmitted
" them to us, on tranſmitting them, had apprized us of the diſcrimination to be made; it
" was ſinning againſt all the canons of criticiſm, to give to theſe books an authority which
" was not granted to them by thoſe from whom we had them, and from whom only we " have received our intelligence.

" With regard to thoſe books which a conſtant tradition has tranſmitted to us, from
" hand to hand, as containing truly 'The word of God,' it is our duty to reſpect, and
" receive them, as the rule of our faith, and of our manners, becauſe we ought to regard
" the Doctrines and the Precepts which are contained in them, as coming from the in-
" ſpiration of God himſelf; for it is properly to theſe two points only, that the inſpiration
" extends. There is no need of inſpiration, to report what is ſeen or heard, or even what " is taken from records and from authentic monuments, on which all public faith is found" ed; and it would be juſt as unreaſonable to refuſe our aſſent to ſuch information, as it " would be to reject what we learn from revelation. The moſt incredulous have no more
" doubt about the exiſtence of Alexander and Cæſar, than Chriſtians have concerning
" that of Jeſus Chriſt; although it is not ſuppoſed that there was any inſpiration in the " hiſtorians who have given us the hiſtory of theſe two conquerors. Inſpiration adds
" nothing to the certainty of facts, and does not appear any way neceſſary to eſtabliſh
" them. I even fear whether the having recourſe to it in order to procure credit, has " not been a motive that has forced the incredulous upon their attempts to ſhew, with a " view of diſcrediting the contents of Scripture, that we have had recourſe to inſpiration,
" only becauſe all other evidence is wanting to give credibility to what is recorded there.
" Farther, to ſuppoſe inſpiration for things to which it is not requiſite, is to admit of mira" cles without neceſſity, and thus to multiply difficulties, and to furniſh objections to unbe-
" lievers, who reject even neceſſary miracles. The prophets were certainly inſpired,
" becauſe they could not have predicted future things but by inſpiration. The Evange" lical Doctrine muſt likewiſe have been inſpired, becauſe the Apoſtles have received it
" from Jeſus Chriſt, who had it from his Father himſelf. But St. John, without having " recourſe to inſpiration, gives us as true the facts which he reports to us, only becauſe he
" ſaw and heard them. 'That which we have ſeen and heard, declare we unto you, &c (b).'
" and St. Luke does not exact belief to the things which he relates, but becauſe he had " taken them from the mouths of thoſe who had ſeen all from the beginning, 'Even as " they delivered them unto us, which from the beginning were eye-witneſſes and miniſters
(c) Luke i. 2. " of the word (c).' If they had believed that inſpiration had been neceſſary to conciliate " belief to the facts which they recorded, they would not have heſitated to tell us, that " they had derived their information and knowledge from God himſelf. But as they " appeal to no other vouchers for their truth beſides their own teſtimony, and that of thoſe
" who had followed and heard Jeſus Chriſt from the beginning, it is evident, that they " did not extend inſpiration to thoſe kinds of facts, and that they reſerved it for the (d) Eng. Tranſ. P. 43—49. " Doctrine (d)."

(b) 1ſt Epiſt. of John, chap. i. ver. 3.

Father Courayer conſidered epiſcopal government as appointed by Chriſt himſelf; and he thought that the deciſions of the Church, or of general Councils, ſhould be ſubmitted to in matters of diſcipline. But he did not admit the infallibility of the Church in points of doctrine. " We cannot wander," ſays he, " by ſubmitting to faith when it is found" ed on the word of God, which is infallible. But the infallibility that is aſcribed to the " Church, is not eſtabliſhed on a foundation ſo ſolid as that on which it is acknowledged " that Scripture reſts. Inaſmuch as the Church in her deciſions conforms herſelf to the " word of God, and to apoſtolic doctrines, ſhe can only pretend to her infallibility, not
" in virtue of her judgment, but in conſequence of this conformity. But if the deciſions
" of the Church go beyond this rule, they cannot have the ſame certainty, becauſe they
" are no longer regulated by the ſame authority, which only can aſſure them of the ſame
" infallibility. Although in the Chriſtian ſociety there be no authority ſuperior to her " own to reform her judgments, this is not a reaſon for believing her to be abſolutely
" infallible, ſince a ſuperior tribunal has nothing in reſpect of fallibility to diſtinguiſh it
" from inferior tribunals, but the impoſſibility of having its deciſions ſuperſeded, becauſe
" there is not any paramount authority that has the right to reform them, whatever need
" they may ſtand in of reformation. It is, therefore, rather an indefectibility than an in" fallibility that ought to be recognized in the church, where, although errors may ſome-
" times inſinuate themſelves, it is ſufficient that ſhe preſerves always the fundamental
" truths, which are the eſſence of Chriſtianity, and the practice of the duties of morality,
" to aſſure the ſalvation of thoſe who perſevere in being her members.

" The

" The Pope is ſtill leſs infallible than the Church. There is nothing that diſtinguiſhes " him from other biſhops but the pre-eminence of his ſee, and a more extenſive juriſdic- " tion, which has nothing in common with infallibility. It is in him an abuſive preten- " ſion, to affect abſolutely to ſubject to himſelf all the particular churches, and to believe " that he can, at his pleaſure, preſcribe to them other doctrines than thoſe which were " taught by Jeſus Chriſt and the apoſtles, and to impoſe upon them arbitrary laws, ſo far " as in caſes of their non-obſervance of them, to aſſume an authority to himſelf of cut- " ting them off, without any ceremony, from the communion of the reſt of the Church. " He may, in truth, refuſe to communicate with thoſe whom he believes to be in error, " or to want the ſubmiſſion due to lawful rules. But this ſuſpenſion of communion does " not exclude them from the body of the Church itſelf; and, if it be he who ſeparates " from them without reaſon, then it is he who is guilty of the ſchiſm, and not they; for, " though he be the head of the Chriſtian Churches, we are not obliged to obey him, but " ſo far as he abides by truth and righteouſneſs, and does not, for things indifferent, break " the bonds of unity and peace (e)."

(e) Ibid. p. 54–58.

Of Baptiſm, Father Courayer expreſſes himſelf in the following manner: " By Bap- " tiſm," ſays he, " we engage ourſelves to a profeſſion of following the doctrine of Jeſus " Chriſt, and God is engaged on his part, to hold us juſtified from our ſins, provided " that, faithful to the engagement we have contracted with him, we regulate afterwards " our conduct by the laws which he has preſcribed to us, and which all tend to render us " happy, by the right regulation of our paſſions, and the practice of virtue. To believe, " that, without obſerving theſe conditions, Baptiſm, or any other external obſervance can " ſanctify us, is to be a Jew under the name of a Chriſtian; and by changing the cere- " mony, we have not made our condition more advantageous, nor our hopes more ſolid, " or leſs preſumptuous. That efficacy which Chriſtian divines aſcribe to their obſervances, " in preference to thoſe of the Moſaic law, is without foundation; if we ſuppoſe that it " is in their nature, and independent of our own internal diſpoſitions, which ought to " accompany the practice. Neither the one, nor the other, have any virtue, but what " they derive from the inſtitution, and always in a dependency on the diſpoſitions of thoſe " who embrace the practice. Under this view, all is equal, and if there be any differ- " ence, it is not in the nature of the obſervances that we are to look for it, but in the " favour of Jeſus Chriſt, who manifeſts himſelf more abundantly under the Goſpel, than " under the Law. The Baptiſm of Infants is of great antiquity in the Church. It is " even, perhaps, the antiquity of this practice, that gave riſe to the idea of original ſin, " taken in the ſenſe of the Theologians, for a guilt that drags all mankind who die with- " out baptiſm, to damnation. This belief once eſtabliſhed, has contributed indirectly to " make the Baptiſm of Infants be judged neceſſary to their ſalvation; for if they had been " conſidered as entirely pure and innocent, why, as Tertullian ſays, ſhould we be ſo " anxious to apply baptiſm for the remiſſion of their ſins? Ut quid feſtinat innocens ætas " ad remiſſionem peccatorum. I do not ſee, however, that Jeſus Chriſt, or his apoſtles, " have preſcribed for them this baptiſm, which he ſeems only to have eſtabliſhed to re- " claim adults to repentance, and to the reception of the Goſpel, and in order to purify " them thereby, from the ſins of which they had been guilty before. I do not in fact " find any thing in Scripture, that obliges us to extend to infants the neceſſity of Baptiſm. " It does not even appear, after the practice was introduced, that it was judged as it is now, " of this neceſſity, ſince it was very common then, to defer the reception of this ſacra- " ment to an advanced age, and even till death. By ſpeaking in this manner, it is not " my intention, to cenſure a practice ſo ancient, and ſo general, as that of baptiſing in- " fants; but I would not for all this, conſider it as an error in thoſe, who believe Baptiſm " to be neceſſary to Adults only: for though I believe, as St. Paul teaches, that it was " 'by the firſt man that ſin entered into the world, and death by ſin (f),' I can hardly " conceive, that by this ſin we muſt underſtand a perſonal guilt in every infant, in con- " ſequence of which, before he can uſe his will and his liberty, he deſerves to be puniſhed " as a voluntary criminal, ſo as to be rendered not only ſubject to miſeries and infirmities, " but moreover liable to eternal damnation."

(f) Rom. v. 12.

Dr. Courayer afterwards ſtates his ſentiments reſpecting the Euchariſt, Confeſſion, Images, and Relicks: " Every part of the Chriſtian doctrine," ſays he, " has had its alterations, " and that part of it which reſpects the Euchariſt has undergone as many at leaſt as what " relates to other obſervances. Jeſus Chriſt, in giving us bread and wine as the memo- " rials of his paſſion and death, has declared to us that he gave us his body, and his " blood. On this ſubject it has been imagined, not only that Jeſus Chriſt was in reality " corporeally preſent in the Euchariſt, with all his phyſical properties, but moreover, that " the ſubſtance of the bread and wine was annihilated, and remained only in appearances, " and this is what was called Tranſubſtantiation. Had they been contented with ſaying, " that this change was ſuch to the eyes of faith, which ſee nothing in the Euchariſt after " conſecration, but the body and blood of Jeſus Chriſt, and without ſuppoſing any real " and phyſical change of ſubſtance, there would have been nothing in this contrary to " reaſon, or which needed to have occaſioned the leaſt diſpute. But in matters of faith

" there

" there was a conſtant inclination to the marvellous; and often even the marvellous, was " not to the taſte of the multitude, but in ſo far as it ſhocked common ideas, and the " ordinary light of reaſon. Accordingly this opinion did not ſpring up, but in the ages " of ignorance and of darkneſs. Till then they were contented to believe, that in receiv- " ing the Euchariſt, they received the body and the blood of Jeſus Chriſt, but without " determining in what manner they received it; or rather, perſuaded that grace does not " deſtroy nature, they received the bread and wine, not doubting, but that in receiving " them, they received Jeſus Chriſt himſelf, becauſe he communicated himſelf under theſe " ſymbols, in a manner ineffable, and perfectly ſpiritual, with ſo much the more efficacy, " as by the inſtitution of Jeſus Chriſt the ſaid ſymbols are a lively repreſentation of his " paſſion and death, by which he merited for us the expiation of our ſins and ſalvation. " We receive therefore Jeſus Chriſt in the Euchariſt, but with the bread and wine; and " if we admit another Tranſubſtantiation than that which is made in the eyes of faith, we " admit an abſurd opinion, which it is impoſſible to maintain without contradicting the " moſt evident maxims of reaſon, the conſtant impreſſions of our ſenſes, and the princi- " ples of our natural light.

" The ſacrifice of Jeſus Chriſt is ſo great a benefit, that we cannot too much preſerve " the memory of it. It was to perpetuate its remembrance that he inſtituted the Euchariſt, " in which we recollect his death, and offer ourſelves to God. This is the ſenſe of all " Chriſtian liturgies, ancient and modern, Catholic and Heretical. Nothing therefore is " worſe founded, than extravagant declamations againſt the Maſs; ſince, with ſome variation " only in the prayers and ceremonies, there is ſtill the ſame object in the Romiſh ſervice, " as in all other liturgies. Whether we believe that Jeſus Chriſt is corporeally preſent in " the Euchariſt, or, as others maintain, that this preſence is only ſpiritual, this does not " add any thing to, or take any thing from the idea of ſacrifice, an idea which ought not to " be ſeparated from the remembrance and offering of the death of Jeſus Chriſt, in the " celebration of the Euchariſt. And as this ſacrifice can only be repreſentative and com- " memorative of that of the croſs, all objections made againſt the Maſs, fall to the ground " of themſelves, becauſe they go to attack in it, a real ſacrifice, which ſubſiſts only in the " imaginations of thoſe who combat it, or in the falſe explications of thoſe who defend it.

" Communion under both kinds never ought to have excited diſputes in the " Church. I ſee no more difficulty in this matter than in the difference of adminiſtering " Baptiſm by immerſion, or by ſprinkling. But I know not by what misfortune it happens " ſo often, that the ſmalleſt diſputes excite the greateſt troubles, as we may judge from " the ancient conteſt about the day of Eaſter. The moſt rational way of thinking on the " diſpute in queſtion is, that as, on the one part, an uſage occaſioned by ſome inconveni- " encies ought not to have been erected into a law, againſt the terms of the inſtitution; " and, on the other, as Chriſtians believe that Jeſus Chriſt is only ſpiritually received in " the Euchariſt, it ſeems that it ought to have been left indifferent, to receive him either " under one kind, or under both the two kinds, foraſmuch as a ſpiritual preſence is abſo- " lutely indiviſible, and it is impoſſible to receive Jeſus Chriſt, in receiving either the bread, " or the wine, without receiving him entirely. It appears to me, that on this point, as " on many others, we ought to leave to each Church the liberty of regulating its uſages, " as it thinks proper. But the beſt are thoſe who depart leaſt from the words of the " inſtitution, and the views of the inſtitutor.

" Confeſſion is an uſeful practice, and of great antiquity in the Church; but the man- " ner in which it is practiſed at this day, in the Romiſh Church, is an uſage much more " modern. Formerly people made confeſſions of great crimes, and eſpecially of thoſe " which were of a public nature. There are proofs of this in the writings of the fathers, " and in the penitential canons, which regulated the times of penitence ordained for each " of theſe flagrant crimes. But we ſee nothing in the ancienteſt monuments of theſe con- " feſſions ſo often reiterated, of the ſmalleſt faults, nor of the laws made for the ordination " of confeſſion at certain times. Nor is it clear beſides, whether this ſort of confeſſion " was inſtituted by Jeſus Chriſt, or whether it was only preſcribed by the Church. It " appears much more probable, on the contrary, that the kind of confeſſion practiſed at " this day, can only have been of the inſtitution laſt mentioned, ſince we find no example " of it in primitive times.

" The article of Images has excited great diviſions in the Church. Some, for honour- " ing them have been taxed with idolatry, and thoſe who have deſtroyed them have been " accuſed of irreligion. This is carrying things too far, both on the one ſide, and on the " other. Images have nothing bad in themſelves; it cannot, however, be denied, but " that they have occaſioned great abuſe, and great ſuperſtitions. It is not, therefore, ſo " much on a religious, as on a prudential account, that we ought to be cautious in regu- " lating our conduct with reſpect to them. If abuſe and ſuperſtition are inſeparable from " the uſe of them, piety and religion oblige us to ſuppreſs them. If we can, on the con- " trary, ſeparate the uſe of them from ſuperſtitious worſhip, we may preſerve them with " utility, for the inſtruction of the people, and the ornament of Churches. This was the " temperate ſtep which the Churches of France took formerly, and almoſt all thoſe of the

" Weſt

(g) Eng. Tra
p. 71—90.

" Weſt, to the tenth century; and they had then no conception, that by ſo doing, they did " any thing contrary to the ſecond precept of the decalogue. This, even now, might be " conſidered as the moſt reaſonable way, eſpecially if it were only confined to hiſtorical " paintings, and went to the excluſion of the Images or the ſtatues of particular ſaints. " But if the fear of abuſe prevails over the mind, I ſee not why we ſhould impute it " as a crime to thoſe, who, influenced by an apprehenſion ſo religious and ſo well found- " ed, actually ſuppreſs what they conſider as an occaſion of ſo much abuſe, and a ſource of " ſuperſtition."

" What I have ſaid of Images, may likewiſe be applied to Relicks. The honour that " has been paid to them in the Greek and Latin Churches, is almoſt as ancient as the " Church itſelf. There has been a great deal of indecency, and a kind of fury, in the " manner in which proteſtants treated them at the beginning of the Reformation. They " might have reaſon for cenſuring, as they did, the exceſs to which ſuperſtition had been " carried on this point, either by giving falſe relics for true ones, or by rendering undue " worſhip to ſuch as were not ſuſpected of falſhood. The evil was extreme, and too much " of the remains of it are ſtill preſerved, not to make us feel, that their reproaches on this " head were too juſt and well founded. But ſtill they might have carried themſelves with " more moderation in the reform of theſe abuſes; and there was a middle way that might " have been taken, between the ſuperſtition of the one party, and the violence of the other. " Religion forbids us not, but on the contrary excites us, to honour the aſhes of thoſe " whom their ſanctity has rendered reſpectable to us; and even the honour that we render " to their memory, is a powerful motive to excite us to imitate their virtues. But to enter- " tain an imagination, that there is any virtue, or any efficacy, inherent in their aſhes, or " their tombs, which can work the miracles that God may ſometimes grant to the faith of " thoſe who ſolicit their ſuccours, and ſupplicate Him to hear the prayers, which there is " ſome reaſon to believe the ſaints offer up to him for us, is to place efficacy and virtue " where there is none. To found a confidence upon this, is to entertain a vain and un- " reaſonable confidence, and to confound the honour due to their virtue with the confi- " dence that we ought to put in God only, and which ought not to be participated with any " of his creatures (g)."

(g) Eng. Tranſ. p. 71—90.

The practice of praying in an unknown tongue is afterwards cenſured by Father Courayer; and he alſo condemns perſecution on account of religion as irrational, indefenſible, and repugnant to the ſpirit of Chriſtianity. He concludes his Declaration in the following manner: " Moderate ſentiments in religion are ſeldom adapted to the taſte of " different parties; and, inſtead of ſerving to conciliate differences, they commonly pro- " duce no other effect, but that of drawing down cenſures upon thoſe by whom they are " advanced. But as, in making this Declaration, I propoſed to myſelf no other appro- " bation, but that of God, and of my own conſcience, it is ſufficient for me, that I have " delivered, with ſincerity, that which appears to me the moſt conformable to truth, and " beſt calculated for the promotion of peace. If I am deceived, it has not been my own " fault; and I hope that God, in his mercy, will pardon my involuntary errors, and will " grant to me in another life, that light and knowledge which have been refuſed me " in this."

In the South Cloiſter of Weſtminſter-Abbey, directly over the effigies of Abbot Vitalis, is a monument erected to the memory of Father Courayer, on which is an inſcription, written by Mr. Kynaſton, Fellow of Brazen Noſe College. But it being put up too haſtily to obtain the author's laſt reviſal, the following is a more accurate copy of it than that upon the monument, being corrected by Mr. Kynaſton himſelf:

H. S. E.
Annis morumque integritate juxta reverendus
PETRUS FRANCISCUS COURAYER,
Cœnobii de Sanctâ Genovevâ dicti
Apud Urbem Lutetiam Pariſiorum
Regularis olim Canonicus.
Vir, ſi quis alius,
De Eccleſiâ atque Politiâ Anglicanâ
Animo pariter ac ſcriptis,
Optimè meritus.
Quippe qui Epiſcopalium jus Adminiſtrationum
Jamdiù a Pontificiis acerrime impugnatum
Huic eidem Eccleſiæ
Et Gallus ipſe, & Pontificius
Invictâ argumentorum vi, aſſeruit & vindicavit:
Quique adeò, ob id vindicandum
Pulſus jam patria, profugus,
Omnibuſque demum exutus fortunis,
Hâc in urbe quærebat aſylum, & inveniebat;

Ibique per annos propè quinquaginta
Honeſtæ mentis otio egregius fruebatur exul,
Bonorum omnium deliciæ vivus,
Moriens commune deſiderium.
Obiit quintâ decimâ die Octobris
Anno poſt natum Chriſtum MDCCLXXVI;
Poſt ſe natum XCV.
Huic tali tantoque Viro,
Marmor hoc, amoris ſui monumentum,
Poſuêre Amici,
Cui famam marmore perenniorem peperit,
Defenſa veritas, refutatus error (b).

(b) Nichols's Anecdotes of Bowyer, p. 545.

To what has been already ſaid reſpecting Dr. Courayer's Works, it may not be improper here to add, that he wrote Traité de Poem Epique; and that his French Tranſlation of Father Paul's Hiſtory of the Council of Trent was printed at London in 1736, in two volumes, folio; and at Amſterdam, the ſame year, in two volumes, quarto; and that his Tranſlation of Sleidan's Hiſtory of the Reformation, to which he added copious notes, was printed in three volumes, quarto, in 1767 (i).

(i) Account of Dr. Courayer, prefixed to the Engliſh Tranſlation of his Declaration of his laſt Sentiments, &c. p. 75, 76.

From the fourth volume of Biſhop Atterbury's Epiſtolary Correſpondence, which has fallen into our hands ſince this article was printed, we learn that the Biſhop was expoſed to ſome trouble on account of Father Courayer's eſcape from France, which he was ſuppoſed to have facilitated. The French King and Cardinal Fleury ſent him a meſſage on the ſubject by the Lieutenant de Police. "I did not mince the matter to the Magiſtrate," ſays the Biſhop, "nor am I at all aſhamed of what has happened, or concerned for it. "I owned my friendſhip for Pere Courayer; told them frankly a great deal more than "they knew of that matter, as far as I was concerned; and thought there was no reaſon "to wonder at, or blame my conduct. I convinced them of that point, and I believe "there is an end of it. I ſhewed the Lieutenant the picture of Pere Courayer hanging "up in my room; told him I had viſited him in his retreat at Hanment, while he was in "diſgrace there; and that he came to take his leave of me the night before he left Paris; and "that in all this I thought I had done nothing that miſbecame me." The Lieutenant, who behaved with great politeneſs, was perfectly ſatisfied with our Prelate's explanation; but this was not the caſe with the Cardinal, who was perſuaded that Father Courayer's eſcape was entirely owing to Atterbury, and diſplayed much reſentment on that account. The picture of Courayer, in the Biſhop's poſſeſſion, was left by him to the Univerſity of Oxford (k).] T.

(k) Atterbury's Epiſtolary Correſpondence, vol. iv. p. 102—104, 133.

 [COURTEN, a name certainly uſed, with a variety of ſpelling, for more than two hundred years, to diſcriminate a family of Engliſh extraction [A], which after being ſettled, upwards of a century, in the Netherlands, returned into England, intermarried with its gentry and nobility, and gave birth to ſeveral men, well entitled to notice in the Biographia Britannica. The laſt of the name, having been an ornament, and a benefactor to this kingdom, in a way, and to an extent not commonly known, is a proper ſubject for a ſeparate article. Others of his anceſtors were likewiſe memorable, for contributing conſiderably to the increaſe and enlargement of our national wealth and dominion, by carrying, at a very early period, the trade, navigation, and colonies of this country, into parts of the Eaſt and Weſt Indies then little known. It is fit, therefore, in the firſt place, that ſome account ſhould be given of them, in a work appropriated to the celebration of our countrymen in whatever way meritorious, and intended to reſcue from oblivion the memories of all ſuch eminent perſons as have at any time lived, or reſided occaſionally in Britain.

Every thing relative to the Courtens in their ſtate of emigration, before their return to the land of their nativity, is in a great meaſure foreign from the plan and purpoſe of this work. The only memoirs of the family which can be recorded here with propriety, lie within a narrow compaſs, clear of the ſuſpicions adherent to late reſearches into remote antiquity. They go no farther back than to the great-grandfather, who, by perſecution,

[A] Engliſh extraction.] The pedigree of this family, the name of which is moſt commonly ſpelt Courten, though ſometimes Courtin, and Courteene, &c. is preſerved in the Britiſh Muſeum (1). It begins on the paternal line from a Roger de Curtis, ſaid there to have been a native of Devonſhire. He paſſed, it ſeems, from the ſervice of a Ducheſs of Gloſter, into that of an Earl of Brabant, married at Hainault, and fixed at Menin, where he died in 1423. But as this paper is not eaſily legible, and is moreover in the Dutch or Flemiſh language, with which the preſent writer is totally unacquainted, the curious are referred for more particular and more certain information to the original, which contains a circumſtantial account of the genealogy of the family, and gives its coat of arms as follows. A Talbot paſſant, quartered with a chevron between three ſwans; no colours depicted; creſt, on a wreath, a demy Talbot iſſuant.

(1) MSS. Sloan. 3515.

There is, in the ſame repoſitory, a Talbot paſſant, on the ſilver-top of a walking-ſtick made of a curious piece of vine, the arms moſt probably of William Courten, Eſq; the ſubject of the ſubſequent article, whoſe property it certainly was, and from whom it paſſed, with his rich muſeum, to Sir Hans Sloane in 1702.

"Courtin, London; Or, A Talbot paſſant Sa. "Courteen, Aldington, or Aunton in com. Wor- "ceſter, the ſame creſt, a demy Talbot Sa. (2)"

(2) Edmondſon's Complete Body of Heraldry, vol. ii. Edit. 1780. f.

was repelled from Flanders into the kingdom from which he ſprang, where he and his immediate deſcendants, by their indefatigable induſtry, and great ſkill in mercantile buſineſs, ſuddenly roſe to an unuſual height of opulence and ſplendour. After flouriſhing here for almoſt a century, this family, by means of a viper of its own generation, by a variety of accidents unforeſeen or unforeſeeable, but chiefly by the depredations and villainy of a jealous nation of mere merchants, experienced a ſad reverſe of fortune, and being blaſted to the root, its male-line and diſcriminating ſurname became extinct in 1702. The riſe and downfall of this houſe being equally remarkable, the following account of its complicated ſtory, given here with all the conciſeneſs conſiſtent with perſpicuity, was ſtudiouſly collected from ſcattered papers and broken memorials in the Britiſh Muſeum, where curioſity may ſatisfy itſelf, and probably diſcover collateral evidence, and additional information, omitted or unobſerved by the preſent writer.

Olivares Duke of Alva, being appointed by Philip II. Governor of the Seventeen Provinces, endeavoured, with execrable policy, to eſtabliſh over all the Netherlands, an irreligious and horrible Court of Judicature, on the model of the Spaniſh Inquiſition. By conſequence, in 1567, great numbers of induſtrious, thriving and worthy people, were impriſoned by the rigorous orders of this petty tyrant, and treated with great injuſtice and cruelty. WILLIAM COURTEN, ſon of a Taylor at Menin, was one of many who experienced this oppreſſion; but had the good fortune to effectuate his eſcape from priſon. In the year following, 1568, he arrived ſafe at London, with his wife Margaret Caſiere, a daughter named Margaret, her huſband, ſon of a macklaer (*) at Antwerp of the name of Boudean, and as much property as they could haſtily collect under ſuch diſadvantages.

(*) The Flemiſh name for bricklayer, or potter.

Soon after their arrival, they took a houſe in Ab-Church-Lane, where they lived all together, following for ſome time the buſineſs of making what were commonly called French Hoods, much uſed in thoſe days and long after, which they vended in wholeſale, to the ſhop-keepers who ſold them by retail. Encouraged by great ſucceſs in this employment, they ſoon removed to a larger houſe in Pudding-Lane, or Love-Lane, in the pariſh of St. Mary Hill, where they entered on a partnerſhip trade, in ſilks, fine linen, and ſuch articles as they had dealt in before, when in Flanders.

Michael Boudean, the daughter Margaret's huſband, died firſt, leaving behind him, unfortunately for the family, a ſon, and only child, named Peter, after an uncle certainly not much older than himſelf. The widow married John Moncy a Merchant in London, who inſtantly became an inmate with the family, which was moreover increaſed by the parents themſelves, with two ſons, William, born in 1572, and Peter, born in 1581. The young men, being inſtructed in reading, writing, and arithmetic, were early initiated in buſineſs, and ſoon after ſent abroad as factors for the family; William to Haerlem, Peter to Cologne, and Peter Boudean the grand-child, to Middleburgh. The writer of this article is not at preſent ſufficiently inſtructed, to date with preciſion the times at which William Courten and Margaret Caſiere died. Moſt probably their deaths happened about the end of Queen Elizabeth's, or in the beginning of King James's reign; but it is ſaid expreſsly, and it ſeems undeniable, that they left their deſcendants not only in eaſy, but even in affluent circumſtances.

At the following æra of this little hiſtory, it does not appear with certainty, whether the old people were actually dead, or had only declined all farther active, reſponſible concern in buſineſs: but moſt certainly in 1606 William and Peter Courtens entered into partnerſhip with John Moncy, their ſiſter Margaret's ſecond huſband, to trade in ſilks and fine linen. Two parts, or the moiety of the joint-ſtock, belonged to William Courten; and to each of the others, Peter Courten and John Moncy, a fourth ſhare. As for Peter Boudean, the ſon of Margaret Courten by her firſt huſband, he ſeems to have been employed to negotiate for the partnerſhip at Middleburgh, on ſome ſtipulated or diſcretionary ſalary; for it does not appear that he had any certain or determinate ſhare in the trade, which was carried on proſperouſly till 1631, with a return, it is ſaid, communibus annis, of 150,000 l. During the courſe of this co-partnerſhip, there is nothing upon record unfavourable to the character of John Moncy. The characters too of William and Peter Courtens appear unexceptionable, fair, and illuſtrious. They proſpered, it ſeems, remarkably in all their undertakings, for twenty years and more, in the courſe of which time they were both dignified with the honours of knighthood [B].

The elder brother, Sir William Courten, beſides his capital concern in the original partnerſhip above-mentioned, traded very extenſively on his own bottom, to Guinea, Portugal, Spain, and the Weſt Indies. He married firſt a Dutch-woman of the name of Cromling, the daughter of Mr. Peter Cromling, an opulent Merchant in Haerlem, who was, though both deaf and dumb, book-keeper to her father. By this marriage he got, it is ſaid, 60,000 l. of which he was enjoined to lay out 50,000 l. in the purchaſe of lands in England, to be ſettled upon his ſon by this Lady, of whom ſhe was delivered in [B] Dignified with the honours of knighthood.] Sir William Courten was knighted at Greenwich, May 31, 1622; and Sir Peter was knighted at Whitehall, Feb. 22, 1623 (3).

(3) Claudius, c. iii.

London,

London, and whoſe name was Peter. This ſon, who was all the offspring from this marriage, King James I. made one of the firſt rank of his Baronets [C]. "He was "afterwards married to Lord Stanhope's daughter, but died without iſſue, leaving the "eſtate in lands to his father Sir William, who ſettled that eſtate, and 3000 l. more, "per annum, upon his only ſon and heir, by a ſecond wife, the daughter of Mr. Moſes "Tryon (*)."

(*) Vox Veritatis, &c. p. 50.

Sir Peter, the uncle to Peter juſt mentioned, and brother to Sir William Courten, kept the books of the family partnerſhip, and died unmarried in 1630, at Middleburgh. It is affirmed, that he was worth at his death 100,000 l. and that he left his nephew Peter Boudean, the ſon of his ſiſter by her firſt huſband, his ſole heir and executor, who ſeems at this time to have taken the name of Courten which he annexed to his own. This crafty man took immediate poſſeſſion, not only of his uncle Sir Peter's property, which could not have been aſcertained without balancing the accounts of the co-partnerſhip, but ſeized likewiſe the ſhipping and goods that belonged unqueſtionably to his other uncle, Sir William, and Mr. Moncy, amounting, as it is ſtated, to 100,000 l. more [D]; nor could he, to the very end of his life, which laſted above thirty years longer, be brought, by argument or law, to ſettle the accounts of the company.

Sir William Courten, after the death of his Dutch Lady, married a ſecond wife, of the name of Tryon, by whom he had one ſon, named William, and three daughters, whoſe names and marriages are but juſt mentioned here, the curious being referred for farther information about them, to the memoirs of the family in the Britiſh Muſeum. Heſter the eldeſt was married to Sir Edward Littleton; Mary the ſecond was wedded to the Earl of Kent [E]; Anna the youngeſt to Eſſex Devereux, Eſq; of Leight-Court, in the county of Worceſter, and after his death, to Richard Knightly, Eſq; of Fawſeley, in Northamptonſhire. She was born in 1614, as we learn from the certificate below [F], and lived to a great age, as appears from an official paper tranſcribed into the following article.

Sir William ſeems to have been poſſeſſed of a comprehenſive mind, an enterprizing ſpirit, abundance of wealth, and credit ſufficient to enable him to launch out into any promiſing branch of trade and merchandize whatſoever. It is ſtated, with apparent fairneſs, that he actually lent to King James I. and his ſon, Charles I. at different times, of his own money, or from the company-trade, 27,000 l. and in another partnerſhip, wherein he was likewiſe concerned with Sir Paul Pyndar [G], their joint claims on the Crown amounted,

[C] One of the firſt rank of his Baronets.] The following entry in SALMON, moſt probably refers to Peter Courten, jun. for the deſcription does not ſeem to point to the uncle, who generally lived, and died in Holland, where he was naturalized. If May was mentioned by miſtake for February, the date of the year would then correſpond to that of the uncle's knighthood, by writing it thus, Feb. — 1622-3; but ſtill there would be an error in the day of the month. "May 18, 1622, Peter Courtene of Aldington, alias "Aunton, Eſq; was [by James I.] created a Bart. "Wigorn, extinct."

[D] £.100,000 more.] Sir Peter Courten, ſen. at the time of his death, ſtood indebted to the company, by the balance of the books kept in London, for money due to the general ſtock 129,426*l.* 0*s.* 10*d.* which remained in the hands of his nephew Peter Boudean.

[E] Earl of Kent.] Henry Grey, the eleventh Earl of Kent of that family, and eldeſt ſon to Anthony Grey the famous Rector of Burbach in Leiceſterſhire (4). He was born Nov. 24, 1643; and by his firſt wife, the daughter of Sir William Courten, had iſſue Henry, Lord Grey, who was buried in Weſtminſter Abbey, June 29, 1644, near his mother, who was buried there March 20, 1643. This Earl's ſecond Lady was Amabella, daughter of Sir Anthony Ben, Recorder of London. He died in 1651; and his Counteſs ſurvived till 1698.

(4) Hiſtory of Burbach, by Nichols, p. 278. Collins's Peerage, vol. i. p. 514.

[F] Certificate below.] "Baptized in the Dutch "Church, London, Anna Filia Guiliame Courten, "anno 1614, the 17 of January. Teſtes Moſes "Tryon and Margaretha de Moncy, which ſtood in "the place of Lucretia Pelicorne the widow of Mr. "Gualterus del Prato." [Signed] Philipp. op de Beech. "Miniſter of the Dutch Church in London "(5)." The original certificate paſted on a blank leaf.

(5) MSS. Sloan. 5961, fol.

[G] Sir Paul Pyndar.] "He was born at Wellingborough in the county of Northampton, where he "was at ſchool till ſixteen. He was then put apprentice to Mr. Parviſh an Italian Merchant, who ſent "him, at eighteen, as his Factor to Venice, where, "and in parts adjacent, he reſided for fifteen years, "or thereabouts, trading upon his own account, and "on commiſſions both from his old maſter, and divers "others of the moſt trading kingdoms, by which he "got a very plentiful eſtate. At his return to England, where he traded five years longer, the Turky "Company, knowing him well ſkilled in the Italian "and Turkiſh languages, and having received many "kind offices from him in his tranſactions abroad, "applied to King James I. in 1611, to ſend him as "Ambaſſador to the Grand Signior at Conſtantinople, which employment, after much ſolicitation, he "embraced to the great ſatisfaction of the King, and the "Turky Company, in whoſe ſervice he continued "nine years, during which time he much improved "the Levant trade, and manufactures of England, "which had been greatly injured by the arts of the "French and Dutch. Three years after his return "in 1623, King James having knighted him, offered "as a reward of his ſervices, to make him his Lieutenant of the Tower; but this honour Sir Paul humbly "refuſed, and the rather, in regard his Majeſty deſired to purchaſe Sir Paul's Diamond-Jewel of "30,000*l.* value, upon credit. Sir Paul brought "home this Diamond-Jewel from Turky, and lent "it to King James to wear at divers times on days "of great ſolemnity, on opening parliaments, and "when audiences were given to foreign Ambaſſadors. "It was afterwards ſold to King Charles I (6)."

(6) Ibid. 351*5.f.* & Vox Veritatis, &c. p. 51.

There is moſt probably a particular account of this Diamond-Jewel, in the MS. which the Honourable H. Walpole purchaſed at the ſale of Thoreſby's Muſeum, promiſed to the public with ſome other curious papers. This MS. it is ſaid, contained among other things, an account of the monies received upon the pawning of the King's, and his Grace the Duke of Buckingham's Jewels, &c. Thirty-one pages being wanting at the beginning relating to the plate and jewels, in the "Catalogue of King Charles the firſt's "goods, &c. with the ſeveral prices at which they "were valued and ſold," diſcovered lately in Moorfields, &c. it is not likely that there will be any mention of this Diamond-Jewel there. It is ſaid on the authoamounted, it ſeems, to 200,000*l.* for no objection appears to have been made to this ſtatement. We are told that one way or other Sir William employed, and with a conſtancy authority of the Catalogue, that the total of the contracts amounted to 118,080*l.* 10*s.* 2*d*(7).

(7) Anecdotes of Painting in England, &c. vol. ii. p. 112, and 114, 8vo. 1782.

This Diamond-Jewel of Sir Paul Pyndar ſeems, by the general account of it given above, to have ſurpaſſed in value the celebrated diamond brought afterwards into this country by Governor Thomas Pitt, of which the curious reader may ſee a circumſtantial account in the late edition of the TATLER with notes, Vol. V. Additional notes, p. 385, & ſeqq.

" On Sir Paul's refuſal of the Lieutenancy of the " Tower, by the over perſuaſion of Sir William " Cockqayne and Sir Arthur Ingram, this Knight " was brought to accept of being one of the Far- " mers of the Cuſtoms; to advance monies for ſup- " ply of the late King's neceſſary occaſions, and to " furniſh the Crown with Jewels, to his infinite loſs " and prejudice. Nevertheleſs, he manifeſted his " loyalty to that degree, towards the preſerva- " tion of the Royal Family, that he ſent ſeveral con- " ſiderable ſums of money, in gold, to the late King " Charles at Oxford, by Madam Jane Whorewood, " in the years 1643 and 1644, for tranſportation of " the Queen and her children.

" In 1639, his caſhiers and accomptants, William " Toomes and Richard Lane, by the orders of their " maſter, caſt up Sir Paul Pyndar's eſtate, which con- " ſiſted in ready money, allome, and good debts " upon tallies, and obligations from Noblemen, and " others at Court, amounting in all to the ſum of " 215,600*l.* ſterling; a great part of which was em- " ployed in the ſole manfacture of allome, for which " allome-farm, Sir Paul Pyndar paid annually " 12,000*l.* ſterling to the crown, for twenty eight " years ſucceſſively."—" This farm was within the " Manor of Mulgrave belonging to the Earl of that " title; and it is ſaid, that all the ſoil of the land, " on which the allome works were erected, with all " the mines and rocks employed, were not before " worth 40*l. per annum* (*)."

(*) " Brief narrative, &c. p. 11.

" This branch of the public revenue has been lately " extinguiſhed under the notion of a monopoly; and " thus, a ſtaple commodity, of the growth and manu- " facture of England, has ſuffered great injury for " want of a due regulation in trade. Sir P. Pyndar " was obliged, by the grant from the King, to fur- " niſh London, and all parts of England, with allome " at twenty pounds per ton, and to tranſport the " overplus, which he did in great quantities, into " Holland, France, Hamburgh, and other parts, to " the advantage and benefit of the King, and his " kingdom.

" This manufacture of allome, was firſt brought " out of Italy, in thoſe parts, under the Pope's tem- " poral juriſdiction, and ſet on work by an Italian, a " friend of Sir P. Pyndar's in King James's time; " who much encouraged the making thereof, and ſet " up the firſt pans, coppers, and materials in York- " ſhire, at the charge of the crown. Before that " time, all allome was imported into England, from " the Pope's territories, at the rate of ſixty pounds " ſterling per ton, under the name of roach allome, " which raiſed a very conſiderable yearly revenue to " his holineſs (†)."

(†) Vox Veritatis, &c. 4to. 1683, p. 51, &c.

In a record in the Britiſh Muſeum, the eſtimate of Sir P. Pyndar's eſtate, at the very time here ſpecified, viz. in the year 1639, is not rated ſo high as it is ſtated above. Excluſively indeed of deſperate and bad debts, it is only fixed at 236,000*l.* or to ſpeak in the modern cant phraſe, at two plums and 36,000*l.* more; and it is affirmed [ibidem] that two thirds of the ſum total were embarked with the King.

There is in the ſame repoſitory, and if the writer does not miſ-remember, in the ſame volume, a printed abſtract of the laſt will of Sir P. Pyndar, dated June 24, 1646, to which the curious are referred for farther information (‡).

(‡) MSS. Sloan. 3515, f.

" There remains nothing viſible at this time, " [viz. 1683] ſays Mr. Browne in the continuation " of his account, to the family of Sir P. Pyndar, out " of all his great acquiſitions, but his memory en- " graven in a modeſt ſtile, upon a ſtone of black " marble, over his grave in S. Buttolph's church, " without Biſhop's-gate, London, in thoſe ſorrowful " days when he died. The epitaph is as follows:

" Sir Paul Pyndar, Ambaſſador to the Turkiſh " Emperour, anno 1611, and reſident there " nine years, faithful in negotiations, foreign " and domeſtic, eminent for piety, charity, " loyalty and prudence. An inhabitant " twenty-ſix years in this pariſh. A boun- " tiful benefactor, deceaſed the 22d of Aug. " aged 84 years.

" William Toomes, who was appointed executor, " adminiſtered and made probat of Sir Paul Pyndar's " laſt Will and Teſtament, wherein, amongſt other " legacies, he bequeathed 7,000*l.* to the Hoſpitals " in London and Southwark. The ſaid Toomes " exhibited an inventory, but could not get in the " eſtate, moſt part thereof being upon tallies, " and many of the Noblemen being inſolvent, he " diſcharged the workmen a remainder of 10,000*l.* " expended by Sir P. Pyndar in his life-time, upon " the porch of St. Paul's Church, on the ſouth ſide. " But Mr. Toomes finding ſuch a vaſt eſtate ſo en- " tangled, and his expectations ſo fruſtrated, had not " a ſpirit to bear his afflictions, therefore laid violent " hands on himſelf in the year 1655, and was found " a felo de ſe."

On the death of Toomes, it ſeems, " Sir William " Powell took out Letters of Adminiſtration, with " the Will of Sir Paul Pyndar annexed; and during " his time, it is ſaid, he employed in Holland, the " writer of the tract here quoted, a Mr. Browne, " Gent. to look after the intereſt of Sir Paul Pyndar's " eſtate and his adminiſtrator, depending in the " Neitherlands, on ſuits in Courts there for the re- " covery of damages, by the deſtruction, ſeizure, and " appropriation of the two ſhips, Bona Eſperanza, " and Henry Bona Adventura, the firſt taken in the " ſtreights of Malacca, the ſecond near the iſland " Mauritius by men of war belonging to the Eaſt- " India Company of the Neitherlands, under a pre- " tence that they traded with the Portugalls their " enemies.

" This Browne was moreover employed by Sir " William Powell to get in ſome debts due to the " eſtate and heirs of Sir Paul Pyndar, upon the allome " account, from Jonas Abeel; but, he ſays, he re- " turned into England re infectâ in the year 1651. " In the ſame year, or much about the ſame time, " Mr. Browne ſays, he importuned Mr. Carew, who " had Sir Edward Littleton's intereſt in the two " ſhips above-mentioned, and a very conſiderable " debt of his own, incumbent on Sir P. Pyndar's " eſtate, to ſatisfy Sir William Powell, and ſo take " upon himſelf the ſole adminiſtration of Sir Paul " Pyndar's goods and teſtament.

" By the advice of Mr. Browne, it is ſaid, that " after ſome enquiries, and encouragements at " White Hall, from his friends that he had then " there, on the concluſion of the Treaty between the " King and the States-general, in the year 1662, " Mr. Carew ſold his land in Worceſter to Mr. " Thomas Foley for 3800*l.* whereby he ſatisfied " and paid Sir William Powell and others, and ſo " took upon himſelf the adminiſtration of Sir Paul " Pyndar's eſtate."

It is added here,

" And this being the truth of the caſe ſoe help me " GOD (§)."

(§) Vox Veritatis, &c. ut ſupra, p. 52, and p. 53.

Sir Paul Pyndar, on his return from Turkey, expended 2000*l.* in repairing the entry, porches, and front of St. Paul's Cathedral, enriching them with marble ſculpture, and the figures of the Apoſtles. Afterwards being appointed by King James, for his ſkill in commerce, one of the farmers of the Cuſtom-Houſe, he laid out 17,000*l.* on the repairs of the ſide aile of the ſaid Church, and at different times ſupplied Charles I. with money to the amount of 12,000*l.*

ſtancy for many years, between four and five thouſand ſeamen; that he built above twenty ſhips of burthen; was a great inſurer, and beſides that, a very conſiderable goldſmith, or banker, for ſo a banker was then called. It appears likewiſe, that he was very deeply engaged in a Herring Fiſhery, which was carried on at one time, with great ſpirit, and at great expence; but ſoon after, much to his coſt, it came to nothing, in conſequence of the ſupervening diſſentions, confuſion, and miſery that in a ſoon-ſucceeding period, extended over all the Britiſh dominions.

Before the time alluded to in the preceding paragraph, about the year 1624, two of Sir William Courten's ſhips, in their return from Fernambuc, happened to diſcover an uninhabited iſland, now of conſiderable importance to Great Britain, to which Sir William firſt gave the name of Barbadoes. The writer follows here the account given in a capital French work, entitled, Hiſt. Gen. des Voyages, tom. xv. p. 595. A Paris, 1759. 19 tom. 4to. The diſcovery of this iſland is repreſented by the French compiler, as merely accidental; but in ſeveral papers in the Britiſh Muſeum, and particularly in the MS. there, mentioned below [H], it is ſaid expreſsly, that the diſcovery was the reſult of a deliberate well-laid ſcheme, formed on hints from Sir William's correſpondents in Zealand, and concerted, no doubt, between him and his brother Sir Peter, probably the intelligencer, for he lived and died in Holland. But be this as it may, Sir William Courten was certainly the firſt who took poſſeſſion of this iſland, the firſt who gave it the name of Barbadoes which it ſtill retains, and the firſt who began to ſettle it, (according to the MS. mentioned above, and quoted below,) in 1625.

On the 25th of Feb. 1627, Sir William Courten obtained the King's Letters Patent, for the colonization of this iſland, ſheltering himſelf, for whatever reaſons, under the Earl of Pembroke: for the deed grants, "The Government of Barbadoes to the Earl of Pembroke, "in truſt for Sir William Courten, with power to ſettle a Colony there, according to the "laws of England, &c." On the faith of this grant, afterwards ſuperſeded by the influence of James, then Earl of Carliſle, though its validity was acknowledged by the firſt, and generally indeed by all the Lawyers, Sir William ſent two ſhips, with men, arms, ammunition, &c. which ſoon ſtored the iſland with inhabitants, Engliſh, Indians, &c. to the number of one thouſand, eight hundred and fifty, when one Captain Powel received from Sir William, a commiſſion to remain in the iſland as Governor, in behalf of Sir William, and the Earl of Pembroke (a). After Sir William had expended 40,000*l.* on this buſineſs (*), and been in peaceable poſſeſſion of the iſland about three years, James, Earl of Carliſle, claiming on grants ſaid to be prior, though dated July 2, 1627, and April 7, 1628; affirming too, that he was Lord of all the Caribbee iſlands, lying between 10 and 20 degrees of latitude, under the name of Carliola, gave his commiſſion to Colonel Royden, Henry Hawley, and others, to act in his behalf. The Commiſſioners of Lord Carliſle arrived at Barbadoes with two ſhips, in 1629, and having invited the Governor Captain Powel on board, they kept him priſoner, and proceeded to invade and plunder the iſland. They carried off the factors and ſervants of Sir William Courten and the Earl of Pembroke, and eſtabliſhed the Earl of Carliſle's authority in Barbadoes, which continued there under ſeveral Governours, till 1646, when the government of it was veſted by leaſe and contract, in Lord Willoughby of Parham.

(a) MSS. Sloan. 2441.

(*) Sir W. expended 28,600*l.* on fortifications, &c. before he had a Patent under the Great Seal of England, in the 3d year of Cha. I. which ſubjected the Iſland to the Dominion of the King. A Brief Narrative, &c. p. 1.

Sir William Courten, it is ſaid, had likewiſe ſuſtained a conſiderable loſs ſeveral years before this blow in the Weſt Indies, by the ſeizure of his merchandize, after the cruel maſſacre of his factors at Amboyna, in the Eaſt Indies. But after all the loſſes above-mentioned, he was ſtill poſſeſſed, in the year 1633, of lands in various parts of this kingdom, to the value, it is affirmed, of 6,500*l. per annum*, beſides perſonal eſtate rated at 128,000*l.* and very extenſive credit. Such were his circumſtances, we are told, when he opened a trade to China, and as if he had grown young again, embarked ſtill more deeply, in mercantile expeditions to the Eaſt Indies, where he eſtabliſhed ſundry new forts and factories. In the courſe of this new trade he loſt unfortunately two of his ſhips richly laden, the Dragon and the Katharine, which were never heard of more; and he himſelf did not long ſurvive

The Communion plate at Wellingborough, conſiſting of a pair of ſilver flaggons, a chalice and cover, gilt, weighing two hundred and fifty-ſeven ounces, was given 1634 by Sir Paul Pyndar, Knt. In the pariſh regiſter is recorded a thankful acknowledgment of this benefaction under the hands of the Vicar, Churchwardens, and principal inhabitants. On every piece of plate is this inſcription, The gift of Sir Paul Pyndar, Knt. to the Town Church of Wellingborough, 1674. On the ſides of the flaggons, and on the bottom and cover of the chalice, are engraved his arms. In 1640 he gave the firſt bell (8).

(8) Bridges's Northamptonſhire, II. 153.

Thomas Pyndar, Eſq; ſon to the famous Merchant Sir Paul, had for a ſhort time poſſeſſion of Nerquis-houſe in Flintſhire, by marriage with Miſs Wynne, heireſs of the place. Their ſon Paul was created a Baronet about 1666, and dying ſingle the eſtate devolved by maternal right to Paul Williams, Eſq; of Pont y Gwyddel. On the death of Edward Williams, Eſq; 1737, it fell to his ſiſter, now relict of Robert Hyde, Eſq; who enjoys it in great hoſpitality (9).

(9) Pennant's Wales, 2d Edit. 392.

[H] The MS. mentioned below.] It (10) is a MS. hiſtory of Barbadoes, well written and not ill-penned, by ſome perſon who does not ſeem to have been connected, or acquainted with the Courten-family. The ſubſtance of what is mentioned in it relative to this article being given above, nothing more remains to be ſaid of the MS. than that it contains a clear and circumſtantial account of the condition, government, productions, and importance of the iſland at the time it was written, probably a century ago; and that it ſtates Barbadoes, it may be not very exactly, as ſituated between 13 and 14 degrees of latitude, diſtant from England about 3430 miles, thirty miles in length, fourteen in breadth, and twenty-five leagues in circumference (11).

(10) MSS. Sloan. 2441, fol.

(11) See alſo Ligon's Hiſtory of Barbadoes.

this

this loſs, which involved him in great debt; for he died in the end of May, or beginning of June 1636, in the ſixty-fourth year of his age, and was buried in the Church or Church-yard of St. Andrew Hubbard, the ground of both which was, after the fire in 1666, diſpoſed of by the city for public uſes, and partly laid into the ſtreet, the pariſh being annexed to St. Mary-Hill. There is an abſtract of Sir William Courten's Will in the Britiſh Muſeum (b), dated May 22, 1636, from which ſome extracts are given in a note below [I].

(b) Ibid. 3515.

He left all his manors, Wingham Barton in Kent excepted, to his ſon William and his heirs, and him he appointed his executor and reſiduary legatee. Among many other charitable legacies, ſome of which are mentioned below, he bequeathed ſixty-four gowns, to ſixty-four poor men, according to the number of the years of his life. A Latin paper in the Britiſh Muſeum (c) ſeems to have been intended for his Epitaph, though it cenſures as folly, the over-ardent ſpirit of mercantile adventure, for which both Sir William and his ſon were very remarkable. It is endorſed "May 1636" in the hand-writing of William Courten, Eſq; the ſubject of the following article, and may contain perhaps the genuine opinion and ſentiments of the endorſer, expreſſed in his own words at ſome early period of his life. His care in preſerving it, induces at leaſt a ſuſpicion, that it was not very different from his own way of thinking concerning the conduct both of his father and grandfather. This may be mere conjecture: the curious reader may ſee below a faithful tranſcript of the paper [K].

(c) MSS. Sloan. 3515.

The accounts of the original partnerſhip, in which a very conſiderable part of Sir William Courten's eſtate conſiſted, remained unſettled at his death; though on the deceaſe of his brother, Sir Peter, their brother-in-law, John Moncy, repaired to Middleburgh, to ſettle with Peter Boudean-Courten. Before this ſettlement could be accompliſhed, Mr. Moncy died at Boudean's houſe, where he made his Will, as was pretended, leaving Sir William Courten and Peter Boudean-Courten his joint executors.

The validity of this Will was litigated for many years by an Eſther White, alias de Wyer, who claimed as heireſs at law to Mr. John Moncy, and obtained letters of adminiſtration to his eſtate. After a tedious legal proceſs at Middleburgh, and the Hague, this gentlewoman obtained a ſentence in 1657, to compel Peter Boudean to produce the books, papers, &c. but the validity of Moncy's will was ſtill left in queſtion, and it does not now appear, in what manner this law-ſuit terminated.

William Courten, Eſq; the ſon of Sir William, was very early initiated, and very extenſively concerned in commercial buſineſs. He married Lady Katharine Egerton, tenth

[I] Extracts are given in a note below.] It appears from the abſtract above-mentioned, that Sir William Courten's manor of Wingham Barton in Kent, had been ſettled before the date of his will, on his daughter Mary and her heirs; and for her better preferment, [it ſeems ſhe was not then married] he left her 2000*l.* To his daughter Anne Devereux, wife of Eſſex Devereux, Eſq; 1000*l.* to his daughter Dame Heſter Littleton, wife of Sir Edward Littleton 4000*l.* and to each of her children living at his deceaſe 100*l.* To his ſons-in-law Littleton and Devereux, each a diamond ring ſealed up, and their names on the boxes. To his daughter-in-law Lady Katharine Courten, a jewel of diamonds ſealed up with his ſeal at arms, and her name thereon. To his nephew Peter Boudean, and to his wife, a ring and a jewel. To Mr. James Pergens, a ring. To Mr. James Caſiere, Merchant, and to his ſiſter Mrs. Andrews, to each of them 50*l.* Ditto to Mr. Caſteel, Merchant. Ditto Flemiſh to Mr. Joos. Ditto to John De Batts. To Mr. James Tryon, 100 merks. To Mary Caſiere daughter to Mr. John Caſiere, 20*l.* To his Book-keeper and Accomptant David Goubard, 100*l.* and 50*l.* per annum ſo long as he continued in the ſervice of his ſon William Courten. To his ſervant Samuel Bonnel, on the ſame condition, 50*l.* per ann. To Mr. John Moone, 10*l.* To ſeventeen men-ſervants and five women-ſervants of himſelf, and to all his ſon's ſervants, different ſmall ſums. To the reparation of St. Paul's, over and above what he had given before for that uſe, 500 merks. To Chriſt's Church Hoſpital and St. Thomas's ditto, 100*l.* a-piece. To the Miniſters of St. Gabriel Fan-Church, Mr. Palmer, and Mr. Saxby, 20*l.* each; and to the poor of the ſaid pariſh, 30*l.* To the poor of the Dutch Congregations in London, 50*l.* and to the young Students maintained abroad, at Univerſities, by the ſaid Congregations, 20*l.* To the poor of St. Mary-Hill, 15*l.* To the Miniſter of St. Andrew-Hubbard, 5*l.* and to the poor of the pariſh, 10*l.* To Monſ. Marmot, preacher to the French Congregation in London, 20*l.* and to the poor of that Congregation, 20*l.* To the poor of the Dutch and French Congregations in Norwich, Colcheſter, Sandwich, Canterbury, Maidſtone, and Yarmouth, 10*l.* each. To the poor of the ſeveral pariſhes of Laxſton, and Kneeſal in com. Nottingham, of St. Nicholas at Wade in the iſle of Thanet, and of Weſtham in Eſſex, 10*l.* each. To John, Earl of Bridgewater, a ring, &c. &c. It is ſaid in a note at the cloſe of the abſtract, that the rings and jewels, Sir William having the diamonds ready by him in his houſe [inter alia] at the time of his death, amounted in value to 7500*l.*

[K] A faithful tranſcript of the paper.]

May, 1636.

GULIELMUS COURTEN, verè liberali mercaturæ deditus, et in contractibus averſi periculi aſſiduus; poſt ſummè amplificatam diuturno fortunæ afflatu, rem familiarem; poſt opes inſignitas equeſtris ordinis honore; poſt liberos utriuſque ſexûs illuſtriſſimis comitum familiis per conjugia innexos; in præcipiti horum omnium perdendi ac contaminandi diſcrimine, exceſſit vitâ 27 Maij, 1636. Filio non multo poſt cedente foro; diſtractis tot villis, agriſque paternis ære alieno abſumptis in claſſem Indicam privatam; immerſis opibus, depreſsâ et abſorptâ oceano claſſe, non ſine errore patris, filijque. Illius, quod ſpes longas inchoare non dubitaſſet, moriendi præ ætate jam fermè certus; quodque annis gravis levem illam lubricamque Deam tentare denuò voluiſſet; quaſi illam ſilicerniorum, buſtorum, cinerumque curam gereret, quam tot procantur venuſti juvenes, et quibus auſcultare, ſolennius multo eſt æquiuſque. Nec filius, ephorive, ſuâ vacabant culpâ; quod fugientem illam perſequi ſtuduerint, et in ordinem cogere. Fortunam fortunæ copijs agreſſi ſunt, non immerito offenſam horum omnium temeritati, qui totius ex alto in partum, ex partu in agros et poſſeſſiones opimas deducti, ſalum rurſus ſolo retrogradi protulerint; quaſi priora beneficia repudiarent, niſi plura ſuggerentur; vel nulla ſatis magna eſſet pecunia, qua impotentis ſenis, juveniſve vota, non adimplerentur.

daughter

daughter of John, firſt Earl of Bridgewater, by whom he had iſſue, one ſon, named William, and one daughter, called Katharine, and afterwards by her marriage Mrs. Yongs. With the aſſiſtance, it ſeems, and additional credit of his father-in-law the Earl of Bridgewater, William Courten, in 1641, equipped two ſhips, at great expence, the Bona Eſperanza, and the Henry Bonadventure, which he ſent to the Eaſt Indies, to proſecute the trade, and ſupport the eſtabliſhment for trade, which his father, Sir William, had ſettled there. This was his deciſive effort, and circumſtanced as he then was, a very hazardous and deſperate adventure, in which he was unfortunate; for his ſhips, on their voyage, were way-laid, ſeized, and plundered by the Dutch, who in this iniquitous way ruined the ſon, after having attempted, in like manner, to ruin his father about twenty years before, by the butchery of his agents, and the ſeizure of his property at Amboyna.

That crafty people ſaw and ſeized the inſtant of a ſtorm burſting juſt then on Britain, to accompliſh a darling point of their mercenary policy, and ſucceeded but too well in ſtopping for a time the trade of this nation to China, Perſia, and the Eaſt Indies. Moreover, to fill up the meaſure of their iniquity and of their infamy, when, nearly thirty years after, the un-recompenced ſufferers of, and by this much-injured family, proteſted their wrongs, and in a legal manner reclaimed the property of which they had been robbed and pilfered, ſolliciting the ſupport of their magiſtrates in the courſe of law; the States permitted their thieves and robbers to plead openly in arreſt of Judgment, a general article in the Treaty of Breda, that conſigns to oblivion, all national offences, injuries, loſſes and damages, &c. antecedent to its ratification in 1667, as a happy releaſe from all obligations on Dutchmen to act honeſtly with Engliſhmen. The States went farther, adopted this ſtrange conſtruction of the article, in contradiction to the common ſenſe of words, and poſitively interdicted all their Courts of Judicature from doing juſtice to the Engliſh plaintiffs, or giving verdicts contrary to this ſcandalous interpretation of an article in a Treaty, where the ſubjects of complaint were never conſidered, or even mentioned (d). On this ſhallow pretext, did the High and Mighty States of Holland, regardleſs of the general faith of nations, ſcreen and juſtify their ſubjects in flagrant crimes, and prohibit their reſtitution of private property invaded by fraud and violence, on a principle ſubverſive of the commerce by which they ſubſiſt, and utterly deſtructive of all civil ſociety.

(d) This is affirmed on the authority of a printed tract of above 134 pages in folio, entitled, "Fraud and Oppreſſion detected and arraigned," a fragment of which is bound up in MSS. Sloan. 3515. fol.

Here ended the grandeur and opulence of a family of intelligent, enterprizing, and wealthy Merchants, who roſe and ſtood unrivalled by individuals, but were, with all their means and ſkill, unable to withſtand the perſiſtive oppoſition of a whole mercantile nation, accuſtomed to determine its right by its power, to whoſe ignoble jealouſy and ſiniſter arts, they fell at laſt a ſhameful ſacrifice. The Dragon and the Katharine of Sir William Courten were moſt probably intercepted, and privately deſtroyed by the ſame left-handed wiſdom which audaciouſly ſeized the Bona Speranza and Henry Bonadventure of his ſon, and thereby gave the finiſhing blow to the trade of the Courten family; for by this laſt diſaſter, their forts and factories in the Eaſt Indies were totally ruined, and the damage they immediately ſuſtained, excluſive of conſequential loſſes, is eſtimated in ſeveral memorials at more than 200,000*l.* the Bona Speranza being rated at 75,000*l.* the Henry Bonadventure at 150,000*l.* and the inſurance upon them at 7,000*l.* more.

The Earl of Bridgewater, who had been the principal collateral ſecurity for his ſon-in-law, when called upon, abſolutely refuſed to fulfil the obligations he had come under on this occaſion. His Lordſhip ſaid and ſwore, "that he would not fry in hell for his own debts, "for the diſcharge of which he had ſet apart ſome lands; but that he would pay none of "William Courten's debts, in whoſe eſtate he ſaid he had been deceived." Nevertheleſs both this Earl, and his ſon after him, if the writer does not miſ-remember, were put to great trouble and expence on this account.

That part of the eſtate of the Courten-family which now probably was his all, William Courten could neither realize, nor aſcertain. Overpowered, therefore, with his father Sir William's debts, and his own, and burthened with large ſums at intereſt, he became inſolvent in 1643, when he abſented himſelf from the adminiſtration of his paternal eſtate, and withdrew into Italy, leaving the many and great claims upon him unſatisfied, and the accounts of the original family-partnerſhip ſtill unſettled. He lived abroad entirely, for the laſt twelve years of his life, and died at Florence in 1655 inteſtate, or at leaſt, it was afterwards thought prudent to ſay ſo.

It ſeems there was no ſtatute of bankruptcy taken out againſt him on his retirement from England, and the eſtates of the family continued, for years at leaſt, unſequeſtered. His wife, Lady Katharine, who remained here with her children three full years after her huſband went abroad, appears to have been entruſted with the ſole management of his affairs, and in the adminiſtration of the eſtates of the family.

In 1646, this Lady employed John Moone, and David Gubard, both remembered in Sir William Courten's Will, as her Agents or Attornies, to ſettle every thing with Peter Boudean, who perſiſted diſhoneſtly in evading the ſettlement, and having, by whatever means, got poſſeſſion of ſome of Sir William Courten's books and papers, abſolutely refuſed to re-deliver them, availing himſelf of the diſorder and iniquity of the times.

It may be, that in ſome inſtances Lady Katharine's intereſt was neglected, perhaps betrayed, by the people ſhe employed; but with all the integrity and activity in her ſervice imaginable, it is not likely that her agents could have ſucceeded effectually, in bringing one ſo watchful and ſo artful as Boudean was, to ſettle, and cloſe the accounts of the partnerſhip. Nevertheleſs, it is not improbable that Boudean, to protract time and ſhuffle off the final ſettlement, might ſend Lady Katharine occaſional remittances, for the ſupport of her huſband abroad, and the ſupply of her own and her children's neceſſities. If this was not done, at any rate ſhe might, with whatever diſadvantage, take up monies on exchange, and give obligations for the repayment of them on the co-partnerſhip. It is certainly ſaid, that Sir William Courten did this, the accounts not having been liquidated for fourteen years before his death. It is ſaid, that "the great bulk of Sir William Courten's lordſhips and lands, excepting thoſe in the counties of Worceſter and Glouceſter, were ſold outright by William Courten his ſon and heir, to William Purpoint, Eſq; Mr. Daniel Harvey, the Earl of Kent, and others (e)."

(e) Vox Veritatis, &c. 4to. 1683. By Tho. Browne, Gent. p. 39.

It does not appear, from any thing this writer has ſeen, in what year Lady Katharine died; nor is he authorized to ſay, that ſhe continued till her death in the ſole management of her huſband's affairs, and the adminiſtration of the remaining eſtates of his family. Certainly, in 1660, King Charles II. granted Letters-Patent of Adminiſtration to all the eſtates of Sir William Courten and his ſon, in favour of one George Carew, Eſq; whilſt William, the ſon of William Courten, Eſq; was ſtill a minor, wanting then three years of being of age, and reſiding at that time beyond ſea.

It may be proper to cloſe here this article with ſome account of Carew, who, in a way apparently not very reputable, probably enriched himſelf from the wrecks of a very opulent family. A certificate ſigned Arlington, if printed from a genuine original, proves that Geo. Carew was one of the Gentlemen of his Majeſty's Moſt Honourable Privy-Chamber. He was likewiſe a Member of the Society of Gray's-Inn, as appears from a printed copy of a certificate of the reader and benchers, dated 1674-5, in the 27th of Charles II. and ſigned Thomas Holt Lector, Robert Raworth, John Otway, and Francis Luttrel. Thomas Browne, who ſays he was concerned for Mr. George Carew twenty years and upwards in the affairs between him, as an Aſſignee of Sir William Courten's eſtates, and afterwards Adminiſtrator of his goods, ſays, that Carew "was in his juvenile years bred ſome-"time in the city of London; that in 1652, he was admitted of Gray's-Inn, where he was a "great Student in the common law of England for ſeven years together after his admittance."

(f) Vox Veritatis, &c. ut ſupra, p. 39.

(f) Another certificate likewiſe printed, and aſcribed to ſomebody whoſe name is forgotten, but who is ſtyled Steward to Mr. Carew, atteſts, that George Carew's eſtates in Suffolk, Eſſex, London, Dorſetſhire and Surrey, amounted to 530*l. per annum*. In the papers relative to the Courten-family in the Britiſh Muſeum, this perſon is commonly called George Carew of Gray's-Inn, and ſometimes George Carew of Richmond, Eſq.

"In 1659, George Carew bought nine cottages at Richmond, alias Weſt-Sheene, in "Surrey, which he demoliſhed as being receptacles for poor inhabitants burthenſome to "the pariſh; and in the room of them built three fair brick-houſes, with coach houſes, "barns, ſtables and out-buildings, whereby, it is ſaid, he increaſed the King's revenue in "hearth-money, and the rents and profits of James, Duke of York, at an expence to "himſelf of 8000*l.* ſterling and upwards." This eſtate fell, it is ſaid, to Sir James Butler in 1682 (g). Carew had likewiſe eight houſes in the pariſh of St. Andrew in Holbourn, of about the value of 1400*l.* which he mortgaged, with his Richmond eſtate, and another he had in Worceſterſhire, to take in ſeveral aſſignments on the ſhips deſtroyed by the Dutch, from Sir William Powell and Sir Peter Vanlore, to unite all intereſts, as it is ſaid, but in fact, it ſeems, to accompliſh the ſcheme in which he ſucceeded, viz. to get Letters of Adminiſtration, to the eſtates and goods, both of Sir William Courten, and of Sir Paul Pyndar, whoſe adminiſtrator Sir William Powell then was; though it is ſaid in the Dedication of the Tract here referred to, "that Providence had caſt this adminiſtration on Carew, in right of his wife, and other his relations." This was done in, or ſoon after the year 1665; for in the month of May, in that year, he obtained Letters of Reprizals on the Eaſt India Company of the Netherlands, for the ſum of 151,612*l.* with coſts and charges, to continue effectual in law, till full ſatisfaction was made for all loſſes, &c. or a compoſition took place between the Grantees and the Company above-mentioned.

(g) Ibid. p. 18, 19. and p. 4. and Dedication.

From two papers tranſcribed into the article immediately following this, it is evident, that there was a Mr. Carew, who was a very conſiderable debtor to William Courten the laſt man of that name and family, and at one time his Agent and Solicitor. It is not clear to the compiler of this article, that this George Carew, Eſq; was either a real creditor, or a rightful agent for the creditors of this family; but it appears, that he bought up debts and claims on the eſtates, and that, under a pretext of having an intereſt himſelf in right of his wife, and a zealous concern for the intereſts of other creditors, he actually worked himſelf into their buſineſs, and obtained at laſt, as has been ſaid, Letters of Adminiſtration to the eſtates of the Courtens in the year 1660, and likewiſe in 1665 or 1666, to the eſtates, &c. of Sir Paul Pyndar.

In 1661, George Carew, Eſq; went to work on the ſtrength of his Letters of Adminiſtration to the goods of Sir William Courten, and commenced a legal proceſs in Holland, againſt Peter Boudean-Courten, who died, it ſeems, rich, as may be ſeen below [L], in or about the year 1662, leaving his ſons and daughters reſponſable for the ſtill undecided claims on the partnerſhip of the Courtens and Moncy, from their joint ſtock of which their father had ſo unjuſtly kept poſſeſſion, and from the real and perſonal eſtates which he had left to a great amount among his children. The legal proceſſes were now renewed, and claims of juſtice re-inſtituted in ſundry Courts of Holland, in the name of George Carew, Eſq; adminiſtrator to the eſtates of Sir William Courten, &c. againſt John and Peter Boudeans and the other ſons and daughters of Peter Boudean deceaſed. They ſeem to have inherited the diſpoſition and craft with the wealth of their father; for one James Bovey, who had been ſervant and book-keeper to Mr. Moncy, being on the death of his maſter employed by William Courten, Eſq; and afterwards veſted with letters of procuration from George Carew, Eſq; was arreſted on a great feigned action, and confined in priſon for ſeveral years, to prevent his proſecution of the ſuit, and to retard the courſe of juſtice. Its deciſions in that country, to judge of them by this ſuit againſt the Boudeans, ſeem to have been ſufficiently deliberate; for whether it was owing to the law's delay, or to the influence and ingenuity of the defendants, it certainly was ſtill in litigation in the year 1674, and this writer is yet to learn in what way, or at what time it terminated. Since this was written, and after part of the article was printed, much new information has been obtained from a curious and ſcarce Tract, obligingly communicated by Iſaac Reed, Eſq. It is entitled "Vox Veritatis, "or a brief abſtract of the caſe between George Carew, Eſq; Adminiſtrator of the goods "and chattels of Sir William Courten, and Sir P. Pyndar, Knts. deceaſed, &c. and the "Eaſt-India Company of the Neitherlands, with other inhabitants of Amſterdam and "Middleburgh, &c. by Thomas Browne, Gent. dedicated to his much honoured friends, "the creditors and legatees of Sir William Courten, Sir P. Pyndar, and William Courten, "Eſq; deceaſed." 60 pages, &c. 4*to*. 1683.

(h) Vox Veritatis, &c.

In this pamphlet, it is ſaid (h), that George Carew, in or about the year 1672, with a letter in his cuſtody from King Charles II. to his Ambaſſadors and Plenipotentiaries in Holland, the Duke of Buckingham and Lord Arlington, with a Paſſport likewiſe from the States Commiſſioners at Hampton Court, was actually apprehended with his two ſervants, as ſpies and enemies to Holland, and committed cloſe priſoners to the Geuangen Port, without acceſs, where they continued for the ſpace of two and twenty months. It is added, (i) that G. Carew "was condemned to die, by way of retortion for Advocate Saſſe, pri-"ſoner then in the Tower of London, but the executions of both were ſuſpended until "farther order, ſoe that at the end of the war, they were releaſed upon equal terms."

(i) Ibid. ut ſupra.

It appears from this new ſource of information, that the litigation was not yet terminated at the date of its publication in 1683; and that in the preceding year, 1682, G. Carew, being determined not to ſurrender the Letters of Repriſals which he had obtained in 1665, had, in contempt of the High Court of Chancery, which had declared them null and void, and iſſued its orders to apprehend him, fled into France, and taken up his reſidence at Paris, where, ſays the writer, "he now reſolves to eat his bread, until the people "of England are come to their right witts and ſences again(k)." A paragraph of a French letter, from a French Lawyer, François Perenott, written at this period, and dated A Paris ce 16 Dec. 1682, being very curious, is given for the reader's amuſement, in a note below [M].

(k) Vox Veritatis, &c. p. 37.

The

[L] Who died, it ſeems, rich, as may be ſeen below.] Peter Boudean-Courten left, among his daughters at his death, according to the phraſeology of the Netherlands, "nine ton of gold," that is, as explained in the paper that contains the information, 90,000l. ſterling.

[M] Given for the reader's amuſement in a note below.]

"MONSIEUR,

"J'ay reçu la votre avec copie du procez de "Scire facias, au nom du Roy, & la reponſe à icelle "tous deux en Latin, & l'ordre de la Chancelerie "enſuivie dattée le 26 de May, 1682, & aye auprés "de moy la copie des Lettres Patentes pour Repre-"ſailles contre les Hollandois, pour 151,612 livres "ſterlins, tranſlaté en Francois. J'ay conſulte cette "affaire avec les premieres Conſeillers du Parlement "de Paris, leſquels ſont d'avis qu'il eſt contre la "juſtice naturelle & la conſtitution du Gouvernement "d'Angleterre, que la méme Cour de Judicature d'où "les Lettres Patentes ſont iſſues, les pourroit abroger & "anuller, ſans premierement faire ſatisfaction aux "perſonnes injuriées ou endomagées, & ils tiennent pour "fort deſhonorable à aucun Prince, ou ſujets, de chercher "relief contre leur propres actes, leſquels ſont en leur "propre pouvoir d'accomplir; LE ROY de FRANCE, "vendroit ſon lit de deſſous ſoy, plutôt que de courir le "deſhonneur & reproche d'une telle action, ſi reflectant "contre tous Princes Soverains, &c (12)."

(12) Vox Veritatis &c. p. 37 and 38.

The King's Attorney, Solicitor, and Counſel pleaded in the Court of Chancery, that the Letters of Repriſals granted to Sir Edmund Turner, G. Carew, &c. in May 1665, were diſannulled by an expreſs article in the Treaty of Breda in 1667. The Chancellors, Hide and Finch, afterwards Earl of Nottingham, acquieſced in this opinion; and it was accordingly decreed in the Court of Chancery that the Letters were void, that they ought to be reſigned, and the record of them erazed. This order of the Court was made abſolute Feb. 27, 1682, when tip-ſtaves and meſſengers being ſent from day to day to apprehend Carew, as it is ſaid, dead or alive, his perſonal liberty became inſecure, and he fled the kingdom.

Carew's pleas againſt the diſannulment or ſurrender of the Letters of Repriſals granted to him and others in 1665 were ſpecious and ſtrong. He pleaded, that his name was only uſed in truſt; that he never per-

The legal demands of the Courten-family on Holland and Zealand were very ſerious things, and ſeem to have required, and indeed to have juſtified, mature conſideration. Its perſonally acted in execution of the powers given by the letters, &c. and that neither the letters themſelves, nor any of the exemplifications, or duplicates, [for commiſſions had been frequently given to Captains of ſhips, upon them] were actually in his cuſtody, although he mentioned the names of the perſons in whoſe poſſeſſion they were. He refuſed however to ſign an inſtrument of ſurrender drawn up by the King's Attorney, which Turner, another grantee, readily ſigned, and by ſigning releaſed himſelf from all farther trouble and proſecution. He pleaded, that he had ſold or mortgaged all his eſtates to purchaſe aſſignments on the two East India ſhips, the ſeizure of which was to have been indemnified by theſe Letters of Repriſals; that the letters had not by any means indemnified him and other ſufferers, for whom he likewiſe acted in truſt; that therefore he could not without ruining himſelf, and being moreover guilty of great injuſtice to other claimants, his conſtituents, as adminiſtrator of the goods of Sir W. Courten, and Sir P. Pyndar, acquieſce in the order of the Court, or relinquiſh or ſurrender, by ſigning the inſtrument of the King's Attorney, the Letters of Repriſals, the ſole ſecurity then left for him, and other ſufferers for whom he acted, without ſome adequate ſatisfaction. He pleaded an expreſs clauſe in the Letters of Repriſals, which ſays, that they were to remain in full force, "Notwithſtanding it may ſo happen, the preſent "differences between us and the States-General, "depending upon General Repriſals, may be "agreed and compoſed, and that in the interim, a "peace and good correſpondence may be renewed "between us and the ſaid States-General (13)." Sovereign Princes, ſaid Carew or his Counſel, make their ſtipulations as they pleaſe concerning their own intereſts, relating to dominion or royalty, either at ſea or land; but as to matters of property, and in caſes of meum & tuum, wherein their ſubjects were concerned, and them only, they were, as the King was, in the article of the Treaty of Breda pleaded by his Attorney, &c. circumſcribed within the limits of the laws of God and man: but the King having granted his fiat, and the Chancellor his recepi to the grant of 1665, for reparation and ſatisfaction according to law, the King had put it beyond his power to avoid it without payment in the way agreed on, or in ſome other effectual way; and that the King's Miniſters and the Dutch laboured equally in vain to gain a point which could not poſſibly be gained, without reſtitution, or adequate ſatisfaction.

(13) Vox Veritatis, &c. p. 58.

Carew added other reaſons againſt the decree of the Court, ſome of which are curious and memorable. He urged, that the certificates, depoſitions, and authentic acts of public notaries, obtained at great expence from the East-Indies, &c. on which Dr. Exton grounded his report of damages at 151,612*l.* had all been conſumed by the fire of London in 1666; conſequently if he ſigned the inſtrument of reſignation and ſurrender propoſed by the King's Attorney, &c. there would remain nothing on record in behalf of the creditors of Sir W. Courten, &c. there would be even a record againſt them. He contended that the ſpoils and depredations for which ſatisfaction was claimed, were upon record under the broad ſeal of England; that the debt and damages of the creditors of Sir W. Courten and Sir P. Pyndar were all liquidated and aſcertained under the Broad Seal of England annexed to the Letters of Repriſals. The names too of the officers and ſeamen in the ſhip Bona Eſperanza killed and deſtroyed in their own defence, in the time of alliance between England and Holland; the wages alſo of the officers and ſeamen in both the ſhips Bona Eſperanza and Henry Bona Adventura, were in like manner upon record under the Broad Seal of England. Finally, Carew inſiſted that this ſole remedy for all their relief, in lieu of which nothing was offered, was, ſo long as the Letters of Repriſals were not abrogated, or ſurrendered, valid on record, in ſeveral duplicates and exemplifications, beſides the original Patent itſelf upon record under the Great Seal of England, the greateſt ſecurity in the kingdom, againſt which there was no averment. It followed, that he conſidered his Letters of Repriſals as his all, and that in ſpite of the Court he propoſed to keep them, and to act upon them as he found occaſion in juſtice to himſelf, and, as was added for the grace of the matter, in juſtice to the numberleſs and much aggrieved creditors of Sir W. Courten and Sir P. Pyndar.

It is eaſy to ſee, that Carew's obſtinacy militated againſt himſelf, that all his pleadings were overborne, and all his arts vain, oppoſed to the Court of Chancery, in a ſuit prompted and ſupported by the crown, though it was actually in proof before that Court upon the depoſition of Sir George Downing, his Majeſty's Envoy Extraordinary to the States, whom his Majeſty had enjoined to get ſatisfaction for the injuries done to the Courten-family by the ſeizure of their ſhips, that John de Witt, in Oct. 1664, had actually offered 200,000 guilders, and whatever more could be got, on the caution of Pergens and P. Boudean, but that the offer had been rejected by Carew, for himſelf and the creditors, &c. as an inadequate ſatisfaction. New differences ariſing juſt at that time, between the King of England and the States, this affair was dropped; and probably in the hurry of the treaty at Breda, concluded juſt after the plague, the fire, and the exploit of the Dutch at Chatham, where they burnt ſeveral of the King's ſhips, and whence they carried off the Royal Charles, of which they made a Coffee-houſe at Helver-Sluce; this private intereſt was either totally over-looked, or politically abandoned. However this was, the crown, it ſeems, acceded to the Dutch interpretation of that Treaty, and having generally releaſed, and re-delivered the prizes taken by commiſſioners acting on the Letters of Repriſals to Hamburgers, Lubeckers, Danzieckers, Swedes, and various very queſtionable claimants, even before the ratification of this treaty; after it was ratified, the captains of ſhips, and ſeamen, who accepted of commiſſions from Carew and other grantees, nominated in the Letters of Repriſals, for proceeding on the powers with which they were undoubtedly veſted, were ſeveral times apprehended, and once tried as felons and pyrates, but acquitted. In ſhort, the Letters, &c. meant for their relief, inſtead of being a benefit to the grantees and creditors of Sir William Courten and Sir P. Pyndar, who had, it ſeems, an aſſignation of the two ſhips, for divers ſums of money lent to Sir W. C. and his ſon, on yielding the ſurplus to Sir Edward Lyttleton, proved eventually an aggravation of their loſs, and an additional injury (14).

(14) Ibid. paſſ.

The author of the publication, from which the ſubſtance of this note is extracted, a ſolicitor for Carew, and, at the date of its printing, employed more than twenty years in the affair of which he relates the caſe, ſtates a fact relative to the Letters of Repriſals granted to Carew, &c. anno 1665, in the following words (15): "Complaints being made to "the Councell-Table, that ſhips of the King's "allies were brought in by force of the Letters "Patent, for repriſalls, upon ſuſpicion as enemies, "and that it was prejudicial to the Lord High Admiral's intereſt, and the King's fleet for want of "ſeamen; proclamation iſſued forth de bene eſſe, to "ſuſpend the execution of the ſaid Letters, &c. "until further orders, and Mr. Carew was committed by the Councell-Table to the priſon of the "Fleet, Aug. 20, 1666, old ſtile, for the ſeamens "pretended miſdemeanours. Afterwards, on the "ſame day of the month, and hour of the day, anno "1672, John de Witt, [to whom Browne imputes "Carew's impriſonment, &c.] and Cornelis his brother were murdered at the Hague by the rabble, "as a judgment upon them for treachery and ingratitude."

(15) Ibid. p. 6.

The preſent writer enters not into the treachery, ingratitude, or conſequential judgment roundly aſſerted

Its ſingle claim on Peter Boudean and his family amounted of itſelf to 122,000*l.* which, great as it is, was not yet one half, if even a third, of the claims of this family in various Courts of that country. Indeed, the ſums ſaid to have been owing to the Courtens, one way or other, here, or beyond ſea, are in their aggregate enormous, and ſo uncommon, as almoſt to exceed all belief, conſidered merely as the net gains of fair trade, never ſuſpected of fraud, nor ever ſupported by force [N]. The writer juſt gives them as he found them, for ſerted by the author of the foregoing paragraph; but he takes the opportunity of recording here, a curious fact relative to the aſſaſſination of theſe brothers, not commonly known, and never printed, which he learnt very early in life, from a well-informed perſon of unqueſtionable veracity and extenſive knowledge in hiſtory.

After the Prince of Orange became King of England, a Dutchman one day ſolicited hard for an audience, and in order to obtain it, requeſted that it might be ſignified to his Majeſty, that the name of the man who begged to ſpeak to him was Tallo. The delivery of this importunate ſuitor's meſſage, procured him inſtantaneous admiſſion, and it became certainly known at Court, that this fellow was the ring-leader of the mob that tore the brothers to pieces. For this piece of ſervice he had, it ſeems, an annual penſion for life from the Prince of Orange; and his application to the King, in which, it was ſaid, he ſucceeded, was for its arrears and continuance.

This digreſſion cannot be much lengthened by the following addition. On this tragic event, the penſionary's mother, and a younger ſurviving ſon, fled into this kingdom. The ſon, perhaps only Engliſhing his Dutch diſcrimination, took the name of White, and began near Fulham, where they fixed their habitation, a manufactory, the firſt in its kind here, of pottery-ware, and ſtone-bottles, vulgarly called grey-beards, which is ſtill carried on, in the ſame place, by the lineal deſcendants of the family, at this day. The mother, it is ſaid, lived recluſe, in ſullen ſolitary dignity, generally inacceſſible, unleſs to the King who viſited her ſometimes, and people of the firſt faſhion. She died in that retirement, where the writer's informer ſays, he ſaw an admirable picture of Oliver Cromwell, for which, he was told, that repeated offers of extraordinary prices had been repeatedly refuſed.

It is high time to conclude this long note, occaſioned by an accidental ſight of Vox Veritatis, &c. too late for incorporation with the article, by obſerving that the author of the tract ſo entitled, mentions four books publiſhed by Carew, of the firſt of which only, the preſent writer has ſeen a fragment. To them all the reader is referred, if he can find them, for farther information in theſe matters, if he wiſhes to know more concerning them.

1. Fraud and oppreſſion detected and arraigned.

2. An hue and cry after the goods and chattels of Sir William Courten, and Sir Paul Pyndar.

3. Hinc illæ lachrimæ.

4. Lex Talionis, or the law of Marque or Repriſalls.

[N] Never ſuſpected of fraud, nor ever ſupported by force; Sir W. Courten, and his fellow-adventurers in the Eaſt Indies, did not ſend ſervants to trade there, with tinſel and trinkets in one hand, and a muſket in the other. To puſh or protect their trade, they had not the aid of ſoldiers maintained at the public charge, or any legal permiſſion to employ ſuch armed auxiliaries ad libitum, even at their own expence. The Letters-Patent which permitted them to make trading voyages to the Eaſt Indies, China, Japan, &c. and to make ſettlements there for future commerce, reſtrained them from all acts of violence and coercive meaſures, and made them only more reſponſible for their behaviour. Their Patent, indeed, though obtained by intereſt, and attended with expence, was more for oſtentation than uſe; chiefly for the grace of their undertakings, and at beſt but in the nature of a teſtimonial, if happily it could be made intelligible, to ſay, that the grantees were not, as many traders then were, mere pirates and free-booters.

Nevertheleſs, with this ſupport only, in appearance ſufficiently ample for all the honeſt purpoſes of commercial dealing, we are told, that Sir William Courten, in an amicable manner, and at great expence, eſtabliſhed factories and ſtore-houſes, at Carwar, Cocheen, Maccao and other places on the coaſt of India; and that he entered at the ſame time, into a correſpondence and agreement with the Viceroys and Governours in thoſe parts, for a continual trade.

After the death of Sir William, and the retirement of his ſon, Lady Katharine Courten, parted with the books and papers of inſtructions for this well-planned trade, to Maurice Thompſon, of London, Merchant, who knew their value; "for he, and others, upon a "private account, ſet forth ſeveral ſhips for trading-"voyages to the Eaſt Indies, upon the ſame founda-"tions laid by Sir William; and made returns of "ten for one upon thoſe trading voyages, as the ſaid "Thompſon himſelf confeſſed before credible wit-"neſſes, ſtill living," in 1679 (15).

Upon this ſame foundation, originally laid by Sir W. Courten at his own proper coſt and charges, it is ſaid, that the firſt Eaſt-India Company erected themſelves; and that perſevering in their purſuit of the trade which he eſtabliſhed, they were ſoon afterwards confirmed in it by a Charter from O. Cromwell, ſtrengthened after that by Charles II. and ſince repeatedly renewed with powers and privileges more and more ample.

As the trade of Sir William Courten and his ſon, was not ſupported by force, ſo neither was it ever ſuſpected of fraud or unfairneſs. This is evident from a fact recorded in the Vox Veritatis, &c.

Mr. Browne concludes that tract, with expreſſing hope, "that the eyes and ears of the Officers and "Miniſters of State, and juſtice, would at length be "opened for the preſervation of his Majeſty's ho-"nour, and the honour and reputation of the Crown "and kingdom, by complying with the humble ad-"dreſſes and propoſals of their creditors, for perpetu-"ating the memory of Sir W. Courten, and of Sir P. "Pyndar, by erecting their ſtatues in marble, under the "piazzas of the Royal Exchange; that of Sir William "Courten, at the end of the Barbadoes-walk on the one "ſide; and that of Sir P. Pyndar, at the end of the "Turkey-walk on the other ſide, &c (16)."

The requeſt and propoſals of theſe public ſpirited creditors are equally honourable to the memories of themſelves, and thoſe of Sir W. Courten and Sir P. Pyndar. They found, no doubt, good reaſon to make this patriotic petition, and they had the greateſt reaſon to have expected, that it would have been readily granted. Their petition, it ſeems, was ſtill depending in 1683; but the King, to whom it was preferred, had more wit than gratitude, was no ſlave to juſtice, and never generous. Neither he, nor his favourite companions and Counſellors were very likely to make much account of claims of this nature; and accordingly, he never acceded to their honourable requeſt. The very extraordinary favours which this Prince's father and grandfather had been accuſtomed to receive from both the Knights, whoſe memories were thus propoſed to have been perpetuated, were probably recollected by their royal heir with reluctance. Certainly he ſeems not to have been unwilling, that the reſidue of their wealth ſhould be alienated from its rightful inheritors, and that all remembrance of them in this country ſhould periſh for ever.

When

(15) "A brief "narrative and "deduction of "the ſeveral re-"markable caſ-"es of Sir W. "Courten and "Sir P. Pyndar, "&c. under "four principal "heads, viz. "1. The diſco-"very and plan-"tation of Bar-"badoes. 2. Ex-"peditions to "Eaſt India, "China, and "Japan. 3. De-"nyal of juſtice "on civil acti-"ons depending "in Holland "and Zealand. "4. Loanes and "ſupplies for "the ſervice of "the crown, "upon the col-"lection of fines "and compoſi-"tions out of "the Popiſh Re-"cuſants eſtate, "&c. Recol-"lected out of "the original "writings and "Records, &c." Lond. 1679. f. p. 3 and 4. N.B. This narrative, which contains twelve pages, beſides the title and epiſtle, was preſented to Parliament ſome time in April that year, 1679, which broke up May 27, and never met till Oct. 1680, when it ſeems a long printed remonſtance on the ſame ſubjects was laid before them, of which, it appears from a quotation, that there was An Epitome printed, conſiſting at leaſt of 21 pages, in 1681. The names of G. Carew, and James Bovey, with ten more, are ſubſcribed to the prefatory epiſtle of the narrative above-mentioned, dated March, 1678-9.

(16) Vox Veritatis, &c. 4to. ad fin. May 29, 1683.

(17) See Johnſon's Dictionary, Art. Liberty and derivatives.

for they are ſtated below with accuracy and fidelity [O], from the ſtatement of a paper which the curious reader may ſee in the Britiſh Muſeum (l).

(l) MSS. Sloan. 3515.

Having

When Mr. Browne expreſſed himſelf in the words above-quoted, ſurely he believed againſt hope, and would ſoon find, that he had erred in diſregarding the admonition which ſays, "Put not your truſt in Princes." This Prince unqueſtionably knew, full well, that if he had granted the requeſt of their creditors in favour of two ſuch ſignal benefactors to his family, it would then have become notorious, that he ought to have done a great deal more; but by abſolutely doing nothing, and appearing rather inimical than friendly to their deſcendants, he foreſaw, that it might be imagined, he either did not know, or was not ſenſible, of his having inherited any obligations from their fore-fathers.

Mr. Browne's argument for the erection of marble ſtatues to Sir William Courten and Sir Paul Pyndar, was certainly the worſt that he could have made uſe of in that reign; namely, to furniſh Merchants in future times, with extraordinary examples of loyalty, and extraordinary incitements to practiſe it; meaning by loyalty, not a religious reverence for our laws, but a blind devotion to our King.

Now, certainly the examples of Sir W. Courten and Sir Paul Pyndar, properly conſidered, and to the full extent of their hiſtories, operate very differently, and hold forth very poor encouragement for the ſort of loyalty, which Mr. B. perhaps, only in the courſe of his pleading, recommends. Nevertheleſs, it ſeems that the language of Engliſhmen, has in proceſs of time, become entirely conformable to Browne's unconſtitutional idea of loyalty: for, whatever it may have been owing to, there is no unequivocal example to be found of the word loyalty, in its primitive and moſt obvious ſenſe, in the grand Dictionary, that profeſſes to give the true meanings of all our words, and to fix, at leaſt up to its date, the ſtandard of our vernacular language (17).

(17) See JOHNSON's Dictionary, Art. LOYALTY and its derivatives.

[O] They are ſtated below with accuracy, &c.]

Debts incumbent on the Crown - -	148,216
Claims for damages at Barbadoes - -	65,000
Ditto on the Eaſt-India Company of the Netherlands - - -	151,612
Debts outſtanding on civil actions in Holland and Zealand - -	134,000
	£. 498,828

Obſervations.

The date of the paper from which this liſt of the principal claims of the Courten-family is tranſcribed, cannot at preſent be fixed, ſome pages being wanting at the beginning, and a leaf or leaves at the end; but it is evident from other papers apparently antecedent, that ſome of the loans to King James I. and his ſon, King Charles I. were liquidated; for it is mentioned, more than once, that the debts, ſaid here to be incumbent on the Crown, amounted at one time to 200,000*l.* &c. The following entries are taken from the ſame paper here referred to, and may be, as the tranſcriber conjectures, particulars of the laſt groſs article in the preceding account, viz. "Debts outſtanding on civil actions in Holland and Zealand." But as he does not know what might be the preciſe value of a guilder at that time, and as the claims on the actions for legacies by Sir Peter Courten and Mr. Moncy are not diſtinctly ſpecified, he does not pretend to determine, whether the aggregate of the entries given below, do, or do not, correſpond with the amount of the groſs article, of which they are ſuppoſed to be the particulars. The deciſion of this point is left to people better ſkilled in this kind of lore, and is of very little conſequence in a work of this nature.

Action againſt the Boudean-family -	122,000
For monies received in truſt for William Courten, Eſq; by Jacob Pergens -	5,500
For money lent by Sir William Courten to Jacob Pergens - - -	3,000
On an attachment in the Bank for 12,000 guilders of D. Goubard - -
Actions for legacies by Sir Peter Courten and Mr. Moncy, to Sir William Courten, &c. proſecuted by G. Carew, James Bovey, and William Courten, Eſq; - - - - probably the ſon of William Courten, Eſq; and the ſubject of the ſubſequent article.

N. B. The claim of damages on the Eaſt-India Company of the Netherlands, was aſcertained upon oath in our High Court of Admiralty, and was fixed at the ſum of 151,612*l.* by the expreſs decree of Dr. Exton, then Judge of that Court.

May 19, 1665, the King granted Letters of Marque or Repriſalls to Sir Edmund Turnor and G. Carew, for the forcible recovery of theſe damages with coſts, to continue effectual in law, until the ſum of 151,612*l.* with all charges, was received, or a compoſition between the parties took place. But according to Browne's account, entitled, perhaps not with unexceptionable propriety, Vox Veritatis, theſe Letters, &c. originally intended for the benefit of the ſufferers, had not, in 1683, been productive of any reparation, but proved indeed a ſtone, inſtead of bread, and for fiſh, a ſerpent. It does not appear at what time Carew [who ſeems to have got into the agency for the aggrieved creditors of Sir W. Courten and Sir P. Pyndar, rather to ſerve his own ends, than to have been their choſen and faithful conſtituent] relinquiſhed theſe worſe than uſeleſs Letters, &c. or whether he ever ſurrendered them. The latter end of this intermeddling man is at preſent involved in obſcurity. Indeed, but that ſome account of him ſeemed neceſſary to explain the intricate hiſtory of this article, he might as well have paſſed unheeded into utter oblivion.

The claims of damages at Barbadoes, in conſequence of the forcible entries of the Earl of Carliſle's agents, ſtated here at 65,000*l.* were not, it ſeems, proſecuted by any legal contention with that Lord, or his heirs, but only by importunate applications to the Crown, grounded on Sir William's having incurred the loſs above-mentioned, in diſcovering, planting, and fortifying Barbadoes, on the faith of the King's Letters Patents under the Broad Seal of the kingdom. It was propoſed that, on an exact ſurvey, a quit rent, at ſo much an acre, ſhould be granted in compenſation for Sir W. Courten's right of prior occupancy, and his expenditures in 1626, 1627, and 1628; or that in lieu of ſuch a quit-rent, four and an half per cent. on the growth of the iſland, ſhould be appropriated, one moiety for the benefit of the Knight's grand-child, and heirs, for ever; the other moiety to belong to his creditors, apparently too, for ever, no mention being made of the expiration of their title, on the liquidation of their claims. Whether the overture was fair, or inſidious, it ſeems to have been unſucceſsful: at leaſt, in 1683, it does not appear that any thing was granted from the crown, on the idea of indemnification upon this ſcore, either to the grand-child, or creditors of Sir William Courten, or to George Carew, who on no very promiſing ſpeculation, by his own confeſſion, ſeems to have ſtripped himſelf of decent raiment to get arrayed in wealth, by the ſhameful purchaſe of cheap claims, amplified, with intereſt, on a reduced family, and an impoveriſhed eſtate (18).

(18) Vox Veritatis, &c. p. 51, p. 17, et paſſim.

As to the out-ſtanding claims on civil actions, in the Netherlands, ſtated in this account at 134,000*l.* it ſeems, that even in 1683, juſtice was ſtill poſitively denied to Engliſhmen, who had ſuits for recovery of debts depending at law, in any of the Courts of Holland and Zealand. The Dutch pretended, in ſpite of ſenſe and reaſon, that they were univerſally diſcharged from all claims whatſoever of Engliſhmen, by an expreſs article in the Treaty of Breda. For any thing that appears at preſent to the contrary, their Magiſtrates perſevered to the laſt

Having now paid that tribute which ſeemed to be deſervedly due in a work of this nature, to ſeveral of our countrymen, who, in the age in which they lived, were conſpicuouſly eminent and very meritorious in the mercantile line; it ſtill remains to give ſome account of the laſt of their name, a man of a contemplative caſt, much eſteemed and beloved in private life, in habits of intimacy and friendſhip with ſcholars in the firſt ranks of literature in his time, who was himſelf well verſed in ſundry branches of ſcience, particularly in Natural Hiſtory, and who appears to have been the principal collector of the coins and natural curioſities now in the Britiſh Muſeum, as the reader will find from the peruſal of the following article.] C. N.

[ COURTEN (WILLIAM), was the laſt in the male line of the family, to whoſe merits it was meant to do juſtice in the preceding article; the writer of which, wiſhed to have given here a better account of this Gentleman, than he now finds it poſſible to give.

The following well-authenticated memorials, however imperfect, may ſtill be better than a chaſm in this alphabetical place for his name, in the Biographia Britannica. They are given, however, with diffidence pro re natâ, and not under the notion of any thing entitled, to be conſidered as a regular life of William Courten, Eſq. Many papers written by him, or relative to him, in the Britiſh Muſeum, have been conſulted and conſidered: but after the pains that have been taken, after all that may be found in that rich repoſitory, probably, there may ſtill be a want of ſufficient materials for a chronological and ſatisfactory narrative of this Gentleman's life.

It was but lately, that the preſent writer became certain of what he had long ſuſpected, though it was not known or attended to before, that the ſubject of this article ſoon after he became of age, dropt his family name, and aſſumed another, which he afterwards retained, as is now well known, to the end of his life.

The certainty of this diſcovery, which this writer had hinted before, in another work, led him to new ſources of information in abundance; from which much was expected, and but little procured. Every book, letter, or ſcrap of paper, that could be found in the Muſeum, under this new name, or in the ſame, or any very ſimilar hand-writing, on the ſtricteſt ſearch of the obliging officers in that eſtabliſhment, has been carefully examined, and entries were made of every thing thought worthy of notice in them, in proviſion for ſomething of this kind.

If new information can fill up the outlines here given, or ſupply deficiencies, or correct any miſtake, the ſubſequent life of Sir Hans Sloane will furniſh an occaſion, which may be taken, to make this account leſs imperfect: for almoſt every thing relative to the perſon ſpoken of here, may be introduced there, with equal pertinence and propriety.

WILLIAM COURTEN, the fourth and laſt of his family who had both theſe names, was born in the pariſh of Fan-Church, in London, March 28, 1642, and baptized on the 31ſt of the ſame month, as appears by an extract from the regiſter of chriſtenings in that pariſh given below [P].

He had probably no knowledge, or remembrance of his father, who, as has been ſaid, the next year after his ſon was born, in 1643, became inſolvent, and quitted this kingdom, to which, it does not appear that he ever returned. When he died at Florence, in 1655, the ſubject of this article was about thirteen years of age, and it is moſt likely, that his mother did not ſurvive her huſband above four or five years; for as no mention is made of Lady Katharine in 1660, when Mr. Carew obtained Letters of Adminiſtration to the eſtates of the Courten family, it is probable ſhe was then dead. In a petition to Parliament, a rough draught of which is in the Britiſh Muſeum, undated indeed, but certainly preſented by William Courten very ſoon after he came of age, there is a like ground for the ſame ſuppoſition, no mention being made of his mother; for it is only ſaid there, that he

in this curious and commodious explication of the article, and boldly avowed an evil principle, in juſtification of an immoral practice. Charles II. unqueſtionably acquieſced in this Dutch interpretation of the Treaty, and with memorable forgetfulneſs of the ſuperabundant obligations of his family to Sir William Courten and Sir Paul Pyndar, urged his Lawyers, &c. to counter-act and diſannul the Letters of Repriſals, which ſhame and juſtice had wreſted from him, in behalf of the heirs of two ſignal LOYALISTS, whoſe ſubſequent fate and family-hiſtory deſerve to be thus minutely recorded, for the inſtruction of their rich ſucceſſors in future times.

[P] An extract from the regiſter of chriſtenings in that pariſh given below.] What follows, is a faithful tranſcript of a paper in the hand-writing of William Courten, Eſq; junior, the ſubject of this article, excepting only the certificate ſigned, THO. WEBSTER.

Memorandum concerning my age, and when Carew took Letters of Adminiſtration to Sir William Courten.

The 28th of March was my birth-day, and I was baptized March 31, 1642.

1642	1694	1642	1668	31 March.
1694	1642	20	1642	31 March.
8	52		26

" I read, on the 17th of Jan. 1662, in the Regiſter-
" book of chriſtenings and burials of the pariſh of " Fan-church, London, now in the cuſtody of
" Richard Powell, Clerk of the ſaid pariſh, among " others William Courteen, the ſon of Mr. William
" Courteen, was baptized March 31, 1642.

" [Signed] THO. WEBSTER."

he the petitioner, and his only ſiſter, had been left for many years, deſtitute of a livelihood. If Lady Katharine had been then living, as ſhe had moſt probably a jointure competent to her birth and rank, which her huſband's creditors could not affect, her children could hardly have been "deſtitute of a livelihood for many years." The paper mentioned below [Q], though not a proof, favours the preſumption, that Lady Katharine was dead at the time of its date.

Attempts have been made in vain, to inveſtigate his education, and diſcover the inſtructors of his early age in literature, and morals. No name of any of them has been found; but the after-character of their pupil, both as a ſcholar, and as a gentleman, which prompted the curioſity about them, is a creditable teſtimony to their abilities and integrity. We are told in a paper, written by Sir Hans Sloane, that William Courten, junior, from his earlieſt years, "did not regard the pomp or vanities of the world, but gave him-"ſelf up to the contemplation of the works of GOD, whoſe infinite power, wiſdom, and "providence, he ſaw and admired, in the creation and preſervation of all things." Revolted it ſeems, from his childhood, at the complicated misfortunes of his immediate anceſtors, this laſt male of the family, contracted probably an irreconcileable diſlike to mercantile buſineſs, in which they had embarked ſo extenſively, and by which his grandfather certainly had, at one time in his life, amaſſed and realized an immenſe fortune, as evidently appears from what has been related in the foregoing article.

It is ſaid on the ſame reſpectable teſtimony, and in the ſame paper above-mentioned, that "William Courten was well-educated in this kingdom, before he travelled." The word in Italics uſed by Sir H. Sloane, juſtifies the ſuppoſition, that William Courten had little knowledge or remembrance of his father, who ſold outright before he left this kingdom, "the great bulk of Sir William Courten's lands, thoſe in Worceſter and Glouceſter-"ſhires excepted [R], to William Purpoint, Eſq; Daniel Harvey, the Earl of Kent, and "others (m)."

(m) Vox Veritatis, &c. ut ſupra, P. 39.

It is not ſaid at what time this Gentleman's father ſold the great bulk of Sir William Courten's lands. If he ſold them before his retirement from England, he doubtleſs, made ſome proviſion, for the ſupport of his wife, Lady Katharine, and their children, whom he left behind him. G. Carew, though "one of the aſſignees of Mr. Courten's lordſhips, &c." could not have ſold outright the eſtates of the Courten family in Worceſter and Glouceſterſhires, till after he became adminiſtrator in 1660, when this laſt male-heir was about eighteen years of age. It is therefore credible, that till that age at leaſt, there were abundant means for his moſt liberal education, in the jointure of his mother, in what was entailed on himſelf, and the ſtill unſequeſtered eſtates of the family.

Even the wrecks of a fortune once ſo ample, muſt have been very conſiderable, and more than ſufficient for the propereſt education, and decent maintenance of William Courten and his ſiſter. She it ſeems could very well live in thoſe days, on no more income as appears, than 30*l. per annum*. That this moderate annual ſum was her principal ſupport, we are led to believe from a ſlight attention to two papers which we have ſeen. If he and his ſiſter had even been more reduced in point of income, than we can well ſuppoſe, they ſtill had infallible reſources in the number, rank, and riches of their relations. Their grandfather, the Earl of Bridgewater, two uncles, with eleven aunts on the ſide of their mother, and three aunts on their father's ſide, were people of fortune and diſtinction; many of them married into honourable and wealthy families, and all of them apparently in affluent or

[Q] The paper mentioned below.] A formal agreement of Lady Dame Knightly, daughter of Sir W. Courten, ſo far as it concerns her, to the ſuit of William Courten her nephew, to get Carew's Letters of Adminiſtration cancelled, conſenting that her nephew proſecute the ſuit to get the ſaid Letters repealed. Dated June 25, 1663, and ſigned,

ANN KNIGHTLY (19).

(19) MSS. Sloane. 3515.

[R] Thoſe in Worceſter and Glouceſterſhires excepted.] It ſeems that the Courten-eſtates in theſe two counties, came into the hands of "Aſſignees of Mr. Courten's lordſhips and lands," but when, or by whom theſe aſſignees were appointed does not appear. T. Browne ſays, that G. Carew was one of the aſſignees of Mr. Courten's lordſhips, &c. in Worceſter and Glouceſterſhires, and he gives the following, it may be imperfect, account of them. "Pyrton, Aun-"ton, Eveſham, Severnſtoak, Upperſwell and Low-"erſwell, formerly granted for counter-ſecurity to "Sir Edward Littleton, againſt debts for which that "Knight ſtood obliged; but pre-engaged for great "ſums of money to Gyles Carter, Eſq; Mr. Daniel "Harvey, Mr. John Ruſhout, Merchants, and "others." G. Carew ſold the reverſions and equities of redemption of Pyrton and Severnſtoak, to Thomas, Lord Coventry, for 8700*l.* of Eveſham, to Mr. William Rudge, Merchant, for 7500*l.* of Aunton, to Thomas Foley, Eſq; for 3800*l.* He ſold Upperſwell and other lands in the mortgage, to Sir James Ruſhout for 300*l.* He ſold Lowerſwell to Sir Robert Atkinſon, for 1600*l.* "The monies "were diſpoſed of according to ſeveral Deeds of "Truſt. William Courten, the grand-child and "heir, joined in the fines and conveyances to Lord "Coventry, Mr. Rudge, and Mr. Foley; but Sir "Robert Atkyns, and Sir James Ruſhout, refuſing "to comply with the ſaid heir, hold their eſtates "under the firſt aſſignees (20)."

(20) Vox Veritatis, &c. Ibid.

The various purchaſes made by Sir William Courten in Worceſterſhire, may be ſeen in Dr. Naſh's Hiſtory of that county (21); who miſtakes in ſuppoſing the Courtens to be ſtrangers to this kingdom, though they were ſo in that county. Of Sir William in particular, Dr. Naſh obſerves, from Habingdon's MSS. "Our Knight was ſo famed for his modeſty, bounty, "and charity, to his tenants and neighbours, as is ſcarce "to be met with in thoſe new men who purchaſe Gen-"tlemen out of their ancient habitations and manors."

(21) Vol. i. p. 411, 452. vol. ii. p. 76, 257, 386.

eaſy

eaſy circumſtances. It might therefore have been reaſonably concluded, that William Courten was well educated, even if it had not been aſcertained on the foregoing teſtimony.

After a previous good education in this country, forwarded probably with peculiar care, and earlier certainly than is now uſual, William Courten began his travels, or was ſent, whilſt yet a minor, to proſeeute his ſtudies abroad. The genius of a naturaliſt, which he diſcovered, it ſeems, from his infancy, led him to cultivate it at Montpellier, diſtinguiſhed then, as Upſal ſince, for its Botanical Garden, its peculiar attention to Natural Hiſtory, and the abilities and celebrity of maſters in various branches of this ſcience.

Here he met, as might probably be expected, with ſtudents of a congenial taſte, and perſons then and afterwards eminent in various walks of literature, with ſeveral of whom he appears to have lived in great familiarity, and to have cultivated long correſpondence. Joſeph Pitton de TOURNEFORT, the celebrated French Botaniſt, was of this number. William Courten, who was the ſenior by ſeveral years, had, no doubt, made a very conſiderable proficiency in Botany, before his acquaintance with this illuſtrious foreigner commenced; but it muſt have been much improved by the intimacy that appears to have ſubſiſted between them.

It was at Montpellier probably, but many years after his primary ſettlement there, that William Courten contracted his firſt acquaintance with Sir Hans Sloane, a zealous naturaliſt, who ſpared no pains or expence in the acquiſition and promotion of knowledge in Natural Hiſtory, and who was yet more honourably diſtinguiſhed, by his ſkill in his own profeſſion, his general patronage of ſcholars, his public ſpirit, and extenſive philanthropy. Sir Hans Sloane unqueſtionably ſpent a conſiderable time at Montpellier, it may be, both to improve his knowledge, and to eſtabliſh his health; and here too it is ſaid, he got his degree of M.D. But at what place, or at what time ſoever their acquaintance began, being forwarded by a ſimilarity of ſtudies, in which William Courten had unqueſtionably the preheminence, it ripened into a friendſhip, that, as will appear in the ſequel, continued, without interruption, to the end of his life. He was at Montpellier, and ſtill a minor, when the adminiſtration of the eſtates of his father and grandfather was legally veſted in G. Carew, Eſq; of whom ſo much has been ſaid in the preceding article. Even at this period, in 1660, when the remaining mortgages and lands of the Courten-family were fore-cloſed, or ſold outright, certainly William Courten and his ſiſter were not ſtript of every thing, ſo as to be left entirely dependent on the generoſity of their many honourable and opulent relations, for the mere neceſſaries, or even the common comforts of life.

William Courten had a manor or manors entailed upon him, which it was thought moſt prudent to ſell and convert into perſonal eſtate. His ſiſter Katharine had, no doubt, ſome patrimony, of which the creditors, or their officious adminiſtrator, could not deprive her. The deeds of truſt before mentioned, intimate ſome ſettlements on the heirs of the family; and, moreover, it is not very likely, that William Courten would have joined, as has been ſaid, in the fines and conveyances to Lord Coventry, Mr. Rudge and Mr. Foley, idly, and for nothing.

Whatever, therefore, the forms of law, and the common phraſeology in an application to the Throne might require to be ſaid, yet what we read in a petition preſented to the King, by William Courten in 1663, probably was not true, and certainly is not credible, viz. that he, the petitioner, and his ſiſter, had actually been for many years deſtitute of a livelihood.

Immediately on the expiration of his minority, William Courten, it ſeems, left Montpellier for ſome time, being obliged to repair to London, by the exigency of his own and his ſiſter's affairs, in order to puſh their final ſettlement, and to ſecure to himſelf and her, the beſt proviſions for the future, that could be collected from the wide-ſpread ruins of their family.

With a turn of mind that biaſſed him ſtrongly to a contemplative life, unexperienced in the ways of the world, torn from darling ſtudies, and under the influence of the indolent habits of a mere ſcholar, this youth was ill-qualified to be a principal agent for himſelf and his ſiſter in a buſineſs ſo perplexed, ſo laborious and ſo unpromiſing. There is little room for wonder, or for cenſure, if in ſuch a labyrinth William Courten did not always ſee clearly, or keep conſtantly the right way.

We have, however, an honourable teſtimony for his integrity and Chriſtian character, in the hand-writing of Sir Hans Sloane, unqueſtionably a competent and a creditable witneſs. But, poſſibly, with the beſt diſpoſitions and principles imaginable, circumſtanced as he was, this young Gentleman might be led to concur in meaſures, of which, from our ignorance of particulars, or an inattention to them, we may now doubt about the rectitude, or the propriety.

It is indeed evident, that he acted but a ſubordinate part, for which only he was qualified, and that he relied entirely on the guidance of his counſellors and relations, who ſeem to have exerted themſelves in his ſervice throughout, with zeal, friendſhip, and ability; and to have effectually protected him and his ſiſter, from being eſſentially injured by G. Carew, Eſq.

Soon after his arrival in England, in concert with his friends, William Courten, Eſq; began his litigations in behalf of himſelf and his ſiſter. The firſt object he aimed at, was to to ſet aſide the letters that, in his abſence and minority, Carew had ſurreptitiouſly obtained, and to get himſelf legally inveſted with the adminiſtration of the eſtates and effects of his anceſtors. He contended that G. Carew was an officious intruder, under falſe pretexts of being a ſufferer, and an agent for other ſufferers by the loſſes of his father and grandfather; and urged that this man's intermeddling with the wrecks of their fortunes had been equally to the prejudice of the rightful heirs, and to the detriment of the legal creditors of the family. He claimed therefore for himſelf, as his natural right, the adminiſtration of the Courten-eſtates; and his aunt Lady Knightly, who ſeems to have been then the only ſurviving child of Sir William, from whom the eſtates deſcended, concurred with her nephew, as has been ſaid, in this claim.

G. Carew, who was both a courtier and a lawyer, ſeems to have exerted his utmoſt addreſs and profeſſional ſkill to ſtop, or fruſtrate theſe proceedings. He expreſsly owns, in one of his papers, that he had indeed paid indefinite ſums of money to William Courten Eſq; after he came of age, though he ſays, at the ſame time, that he did not pay the monies becauſe William Courten had a right to them, but ſolely to prevent and terminate debates. The cauſes here aſſigned for the payments to William Courten, Eſq; after he came of age, are very queſtionable; for Carew does not appear a man likely to have parted with money on ſuch principles, merely to prevent or terminate debates. Whatever ſums he paid with the views he pretends, were all totally loſt to him; for they did not then anſwer the purpoſes which they were the moſt promiſing means to have accompliſhed.

Mr. Courten ſtill perſiſted in his favourite ſtudy of Natural Hiſtory [S]; but he perſevered notwithſtanding, in the various proceſſes inſtituted in behalf of himſelf and his ſiſter. He preferred and proſecuted his application and petitions for redreſs of their grievances, probably to the Court of Chancery, certainly to the Prerogative Court, to the Committee of Parliament, and to the Throne itſelf.

In the Britiſh Muſeum, there is the rough draught of an undated petition of William Courten to the honourable Committee of Parliament, for redreſs of grievances in foreign trade. In this unfiniſhed inſtrument, the injuries done to his anceſtors are ſtated in ſtrong terms, at 200,000*l.* with an account of particulars proved, it is ſaid, upon oath, in the Court of Admiralty. Theſe injuries, and the conſequential claims they gave riſe to, have been treated of ſatis ſuperque, in the preceding article. It is therefore ſufficient here, to mention only one circumſtance relative to the affair of Barbadoes, omitted in the foregoing account. It is this, that from the time this violent injury was done to Sir W. Courten by the Earl of Carliſle, for thirteen ſucceſſive years, there was no Parliament to apply to for redreſs: during the Protectorate, the feeble remonſtrances of the Courten-family, ſo obnoxious to the powers then in being, were diſregarded; and when its ſolicitors had good ground for better hopes, their ſolicitations were ſtill rejected by the ſuperior influence of thoſe who were in poſſeſſion of the lawleſs plunder they reclaimed.

Along with the inſtrument above-mentioned, there is in the ſame place, the petition of W. Courten, Eſq; to the King, dated in 1663; in which the petitioner complains, as has been ſaid, of G. Carew; claims the adminiſtration of the Courten-eſtates for himſelf; ſtates the debts due to him for money lent to his Majeſty's father, and the reparations and claims due to his family in every way, ut ſupra. W. Courten concludes with an earneſt requeſt, that the conſideration of his petition, in toto, might be referred to his Majeſty's Attorney-General.

It appears from other papers in the ſame repoſitory, that his Majeſty did actually deign to refer this petition to his Attorney-General, then Sir Jeffery Palmer, who, after conſulting with Sir William Mericke, at that time Judge of the Prerogative-Court, and anſwering two queſtions ſtated by Sir William Mericke in writing, gave in his report, warranting the revocation of the Letters granted to G. Carew, and the grant of the adminiſtration to W. Courten, Eſq. The curious may ſee the queſtions and anſwers alluded to in the Britiſh Muſeum, and the report itſelf, which is an original paper, and has the autograph ſignature of J. PALMER.

There is, ibidem, a letter ſigned Richard Dowdewell, dated Sept. 11, 1663, and directed "To his honourable friend William Courten, Eſq; at Fawſley-Lodge, "to be left at the Poſt-Houſe in Daintrye, to be conveyed." This letter mentions ſome propoſals of Mr. Carew, from the conſideration of which, [ſays the letter-writer, R. D.] "I infer that the Squire has loſt his wits, and as for his honeſty, if ever he had any, it has "quitted him long ago."

Sir Jeffery Palmer's Reports ſeems to have reſtored the Squire to his wits, and to have produced more reaſonable propoſals, which, for want of better, were probably accepted; for it does not appear, either that W. Courten, Eſq; took out Letters of Adminiſtration, as he now might have done; or that the Letters of Adminiſtration, which had been granted to Mr. Carew, were ever actually revoked.

[S] Study of Natural Hiſtory.] There are many MSS. of William Courten, Eſq; preſerved in the Britiſh Muſeum, apparently written about this time. One or two of his common place-books have the name of William Courten upon them, written by himſelf, and with the date 1663: they contain, as moſt of his papers do, evidences of his having been an inquiſitive, able Naturaliſt, and well-ſkilled in coins and antiquities. They abound with obſervations on animals, vegetables and minerals, and with hints and directions for the preſervation of natural productions, generally very curious, frequently, as this writer believes, original, but ſometimes, and not ſeldom noted from his reading, and it may be from oral information, for his own particular uſe.

It ſeems, indeed, that about this time, or not very long after, ſome compromiſe took place between William Courten, Eſq; and G. Carew; but it is evident from a letter in the Britiſh Muſeum, that all matters were not entirely adjuſted between them, or even likely to be finally ſettled in Auguſt 1684. The terms and ſtipulations of their partial and temporary agreement, this writer has not been able to collect with circumſtantial certainty, from any thing he has yet ſeen; he ſuſpects the conditions were induſtriouſly kept as private as poſſible, and ſuppoſes there were prudential and valid reaſons for this concealment. The circumſtances that incline him to think ſo, will preſently diſcloſe themſelves; nor is there any thing in them, or indeed in any thing clearly viſible, in the conduct or concluſion of his negotiations with Carew, ſo far as we know of them at preſent, to warrant our thinking unfavourably of Mr. Courten's character.

A rough draught of an undated bond is preſerved in the Britiſh Muſeum, from which it appears, that Mr. Courten gave up all claim to the adminiſtration of the eſtates of his father and grandfather, in favour of G. Carew of Gray's-Inn, for valuable conſiderations not ſpecified. If Carew moreover indemnified Mr. Courten againſt all moleſtation and lawſuits from the creditors of his anceſtors, on the ſcore of his deſcent, it was manifeſtly prudent in both parties to conceal as much as they could, their agreement, and all its conditions. Nevertheleſs it is ſaid expreſsly, that Mr. Courten was ſued, ſummoned into Chancery, and even arreſted, by ſome or other of the creditors of his father and grandfather. We are likewiſe told that in all theſe caſes, he pleaded that he was not the executor of his father or grandfather, nor the adminiſtrator of their eſtates and effects, from which he ſaid he now claimed nothing. He added, moreover, that whatever he had received from the wrecks of their fortunes, was ex dono et gratia, and not ex jure; and declared openly, that he did not demand any thing ex additione hæreditatis, as heir to his father or grandfather. He even relinquiſhed his family name of COURTEN, aſſumed that of WILLIAM CHARLETON [T], and publicly announced his intention of quitting England, and living in a ſtrange land.

There being no dates to direct the regular entry of the laſt-mentioned circumſtances, it may be, they are not introduced here in the order they happened. It is a matter of little conſequence, as the irregularity, if there be any, can only relate to the later part of a period of about ſeven years, from 1663 to 1670, which ſeems to include the whole duration of William Courten's reſidence in England, after his firſt return from Montpellier. It appears, from a preceding note, that he lived with his aunt, Lady Knightly, at Fawſley-Lodge, in Northamptonſhire, for the moſt part of the time (p), and that he was beyond ſea about Jan. 1670 (q).

(p) MSS. Sloan. 3988. Plut. xii. c.

(q) Letter ſigned P. S. dated 1684. Note [D].

Some time or other, more or leſs advanced in the courſe of the ſeven years ſpecified, certainly William Courten, Eſq; formed his plan of life, dropt his litigation with Carew, got things in a train for final ſettlement, and ſecured the beſt means he could ſtipulate for his own and his ſiſter's future livelihood.

Now with whatever prudence or privacy the arrangement was ſettled, out-ſtanding creditors muſt know, that the grandſon of the family could legally enter on the adminiſtration of the eſtates of his anceſtors, and conclude, from his deferring to adminiſter; that he had compounded with Carew, the former adminiſtrator, and received ſomething very conſiderable to induce him to relinquiſh his rightful claims, and all his own, and his ſiſter's inheritance. Any knowledge, or even ſuſpicion of this kind, was ſufficient to bring on, towards the cloſe of the ſeptennial period above-mentioned, the law-ſuits and vexations that obliged Mr. Courten to make the preceding declarations, and compelled him finally, for peace-ſake, to quit the kingdom, to change his name to CHARLETON, and to live abroad as he did for many years (*).

(*) About 14, or 16.

Floyd's proſecution grounded ultimately, as it ſeems, on a family debt to a Dutchman, of the name of Vanlore, or Vanlere, purſued Mr. Courten, it is ſaid, to the Land's-End, about Jan. 1670, continued to go on againſt him after he was beyond ſea, and was ſtill likely to put him to more trouble and expence fourteen years after, i. e. in the year 1684, as appears from the letter of his couſin P. S. of that date (r).

(r) Note [D], ut ſupra.

[T] WILLIAM CHARLETON.] "M. Guillame "Courten, fut plus connu poſterieurment, ſous le nom de "Charlton, qu' il prit apres avoir perdu un tres beau "domaine appertenant à ſa famille (22)." His will is made in his family name of William Courten, but his death is announced in the Poſt Angel for March 1702, 4*to*. p. 137, in the following words. "March "27, 1702, William Charleton, Eſq; of the Middle "Temple, eminently known for his fine collection "of curioſities, viz. medals, ſhells, &c. died at the "Gravel Pits at Kenſington, and has left the fore-"ſaid curioſities to Dr. Sloan." There is likewiſe an entry of his death, under the name of William Charleton, on March 17, 1702, in Le Neve's MS. obituary (23). This information was given as a probable conjecture, in a late edition of the TATLER with notes, Vol. VI. p. 477. It is now beyond a doubt, and to the proofs of it, already given, unqueſtionable evidences of his having long borne the name of William Charleton, will occur in the ſequel of this article. It is ſufficient to know, with certainty, that William Courten actually took this other name, of Charleton; but it is unneceſſary here to aſcertain, with nicer preciſion, the occaſion, or the time of his taking it.

(22) MSS. Birch. 4241, 4*to*.

(23) Harl. MSS. 3625.

The moſt dry and unpleaſant part of this article the writer would willingly cloſe here, but that it ſeems neceſſary to ſay ſomething farther on this head, to obviate a very ſerious objection to Mr. Courten's moral character, for which, it does not clearly appear, that there is any real foundation. It is ſtated by B. S. a writer in the Gentleman's Magazine, who maintains in brief, that every farthing that William Courten, Eſq; recovered from Carew, or from the wrecks of the Courten-eſtates, ought to have been diſtributed among the creditors of the family;—that Mr. Courten had no right to whatever monies he derived from his inheritance; and that his application of it to his own, or his ſiſter's ſupport, was ipſo facto an impeachment of his integrity.

The objection deſerves conſideration the rather, as it is not grounded on a point of law, but on a principle of rectitude, which, like Bayes's ſimile in the Rehearſal, might do very well, if it were but well applied. It ſeems neceſſary, therefore, to ſtate the following circumſtances, with a view to vindicate Mr. Courten's character from this odious aſperſion, and to guard it from injurious miſconceptions in future.

In the courſe of this narrative, it has been ſaid, in the words wherein the relater found his information, that Sir William Courten died involved in great debt,—and that his ſon, overpowered with his father's debts and his own, and with large ſums at intereſt, &c. withdrew from the Adminiſtration, and left this kingdom inſolvent. Merchants, properly ſo called, and many others of reſpectable profeſſions, when very extenſively concerned in trade, may, however, be involved in great debt, inſolvent, even bankrupts [U], and yet be in a condition to pay twenty ſhillings in the pound, and to make, after all, decent and ample proviſion for their families.

There was no bankruptcy in the Courten-family; yet from a peculiarity of circumſtances, which it is not requiſite to mention, this appears to have been eminently the caſe of Sir William Courten's affairs, when he died very deeply in debt; and of his ſon's too, at the very time of his inſolvency, but much more at the period we are now come to, twenty, or it may be more years after his death.

The accounts of the family, both on the debtor and creditor ſide, are unqueſtionably incomplete, and by no means before us in ſuch an accurate ſtate, as that we can ſpeak or reaſon upon them with arithmetical exactneſs; but ſtill we know enough of them otherwiſe to ſupport the following apparently concluſive arguments.

G. Carew had certainly all the knowledge that we want of the affairs of the Courten-family; he had been long employed in them both at home and abroad; he had balanced, no doubt, the debtor and creditor ſides of their accounts; and as he was a man of equal perſpicacity and induſtry, certainly in a buſineſs wherein he embarked ſo deeply, it may well be ſuppoſed that he knew perfectly what he was doing. Surely he was no fool, and would not have taken the trouble, or paid the price he did for the adminiſtration of the Courten-eſtates, but with, I ſay not a probable, but a certain proſpect of very ample recompenſation. Now if this adminiſtration was an object well worthy of all the trouble and coſt that G. Carew expended upon it, there can be no doubt but that it would have been equally advantageous, and more beneficial to Mr. Courten. It ſeems therefore highly reaſonable to conclude, not only on the face of the general accounts, but more eſpecially from the drift of Carew's conduct, and his unremitted perſeverance in the purſuit, that the debts due to the Courten-family greatly exceeded the debts payable by it, and to a very large amount.

To the partial ſtatement of 498,828 l. on the creditor-ſide, well aſcertained, and in very many particulars upon oath, which by no means included the whole of what was due to the family, it ſeems difficult, indeed impoſſible, to find debts equally well authenticated, of half the ſum, to oppoſe upon the debtor-ſide. If juſtice then had been done, [and we go on principles of rectitude] if the debts on both ſides had been liquidated, in toto, or by compoſition, the vaſt overplus muſt aſſuredly have been the whole and ſole property of William Courten Eſq; and his ſiſter. He and ſhe, therefore, were creditors, in appearance the principal creditors on the eſtates of the Courten-family.

Beſides, the debts of the many creditors of this family in Holland and Zealand were ſettled, it ſeems, and paid by the Treaty of Breda; for if by this treaty, no debts antecedent to it were afterwards to be paid to Britiſh ſubjects over all the dominions of the States, certainly no antecedent debts need be paid to Dutchmen in any of all the territories of Britain.

It is, indeed, obvious to remark, that on this principle, the Courten-family cleared with Vanlore, and their relatives of the Cromling-family, and thereby gained ſomething conſiderable, though they ſtill loſt vaſtly more. But this loſs, Mr. Courten and his ſiſter were well entitled to have made up to them, by the community which enjoyed the bleſſings of this treaty, and which, doubtleſs, owed full reparation to the individual ſufferers, at whoſe great [U] Even bankrupts.] This has not uncommonly happened even in more recent times; and may be exemplified in the caſe of Mr. Knapton, the famous bookſeller, who, with the utmoſt integrity, and with a ſurplus of many thouſand pounds, ſubmitted to become a bankrupt, as the readieſt mode of collecting his out-ſtanding debts, in order to pay the demands of all his creditors, and to retire on an affluent independence.

expence

expence the beneficial treaty had been obtained. And if the King and his Council on this occaſion had driven a hard bargain for the public, ſtill the public muſt abide by the loſs, and no reaſon could be aſſigned why two innocent orphans, againſt whom nothing was alledged, or pretended, ſhould be plundered of their property, and left to ſtarve, by the act of the Sovereign, or of his negociators, who, by aſſuming a power of giving what was not theirs to give, recognized the right of the proprietors to come upon them for damages and reparation.

William Courten, Eſq; claimed, moreover, as his right, the adminiſtration of his father's and grandfather's eſtates; and a great Crown-lawyer honeſtly admitted the right, and vouched for the legality of his claim, in direct contravention to a prior royal grant.

Sir Jeffery Palmer's determination put the adminiſtration in Mr. Courten's power, but left it at his option; nor was he by any means obliged to adminiſter, contrary to the dictates of prudence, the advice of his friends, or his own inclination. Had Mr. Courten actually engaged in the adminiſtration, there is no ground to doubt, but that, if juſtice had been done to him, he would have done ample juſtice to the creditors, and would have had in the end, an abundant proviſion for himſelf and his ſiſter.

Circumſtanced as Mr. Courten was, he probably acted in the beſt, as well as in the moſt cautious manner poſſible. The eſtates on which he was to enter, might have been injured irreparably, by the preceding adminiſtrator he was about to ſuperſede. He might have been over-awed by the apprehended embarraſſments, and threatened oppoſition of this artful man. He might have thought it more difficult and more expenſive, than it was in reality, to get equal juſtice done to himſelf, and to do equal juſtice to the creditors; and have been more apprehenſive of the final iſſue than he had good cauſe to be. He might commiſerate the condition of the creditors, and deſpiſe and deteſt the character of the man whom the king had appointed adminiſtrator, and agent for them.

Nevertheleſs, if terrified at the proſpect of an office ſo troubleſome and ſo perilous, or ſmitten with the love of a ſtudious and quiet life, he choſe rather to give up greater but more precarious advantages, for a leſſer but more certain proviſion; and if his ſiſter likewiſe conſented to the compoſition, what indeed was to hinder him from compounding with Carew, for all his own and her claims. Whatever right he, or his ſiſter had, or might be ſuppoſed to have in reverſion, with her previous conſent, he was certainly free to transfer. He might do, as ſome creditors had done before him, as others probably did after him. In treating with Carew, who was the legal adminiſtrator, if he himſelf declined to become ſo, he had to deal with a man, who parted, it ſeems, with a decent livelihood, to make himſelf rich in this diſreputable way, and who was likelier to give him leſs than an equivalent, than more than enough.

If, becauſe "he was faint," or conſtrained by dire neceſſity, he ſold his own and her birth-right for a meſs of pottage, Was he not to eat it? Was the poor pittance he got, after all, not his own? Might he not honeſtly retire with it wherever he pleaſed? Sharing it, as they could agree, with his ſiſter, which he appears to have done to the end of her life. Surely, all things conſidered, there is more call here for ſympathy, than for cenſure; for commiſeration, than for reproach.

In a word, the preſent writer, after a reviſal, cannot ſee that there is any thing in the long account that B. S. refers to, in the longer account given here, or in any account he has ever ſeen, that really militates againſt Mr. Courten's integrity in the way ſurmiſed, or that invalidates the ample and repeated teſtimony under the hand of Sir Hans Sloane, corroborated beyond all ſuſpicion, and much to Mr. Courten's honour, as will appear in the ſequel, by the cordial friendſhip of John Locke, one of the greateſt and beſt of men, eminent alike as a philoſopher, and as a chriſtian.

Indeed, to this writer, the compoſition with Carew, for what he could get, and his eaſy relinquiſhment of the adminiſtration to a man of the world, whoſe keenneſs and conduct argue its value, appear to be ſtrong and unſuſpicious evidences of Mr. Courten's integrity.

Having thus, with difficulty, in the courſe of ſeveral of the beſt years of his life, collected, from the remains of his fore fathers opulence, ſome future proviſion for himſelf and his ſiſter, and it may be, an ample ſufficiency for all the wants of a ſcholar, whoſe humble walk he choſe, Mr. Courten entirely withdrew from active life, in which he apparently engaged with reluctance, and indeed, from neceſſity. Contented with the little he got, he retired to indulge his contemplative diſpoſition, and declined the very probable proſpects of bettering his circumſtances, which his extenſive and honourable connections held forth, if he would have taken to any learned profeſſion or lucrative employment.

In the Britiſh Muſeum, over a door in the ſecond ſhell-room, there is a fine portrait of William Courten Eſq; drawn, ſeemingly, before his leaving England for the ſecond time, about the cloſe of 1663, and certainly by ſome eminent painter. It was probably at this period of his life, that "he travelled [as Sir Hans Sloane informs us] over moſt parts of "Europe, ſtudying the languages, obſerving the cuſtoms and manners of its inhabitants, "and purchaſing every where, whatever he could get curious in nature or art."

Of

Of the courſe, or duration of his travels, the preſent writer can give no particular information. It may be reaſonably judged, that after a peregrination of three or four years, at moſt, he ſettled in his former place of abode, at Montpellier, where he certainly reſided for the greateſt part of the time that he lived abroad. Sir Hans Sloane ſays, expreſsly, that he was abſent from England, at different times no doubt, twenty-five years in all; and though the particular years are not ſtated, it would not be very difficult, if it was of any importance, to aſcertain them.

Mr. Courten ſeems all along to have paid great and general attention to polite literature. His papers and place-books, many of which are preſerved in the Britiſh Muſeum, diſcover various, judicious, and extenſive reading; and his own frequent remarks ſhew, that he thought as well as read.

About this time he ſeems to have been much engaged in the ſtudy of coins, both ancient and modern. In this entertaining and uſeful, but expenſive branch of knowledge, he certainly made great proficiency, and attained at laſt extraordinary ſkill.

It appears from one of his pocket-books, referred to in the margin (s), that in 1669, he began to collect coins, in both kinds, and in all metals, at conſiderable expence. There is no doubt but that his collection in this way became ultimately ample, well-ſelected, and very valuable; but there is now no poſſibility of aſcertaining its extent, its merit, or its value; for it certainly appears, that he not only exchanged his duplicates, as all collectors do, but that he very frequently ſold, as well as bought, and bought for others, as well as for himſelf. From ſeveral of his priced catalogues in the Britiſh Muſeum, latterly very accurate, and entirely in the manner of a maſter in the ſcience, the preſent writer is inclined to think, that very many, perhaps moſt of the coins in that repoſitory, might be traced to their original purchaſer and prices. The whole catalogue of coins gathered in Spain, and purchaſed by Sir Hans Sloane (t), thoſe preſented by John Lee Eſq; and all donations of this kind poſterior to the death of Mr. Courten, are obviouſly out of the queſtion. It ought likewiſe to be mentioned here, as it is upon good authority, that the original coins purchaſed by the public, told ſeveral hundreds above a thouſand, ſhort of Sir Hans Sloane's inventory delivered to Parliament.

(s) MSS. Sloan. 3988. Plut. xxxi. c.

(t) MSS. Sloan. 2824.

Certainly Mr. Courten, on his return to England, about fourteen years after the time we are now ſpeaking of, was looked up to here, and apparently with juſtice, as a perſon of ſuperior ſkill in medallic ſcience, wherein no man, who is not a good ſcholar, can ever arrive at any great degree of eminence. This very deſirable literary accompliſhment, at times perhaps, may have been over-rated by ſome of the few who have been too laviſh of their time, ingenuity, and expence, in the acquiſition. It has oftner been undervalued, like the grapes in the fable, and treated by the illiterate, with a Gothic ridicule, manifeſting a kindred diſpoſition and an abſurd vanity, ſimilar to that which Diogenes manifeſted, in trampling with inſolence, on the cloak of Plato.

It is now well known, that the beſt and moſt elegant writers of antiquity, cannot be read with juſt underſtanding and true taſte, without good maps. Genuine coins are ſerviceable in the ſame, and in very many other reſpects. As they might be ſo very advantageouſly employed in the courſe of our early inſtruction in claſſical literature, the means of that part of our education are manifeſtly defective, where a good cabinet of coins, or the beſt books that repreſent and explain them are wanting, or not brought into common uſe. Unqueſtionably, after all that can be ſaid to depreciate this kind of knowledge, it muſt ſtill be held in conſiderable eſtimation, and very deſervedly, by all who are deſirous to know with certainty, the hiſtory, chronology, geography, arts, manners, cuſtoms, and notions, both civil and religious, of ancient times, which theſe compendious and indubitable monuments do, in ſo many pleaſing and uſeful ways, contribute to illuſtrate, to rectify, and to eſtabliſh in truth, or veriſimilitude.

Mr. Courten's ſuperior ſkill in this ſcience, a hand-maid to ſo many other arts and ſciences, is well aſcertained, by his catalogues of his own coins, by his many papers, and his epiſtolary correſpondence on ſubjects of this nature, with Sir John Evelyn, the honourable Heneage Finch, and others, but eſpecially with Lord Colrane, his own elevée in this ſcience, and a pupil that evidently appears by his proficiency to have done great honour to his maſter.

The preſent writer having derived, from a little cabinet of his own, purchaſed at more expence perhaps than was ſuitable to his circumſtances, a great alleviation of uneaſineſs, and much elegant enjoyment, diſtruſts his own judgment in this caſe, and forbears rather reluctantly, giving any of all the many curious extracts that might have been given from theſe letters, for fear of being carried farther on a favourite ſubject, than might be acceptable to the generality of readers. The peruſal of the originals in the Britiſh Muſeum, is eaſily acceſſible to the curious in this way, who may there freely gratify their curioſity. In the notes taken for this writer's private uſe, the references have been too often omitted, and he has neglected to mark, particularly, every thing of this kind that has been examined; but ſome, and perhaps the principal references, are given in the margin (u) to direct the ſearch, and facilitate the enquiries of ſuch as think juſtly, and as they ought to think, of this kind of knowledge.

(u) MSS. Sloan. 3961. f. 3962. f. Plut. 3988, 1828, &c.

It was moſt probably abroad, and about the year 1675, that Mr. Courten's acquaintance and friendſhip with the celebrated Mr. John Locke began; for in the ſummer of that year the bad ſtate of Locke's health, and an apprehended conſumption, induced him to repair to Montpellier, then as famous for the cure of diſeaſes of the lungs, as Antycira was of old for thoſe of the brains. For many years paſt, people have diſcontinued to reſort to Montpellier, when afflicted with pulmonary and conſumptive complaints, its air having been long judged peculiarly improper for them; though it is now ſaid to be much mended, by draining a moraſs, or planting, or deſtroying a wood. Biſhop Atterbury, who was there in the ſummer 1729, repreſents it as ſo uncomfortable, that he was forced to take ſhelter from the ſultry heats, at Vigan in the Cevennes, ten leagues diſtant.

The unpubliſhed letters of Mr. Locke, to Mr. Courten, &c. given below [X], about ten years after this time, prove the intimacy and dearneſs that ſubſiſted between them, and which,

[X] Unpubliſhed letters of Mr. Locke, to Mr. Courten, &c. given below.]

'Dear Sir, Amſt. 12 Aug. —87.
'I cannot but take kindly, from Dr. Goodall, 'any ſervice that he has done you: and he cannot 'obleige me more than by puting it to my account, 'which is with great juſtice done, ſince there is noe 'thing that more nearly concerns me than your health. 'When I write to him, I ſhall acknowledge it, and 'alſo recommend it to him as an intereſt ſoe properly 'mine, that he may aſſure himſelf, that if he admi-'niſters any thing to the recovery of your health, he 'truly takes care of mine. I have not had time, ſince the 'receit of your letter yeſterday, ſoe to inform myſelf 'as to anſwer all the particulars of his, ſoe as I deſire; 'for which I muſt beg you to excuſe me to him, with 'the returne of my thanks, till I ſhall be in a condi-'tion to doe it by an anſwer to what he demands. 'In the mean time, pray do me the favour to informe 'him, that I remember a friend of mine, one Mr. 'Charleton, had, by the uſe of tobacco in ſnuff, con-'tracted at Montpellier, a continual head-ach; which, 'upon the forbearing of ſnuff, left him again: whether 'this at all concerne your preſent caſe, I beſeech you 'conſider; and if faſhion has prevailed upon you to do 'yourſelf harme, to quit it again. I with the more 'importunity preſſe this, becauſe I remember, it was 'with great inſtance and violence I extorted that 'pleaſure from you, which perhaps forgetfulneſs has 'ſuffered you to return to again. I have already ſpoke 'to a friend of mine, to get for you any raritys that 'he can light on in the Eaſt-India fleet, which is now 'here every day expected. I, the laſt week, put into 'the hands of Mr. Smith, a bookſeller, liveing at the 'Prince's Arms in Paul's Church-yard, twenty-ſix 'draughts of the inhabitants of ſeveral remote parts 'of the world, eſpecially the Eaſt-Indies, they are 'marked thus, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 14, 15, '16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, '30; and the names of them writ on the backſide 'with my hand; thoſe, whoſe names are not writ, 'if you know them not, I will get explained here; 'the Braſilian Canibals [of which there are one or 'two] are eaſily known; but ſince there was not the 'name of the particular nation from which they 'were taken, I would not add them myſelf. For 'the excellency of the drawing I will not anſwer, 'they being don by my boy, who hath faithfully 'enough repreſented the originals they were copied 'from, ſoe that one may ſee the habits and complexion 'of the people, which was the main end they were 'deſigned for, and therefore you muſt excuſe them 'if they be not excellent pieces of painting. I alſo 'put into the hands of the ſaid Mr. Smith, a little 'box, with the ſeeds and huſks of Fœniculum Sinenſe. 'The huſks have a very fine aromatical taſte, and are 'uſed by the Muſcovites, to be mixed with their 'Thè, as I have been told, which is not, I imagin, 'the moſt fotiſh thing they are guilty of. If you 'think the ſeeds will grow, and then find to ſpare, I 'would be glad you would ſend two or three of them 'in my name, to Jacob Bobart, the gardener of the 'Phyſick-garden in Oxford, who may endeavour 'to raiſe plants from them. He is a very honeſt 'fellow, and will not be unwilling to furniſh you 'with any curioſities of that kinde. Moreri, I find, 'by your ſoe often mentioning it, lies heavy upon 'your hands, not that you are weary of the book, 'but are impatient till I have it. I tell you truly, 'if I had a better friend, to whoſe care to commit it 'till I return, I ſhould preſently eaſe you of it; but 'if you cannot be eaſy in your conſcience, till you 'find it wholly in my poſſeſſion, I muſt intreat you 'yet to have patience till I bethinke myſelf how to 'diſpoſe of it commodiouſly. You are one of thoſe 'ſcrupulous friends that cannot be at reſt till you 'have more than quitted ſcores, (for ſo your exact 'puting them to account, gives me reaſon to ſpeak) 'with the kindneſs of your friends. In this reſpect, 'Dr. Guinellon and you are well met; and I, who 'am of a more looſe and careleſs temper, am pleaſed 'to ſee, that this nice humor has a little perplexed 'one, or both of you, for I ſee the Doctor is in pain 'that he cannot find Gorlæus and the other books 'you deſired. I moſt earneſtly wiſh your health, 'and am,

'Dear Sir,
'Your moſt humble,
'and moſt obedient ſervant,
'J. Locke (24).' (24) MSS. Sloan. 3962. f.

'I was told you promiſed to enquire of Serjeant 'Maynard for the hearbe which cures the leproſy; 'give me leave to aſke whether you have don it. It 'is not fit ſo uſeful a thing ſhould be loſt.'

Directed. "For Mr. William Charleton, to be left "with Mr. William Garret, Merchand in Lime-ſtreet, "London."

'Dear Sir, 26 Aug. —87.
'I lately gave you the trouble of a letter, to let 'you know, that I had ſent you, by Mr. Smith a 'Bookſeller, at the Feathers, in Paul's Church-'yard, 26 draughts of the habits of ſeveral forain '[eſpecially Aſiatick] people; and alſo a little box, 'of the ſeeds of Fœniculum Sinenſe. What other 'commands I have from you, in your's of 26 of 'July, I ſhall take all the care I can to give you ſa-'tisfaction in. I herewith ſend you a letter, and a 'little manuſcript, to Lord Pembroke, which I beg 'the favour of you to deliver to his own hands, and 'to ſend me what anſwer his Lordſhip ſhall pleaſe 'to honour me with. If his Lordſhip be at Wilton, 'I beg the favour of you to ſend the whole packet 'away by the next poſt, to Dr. David Thomas at 'Saliſbury, with the letter here incloſed to him. If 'I make you not an apology for this trouble, 'tis 'becauſe I know, with what pleaſure and readineſs 'you obleige your friends, which lays on me the 'greater obligation to be, as I am,

'Dear Sir,
'Your moſt affectionate and
'Moſt humble ſervant,
'J. Locke (25).' (25) MSS. Sloan. 3962.

Directed. "For Mr. William Charleton, to be "left at Mr. William Garret's, a Merchand in Lime-"ſtreet, London."

Endorſed in Mr. Courten's hand-writing,

"Copy of mine of the 26 July, in anſwer to Mr. "Locke's of 10th of June."

'Dear

which no doubt continued to the end of Mr. Courten's life, for Locke, though his ſenior about eight years, was the ſurvivor. It appears that Mr. Courten was one of the ſelect friends among whom Locke practiſed phyſick, of which he had taken a Bachelor's degree at Oxford. That Locke practiſed a little, and was exceedingly well qualified for the employment, appears from many circumſtances mentioned in his article, and particularly from the following teſtimony of the celebrated Dr. Sydenham. "You know how much my method has been approved by a perſon who examined it to "the bottom, and who is our common friend: I mean Mr. John Locke, who, if we "conſider his genius, and penetrating and exact judgment, or the ſtrictneſs of his morals, "has ſcarce any ſuperior, and few equals now living (x)." That Mr. Courten attended particularly to Locke's preſcription, and derived benefit from it, is evident from his anſwer, and from the following entries in a Saunders's Almanac for 1698, in which there is a MS. Diary, not by Dr. Walter Charleton, as it is entitled in the Muſeum, and the Catalogue of MSS. but relative ſolely to Mr. William Courten, being his own hand-writing, which is ſufficiently diſtinguiſhable, and moreover vouched as his, by the information itſelf. "July 27, 1698, being diſtreſſed with my head-ach and giddineſs, I left off entirely taking "tobacco in ſnuff, having only taken it but four times a day, for ſeveral days before, and "never after 7 at night." Aug. 20, 1698. "Muſt ſhew my things, [meaning his "Muſeum] but ſeldom, never two days conſecutively for the future (y)."

(x) Biog. Brit. Art. Locke, 1ſt. edit. p. 2995, Note [H].

(y) MSS. Sloan. 4956.

Certainly Mr. Courten cultivated medallic ſcience with pleaſure, avidity, and conſiderable ſucceſs: the curious may ſee the moſt ſatisfactory proofs of this at the Britiſh Muſeum, both in the coins he collected, and in the accounts he has given of them. It appears likewiſe, from very many of his papers in the ſame repoſitory, that as a general ſcholar he was far from being contemptible, and that he was not unſkilled in making experiments. Some of theſe papers the curious may eaſily find in Mr. Ayſcough's Catalogue of MSS. but to others of them, not leſs worthy of notice, as they are looſe and unentered, no expreſs references can be given. The only paper of Mr. Courten, which the preſent writer has ever ſeen in print, is a tranſlation from an original in Latin, publiſhed ten years after the death of its author, in the Philoſophical Tranſactions, at large, Vol. xxvii. page 485, for the months of July, Auguſt, and September. The title, and ſome account of it, the reader may ſee below [Y].

Mr.

MSS. 3962.5

'Dear Sir, July 26, 1687.

'Incloſed, I ſend you the long expected letter 'from our worthy friend, Dr. Goodall, for whoſe 'extraordinary kindneſſe and civility to me, on your 'account, I intreat the return of your thanks. It is 'now near three months, that I have been ſorely 'afflicted with violent and conſtant pains in my head, 'accompanied with great giddyneſſe, inſomuch that 'I was not able to read your letters on the back of a 'book, placed on a ſhelf of an ordinary height, 'without being ready to fall. In this condition the 'able and compaſſionate Dr. found me; and after he 'had taken a very exact account of the circumſtances 'of it, he preſcribed me ſeveral things in order to 'my cure; amongſt others, a ſort of lozenges, by 'which I found benefit, though he would receive 'none, it not being in my power to fix one ſingle 'fee on him, telling me, that perceiving I was ſo 'intimate a friend of yours, I ſhould have his advice 'gratis. I thank God I am ſomewhat better than 'I have been, but I fear that I ſhall ſcarcely ever be 'freed from this unhappy diſtemper. Pray let me 'know in your next, when I ſhall ſend the Moreri's 'Dictionary, and the other books you formerly men'tioned, &c.'

The letter concludes with an order for ſome inſects, birds, and animals, from a catalogue of objects of Natural Hiſtory, apparently on ſale about this time at Amſterdam.

Endorſed by Mr. Courten, in his own hand. "Copy of mine of the 28th Aug. in anſwer to "Mr. Locke's of the 12th and 26th ditto."

'Dear Sir, Aug. 28, 1687.

'I have received both yours of the 12th and 26th 'inſtant; and, according to your order, my Lord not 'being in town, I have ſent the let. and MS. into 'the country. Mr. Smith the Bookſeller is not yet 'arrived; when he comes, I ſhall enquire of him for 'the favours you deſigned me, and ſend to Mr. 'Bobart ſome ſeeds of the Fæniculum Sinenſe. He 'was recommended to me not long ſince, by a very 'good friend, and I gave him a ſight of the collec'tion of plants I made at Montpellier, and of the 'fine extotic ones you were pleaſed to ſend me, ſe'veral of which he had never ſeen before. I told 'Dr. Goodall what you had written relating to his 'letter; he preſents you his ſervice. I am endea'vouring to follow your kind and good advice, and 'have ſo far prevailed on myſelf, as to forbear tak'ing tobacco in powder, uſing, inſtead of it, cut'tobacco: when you are pleaſed to write, I ſhould 'be glad to have your opinion about it. I have ſome 'few things by me, that if your friend is not already 'furniſhed with, I ſhall take care to ſend, by the firſt 'opportunity:' [then follows a liſt of them too long 'to inſert.]

'When Sir Henry Hobart was in town, he pro'miſed to enquire of his father-in-law concerning 'the herb you mentioned, but I heard not ſince from 'him. When he comes again, I ſhall wait upon 'him, and put him in mind of it. My humble 'ſervice to Dr. Guenellon,' &c.

It appears from another letter in the ſame volume of MSS. that Mr. Courten ſucceeded in propagating the ſeeds of the Fæniculum Sinenſe, and ſent ſome of them to James Bobart, as Locke requeſted. There is, ibidem, a letter from this gardener, to Mr. Courten, accompanied with ſome African ſeeds; among which, he recommends, particularly, one under the name of Cucumis Africanus echinatus.

[Y] The title, and ſome account of it, the reader may ſee below.]

II. Experiments and obſervations of the effects of ſeveral ſorts of poiſons upon animals, &c. made at Montpellier, in the years 1678, and 1679, by the late William Courten, Eſq; communicated by Dr. Hans Sloane, R. S. Secr. Tranſlated from the Latin MS.

Two ounces of the juice of Dutch Nightſhade [Solanum Batavicum] did a dog no manifeſt injury; the ſame doſe of the juice of hemlock [Cicuta] did not hurt him; nor did he appear to be hurt by a pretty large root of wolfs-bane [Aconitum Pardalianches] bruiſed with the leaves and flowers of the ſame plant mixed with fleſh. Two drachms of white hellebore [Helleborus albus] diſordered the ſame dog very much, but he recovered, and afterwards ſwallowed five roots of meadow-ſaffron [Colchicum Ephemerum] freſh dug, with which he was violently tormented, but did not die. Two drachms of opium ſtupified, but did not kill him. He was afterwards cauſed to be bit three or four times on the belly by an

Mr. Courten was evidently a pretty general ſtudent, and not ill-verſed in moſt parts of polite literature; but whatever branch, or branches of knowledge, might, more or leſs, engage his attention occaſionally, it manifeſtly appears, that his forte, his principal and favourite ſtudy, was always that of Natural Hiſtory; a moſt engaging and extenſive ſcience, that miniſters very copiouſly to the wants and the pleaſures of human life, and furniſhes us throughout all the works of nature, with the moſt delightful demonſtrations of the wonderful power, wiſdom, and goodneſs of its all-perfect author.

It has been ſaid, on the reſpectable teſtimony of Sir Hans Sloane, that Mr. Courten, "from his earlieſt years diſregarding the pomp and vanities of the world, gave himſelf up "to the contemplation of the works of God, &c." Many papers, in Mr. Courten's hand writing, appear in aid of the Baronet's teſtimony; and it ſeems very certain, that the writer of them proſecuted this inexhauſtible ſcience, in all its branches, con amore, and with ſucceſs, to the remoteſt period of his life, which extended beyond the age of threeſcore years.

The Catalogues of Mr. Courten's plants, at Montpellier, &c. referred to in the margin (z), afford abundant proofs of his ſkill in Botany, and may ſerve, with the aſſiſtances of various accidental notices contained in his papers paſſim, to give a tolerable idea of the ſtate, at that time, of the Botanical Garden at Montpellier, then celebrated as the beſt of the kind in Europe. His friendſhip with Dr. Sherwood, which laſted to the end of his life, ſeems to have been grafted, originally, on their common attachment to Botany [Z].

(z) MSS. Sloan. 3962. Plut. f.

Mr.

an enraged viper, and would probably have died, if he had not been cupped, ſcarified, and relieved with Theriaca, and volatile ſpirit of hartſhorn, mixed in broth. He was at laſt killed by another dog. By fifteen grains of the dried root of monks-hood, [Napellus] powdered and mixed with fleſh and broth, a dog was variouſly diſtreſſed, and miſerably tormented for an hour, but recovered by degrees. A little dog, by a drachm of the root of monks-hood [Napellus] laboured under the ſame grievous ſymptoms, more violently and longer; but he likewiſe recovered: but an ounce of the leaves, flowers, and ſeed of the Napellus, when green, bruiſed, and given to a dog, ſcarce diſordered him any more than if he had eaten ſo much graſs.

The ſtomach and ſmall guts of another dog, killed by the nux vomica, were found very red and inflamed by the corroſiveneſs of the medicine.

A ſtrong luſty dog was, by a warm injection of an ounce of vinum emeticum, diſtreſſed with a variety of lamentable complaints, circumſtantially narrated in the paper, and died convulſed in a few hours, though twice revived with warm broth through a funnel.

A drachm and a half of ſal armoniac, diſſolved in an ounce and a half of water, injected warm into the jugular vein of a dog, convulſed and killed him preſently. A whelp, bit in the lower lip by a blind worm [Cæcilia] ſo that the blood appeared in the wound, died the ſame day. An injection of a drachm of Salt of Tartar, diſſolved in an ounce of warm water, convulſed and killed a dog almoſt immediately. A warm injection of an ounce of urine, made by a man faſting, produced no convulſion or other ill ſymptoms. A gentle decoction of two drachms of white hellebore, well powdered, in ſpring water, and evaporated to nine drachms and a half, ſtrongly preſſed out and injected turbid into the jugular vein of a dog, inſtantaneouſly produced convulſive motions, and on its entrance into the heart, killed him as ſuddenly as if he had been ſhot dead with a bullet; and he hung flaccid, like a fleece, in the hands of the perſon who held him.

A whelp ſtung in the tongue, &c. a pigeon ſtung likewiſe by a ſcorpion, the ſting being often forced into the wounds, and the bladder, ſuppoſed to contain the venom, being preſſed, remained unhurt; ſo alſo did a rat, included and ſtung often by ſcorpions, in a large glaſs. The provoked rat attacked the ſcorpions and gnawed off, and devoured part of them, with the precaution of keeping his eyes ſhut meanwhile. Several animals were killed by injections of ſpirit of ſalt, of ſpirit of wine, and opium; but an injection of two drachms of ſugar, diſſolved in an ounce of water, did a dog no harm; and an injection of a drachm and a half of common ſalt made him only very thirſty, and drink greedily. An injection of half an ounce of warm oil of olives into the crural vein of a little dog, deprived him preſently of all external ſenſe, and killed him in three hours; and the injection of an ounce of the ſame oil, into the jugular vein of another dog, ſuffocated him in the ſame moment.

An injection of ten drachms of highly rectified ſpirit of wine, into the crural vein of a dog, killed him quietly, and as it were with pleaſure, in a very little time. An injection of five ounces of ſtrong white wine, into the crural vein of a dog, made him very drunk; but the drunkenneſs abated and he recovered.

An injection of three drachms of rectified ſpirit of wine, into the crural vein of a ſmall dog, made him apoplectick; in a little time he recovered from his apoplexy, but was giddy, and reeled, and drunken; but in four hours he eat bread, and was next day out of danger.

A dog died terribly convulſed from an injection of an ounce of a ſtrong decoction of tobacco; but a ſimilar injection of ten drops of diſtilled oil of ſage, mixed with half a drachm of ſugar, did a dog no harm. A drachm of purified white vitriol, injected into the crural vein, killed a dog immediately. Another recovered, with much difficulty, from an injection of fifteen grains of ſalt of urine; ſo alſo did another, from a warm injection of a decoction of ſena, in water, to the quantity of two drachms. A mole, ſtung in the ſide by a ſcorpion, died immediately, convulſed; and on diſſection, the experimenter diſcovered that the inteſtinum cæcum is wanting in moles. Next follows, an account of the effects of tying nerves, arteries, &c. in dogs, for which, the curious reader is referred to the paper itſelf.

[Z] On their common attachment to Botany.]

Extract from a copy of a letter of William Courten, Eſq; to Dr. Sherwood, dated Middle Temple, May 11, 1691 (26).

(26) MSS. Sloan. 3961. 6

'Sir,

'I am aſhamed to mention the date of the letter I 'received from you; but having ſo favourable an op- 'portunity of writing by Mr. Hariſon, I could not 'but own the receipt of it, and aſſure you, that 'though I have not had the civility of returning an 'an anſwer till now, yet I did ſeveral times wait 'upon our friend, in relation to what you deſired, 'and acquainted him, that whatever kindneſſe he 'ſhould expreſs towards you, I ſhould eſteem it as 'done to myſelf; and he was pleaſed to ſay, that he 'ſhould eſpouſe your concern as if it was his own, '&c.&c. My moſt humble ſervice to Sir Arthur Raw- 'don, and when you write to Dr. Tournefort, be 'pleaſed to give him my ſervice. I wiſht you at our 'club the other night for an hour or two, to have 'had a ſight of a curious book of plants of the Cape 'of Good Hope in miniature, preſented by the States, 'to the Biſhop of London. There were to the 'number of fourty, and as our chief Botaniſts ſaid, 'moſt of them not deſcribed. May you have a plea-

'ſant

Mr. Courten's intimacies, correſpondencies, and friendſhips with Doctor, afterwards Sir Hans Sloane, with Doctor, afterwards Sir Tancred Robinſon, Phyſician in Ordinary to George I. with Doctor Martin Liſter, with Mr. L. Pluckenett, with Mr. Edward Llwyd, &c. &c. were certainly founded on congenial taſte, and argue no contemptible degrees of proficiency in the various branches of Natural Hiſtory.

Though Mr. Courten was very greatly Sir Hans Sloane's ſuperior in the knowledge of the ſcience here ſpoken of, as appears from many and various evidences in the Britiſh Muſeum, nevertheleſs their intimacy ſeems to have grown from their common affection for Natural Hiſtory; and their friendſhip ſeems to have been cemented and cheriſhed to the laſt by their perſevering ardour as naturaliſts, and the mutual aſſiſtances they lent to each other in ſimilar purſuits. The extracts from Sir Hans Sloane's own letters given below [AA], ſeem to confirm what has been ſaid; the harſheſt part of which, the writer well knows, cannot be conteſted by the ableſt officer in the Natural Hiſtory department of the Britiſh Muſeum.

We can now only gueſs at the nature of Sir Hans Sloane's great obligations to Mr. Courten; but it ſeems, by Sir Hans's own account of them, that they were very great in whatever way, fourteen years at leaſt, before the date of Mr. Courten's laſt will, by which this very worthy Phyſician was ſo much more obliged, as ſhall be ſhewn in the ſequel. In 1687, at his departure from this country for Jamaica, in quality of Phyſician to the Duke of Albemarle, who went there as Governour, Sir Hans Sloane, under a grateful ſenſe of peculiar obligations to Mr. Courten, purpoſed, it ſeems, to collect natural things principally for him, and to enrich a collection which his benefactor had been making from his earlieſt years, and for which, it is not unreaſonable to ſuppoſe, that there was no inconſiderable foundation in his family before he was born.

However this was, Mr. Courten, about three or four years before the date of Doctor Sloane's firſt letter, that is, about 1684 [BB], had returned to his native country, where he

'ſant ſeaſon in your intended progreſſe, and the ſa-
'tisfaction of meeting with whatever may be rare in
'the parts you viſit, &c.'

N. B. Mr. Courten in his laſt will, left Dr. Sherwood five pounds to buy him a ring.

[AA] The extracts from Sir Hans Sloane's own letters given below.]

Extract of a letter ſigned H. Sloane, dated from Portſmouth, Sept. 10, 1687, and directed to William Charleton, Eſq; at his Chambers over Mr. North's, in Brick Court, Temple.

'I thank God I am come hither very ſafe. I 'hope before this you are likewiſe come ſafe from
'Dover with your friends, &c.'—'I hope, for my
'ſake, you will abſtain as much from exceſſe in wine,
'as your too good and complaiſant humour will
'ſuffer you. You cannot do me a greater favour
'than to be careful of your own health.' [Then follow particular advices, directions, and preſcriptions relative to his health, earneſtly recommended to Mr. Courten's obſervation.] 'I am extremely obliged
'to you beyond any in the world, and upon all occa-
'ſions, and in all places, I ſhall endeavour ſome man'ner of requital. I deſign to ſend you what I meet
'with that is curious from the ſeveral iſlands we land
'at, which will be moſt of our plantations. Remem'ber me to all friends, not forgetting Mrs. Wood.
'I am in all ſincerity,
'Dear Sir,
'Your moſt obedient,
'moſt obliged, and
'moſt humble Servant,
'HANS SLOANE.'

N. B. Dr. Sloane was at this time on his way to Jamaica, in the character of Phyſician to his Excellency the Duke of Albemarle.

Extract of a letter ſigned Hans Sloane, dated Barbadoes, Nov. 28, 1687, and directed to William Charleton, Eſq; to be left at Mr. William Cockram's, Merchant, in London.

'Dear Sir,
'I would have wrote to you from the Madeira,
'but there were no Engliſh ſhips there bound home-
'wards. This is the firſt one I meet, and I am 'heartily ſorry, I being new-landed here, cannot
'now ſend with this any natural things; for what I
'had at Madeira cannot be come at, which are plants,
'and what is here, I have not as yet gathered; but
'you may aſſure yourſelf, that what theſe parts of
'the Weſt Indies afford, is all your own, the beſt way
'I can ſend them. You may be ſure the taſte I have 'already is delightful to me, for this is indeed a new 'world in all things. I wiſhed heartily for you to 'day, if you could have been back in your Cham-
'bers at night. I find this place very warm; my
'greateſt work is ſweating and drinking water, which
'I find does well, and better than other ſmall liquors
'of this place. From Jamaica you ſhall hear and 'receive from me at large. My humble ſervice to
'Dr. Liſter, to Dr. Robinſon, to whom I deſign to 'write very ſoon, and to Mrs. Wood.
'Your very affectionate, &c.'

There is, ibidem, a letter, ſigned Hans Sloane, dated Newhall, July 11, 1690, directed to W. Charleton, Eſq; at his Chambers over Mr. North's, Eſſex-Court, Middle-Temple, full of affection, and particular directions about Mr. Courten's health.

In a letter dated likewiſe from Newhall, Sept. 12, 1690, and directed as above, Dr. Sloane recommends three Ladies, who came to town with the Ducheſs of Newcaſtle, to ſee Mr. Courten's fine curioſities; informs him that Dr. Mullens died at Barbadoes, of a ſpotted fever in three days; and acquaints him with his own intention of being in town in ten days at fartheſt.

There is, ibidem, a letter directed to the Worſhipful William Charleton, Eſq; above Mr. North's Chambers, in the Temple, dated Oxford Sept. 25, 1691, ſigned Edward Llwyd, advertiſing him of the robbery of the Aſhmolean Collection, with a curious account of the particulars, for which the reader is referred to the Britiſh Muſeum (27).

(27) MSS. Sloan. ut ſupra.

[BB] About 1684.] In a printed paper in the Britiſh Muſeum, and likewiſe in the Vox Veritatis, ut ſupra, it is ſaid, that "William Courten, Eſq; lived "in France in 1683, on a ſmall eſtate in money, not "having a foot of land in England of all his father's "or grandfather's large poſſeſſions (28)."

(28) Ibid. 3515.

From a letter written by his couſin Poſthumus Salwey, dated Auguſt 8, 1684, from Throckmorton, it ſeems that Mr. Courten was then living at his Chambers in the Temple. Probably he made a ſhort viſit to his friends in England, in 1681-2, he opened, as the Doctor himſelf informs us, " A Muſeum extremely well furniſhed with " every thing curious either in nature, or for illuſtrating hiſtory, and ancient times." It filled, it ſeems, ten rooms in the Middle Temple, where, ſays Dr. Sloane, " Mr. Courten " ſhewed it very freely, and with great civility, to the advancement of the glory of GOD, " the honour and renown of the country, and the no ſmall promotion of knowledge and " uſeful arts."

Dr. Sloane's own collection, or cloſet, as is called, at the time here ſpoken of, that is, in 1687, and long after, was, probably, inconſiderable, certainly never comparable to Mr. Courten's Muſeum, which it had always, from his earlieſt youth, been the chief buſineſs of this intelligent Naturaliſt's life to form, and to render every day leſs imperfect.

It has been ſaid, that in the formation and diſpoſition of it, Mr. Courten did not overlook any thing that was rare or curious in art, and that he enriched it very ſkilfully with coins and medals ancient and modern, antiquities [CC], ſeals, pictures, drawings, prints, vaſes, &c. for the " illuſtration of Hiſtory and ancient times;" but certainly his chief attention was, to bring together the principal and moſt curious objects of the vegetable, animal, and mineral kingdoms, which he collected through the whole courſe of his life, with great judgment and at great expence.

It appears from his Catalogues and MSS. in the Britiſh Muſeum, that this able collector was well acquainted with the beſt methods of preſerving, and the moſt ſcientific modes of claſſifying them then known, to the improvement of which, he ſeems to have been, himſelf, no contemptible contributor. It is equally evident, and deſerves to be recorded to Mr. Courten's honour, and for the imitation of ſuch as engage in ſimilar ſtudies and purſuits, that though he did not overlook their claſſification and arrangement, his principal attention was beſtowed on the wiſe contrivance and beneficent deſign diſcoverable in the objects he collected, on their admirable œconomy, and on the moſt judicious and ingenious applications of them to the many various purpoſes of uſe and ornament in human life.

It is highly proper, indeed abſolutely neceſſary, that the multifarious objects of Natural Hiſtory ſhould be well aſcertained, and diſtinguiſhed with nicety in all their varieties. The ſcience, and lovers of it, are unqueſtionably indebted to the able Naturaliſts, who have ſpent their time, and exerciſed their ingenuity, in deviſing commodious methods of arrangement, and inventing ſyſtems for identifying the things about which it is converſant, with accuracy, and leſs danger of fallacy or miſtake.

If ſtudents in this way could but agree univerſally to adopt any one of the methods or ſyſtems of claſſification, the worſt of them all, much more the beſt, brought into general uſe, and conſtantly adhered to, would doubtleſs facilitate very greatly the ſtudy, and baniſh entirely that immenſe ſuperfluity of ſynonymous terms, and ever-growing jargon, that is at preſent, the embarraſſment and reproach of their favourite ſcience.

All who are, or would wiſh to be thought Naturaliſts, certainly ought to conſider, that the beſt poſſible mode of claſſification, the Linnæan ſyſtem not excepted, is after all, only an introduction to Natural Hiſtory; and the Naturaliſt who goes no farther, hardly deſerves that name: he embraces a cloud for a goddeſs, quits a ſubſtance for a ſhadow, ſubſtitutes the means in place of the end of the ſcience, brings the ſtudy of it into diſrepute and contempt, and proſecutes the knowledge of Natural Hiſtory as if he conceived it to be only a mere vocabulary. The ingenious and indefatigable Linnæus, who ſpent his life in fabricating the curious ſyſtem of claſſification now in vogue, intended it certainly for the advancement of Natural Hiſtory, as a baſis for the ſervice of knowledge and the benefit of mankind. But ſurely ſome of his admirers ſeem to have overlooked his views, and taken the ſcaffold for the building; or if the writer is miſtaken in this opinion, there can be no harm in expreſſing a wiſh, that the lovers of Natural Hiſtory, would in the proſecution of the ſcience, think of the true ends of knowledge, and endeavour to promote their own inſtruction, and the advancement of others, and not purſue it from mere curioſity, or only for the arrangement of objects, but chiefly with a view to their application to the occaſions and uſes of life, all along conducting and perfecting the ſtudy in the ſpirit of benevolence.

Perhaps it may be of more uſe, ſome time or other, than is commonly apprehended, to define, with preciſion, the claſs, order, genus, ſpecies, ſex, family, and habitation of a plant, for example, if poſſible with all its varieties; but why, in the mean while, ſhould the plant itſelf remain, I ſay not uſeleſs [for certainly nothing in nature is ſo], but unuſeful, and no attention be paid after aſcertaining and arranging it, to diſcover, by experiment, its virtue as a or, as we may reaſonably infer from the concluſion of another letter from his couſin Richard Salwey, dated London, June 30, 1681.

N. B. In a marginal note on the preceding article, p. 323, the word maclaer is miſinterpreted. In the Flemiſh language, this word variouſly ſpelt, makalaer, or maclaer, &c. ſignifies a broker, a factor, an agent, a man that deals in trade on commiſſion, &c.

[CC] Antiquities, &c.] Old, ancient, and antique, heighten the ſignification of one another. A faſhion is old when it ceaſes to be followed; it is ancient when the uſe of it is entirely laid aſide; and it is antique, or antiquated, when it has been a long time ancient. Oldneſs refers to age, ancientneſs refers to families, and ANTIQUITIES to things that have exiſted in times far remote from our own.

dye,

dye, its benefit as a food, cloathing, or phyſic to man, or its ſerviceableneſs in whatever way to him, or to any of all the multitude of animals ſubſervient to his uſe, or miniſterial to his pleaſure. But even during this æra of apparently mere claſſification, Natural Hiſtory may in reality have been advanced, or advancing, and therefore, with theſe hints only, certainly well intended, the preſent writer paſſes, very willingly, from a theme ſo unpleaſant, with a ſincere wiſh, and in great hopes, that it may become every day leſs and leſs neceſſary for any perſon to reſume it.

Mr. Courten proſecuted the ſtudy of Natural Hiſtory in the moſt uſeful way, and to its full extent; and he collected, diſpoſed, and communicated the various objects of it, with ſolicitude, judgment, and liberality. Some inſtances of this the reader may collect from what has been ſaid, to which I ſhall only add the following. Among his apparently earlieſt MSS. in the Britiſh Muſeum, there is a methodical treatiſe on the aſbeſtos, and of the beſt methods of applying it to various uſeful purpoſes, in Latin, certainly in the hand-writing of Mr. Courten; but whether it is altogether original, or only tranſcribed with obſervations and remarks, from the papers of Dr. Liſter, Dr. Plot, &c. publiſhed about that time, on the ſame ſubject, the preſent writer not having ſeen them all, cannot pretend to determine.

When Mr. Courten could only be about the age of fourteen, his name appears in the liſt of benefactors to "TRADESCANT's Ark"[DD]; for the "Muſeum Tradeſcantianum" was publiſhed in 1656, 12*mo*. and contains an account of the plants, ſhrubs, and trees in the extenſive Botanical Garden of this family, as well as a Catalogue of their Muſeum properly ſo called. When this early collection, after remaining for ſome time in the poſſeſſion of Elias Aſhmole, Eſq; who augmented it very conſiderably, became, by that learned and worthy Gentleman's bounty, a kind of public property, by being depoſited at Oxford, where it might beſt anſwer the ends of judicious enquirers through all ſucceeding ages, Mr. Courten continued to be a generous contributor to it, and in a variety of ways, as appears from the authentic teſtimonial given below [EE].

Mr. Courten's own Muſeum remains to this day, and may be ſtill ſeen very freely, and probably much in the ſtate he left it, though improved, as may well be ſuppoſed, and now arranged for the moſt part, to greater advantage, according to the Linnæan ſyſtem. Of his curious collection, it is now impoſſible to aſcertain the exact Catalogues, or the preciſe value. None of all the preſent catalogues that this writer has ſeen, though differently written, appear to be in Mr. Courten's hand-writing, nor are they made in his way, or indeed in any very accurate or ſcientific manner. Swelled with ſhort and unſcholar-like hiſtories and accounts of their contents, they amount, it is ſaid, in all, to thirty-eight volumes in folio, and eight volumes in quarto; but the preſent writer has not ſeen the whole number of them, nor even examined what he ſaw very particularly.

[DD] "TRADESCANT's Ark."] One of the earlieſt Muſeums formed in this country, in a ſcientific way, by very intelligent collectors, and with liberal and public-ſpirited views, was ſo called from the name of the Flemiſh family who formed it. The curious are referred, for farther information about it, to the "Muſeum Tradeſcantianum" mentioned in the text, 179 pages, excluſively of the long liſt of benefactors, which is not very ſcarce, or very dear, except on account of the two fine prints of the original collectors, by Hollar, prefixed, which, during the late and preſent humour of preſerving the heads of eminent men, have raiſed it, without any conſideration of the curious publication itſelf, to the price of one guinea. The two John Tradeſcants, father and ſon, whom theſe two prints repreſent, certainly well deſerve to be better known, for their early and eminent ſervices to Botany in particular, and to Natural Hiſtory in general, which they laboured expenſively, and not unſucceſsfully, to promote in this country. The reader is referred for the fulleſt account that has hitherto been given of them, to the additional notes in the firſt volume of the laſt edition of the TATLER, with biographical, hiſtorical, and critical annotations, p.435, & ſeqq. To this firſt Catalogue that the preſent writer has ever ſeen of a Muſeum, printed probably by John Mayler, next ſucceeds, ſo far as he knows, in 1664, and in 12*mo*. likewiſe, "A catalogue of "the many natural rarities, with great induſtry, coſt, "and thirty years travel into foreign parts, collected "by Robert Hubert, alias Forges, Gent. and ſworn "ſervant to his Majeſty, and daily to be ſeen at the "place called the Muſic Houſe, at the Mitre, near "the Weſt end of St. Paul's Church-Yard." Of this Collector, and his place of abode, the curious may ſee a more particular account in the edition of the TATLER, ut ſupra, N°. 221, Vol.VI. p.33, Note. Sir J. Hawkins affirms, on the authority of Mr. Oldys, that HUBERT's Muſeum came at laſt into the poſſeſſion of Sir Hans Sloane, moſt probably with Mr. Courten's ſuperior collection, of which it might be ſome part. Of the following very rare book, or of the collection it announces, the preſent writer knows nothing but the title given on the authority in the margin (29). "Catalogus Muſei inſtructiſſimi. By "the induſtrious labour of Johannes Jacobus Swammer-"dam, Apothecary, at Lambeth," 1679, 8*vo*. 143 pages. About the ſame time Mr. John Coniers, an ingenious and intelligent Apothecary, who lived in Shoe-Lane, and in whoſe hand-writing there are ſundry and very curious original MSS. in the Britiſh Muſeum, formed with much aſſiduity, with unqueſtionable ſkill, and at great expence, another collection of Natural Hiſtory, but chiefly of Antiquities; and in 1691, he made a propoſal to the public, of opening it for general inſpection. Such as are curious to know more of this, are referred for a farther account of it to "The Athenian Mercury," Vol.IV. N°. 16. Nov. 21, 1691. Printed for John Dunton, at the Raven in the Poultry, in folio. See alſo TATLER with Notes, &c. Vol. VI. p. 336, and Adv.

(29) Ha l.MSS. Bagf. 5979.

[EE] The authentic teſtimonial given below.] It is endorſed, not in the hand-writing of Mr. Courten, but by ſome other writer, "A copy of the regiſter "of your benefaction at Oxford."

'Gulielmus Charleton è Medio Templo, London, Armiger, rerum naturalium rariorum, domi foriſque, ubique gentium explorator ſagaciſſimus: hujus Muſei inſtructiſſimi quaſi conſummationem intentaret; eidem e penu ſuo CUMULATISSIMO, Zyganam piſcem integram, varias tum Coralliorum, tum Conchyliorum ſpecies, numiſmata item non-nulla (plurium pignora) piè ſacravit (30).'

(30) Brit. Muſ. Bibl. Sloan. MSS. 3962. Plut.

From

From what has been ſaid, however, the reader may poſſibly be inclined to believe, with the writer of this article, that Mr. Courten's collection was choice and valuable; nor is it very unreaſonable to ſuppoſe, that it might nearly amount to the full price that was afterwards given to the heirs of his generous and bountiful executor for the Muſeum, augmented no doubt, in very many reſpects, but diminiſhed, as has been mentioned, in one reſpect at leaſt, on which certainly, its value greatly depended, and on which it was chiefly eſtimated.

It remained for about half a century after the death of Mr. Courten, in the poſſeſſion of his executor and reſiduary legatee, who certainly added very much to it, and was then purchaſed in 1753, for the uſe of the public, without ſo much as the mention of the name of its firſt, and moſt ſcientific collector and proprietor, ſo far as appears in the whole courſe of the tranſaction, for 20,000*l.* though the coins and precious ſtones alone, were ſaid to be of that value (a). It is now preſerved with the Cottonian, Edwardian, and other public Libraries, the Harleian and other MSS. a liberal royal donation of books and pamphlets, the curious collections of Sir William Hamilton, from Herculaneum and Italy, of Sir Joſeph Banks and Dr. Solander, from the Iſlands in the South Seas, and a very conſiderable and accumulating treaſure of other occaſional donations of printed books, MSS. coins, and various objects for the illuſtration of ancient times, and Natural Hiſtory, at the national expence, in the Britiſh Muſeum.

(a) It was eſtimated altogether, the library included, at 50,000*l.*

There is a memorable clauſe in the preamble to the Act of Parliament for the purchaſe of this Muſeum, which the reader may not be diſpleaſed to find here, as it is not foreign to the purpoſe of this article: "Whereas all Arts and Sciences have a connection with each "other, and diſcoveries in Natural Philoſophy and other branches of ſpeculative know-"ledge [for the advancement and improvement whereof, this Muſeum was intended] do, "and may, in many inſtances, give help and ſucceſs to the moſt uſeful experiments and "inventions; therefore, to the end that the ſaid Muſeum may be preſerved and main-"tained, not only for the inſpection and entertainment of the learned and the curious, but "for the general uſe and benefit of the publick: May it pleaſe your Majeſty to enact, "and be it enacted, That out of all or any of the monies to be raiſed by virtue of this "Act, the full and clear ſum of twenty thouſand pounds, lawful money of Great Britain, "ſhall be paid to the executors of Sir Hans Sloane, &c."

This very juſt ſentiment, if not borrowed from Cicero, we find in his fine oration for Archias the Poet; and he has expreſſed it with the accuracy of a Philoſopher, and the curious felicity of a man of genius. 'Omnes artes—habent quoddam com-'mune vinculum, & quaſi cognatione quadam inter ſe continentur.'

This judicious conſideration anticipates and obviates, in a ſatisfactory manner, the frivolous objections to a public proviſion of this nature, which generally originate in illiberality and narrowneſs of mind, and ought to keep wit from over-running judgment in eſtimating inconſiderately, the comparative value of the various branches of ſcience. To form ſuch eſtimates juſtly, requires an impartiality, a greater compaſs of knowledge, and more patient deliberation than is commonly poſſeſſed. Non omnia poſſumus omnes; and even ſcholars eminently diſtinguiſhed in various branches of literature, are apt to err, and to be too precipitate, and too peremptory in this reſpect. There is a proneneſs to over-rate what we have acquired, to under-value what we have not attained, and to diſlike and deſpiſe what we have neglected, which ought to be guarded againſt, as it often diſcourages ſtudy, betrays ignorance, and ſuggeſts objections that recoil to the reproach of the objectors.

The purchaſe in queſtion generouſly offered at leſs than half its value, if it had been rejected, would have been ſtill more diſgraceful to this nation, than the loſs of Voſſius's fine library, ſuppoſed to have been the beſt private library then in the world, concerning which the preſent writer takes this opportunity, to give a little information below [FF], omitted, or unobſerved by the biographer of Isaac Vossius, in the firſt edition of this work.

The acquiſition of Mr. Courten's collection, augmented, as has been ſaid, in books and various reſpects by his worthy executor, and through his liberality offered, at a price ſo inadequate to its real value, the eſtabliſhment and ſupport of it for public uſe, is very honourable to this nation, and appears to be an act of true wiſdom and ſound policy.

[FF] A little information below, &c.] "The "library of Voſſius, in which were a great many "Greek MSS. beſides five hundred printed books "as ſcarce as any MS. was offered to our Univerſity "at Oxford, but unhappily loſt through miſma-"nagement. The moſt ancient of his MSS. Voſſius "had begged of Chriſtina, Queen of Sweden (31), "and theſe he had from time to time tranſcribed by "the hands of one Faulkner, a Scotchman, which "he ſold to the King of France, and for ſome years "together, made little leſs than one hundred "pounds per annum (32)."

(31) See Biog. Brit. Art. Vossius, (Iſaac).

This fine library, the joint collection of Iſaac Voſſius and of his father John Gerard Voſſius a more judicious ſcholar, was ſuffered to be purchaſed, and carried out of this kingdom by the Univerſity of Leyden, to the great ſhame and reproach of England. Gabriel Naudeus, who publiſhed in Latin, in 1644, "Inſtructions concerning erecting a Library," never ſaw, it ſeems, this curious library of Voſſius, though he ſays he had often importuned Profeſſor Perizonius to procure him that pleaſure (33).

(32) Harl. MSS. 5911.

(33) "Inſtruc-"tions concern-"ing the erect-"ing of a Libra-"ry, written by "Gabr. Naudé, "publiſhed in "Engliſh, with "ſome Im-"provements, "By John Evelyn, "Eſq; Lond. 1661, "8vo. It is but "fair to obſerve, "that Naudeus's "book on this "ſubject, though a "good one, could "not but admit "and ſtand in "need of improve-"ments, almoſt "20 years after its "publication.

In

In all ages it has been an object of political attention, and ought to be ſo for ever in every civilized and wiſe nation, to promote uſeful learning, to cheriſh liberal arts, and facilitate the ſtudy by ſupplying the ſtudents of them, with ſuitable aſſiſtances of books, MSS. enticing materials, and every fitting encouragement. The kings of this world do really imitate the King of kings, and are truly his vicegerents on earth, when they are thus his miniſters for good to their people, and bleſs them by opening fountains of uſeful inſtruction, elegant enjoyment, or innocent amuſement. By the erection of Libraries and Muſeums in their dominions, they build permanent temples to their own glory, and ſecure to themſelves a ſort of honourable immortality, by furniſhing the means, and patroniſing the inſtruments of it.

Public libraries ſeem, indeed, to be as neceſſary as public walks; for "reading is to the "mind what exerciſe is to the body; as by the one health is preſerved, ſtrengthened, "and invigorated; by the other Virtue, which is the health of the mind, is kept alive, "cheriſhed and confirmed (*)." In an age when the expence of living is ſo increaſed and increaſing, that buying books is the firſt article of expence retrenched, that large libraries are got beyond the reach of moſt ſcholars, and even muſeums in miniature are become imprudent becauſe over-coſtly purſuits for individuals, the convenience and felicity of this public proviſion for mental improvement, and intellectual gratifications, are likely to become more and more ſenſibly felt, and to be more generally reſorted to by people of different ranks in life, for filling up with pleaſure and profit the accidental intervals of leiſure, in ways that may contribute to their delight in retirement, their ornament in company, and their ability in buſineſs. It would be lamentable indeed, and a ſubject of equal concern and reproach, if in a kingdom where no encouragement is withheld from leſs laudable ſchemes of paſtime and frivolous amuſement, an eſtabliſhment in favour of more manly, more rational, more elegant, and more uſeful employment ſhould be objected to on the ſcore of expence, or fail for want of ſupport.

(*) Addison.

Beſides what might be urged in recommendation of a Muſeum well furniſhed with coins, &c. &c. arranged with propriety for the illuſtration of hiſtory and ancient times, a judicious and well-aſſorted collection of animal, vegetable, and mineral objects, may truly and devoutly be conſidered as A Sanctuary of God, filled with numberleſs pleaſing and inſtructive evidences of his adorable goodneſs, wiſdom and power, properly furniſhed and ordered for free and general inſpection, to attract rational notice and ſerious examination, to excite, enliven, and confirm in the minds and hearts of all beholders, the moſt pious and ſalutary impreſſions of the Creator, Preſerver, and Governor of all. In this view it is unqueſtionably well worthy of national attention and expence, as being evidently a great good mean of adding many to the number, and much to the degrees of our pureſt enjoyments, of making good ſubjects, by making good men, and of extending the boundaries of ſcience in every way imaginable. The pious, the conſiderate, the curious, the idle, and the gay, as they reſort to it promiſcuouſly, may be benefited there, in an almoſt infinite variety of ways; and people of genius, by lucky and random-ſtrokes of ingenuity, may draw luminous ſparks from one thing and another, ſufficient to point out ways and means of applying them happily to purpoſes of uſe, conveniency, and ornament, and thereby to diſcover new methods of leſſening the evils, of alleviating the labours, and of multiplying or enlivening the pleaſures of human life.

As it is the profeſſed intention of this work to promote knowledge, and the love of it, as well as to celebrate merit in every way, there needs no apology for this, or any ſimilar digreſſion, in the courſe of this article. The preſent writer, well aware of the nature and ſcantineſs of any information that can now be given, or obtained, of Mr. Courten, would not have undertaken ſo barren a ſubject, but chiefly in conſideration of this ſcientific man's purſuits, and of his Muſeum, now the property of the public, which furniſhed collateral matter for a proper article in this work, and a fair occaſion of enlarging on parts of knowledge that have at times been ignorantly undervalued, and even invidiouſly treated, with a degree of abſurd rudeneſs and indignity, tending alike, in his opinion, to the diminution of the innocent and elegant amuſements of life, and to the general prejudice of uſeful ſcience.

It ſeems difficult to account for the twenty-five years, which Sir Hans Sloane ſays Mr. Courten ſpent abroad, without ſuppoſing that he reviſited Montpellier, and lived beyond ſea for a year or two, after his return to England in or about 1684. The laſt fourteen or fifteen years of his life he paſſed in chambers at the Temple, promoting the knowledge of Natural Hiſtory, and exhibiting his collection gratis, in an inſtructive manner, of which the reader may form ſome idea from what has been ſaid. Latterly the declining ſtate of his health obliged him to practiſe more abſtemiouſneſs than was agreeable to his convivial turn; and for ſeveral years he was under the neceſſity of abſtaining almoſt entirely from wine and all ſpirituous liquors, in which, from a companionable diſpoſition, and in compliance with a faſhion then much more prevalent than at preſent, it ſeems that he indulged at times, rather too freely. He died at Kenſington Gravel-Pits, on the 26th of March, 1702, aged ſixty-three, and was buried in the church-yard of that pariſh. The inſcription on his monument there, which ſhall be given at the concluſion of this article, cle, was compoſed by Sir Hans Sloane, who inherited by his will the bulk of his fortune. There is, moreover, in the Britiſh Muſeum, a paper written by this Baronet, which contains the following honourable teſtimony to Mr. Courten's character: "He was a man of the "greateſt integrity and benevolence, remarkably modeſt and inoffenſive, and a ſincere "believer in Chriſtianity."

The following paſſage in the life of Sir Hans Sloane, in the firſt edition of this work, gave riſe to this and the preceding article. It is certainly injurious to the memory of Mr. Courten, and contains an inſinuation or ſuggeſtion to the prejudice of his character, probably not intentional, which nothing, either in Sir Hans Sloane's laſt will, or in the Eloge quoted by the biographer, can juſtify. It is therefore neceſſary to take ſome notice of it here, to enable the future writer, or reviewer of Dr. Sloane's life, to ſtate it more unexceptionably, and in greater conſiſtency with accuracy and truth (b).

(b) Biog. Brit. vol. vi. part i. page 3702. Text Art. Sloane [Sir Hans.]

"Our Author's [Sir Hans Sloane's] thirſt for Natural Knowledge, ſeems to have been "born with him, ſo that his cabinet of rarities may be ſaid to have commenced with his "being. He was continually enriching and enlarging it; and the fame, which in a courſe "of years it had acquired, brought every thing that was curious in art or nature, to be "firſt offered to him for purchaſe. But theſe acquiſitions increaſed it but ſlowly, in "compariſon of the augmentation it received in 1701, by the death of William Courten, "Eſq; a Gentleman who had employed all his time, and the greateſt part of his fortune, "in collecting rarities, and who bequeathed his whole collection to Dr. Sloane, on condi- "tion that he ſhould pay certain legacies and debts with which he had charged it (c). Our "Author [Sir Hans Sloane] accepted the condition and performed the will of the Donor "punctually: on which account, there are ſome who do not ſcruple to ſay, he purchaſed (d) Ib. ELOGE. "Mr. Courten's curioſities at a dear rate (d)."

(c) Sir Hans Sloane's laſt will.

The article from which the preceding paſſage is quoted, was written, as the ſignature indicates, by Dr. Philip Nicholls, who ſeems to have known what he has not ſaid, though moſt probably true, that Dr. Sloane's Cabinet of Curioſities, notwithſtanding its commencement with his being, and all its enrichments, and all its enlargements, was ſtill comparatively inconſiderable, before the augmentation, as it is called, received in 1701 [he ſhould have ſaid in 1702] by the death of Mr. Courten. It appears moſt probable from Dr. Sloane's own teſtimony, that he collected principally, not long before this time, for Mr. Courten's muſeum, poſſibly with the hopes, and in the proſpect of benefit from the ſurvivorſhip, for he was eighteen years younger than his friend. It does not appear that the Doctor's own cabinet of curioſities had acquired the fame advantageous to it, as his biographer mentions, before 1702. That year, which was the firſt of its junction with Mr. Courten's Muſeum, was moſt probably the commencement of the æra of its celebrity.

It is left, and recommended to the future writer or reviewer of Dr. Sloane's life, to examine the laſt will and the eloge quoted by Dr. Nicholls, ut ſupra, the conſideration of which does not properly belong to this article; though it ſeems neceſſary to obſerve here, that whereas Dr. Sloane's biographer, in the fore-cited paſſage, would lead his reader to believe, that Mr. Courten died poor, and in debt, for the payment of which, his creditors were beholden to an exertion of Dr. Sloane's generoſity and friendſhip for the deceaſed, the real fact was certainly otherwiſe. Mr. Courten died rich, and contributed very conſiderably to the enrichment of Dr. Sloane, in appointing him, by his laſt will, his executor, with a legacy of 200*l.* for his trouble, and the benefit of being his reſiduary legatee. This appears to have been the truth of the caſe; and though the preſent writer has not ſeen Sir Hans Sloane's will, or his eloge, he is nevertheleſs confident that there can be nothing in them to diſprove it. The following ſhort account of an atteſted copy of Mr. Courten's will, extracted from the Regiſtry of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, is amply ſufficient to prove all this, and to ſhew that Dr. Sloane, inſtead of purchaſing Mr. Courten's Muſeum at a dear rate, acquired, at this Gentleman's death, a very conſiderable acceſſion to his fortune, though it is now impoſſible to aſcertain the value of it with preciſion. The authentic paper from which the account is given, this writer will depoſit in the Britiſh Muſeum, to throw ſome light on the ſtory of its original collector, and to be preſerved with the other vouchers for the truth of what has been advanced in the hiſtorical part of this and the preceding articles.

Mr. Courten's laſt will is dated March 10, 1701-2: of the three codicils annexed to it, the firſt is dated March 20, 1701-2; the ſecond is dated March 22, 1701-2; and the laſt bears the date of March 23, 1701-2, only three days before Mr. Courten's death; and the probate is dated April 4, 1702, in which Dr. Sloane is expreſsly prohibited, for whatever reaſon, from intermeddling with the goods, &c. of the Honourable Elizabeth, Counteſs Dowager of Exeter lately deceaſed, or with the eſtates of Mr. Courten's father, or grandfather.

1. Imprimis. "Mr. Courten appoints his after-named executor to ſell and diſpoſe of "what goods of any ſort, or other perſonal eſtate he ſhould leave behind him, to the beſt "advantage, in order to pay the debts and bequeſts mentioned in the ſequel of his will, "except ſuch particular things as he diſpoſes of otherwiſe by his will."

2. "Mr.

2. " Mr. Courten ſtates the whole amount of his debts, which he orders to be paid " with all convenient ſpeed, at the exact ſum of two hundred and forty-eight pounds, " ſix ſhillings and eight-pence ſterling, and no more."

3. Mr. Courten mentions a number of little legacies in ſmall ſums of money, ſome of which he revokes, augments, and alters variouſly, in the codicils annexed to his will. The ſum total of them ſhall be given in the ſequel, and the reader, if curious, is referred for farther particulars, to the will itſelf in the Britiſh Muſeum, to the ſignature, ſealing, and publication of which, Bernard Lintott the bookſeller, ſubſcribes his name as one of the three witneſſes (e).

(e) The names of the other two witneſſes are Thomas Bever and John Morgan.

4. The following are the expreſs words of Mr. Courten's will relative to Dr. Sloane: " The reſidue of my eſtate, above what will pay my debts and other legacies, I give to " my executor; and I do hereby appoint Doctor Hans Sloane, of the pariſh of St. Giles " in the Fields, to be the ſole executor of this my laſt will and teſtament."

5. The firſt codicil, dated ut ſupra, diſcovers that Mr. Courten was entitled, after the death of his aunt, Lady Knightley, to two mortgages, of which there is no mention made in his preceding will. The firſt mortgage, dated July 7, 1685, for the ſum of 1000*l.* the ſecond, dated Nov. 29, in the year preceding Mr. Courten's death, for 400*l.* Both theſe mortgages were ſecured to his aunt Dame Ann Knightley, who was to have the intereſt of both the aforeſaid ſums during her life, the preciſe date of which, at the time when this codicil was added, the reader may aſcertain by looking back to an atteſted certificate of her baptiſm given in the foregoing article.

6. The following bequeſt to Dr. Sloane is given in the expreſs words of the teſtator: " I do hereby will and deviſe to my executor two hundred pounds, in conſideration of " his great trouble."

7. In the ſame firſt codicil of the 20th of March 170$\frac{1}{2}$, Mr. Courten alters, in ſundry reſpects, his former will, augments generally the ſums of his legacies, and increaſes the number of his legatees, by the addition of Mr. John Gibbes of Mellington, Dr. Paul of Montpellier, and Dr. Sherwood. The ſignature, &c. of this codicil is atteſted by three different witneſſes (*).

(*) Theodore Rivett, John Cumberford, and George Scott.

8. What has been called the ſecond codicil, dated two days after the firſt, is only a memorandum annexed to the firſt codicil, and relative ſolely to Dr. Sloane; it is conceived in the following terms, and given here entire.

" Memorandum, That it is my intention and meaning, that the ſeveral ſums or legacies " given by this codicil" [meaning the preceding codicil, dated March 20,] " to my will, ſhould be " paid by my executor therein named, ſo ſoon as the two ſums of one thouſand pounds and " four hundred pounds mentioned in this codicil, wherein I have intereſt, ſhall be paid my " executor, and no ſooner. Dated the two and twentieth day of March, 170$\frac{1}{2}$. William " Courten. Signed, ſealed, and publiſhed by the teſtator, in the preſence of us who ſub- " ſcribed the ſame in his preſence. John Cumberford, Thomas Smith, John Chandler."

9. The third codicil relates likewiſe ſolely to Dr. Sloane, and is therefore given entire, and verbatim, from the authenticated copy, ut ſupra.

" Whereas I William Courten, of the Middle Temple, London, Eſq; have made my " laſt will and teſtament in writing, and have conſtituted and appointed Hans Sloane, " Doctor in Phyſick, ſole executor thereof, and have made a codicil thereto. Now I, the " ſaid William Courten, do hereby give and bequeath unto the ſaid Hans Sloane, his exe- " cutors and adminiſtrators, to his and their own uſe and benefit, all the reſt and reſidue " of my perſonal and teſtamentary eſtate whatſoever, after the payment of my debts, lega- " cies and funeral expences, and I deſire this may be added as a further codicil to my " ſaid will. In witneſs whereof I have hereunto ſet my hand and ſeal this three and " twentieth day of March, anno Domini 1701, William Courten. Signed, ſealed, pub- " liſhed, and delivered in the preſence of us, John Cumberford, Thomas Smith, John " Chandler."

Mr. Courten's bequeſts and debts, taken all together, amounted to no more than 2,020*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* ſterling. To pay this ſum, his executor had in money ſecured on two mortgages to Dame Ann Knightley, and payable at the death of that Lady then aged eighty-eight [GG], fourteen hundred pounds; and a legacy to himſelf [GG] Aged eighty-eight.] This Lady did not out-live her nephew a full year, for ſhe died on the fifth of Feb. 1702-3; the following account of her, extracted from a recent publication, contains ſome curious information, and comes very ſeaſonably to explain and confirm many parts of this article.

Ann, daughter of Sir William Courten, Knt. widow of Eſſex Devereux, Eſq; married for her ſecond huſband Richard Knightly, Eſq; of Fauſley in Northamptonſhire. Charles II. before his coronation, created Richard Knightley a Knight of the Bath, but Sir Richard did not long enjoy this honour, for he died June 29, 1661, and was buried in Fauſley Church. Sir Richard's firſt wife was a daughter of the celebrated John Hampden the patriot, by whom he had one ſon, Richard Knightley, who died unmarried at Paris aged 26; and one daughter, Elizabeth, who died when a child. By his ſecond wife Ann, daughter of Sir William Courten, Sir Richard had iſſue, 1. A ſon, named Eſſex Knightley, who was his heir, and married Sarah, daughter of T. Foley, Eſq; by whom he had a daughter named Sarah. He died in 1670 about the age of 22, and left this daughter Sarah, a rich heireſs, though ſhe did not inherit ſelf of 200*l.* more. Dr. Sloane therefore being ſole executor and reſiduary legatee, might, or might not ſell, juſt as he pleaſed, and not chuſing to part with any thing, he judged it moſt prudent to ſecure to himſelf entirely Mr. Courten's Muſeum, &c. by paying the expences of his friend's funeral, and a ſum of 420*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*

Now in point of time, thirty years before this, it has been ſaid in the courſe of the narrative, and it may be ſeen from the Collector's own account of only a very few particulars then purchaſed, that this price was not even one half of the ſum, which Mr. Courten had then expended in three years only, and during the very worſt ſtate of his affairs, when he had the ſmalleſt, indeed no certain income, and was involved in the greateſt expence and ſolicitude (f).

(f) Ut ſupra. MSS. Sloan. 3988. Plut. xxxi. c.

It ought likewiſe to be obſerved, that Mr. Courten, as appears from the MS. referred to, had not then even begun to collect coins, &c. His Muſeum at that time was in it's very infancy; the part of it, probably not inconſiderable in ſuch an opulent mercantile family, which it is not unreaſonable to ſuppoſe came to him as an heirloom, augmented no doubt by the contributions of his friends, and his own preceding unappretiated collections, was not included in the eſtimate here ſpoken of; and for more than thirty ſucceſſive years, it is ſaid, that "he employed all his time, and the greateſt part of his fortune," in enriching and enlarging it.

Theſe things being conſidered, it may be fairly concluded, that the author of the eloge, wrote not like an hiſtorian, but as a declaimer, and abſolutely at random, if he has ſaid any thing to induce Dr. Nicholls, or any body to think, that Sir Hans Sloane purchaſed Mr. Courten's Muſeum "at a dear rate."

Certainly it came to Dr. Sloane, as it did afterwards in its augmented ſtate to the public, very much under its original and real value. Sir Hans bears an honourable teſtimony to the ſingular modeſty of his friend; and conſidering the benevolent caſt of this ſcientific Gentleman's character, it is not improbable, that it was Mr. Courten's deſire, as well as Dr. Sloane's intereſt, that the Muſeum ſhould be kept entire, that it ſhould devolve at a great under-value to his friend and executor, and even that it might ultimately be ſettled according to its final deſtination, as the property of the public, at a price very much reduced.

It detracts nothing, certainly it is not meant to detract any thing, from the merit and patriotiſm of the great improver, and immediate donor of the Muſeum, to think that his bounty might originate in the generoſity, and grow out of the public kindneſs, and national friendſhip of its firſt Collector. It does not indeed clearly appear that this was actually the caſe, from any direct proof now viſible, or hitherto ſeen; but unqueſtionably Mr. Courten on his death-bed intimated deſires, and recommended things to his executor, not mentioned in the written will, which his worthy friend nevertheleſs obſerved as a will, and performed religiouſly.

The following epitaph contains one proof of this, which ſhall be given, with a reference to its proper place in the inſcription, as the concluſion of this article.

Juxta hic, ſub marmoreo tumulo,
Jacet Gulielmus COURTEN, cui Gulielmus pater, Gulielmus avus (g),
Mater Catherina, Johannis Comitis de Bridgewater filia,
Paternum vel ad Indos præclarum nomen.
Qui tantis haudquaquam degener parentibus,
Summa cum laude vitæ decurrit tramitem.
Gazarum per Europam indagator ſedulus,
Quas, hinc illinc ſibi partas, negavit nemini,
Sed cupientibus expoſuit humaniſſime,
Non avaræ mentis pabulum, ſed ingenii.
Si quid naturæ, ſi quid artis nobile opus,
Id quovis pretio ſuum eſſe voluit,
Ut Muſis lucidum conderet Sacrarium.
Aſt Morti hæc non ſunt curæ!
HIC Muſarum cultor tam eximius,
HIC tam inſignis viator,
Obiit, quievit, 7 Kl. Apr. A. D. 1702.
Vixit annos 62, menſes 11, dies 28.

(g) Gulielmuſque proavus.

inherit the eſtate of Fauſley, which went to his uncle Devereux Knightley, who died in 1681, and left it to a ſon of the name. Sarah the widow of Eſſex Knightley, married for her ſecond huſband, John Hampden, Eſq; grandſon to the patriot HAMPDEN. Sir Richard Knightley had likewiſe two daughters by Mr. Courten's aunt, 1. Elizabeth, who was married to Sir Edward Seabright, Bart. and 2. Jane, married to Sir Thomas Delves, Bart. In the book from which this intelligence is given, it is ſaid, that Lady Knightley, after being twice married, in the fortieth and ſecond year of her widowhood, died at the age of eighty-eight, but certainly ſhe had compleated her eighty-ninth year, for ſhe was baptized Jan. 17, 1614, as appears from the regiſter of her baptiſm given in the preceding article (35).

(35) NOBLE's "Memoirs of the Protectoral Houſe of Cromwell," vol. ii. p. 96, and 97. 2d. edit. Birmingham, 1787, 2 vols. 8vo.

Pompa,

Pompa, quam vivus fugit, ne mortuo fieret,
Teſtamento cavit [HH].
Sed hoc qualecunque Monumentum,
Et quam potuit immortalitatem
Bene merenti, mœrens dedit.
Hans Sloane, M. D.

[HH] Teſtamento cavit.] It ſeems probable, that Sir Hans had mentioned his intention of erecting a monument to Mr. Courten's memory, in Weſtminſter-Abbey; and that Mr. Courten, diſliking the propoſal, had expreſsly requeſted of his friend not to do it; for it is very certain there is no mention made of this in Mr. Courten's written will.

From what has been ſaid, it appears that Mr. Courten muſt have had no inconſiderable fortune, to enable him to live like a Gentleman, and to leave behind him beſides his Muſeum, a ſum in money, of 1,400 l. There were two papers, containing accurate ſtatements of Mr. Courten's accompts for two years, tranſcribed for publication, which went nigh to aſcertain with preciſion, both his annual income, and his ſiſter's livelihood. But as it is judged improper to ſwell this account by inſerting them, the reader can only be referred to the originals in the Britiſh Muſeum, MSS. Sloan. 3962: and to the ſame repoſitory and MS. the curious muſt go, it ſeems, for a ſight of the letters ſigned, P. SALWEY, and other vouchers intended to have formed the note [D] ſo often referred to, but nevertheleſs omitted in this article.]

C. N.

COURTNEY (WILLIAM), Archbiſhop of Canterbury in the reign of King Richard II. was the fourth ſon of Hugh Courtney, Earl of Devonſhire, by Margaret, daughter of Humphrey Bohun Earl of Hereford and Eſſex, by his wife Elizabeth, daughter of King Edward I (a). and was born in the year 1341 (b). He had his education at Oxford, where he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the Civil and Canon Law. Afterwards, entring into Holy Orders, he obtained three Prebends in three Cathedral Churches, viz. thoſe of Bath, Exeter, and York (c). The nobility of his birth, and his eminent learning, recommending him to public notice, in the reign of Edward III. he was promoted, in 1369, to the See of Hereford (d), and thence tranſlated to the See of London, September the 12th 1375, being then in the 34th year of his age (e). In a Synod, held at London in 1376, Biſhop Courtney diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his oppoſition to the King's demand of a ſubſidy [A]; and preſently after he fell under the diſpleaſure of the High Court of Chancery, for publiſhing a Bull of Pope Gregory II. without the King's conſent [B]. The next year, in obedience to the Pope's mandate, he cited Wickliff to appear before his tribunal in St. Paul's Church: but that hereſiarch being accompanied by John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaſter, and other nobles, who ſecretly favoured his opinions [C], the Biſhop

(a) Parnes's Life of King Ed. III. Cambr. 1688, p. 904.

(b) This appears from his age at the time of his promotion to the See of London.

(c) M. Parker, De Antiq. Eccleſ. Brit. Ed. S. Drake, Lond. 1729, fol. p. 398.

(d) Id. ib. & Godwin, De Præſul. Angl. inter Epiſc. Heref. an. 1369.

(e) Regiſtr. Sudbury.

[A] He oppoſed the King's demand of a ſubſidy.] He laid before the Synod a written account of ſome injuries offered to him, and William Wickham Biſhop of Wincheſter, and conjured the clergy not to grant the ſubſidy required, till ſatisfaction was made for them. The Synod hereupon being divided, the King could not obtain a ſubſidy, till he had given hopes of redreſs; which however he thought no more of after the breaking up of the Synod (1).

(1) M. Parker, De Antiq. Eccleſ. Brit. Ed. S. Drake, Lond. 1729, fol. p. 383; and Wharton, De Epiſc. &c. Lond. London, 1695, 8vo. p. 137.

[B] He publiſhed a Bull of Pope Gregory II. without the King's conſent.] The Affair was this: Pope Gregory II. had lately excommunicated the Florentines, and had diſpatched his Bulls every where, ordering their effects to be ſeized. The Biſhop of London, without conſulting the King, publiſhed the Pope's Bull at Paul's Croſs, and gave the populace licence to plunder the houſes of ſuch Florentines as were in the City. The Lord Mayor hereupon, reſtraining the violence of the people, clapped a ſeal on the doors of the Florentines, and conducted them to the King, who took them into his protection. Afterwards, by order of the King, the Biſhop of Exeter, Lord High Chancellor, ſummoned the Biſhop of London into the Court of Chancery, to anſwer for having dared to publiſh the Pope's Bull, without conſent of the King and Council, and contrary to the laws of the land. Courtney pleaded the Pope's authority and command. But the Chancellor gave ſentence, that he ſhould either forfeit his temporalities, or revoke his words with his own mouth. With ſome difficulty the Biſhop of London obtained, that he might re-call them by one of his officers; and accordingly an Official mounted Paul's Croſs, and addreſſed the people in theſe words: My Lord ſaid nothing about the Interdict: it is ſtrange you ſhould miſunderſtand, who hear ſo many ſermons from this place (2).

(2) Chronic. Eulogium dictum. apud Wharton, ubi ſupra, p. 138.

[C] The Duke of Lancaſter, and other Nobles, ſecretly favoured Wickliff's opinions.] This appeared openly by their behaviour upon this occaſion. The Duke of Lancaſter, the Lord Marſhal Percy, and others, countenanced Wickliff by their preſence in the Biſhop of London's Court. There was a vaſt concourſe of people about St. Paul's Church, ſo that the Lord Percy could not paſs through the crowd without difficulty. Courtney was alarmed at Wickliff's appearance in ſo extraordinary a manner: upon which there enſued the following dialogue between the Biſhop and the two Lords above-mentioned; which I ſhall ſet down in Fox's language (*).

(*) Acts and Monuments.

'Biſhop Courtney. Lord Percy, if I had known before hand what maſteries you wou'd have kept, I wou'd have ſtopt you out from coming hither.

'Duke of Lancaſter. He ſhall keep ſuch maſteries here, tho' you ſay nay.

'Lord Percy. Wickliff, ſit down, for you have many things to anſwer to, and therefore have need of a ſoft ſeat.

'Biſhop Courtney. It is unreaſonable that one cited before his Ordinary ſhould ſit down during his anſwer; he ſhall ſtand.

'Duke of Lancaſter. The Lord Percy's motion for Wickliff is but reaſonable. And as for you my Lord Biſhop, who are grown ſo proud and arrogant, I will bring down the pride, not of you only, but of all the prelacy in England. Thou beareſt thyſelf ſo; brag upon thy parents, which ſhall not be able to help thee; they ſhall have enough to do to help themſelves.

'Biſhop Courtney. My confidence is not in my parents, nor in any man elſe, but only in God in whom I truſt, by whoſe aſſiſtance I will be bold to ſpeak the truth.

'Duke of Lancaſter. Rather than take theſe words at the Biſhop's hands, I'll pluck him by the hair of the head out of the church.'

Theſe laſt words, though ſpoken ſoftly by the Duke to one next him, were over-heard by the Londoners, who, being enraged to ſee their Biſhop thus uſed, would have torn the Duke to pieces, had not Courtney interpoſed, and checked their fury. However they could not be reſtrained from marching directly to the Duke of Lancaſter's Palace in the Savoy, Biſhop proceeded no farther than to enjoin him and his followers ſilence (f). In 1378, it is pretended, that Courtney was made a Cardinal [D]. In 1381, he was appointed Lord High Chancellor of England (g). The ſame year, he was tranſlated to the See of Canterbury (h), in the room of Simon Sudbury [E]; and on the 6th of May 1382, he received the Pall from the hands of the Biſhop of London in the Archiepiſcopal Palace at Croydon. This year alſo he performed the ceremony of crowning Queen Anne, conſort of King Richard II. at Weſtminſter (i). Soon after his inauguration, he reſtrained, by eccleſiaſtical cenſures, the bailiffs, and other officers, of the See of Canterbury, from taking cognizance of adultery and the like crimes [F]. About the ſame time, he held a Synod at London, in which ſeveral of Wickliff's tenets were condemned as heretical and erroneous [G]. In 1383, he held a ſynod at Oxford, in which a ſubſidy was granted to the King [H]. The ſame year, in purſuance of the Pope's Bull directed to him for that purpoſe, he iſſued

(f) Walſingham, Hiſt. Angl. p. 192, apud Wharton, De Epiſc. &c. Lond. 1695, p. 139.

(g) Dugdale, Chr. Servient. p. 52.

(h) Regiſtr. Courtney.

(i) Harpsfield, Hiſt. Eccl. Angl. Duaci, 1622, p. 536.

which they plundered, and were preparing to ſet fire to it; when the Biſhop, leaving his dinner, haſtened to the Savoy, and, by his preſence and intreaties, quieted the tumult, and ſaved the Duke's houſe (3). And here we cannot but take notice of the generous and Chriſtian temper of the Biſhop of London, in appearing thus heartily in behalf of the Duke of Lancaſter, after he had been ſo lately outraged by him. Nor is the zeal of the Londoners, and their affection for their Biſhop ſhewn on this occaſion, leſs remarkable.

(3) Harpsfield, Hiſtor. Wickleff. in calc. Hiſt. Eccl. Angl. Duaci. 1622, p. 683; & Walſing. Hiſt. Angl. p. 191, 192, Apud Wharton, ubi ſupra, p. 138, 139.

[D] It is pretended, that he was created a Cardinal.] This is Biſhop Godwin's opinion, which he founds upon the hiſtorian Thomas Walſingham, who writes, that the Biſhop of London was one of thoſe, whom Urban VI. promoted to the Cardinalate in 1378. Ciaconius alſo and Onuphrius affirm, that a Biſhop of London was, about that time, created a Cardinal; but his name, they tell us, was Adam. Now it is not to be doubted, that one Adam Eſton, an Engliſhman, was honoured with the red hat; but Bale (*), and other authors, tell us, it was by Gregory II. If therefore a Biſhop of London was made a Cardinal by Urban VI. in 1378, it muſt be Courtney (4). You ſee Biſhop Godwin's argument: upon which M. Aubery (5) makes the following remark. 'Godwin, a modern 'author, will have it, that Adam Eſton was one of the 'creatures of Pope Gregory II. Urban's predeceſſor, 'and as one abſurdity is uſually followed by another; 'this writer, by his own authority, creates a new Cardinal, whom he calls William Courtney Biſhop of 'London, becauſe Thomas Walſingham writes, that 'the Biſhop of London was one of thoſe, whom Urban VI. promoted to the Cardinalate in 1378. It 'muſt certainly be acknowledged, that Godwin does 'not deal fairly in this matter; ſince, for fear of being obliged to recognize Adam Eſton for Biſhop of 'London, he has ſet down but half his epitaph (†), 'and has purpoſely omitted the other part, by which 'the reader might have been informed, that our Cardinal was actually Biſhop of London. It muſt however be obſerved, that S. Contelorio writes, that 'William Courtney, being nominated to the Cardinalate in 1378, would never conſent to his promotion. 'But the Engliſh writers will not agree, that there 'were two Biſhops of London created Cardinals ſucceſſively by the ſame Pope Urban VI. So that, 'probably, either Adam Eſton was not Biſhop of London, which I cannot aſſent to, ſince his epitaph, 'reported by creditable authors, proves the contrary; 'or William Courtney was not created a Cardinal.' I ſhall only obſerve here, that neither is Cardinal Eſton acknowledged for Biſhop of London by our own writers, nor Biſhop Courtney for a Cardinal by foreigners.

(*) De Script. Brit. Centur. 7. n. 15.

(4) Godwin, de Præſul. Angl. inter Epiſc. Londinenſ. ann. 1375.

(5) Hiſtoire General des Cardinaux. Paris 1642, 4*to.* tom. i. p. 624, 625.

(†) In his Cardinalium Catalogus, &c. n. 31.

[E] He ſucceeded Simon Sudbury in the See of Canterbury.] He was elected by the Monks of Canterbury, July the 30th, 1380 (6), and confirmed by the Pope's Bull of September the 9th, 1381, which was publiſhed January the 9th, 1382 (7). Having received the Temporalities, and done homage to the King, he repaired to Lambeth; and on the 12th, a Monk of Canterbury came thither, being ſent by the Prior and Convent with the archiepiſcopal croſs: which he delivered to the Archbiſhop, ſitting in his chapel, with theſe words: 'Reverend father, I am the meſſenger of the ſupreme 'King, who intreats, commands, and enjoins, that 'you take upon you the government of his Church, 'and that you love and protect it: In token of which 'meſſage, I deliver into your hand the banner of the 'ſupreme King.' Pater Reverende, nuncius ſum ſummi regis, qui te rogat, mandat, & præcipit ut eccleſiam ſuam regendam ſuſcipias, eamque diligas & protegas: In cujus ſignum nuncii, ſummi regis vexillum tibi trado ferendum (8). The Archbiſhop, not having yet received the Pall, was doubtful whether the Croſs might be carried, as uſual, before him, and whether he had a right to crown the new Queen. But theſe ſcruples were eaſily removed by the Monks of Canterbury, who brought precedents for both. Nevertheleſs, the Archbiſhop, though, upon the authority of the Monks, he ſuffered the Croſs to be carried before him, yet cautiouſly entered a Proteſt, that he did not do it in contempt of the Court of Rome. Archiepiſcopus autem, accepta a monacho cruce, dubitationem ipſe hanc injecit: An Crucem ante ſe perferri liceat, antequam a Papa pallium accepiſſet. Ex eaque quæſtione alia dubitatio nata eſt. Regis Bohemiæ ſoror regi Angliæ Richardo Secundo nuptura in Angliam hoc tempore venit. Has regias nuptias Cantuarienſis Archiepiſcopus jure, ut diximus, metropolitico celebrare, & reginam coronare debuit. De quo non minus ante acceptum pallium, quam de cruce gerenda, dubitavit. Qui tam perplexus dubitationis ſcrupulus non à Juriſconſultis & Cauſidicis, ſed à Monachis Cantuarienſibus, qui actus crebros & frequentes rerum ſimiliter ſine pallio geſtarum proferebant, & Cantuarienſis Eccleſiæ conſuetudinem allegabant, facile ſublatus eſt. Et tamen archiepiſcopus, etſi ex monachorum aſſertione, geſta ante ſe cruce, inceſſit, Proteſtationem cautè interpoſuit: Non ſe id in Romanæ Curiæ contemptum facere (9).

(6) Regiſtr. Eccl. Cantuar.

(7) Regiſtr. Courtney.

(8) Verba Archiep. apud M. Parker, ubi ſupra, p. 398.

(9) M. Parker, ibid.

[F] He reſtrained the officers of the See of Canterbury from taking cognizance of adultery, and the like crimes.] He extended his cenſures to others, who were guilty of the like offence: for, about two years after, we are told (10), he excommunicated one Richard Iſmonger, a Kentiſh-man, for pretending to puniſh crimes, cognizable only in the eccleſiaſtical courts, by meer lay authority. Who, or in what office, this perſon was, we are not told: but, it ſeems, he could not obtain abſolution, but by ſubmitting to be beaten with a cudgel, naked, three ſucceſſive market-days, in the open market-place of Weſt-Malling; to have the ſame puniſhment repeated in the market-places of Maidſtone and Canterbury; and, at the latter place, to enter naked into the Cathedral Church, and offer a wax taper of five pounds weight at the ſhrine of Thomas Becket.

(10) Id. ib. 400.

[G] He held a ſynod, in which Wickliff's tenets were condemned as heretical and erroneous.] A more particular account of this ſynod will be found in the article WICKLIFF. Robert Rigge, Chancellor of the Univerſity of Oxford, and Thomas Brightwell, Doctor in Divinity, being ſuſpected of favouring Wickliff's doctrines, appeared before this ſynod, and were obliged to diſclaim thoſe tenets, and ſubſcribe to the contrary. Nicholas Hereford and Philip Repindon, Doctors in Divinity, and John Aſheton, Maſter of Arts, were accuſed in the ſame ſynod of hereſy, and, refuſing to purge themſelves, were excommunicated. The King, in ſupport of this eccleſiaſtical ſeverity, directed his letters to the Archbiſhop and his ſuffragans, impowering them to ſeize and impriſon all perſons ſuſpected of the aforeſaid hereſy (11).

(11) Id. ib. 399.

[H] A ſynod at Oxford, in which a ſubſidy was granted to the King.] It was held in St. Fridiſwide's monaſtery. Archbiſhop Courtney officiated at divine ſervice, issued his mandate to the Bishop of London for celebrating the festival of St. Anne, mother of the blessed Virgin (k). In 1384, he had a contest with the Earl of Arundel, some of whose servants had robbed one of his fish-ponds [I]. In 1386, the King, by the advice of his Parliament, put the administration of the government into the hands of eleven Commissioners [K], of whom Archbishop Courtney was the first (l). In 1387, he held a synod at London, in which a tenth was granted to the King (m). The same year, it being moved in a Parliament, held at London on occasion of the dissension between the King and his nobles, to inflict capital punishment on some of the ringleaders, and it being prohibited by the Canons for Bishops to be present and vote in cases of blood, the Archbishop and his suffragans withdrew from the House of Lords (n), having first entered a Protest in relation to their Peerage [L]. In 1399, he held a synod in St. Mary's Church in Cambridge, in which a tenth was granted to the King [M], on condition that he should pass over into France with an army before the first of October following (o). This year, Archbishop Courtney set out upon his metropolitical visitation, in which he was at first strongly opposed by the Bishops of Exeter and Salisbury [N]: but those prelates being (k) Spelman's Councils, vol. ii. p. 636.

(l) H. de Knyghton, De Eventib. Angliæ, l. v. ap. X. Scriptor. col. 2685.

(m) M. Parker, ubi supra, p. 401.

(n) Regist. Courtney, f. 174, & Walsingham, Hist. Angl. apud M. Parker, ubi supra.

(o) Walsingh. ib. ap. M. Parker, ibid. p. 402.

service, and the sermon was preached by the Chancellor Dr. Rigge. After the affair of the subsidy was over, the Bishops proceeded to enquire after persons suspected of heresy: upon which occasion, Nicholas Hereford, Philip Repindon, and John Asheton, excommunicated in the last synod, recanted their opinions, and were absolved. And, to secure the University from latitude in opinion, all the Graduates were obliged to swear a renuntiation of Wickliff's tenets condemned at London (12).

(12) Wood, Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. p. 193; & M. Parker, ib.

[I] The Earl of Arundel's servants had robbed one of the Archbishop's fish-ponds.] It was at his manor of South-Malling in the Diocese of Chichester. The Earl's servants had dragged the pond, and cleared it of all the fish. The Archbishop, in a great rage, ordered the Bishop of Chichester to excommunicate the robbers, whom he styled sacrilegious persons, and violaters of the Church of Canterbury. The Earl hereupon applied to the King, desiring his Majesty to take cognizance of the affair, that he might not incur the sentence of excommunication. The King complying with the Earl's request, the Archbishop wrote to the Bishop of Chichester, to revoke the excommunication. And thus the affair dropped. Archiepiscopus, qui in Wickliffianos ante vehementissimus erat, jam in Arundeliæ comitem magnam controversiam instituit. Hujus servuli piscinam in archiepiscopi manerio de Southmalling Cicestrensis dioecesis sublatis piscibus evacuaverunt. Quo facto archiepiscopus in magnam actus sævitiam Cicestrensi Episcopo mandavit, ut piscinæ suæ prædones, quos sacrilegos & Cantuarienſis ecclesiæ violatores nominavit, excommunicatione feriret. Comes autem Regem adiit, petiitque, ut de ea controversia, ne excommunicationem incurrat, in sua præsentia transigatur. Atque Archiepiscopus, postquam Rex hujus controversiæ cognitionem suscepisset, ad Ciceſtrensem Episcopum scripsit, ut latas excommunicationes revocaret (13).

(13) M. Parker, ib. p. 400, 401.

[K] The King put the administration of the Government into the hands of eleven Commissioners.] Namely, William Archbishop of Canterbury, Alexander Archbishop of York, Edmund Duke of York, Thomas Duke of Gloucester, William Bishop of Winchester, Thomas Bishop of Exeter, Nicholas Abbot of Waltham, Richard Earl of Arundel, John Lord Cobham, Richard Le Scroop, and John Devereux. This committee was authorized to receive the public revenues, to inspect the King's household and Courts, in short to direct the government, and make what reformations in the kingdom they thought fit. But their commission expired at the end of one year (14). Henry de Knyghton adds three more commissioners to the foregoing, viz. the Bishop of Ely Chancellor, the Bishop of Hereford Treasurer, and John de Waltham Privy-Seal, making the whole number fourteen (15).

(14) Rot. Parl. 10 Rich. II.

(15) De Eventib. Angliæ, l. v. ap. X. Scriptor. col. 2685.

[L] The Bishops entered a protest in relation to their Peerage.] The purport of it is to set forth, that the Lords Spiritual, by virtue of their Baronies, and as Peers of the Realm, had a right to sit, vote, and give judgment with the rest of the Peers, in all cases and matters transacted in Parliament. But since Impeachments of High Treason, and Tryals for Life, were coming on, and they were forbidden by the Canons of the Church to concern themselves in matters of that nature, they protested, that, for this only reason they were obliged to withdraw. And thus having guarded the entireness of their Peerage, they concluded with declaring, that nothing done in their absence upon this occasion should be hereafter questioned or opposed by any of their body. This instrument, at the instance and petition of the Archbishop and his suffragans, was read in full Parliament, and entered upon the Parliament Rolls, by the King's command, with the assent of the Lords Temporal and the Commons (16).

(16) Regist. Courtney, fol. 174. Rot. Parl. 11 Rich. II. n. 9. See also M. Parker, ubi supra, p. 401.

[M] A tenth was granted to the King.] Speed has particularly dilated upon the circumstances of this grant, which we shall represent in that historian's own words. 'The Laitie, at the Parliament now holden 'at London, had yeelded to ayde the King with a 'Fifteenth, upon condition that the Clergie should succour him with a Tenth and an Halfe: against which 'unjust proportion William de Courtney, Archbishop of 'Canterbury, most stiffly opposed, alledging, that the 'Church ought to be free, nor in any wise to be taxed 'by the Laitie, and that himself would rather die then 'endure that the Church of England (the liberties 'whereof had by so many free Parliaments, in all times, 'and not only in the raigne of this king, beene confirmed) 'should be made a bond-maide. This answere so offended the Commons, that the Knights of the Shires, 'and some Peers of the land, with extreme fury besought, That Temporalities might be taken away from 'ecclesiastical persons, saying, that it was an Almesdeed, 'and an Act of Charitie, so to do, thereby to humble 'them. Neither did they doubt, but that their petition, which they had exhibited to the King, would 'take effect. Hereupon they designed among themselves, out of which Abbey, which should receive 'such a certaine summe, and out of which, another. 'I myself (saith a (*) Monk of St. Albans) heard one of 'those Knights confidently sweare, that he would have 'a yearly pension of a thousand Markes out of the 'Temporalities belonging to that Abbey. But the 'King, having heard both parts, commanded the Petitioners to silence, and the Petition to be razed out, 'saying, He would maintaine the English Church in the 'qualitie of the same state or better, in which himselfe 'had known it to be, when hee came to the crowne, 'The Archbishop hereupon, having consulted with 'the Clergie, came to the King, and declared, that 'he and the Clergie had with one consent willingly 'provided to supply his Majesties occasions with a 'Tenth. This Grant the King tooke so contentedly, 'as he openly affirmed he was better pleased with this 'free contribution of one Tenth for the present, than 'if he had gotten foure by compulsion (17).' We have much the same account, but more briefly delivered by the author of the Antiquities, &c. (18) in the following words: In superiori autem Parliamento, cum Laici Subsidium sub hac conditione regi concessissent, si Clerus Decimam concederet; Archiepiscopus cum suis Suffraganeis valde iniquum et pessimi exempli asserebant, Cleri in regem donationes, quæ spontaneæ gratuitæque esse debent, à Laicis tam strictis modis et conditionibus alligari: proinde se de quacunque cleri concessione in Synodo non acturos, nisi illa laicorum conditione deleta. Itaque Rex, qui eo die interfuit, expungi laicorum conditionem jussit; quod mox publice in Parliamento factum est.

(*) Tho. Walsingham.

(17) Speed's Hist. of Gt. Britaine, &c. Lond. 1632, fol. p. 726.

(18) M. Parker, ubi supra, p. 402.

[N] He was opposed by the Bishops of Exeter and Salisbury.] The Bishop of Exeter (*) issued his mandate, forbidding all persons in his diocese, under pain of excom-

(*) Tho. Brentingham, late Lord Treasurer.

being at laſt reduced to terms of ſubmiſſion, he proceeded in his viſitation without farther oppoſition: only, at the interceſſion of the Abbot of St. Alban's, he refrained from viſiting certain Monaſteries at Oxford (p). The ſame year, the King directed his Royal Mandate to the Archbiſhop, not to countenance or contribute any thing towards a ſubſidy for the Pope [O]. In a Parliament held at Wincheſter 1392, Archbiſhop Courtney, being probably ſuſpected of abetting the papal encroachments upon the Church and State, delivered in an anſwer to certain Articles exhibited by the Commons in relation to thoſe encroachments [P]. The ſame year, he viſited the dioceſe of Lincoln, in which, by his vigilance communication, to acknowledge the Archbiſhop's juriſdiction. Courtney iſſued a mandate in oppoſition thereto, requiring their ſubmiſſion to his authority. The Biſhop appealed to the Pope, and fixed up his Appeal upon the gates of his Cathedral. The Archbiſhop notwithſtanding proceeded in his Viſitation, and cited the Biſhop to appear before him, and anſwer to certain articles exhibited againſt him. The Citation was diſpatched by one of the Archbiſhop's Officers named Peter Hill; who being met by ſome of the Biſhop of Exeter's ſervants in the town of Topſham, they, diſcovering his buſineſs, not only beat him moſt unmercifully, but obliged the poor fellow to chew, and ſwallow down the Inſtrument, which was of parchment, wax and all. The King, being informed of this violence, ſent an order to the Earl of Devonſhire, and others, to apprehend the Biſhop's ſervants, and bring them before the Archbiſhop; which being done, Courtney enjoined them the following penance. They were to walk in proceſſion before the Croſs, in their ſhirts only, and carrying lighted tapers in their hands; to pay a certain ſtipend to a Prieſt for ſaying daily Maſs at the tomb of the Earl of Devonſhire; and laſtly to pay twenty ſhillings each towards repairing the walls of the city of Exeter. The Biſhop in the mean time proſecuted his appeal in the Court of Rome; but finding the Archbiſhop's credit prevail there, and that the King likewiſe eſpouſed his cauſe, he thought it the moſt prudent courſe to withdraw his appeal, and to acknowledge both his own offence and the Archbiſhop's juriſdiction (19). The Biſhop of Saliſbury (†), when it came to his turn to be viſited, made no leſs reſiſtance, but proceeded, as he thought, with more prudence and caution, than the Biſhop of Exeter had done. For being of opinion, that the Archbiſhop's viſitatorial power was founded ſolely upon the authority of Pope Urban, who was now dead, he found means to procure from Pope Boniface, his ſucceſſor, an exemption of himſelf and his dioceſe from metropolitical viſitation in virtue of Pope Urban's authority. With this privilege he waited on the Archbiſhop at Croydon, but met with an unexpected reception from that Prelate, who declared he would viſit the dioceſe of Saliſbury, notwithſtanding any papal exemption, and commanded the Biſhop to be ready to receive him on a certain day in his Cathedral Church. The Biſhop, depending on his privilege, took no notice of this order, and, the Archbiſhop beginning his viſitation, appealed to the Pope. The Archbiſhop immediately excommunicated him, and commenced a proſecution at Law againſt him, for endeavouring to withdraw himſelf from the ſubjection he owed to the See of Canterbury. The Biſhop of Saliſbury, terrified by this ſeverity, and the recent example of his brother of Exeter, renounced his appeal, acknowledged the Archbiſhop's juriſdiction, and, through the interceſſion of the Earl of Saliſbury, and others, obtained Abſolution and Reconciliation (20).

(p) Regiſtr. Courtney, fol. 86; & Walſ. ib. ap. M. Parker, ib. p. 404.

(19) Regiſtr. Courtney, fol. 86; & M. Parker, ib. p. 402, 403.

(†) Jo. Waltham

(20) Ibid.

[O] The King commanded him not to countenance, or contribute any thing towards a ſubſidy for the Pope.] The writ ſets forth, 'that the Archbiſhop could not 'be ignorant, that the King was bound by oath to 'maintain the rights and cuſtoms of the kingdom, to 'govern impartially by the Laws, to ſecure the property of the ſubject, and to prevent impoſitions being charged or levied upon the people without the 'common conſent of the kingdom.' The King ſuggeſts farther, 'that the Commons, lately aſſembled in 'Parliament at Weſtminſter, had addreſſed him for a 'remedy againſt the Impoſitions upon the Clergy, at 'that time exacted by the Court of Rome; and had 'petitioned him, that if any perſon ſhould bring in 'any Papal Bulls for levying ſuch impoſitions, or 'ſhould actually collect or levy ſuch impoſitions, he 'ſhould be adjudged, and ſuffer, as a traytor to him 'and his kingdom.' His Highneſs adds, 'that he 'had granted, with the conſent of the ſame Parliament, that nothing ſhould be levied or paid, that 'might tend to the burthen or damage of the ſubject 'and kingdom: That notwithſtanding this legal 'proviſion, he was informed of a new Papal Impoſition upon the Clergy, which by his (the Archbiſhop) 'authority, or that of his Suffragans by his order, 'was to be levied without the common advice and 'aſſent of the kingdom; which he (the King) could 'not ſuffer conſiſtently with his oath.' And therefore in the cloſe he commands the Archbiſhop, 'upon 'his allegiance, and under the higheſt forfeitures, to 'revoke his orders for the levying this tax, and to 'return what had been already paid,' enjoining him 'not to pay, or contribute any thing to this ſubſidy, under the penalties aforeſaid.' Witneſs the King at Weſtminſter, the 10th day of October (21). Writs of the ſame purport and date were directed to the Archbiſhop of York, to all the Biſhops of both Provinces, to the Guardians of the Spiritualities, and to the ſeveral Collectors of this Tax. A like Writ was directed to the Pope's Nuntio, commanding him to deſiſt from exacting this ſubſidy, ſub forisfactura vitæ et membrorum, under forfeiture of life and limb. This impoſition was the payment of a Tenth laid upon the Clergy by the Pope, as appears by the title of the record, Decimis Papæ non ſolvendis.

(21) Ret. Clauſ. 13 Ric. II. P. 1. M. 17. De Decimis Papæ non ſolvendis.

[P] He delivered in an anſwer to certain Articles exhibited by the Commons, &c.] The tenor of it was as follows. 'To our Dread Sovereign Lord the King 'in this preſent Parliament, his humble Chaplain, 'William Archbiſhop of Canterbury, gives in his Anſwer to the Petition brought into the Parliament by 'the Commons of the Realm, in which Petition are 'contained certain Articles: That is to ſay, Firſt, 'Whereas our Sovereign Lord the King, and all his 'Liege Subjects, ought of right, and had been always 'accuſtomed to ſue in the King's Court, to recover their 'preſentations to churches, to maintain their titles to 'prebendaries, and other benefices of Holy Church, to 'which they have a right to preſent: The cognizance 'of which plea belongs ſolely to the Court of our Sovereign Lord the King by virtue of his antient prerogative, maintained and practiſed in the reigns of 'all his predeceſſors Kings of England; and when 'judgment is given in his Highneſs's ſaid court upon any 'ſuch plea, the Archbiſhops, biſhops, and other ſpiritual perſons, who have the right of giving Inſtitution to ſuch benefices within their juriſdiction, are 'bound to execute ſuch judgments, and uſed always to 'make execution of them at the King's command (ſince 'no lay perſon can make any ſuch execution), and are 'alſo bound to make execution of many other commands 'of our Lord the King: Of which right the Crown of 'England has been all along peaceably poſſeſſed: Notwithſtanding, of late, divers proceſſes have been 'made by the Holy Father the Pope, and Excommunications publiſhed againſt ſeveral Engliſh Biſhops, for 'making ſuch executions, and acting in purſuance to 'the King's commands in the caſes above-mentioned; 'and ſuch cenſures of his Holineſs are inflicted in open 'diſheriſon of the Crown, and ſubverſion of the Prerogative Royal, of the King's Laws, and his whole 'Realm, unleſs prevented by proper remedies.' To this article, the Archbiſhop, premiſing his Proteſtation, 'that it was not his intention to affirm, that our holy 'father the Pope has no authority to excommunicate a 'Biſhop, purſuant to the Laws of Holy Church, declares vigilance and activity, he gave a conſiderable check to the growth of Wickliff's doctrines (q). In 1395, he obtained from the Pope a grant of four-pence in the pound on all eccleſiaſtical benefices; in which he was oppoſed by the Biſhop of Lincoln, who would not ſuffer it to be collected in his dioceſe, and appealed to the Pope (r). But, before the matter could be decided, Archbiſhop Courtney died, July the 31ſt 1396, at Maidſtone in Kent, and was buried in the Cathedral Church of Canterbury [Q], under a monument of alabaſter, on the South ſide, near the tomb of Thomas Becket, and at the feet of the Black Prince; the King, who was then going to marry the King of France's daughter, being preſent, with ſeveral of his nobles, at the funeral ſolemnity (s). This Prelate founded a College of Secular Prieſts at Maidſtone. He left a thouſand marks for the repair of the Cathedral Church of Canterbury; alſo to the ſame Church a ſilver-gilt image of the Trinity, with ſix Apoſtles ſtanding round it weighing 160 pounds; ſome books [R], and ſome eccleſiaſtical veſtments (t). He obtained from King Richard a grant

(q) Knyghton, ubi ſupra, col. 2736, 2737.

(r) Walſ. ib. ap. M. Parker, ibid. p. 405.

(s) Chronic. W. Thorn, apud X. Scriptores, col. 2197, 2198. See alſo Dart's Hiſt. and Antiq. of the Cath. Ch. of Cant. Lond. 1726, p. 157.

(t) Dies Obitual. Archiep. Cant. apud Wharton, Anglia Sacra, vol. i. p. 61.

'clares and anſwers, that if any executions of proceſſes 'are made, or ſhall be made, by any perſon; if any 'cenſures of excommunication ſhall be publiſhed and 'ſerved upon any Engliſh Biſhops, or any other of the 'King's ſubjects, for their having made execution of 'any ſuch commands, he maintains ſuch cenſures to be 'prejudicial to the King's prerogative, as is ſet forth 'in the Commons Petition: And that ſo far forth he is 'reſolved to ſtand with our Lord the King, and ſup-'port his Crown, in the matters above-mentioned, to 'the utmoſt of his power. And whereas it is alledged 'in the Petition, That complaint has been made, that 'the ſaid Holy Father the Pope had deſigned to tranſlate 'ſome Engliſh Prelates to Sees out of the Realm, and 'ſome from one Biſhoprick to another, without the know-'ledge and conſent of our Lord the King, and without 'the aſſent of the Prelates ſo tranſlated (which Pre-'lates are very ſerviceable and neceſſary to our Lord the 'King, and his whole Realm;) which tranſlations if 'they ſhould be ſuffered, the ſtatutes of the Realm would 'be defeated, and made in a great meaſure inſignificant, 'and the ſaid Lieges of his Highneſs's Council would be 'removed out of his kingdoms, without their aſſent, 'and againſt their inclination, and the treaſure of 'the ſaid Realm would be exported: By which means 'the country would become deſtitute both of wealth and 'counſel, to the utter deſtruction of the ſaid Realm: 'And thus the Crown of England, which has always 'been ſo free and independent, as not to have any earthly 'ſovereign, but to be immediately ſubject to God in all 'things touching the Prerogatives and Royalty of the 'ſaid Crown, would be made ſubject to the Pope, and 'the Laws and Statutes of the Realm defeated and ſet 'aſide by him at pleaſure, to the utter deſtruction of the 'Sovereignty of our Lord the King, his Crown and 'Royalty, and his whole kingdom, which God forbid. 'The ſaid Archbiſhop, firſt proteſting, that 'tis not 'his intention to affirm, that our Holy Father afore-'ſaid cannot make tranſlations of Prelates according 'to the Laws of Holy Church, anſwers and declares, 'that if any Engliſh Prelates, who by their capacity 'and qualifications were very ſerviceable and neceſ-'ſary to our Lord the King, and his Realm, ſhould 'be tranſlated to any Sees in foreign dominions, or 'the ſage Lieges of his Council were forced out of 'the kingdom againſt their will, and that by this 'means the wealth and treaſure of the kingdom ſhould 'be exported; that ſuch tranſlations are prejudicial to 'the King and his Crown, and that if any ſuch thing 'ſhould happen, he reſolves to adhere loyally to the 'King, and endeavour, as he is bound by his allegi-'ance, to ſupport his Highneſs in this, and all other 'inſtances, in which the rights of his Crown were 'concerned.' He concluded with praying, that this Declaration might be entered in the Parliament Rolls; which was granted (22). This Declaration of Archbiſhop Courtney's ſeems to have led the way to the famous Statute of Præmunire paſſed in this Parliament; and it is evident from hence, that this Prelate was no vaſſal to the Court of Rome, nor aſſerted the Pope's Supremacy ſo far as to weaken his allegiance, or to make him an ill ſubject.

(22) Rot. Parl. 16 Ric. II. N. 20. Cotton's Abridgment, p. 348.

[Q] He was buried in the Cathedral Church of Canterbury.] It appears by a codicil annexed to his will, extant in the Archieves of the Church of Canterbury, that, upon his death-bed, not thinking himſelf worthy to lie in his own Metropolitan, or in any other Cathedral or Collegiate Church, he choſe, and deſired, to be buried in the Church-yard of Maidſtone-College, in the place deſigned for his Eſquire John Butler. Languens in extremis in interiori camera Manerii de Maydenſton, voluit & ordinavit, quod quia non reputavit ſe dignum, ut dixit, in ſua Metropolitana, aut aliqua Cathedrali aut Collegiata Eccleſia ſepeliri, voluit & elegit ſepulturam ſuam in Cœmeterio Eccleſiæ Collegiatæ de Maydenſton, in loco deſignato Johanni Botelere Armigero ſuo (23). But moſt certain it is, Dart tells us (24), that, notwithſtanding this humble thought of his, in his lowneſs of ſpirits, King Richard, being at Canterbury, when he was to be buried, overruled his Will, and ordered him to be interred in that Cathedral.

(23) Verba Archiv. Apud Wharton, Angl. Sacra, vol. i. p. 121.

(24) Hiſt. and Antiq. of the Cath. Ch. of Cant. Lond. 1726. p. 157.

[R] — ſome books.] Theſe were: St. Auguſtin's Milleloquium, A Dictionary in three volumes, and Doctor de Lira in two volumes. His nephew Richard Courtney was to have the uſe of them during his life, and his executors to return them after his death, under a penalty of three hundred pounds; for which they gave a bond. My author calls them, ſex libros precioſos, ſix valuable books (25). B.

(25) Dies Obit. Archiep. Cantua. apud Wharton, ubi ſupra, p. 62.

 [Our learned Predeceſſor has touched the character of Archbiſhop Courtney with a very gentle hand. Wickliff, without any qualifying or ſoftening word, is called an hereſiarch, which is uſually a term of reproach; and the Archbiſhop's conduct towards that eminent reformer is not related in the language of diſapprobation. It is only recorded, that ſeveral of Wickliff's tenets were condemned as heretical and erroneous; and that a conſiderable check was given to the growth of his doctrines, by the vigilance and activity of Courtney. Such lenity of expreſſion was ſcarcely becoming a Proteſtant Divine. In fact, Biſhop Courtney was attached to the See of Rome beyond the duty of a ſubject, and he was, at the ſame time, a bitter perſecutor. There is ſufficient evidence of the former from many circumſtances mentioned in his article, and eſpecially from his behaviour in regard to the Florentines. His publiſhing the Pope's Bull at Paul's Croſs, without conſulting the King, and his giving the populace licence to plunder the houſes of the Florentines who had been excommunicated by that Bull, were acts of great diſloyalty and inſolence. His character as a perſecutor would have been equally apparent, if his treatment of Wickliff had been properly related. This character he uniformly maintained, both when Biſhop of London and Archbiſhop of Canterbury, as may be ſeen in the life of Wickliff, written by Mr. Gilpin, to whom the world is ſo much indebted for ſeveral Biographical pieces, and other very elegant publications. One circumſtance, which diſplays the ſtrength and firmneſs of Courtney's mind in the exerciſe of his religious bigotry, deſerves to be noticed. When the Archbiſhop, on a certain day, with a number of Biſhops and Divines, had aſſembled to condemn the tenets of Wickliff, juſt as they were going to enter upon buſineſs, a violent earthquake ſhook the monaſtery. Upon this, the terrified Biſhops threw down their papers, and crying out, that the buſineſs was diſpleaſing to God, came to a haſty reſolution to proceed no farther. "The Archbiſhop alone," ſays grant of four fairs at Canterbury yearly, viz. on Innocents-Day, Whitſun-Eve, the Eve of Becket's tranſlation, and Michaelmas-Eve; each to continue nine days, and to be kept within the ſite of the Priory (u).

(u) Dart, ubi ſupra.

Mr. Gilpin, "remained unmoved. With equal "ſpirit and addreſs he chid their ſuperſtitious fears, "and told them, that if the earthquake por- "tended any thing, it portended the downfall of "Hereſy; that as noxious vapours are lodged in the "bowels of the earth, and are expelled by theſe vio- "lent concuſſions, ſo by their ſtrenuous endeavours, "the kingdom ſhould be purified from the peſtilen- "tial taint of hereſy, which had infected it in every "part. This ſpeech, together with the news, that "the earthquake was general through the city, as it "was afterwards indeed found to have been through "the iſland, diſpelled their fears. Wickliff would "often merrily ſpeak of this accident; and would "call this aſſembly the Council of the Herydene; "Herydene being the old Engliſh word for earth- "quake (26)."

In the Parliamentary Hiſtory, ſome notice is taken of the ſpeech which, as Chancellor of England, Courtney made at the opening of the Parliament in 1382. The words which he took for his theme were Rex convenire fecit conſilium, and it is ſaid that he made a notable oration upon it in Engliſh. He applied his text to the good and virtuous government of the kingdom during his reign. No reign, the Archbiſhop affirmed, could long endure if vice ruled in it, to remedy which evil the Parliament was called, the laws then in being not having been found effectual to that purpoſe (27).] K.

(26) Gilpin's Life of Wickliff. p. 48, 49.

(27) Parliamentary Hiſt. vol. i. p. 385. 2d. edit.

 [COWARD (WILLIAM), a Medical and Metaphyſical Writer, (of whom we are able to give only an imperfect account, but who is, nevertheleſs, entitled to ſome degree of notice in this work,) was the ſon of Mr. William Coward of the city of Wincheſter, where he was born in the year 1656, or 1657. His mother was the daughter of Mr. George Lamphire, an Apothecary in that city, and the ſiſter of Dr. John Lamphire, an eminent Phyſician at Oxford, Camden's Profeſſor of Hiſtory, and Principal of Hart Hall (a). It is not certain where young Coward received his grammatical education; but it is natural to ſuppoſe that it was in his native place, at Wykeham's School, which hath long ſuſtained a great and deſerved reputation, and produced many learned men. At the age of eighteen, or in his eighteenth year, he was removed to Oxford, and, in the month of May, 1674, became a Commoner of Hart Hall, the inducement to which might probably be, that his uncle was at the head of that ſeminary. However, he did not long continue there; for in the year following, he was admitted a Scholar of Wadham College. On the 27th of June, 1677, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts; and in January, 1679-80, he was choſen Probationer Fellow of Merton College, which may reaſonably be conſidered as a teſtimony of his having obtained ſome reputation for his literary improvements (b). In 1681, was publiſhed Mr. Dryden's Abſalom and Achitophel, a production on the celebrity of which we need not expatiate. At Oxford it could not fail to be greatly admired for its poetical merit; beſide which, it might be the better received on account of its containing a ſevere ſatire on the Duke of Monmouth and the Earl of Shafteſbury; two men who were certainly no favourites with that loyal Univerſity. Accordingly, the admiration of the poem produced two Latin Verſions of it, both of which were written and printed at Oxford; one by Mr. Francis Atterbury, (afterwards the celebrated Biſhop of Rocheſter) who was aſſiſted in it by Mr. Francis Hickman, a Student of Chriſt-Church; and the other by Mr. Coward. Theſe tranſlations were publiſhed in 4to. in 1682. Whatever proof Mr. Coward's Verſion of the Abſalom and Achitophel might afford of his progreſs in Claſſical Literature, he was not very fortunate in this his firſt publication. It was compared with Mr. Atterbury's production, not a little to its diſadvantage. According to Anthony Wood, he was ſchooled for it in the College; it was not well received in the Univerſity; and Atterbury's Poem was extolled as greatly ſuperior. To conceal, in ſome degree, Mr. Coward's mortification, a friend of his, in a public paper, advertized the tranſlation, as written by a Walter Curle, of Hertford, Gentleman (c). On the 13th of December, 1683, Mr. Coward was admitted to the degree of Maſter of Arts. Having determined to apply himſelf to the practice of Medicine, he proſecuted his ſtudies in that line; in conſequence of which, he took the degree of Bachelor of Phyſic, on the 23d of June, 1685, and of Doctor, on the 2d of July, 1687 (d). After his quitting Oxford, he exerciſed his profeſſion at Northampton, from which place he removed to London, in 1693, or 1694, and ſettled in Lombard Street. In 1695, he publiſhed a tract, in 8vo. entitled, "De Fermento vola- "tili Nutritio Conjectura Rationis, qua oſtenditur Spiritum volatilem oleoſum, è Sanguine "ſuffuſum, eſſe verum ac genuinum Concoctionis ac Nutritionis Inſtrumentum (e)." For this work he had an honourable approbation from the Preſident and Cenſors of the College of Phyſicians (f).

(a) Wood's Athenæ Oxonienſes, vol. ii. col. 947. Ibid. Faſti Oxonienſes. col. 134.

(b) Athenæ. ubi ſupra. col. 947.

(c) Athenæ, ubi ſupra. col. 948. 1064.

(d) Catalogue of Oxford Graduates, p. 84.

(e) Athenæ, ubi ſupra. col. 947, 948.

(f) An hiſtorical view of the controverſy concerning an intermediate ſtate, p. p. 179. Sec. ed.

It was not to Medical ſtudies only that Dr. Coward confined his attention. Beſides being fond of polite learning, he entered deeply into metaphyſical ſpeculations, eſpecially with regard to the nature of the ſoul, and the natural immortality of man. The reſult of his enquiries was the publication, in 1702, under the fictitious name of Eſtibius Pſycalethes, of a book, the title of which was, "Second Thoughts concerning human Soul, demon- "ſtrating the Notion of human Soul, as believed to be a ſpiritual, immortal Subſtance "united to a human Body, to be a plain heatheniſh Invention, and not conſonant to the "Principles of Philoſophy, Reaſon, or Religion; but the ground only of many abſurd and

" and ſuperſtitious Opinions, abominable to the reformed Churches, and derogatory in " general to true Chriſtianity." This work was dedicated by the Doctor to the Clergy of the Church of England, and he profeſſes, at his ſetting out, " that the main ſtreſs of " arguments, either to confound or ſupport his opinion, muſt be drawn from thoſe only " credentials of true and orthodox Divinity, the lively oracles of God, the Holy Scrip- " tures." In another part, in anſwer to the Queſtion, Doth Man die like a Brute Beaſt? He ſays, " Yes, in reſpect of their end in this life; both their deaths conſiſt in a privation of " life (g)." " But then," he adds, " Man has this prerogative or pre-eminence above " a brute, that he will be raiſed to life again, and be made partaker of eternal happineſs " in the world to come." Notwithſtanding theſe, " and as many other proofs," (ſays a moſt competent judge) " of a firm and ſerious attachment to the authority of the Chriſ- " tian Scriptures, as it is in any man's power to give under his hand," Dr. Coward has commonly made one in the liſt with thoſe who have been reputed to be the moſt rancorous and determined adverſaries of Chriſtianity (h). Swift hath ranked him with Toland, Tindal, and Gildon (i); and paſſages to the like purpoſe are not unfrequent among controverſial writers, eſpecially during the former part of the preſent century. However ſincere and zealous Dr. Coward might be in his belief of the goſpel, his denial of the immateriality and natural immortality of the ſoul, and of a ſeparate ſtate of exiſtence between the time of death and the general reſurrection, was ſo contrary to the opinions then almoſt univerſally received, that it is not very ſurprizing that he ſhould haſtily be conſidered as an enemy to revelation. It might be expected that he would immediately meet with opponents; and accordingly he was attacked by various writers, of different complexions and abilities; among whom were Dr. Nichols, Mr. John Broughton, and Mr. John Turner. Dr. Nichols took up the argument in his " Conference with a Theiſt." Mr. Broughton wrote a treatiſe, entitled " Pſychologia, or, An Account of the Nature of the rational Soul, in two Parts;" and Mr. Turner publiſhed " A Vindication of the ſeparate Exiſtence of the ſoul from a late Author's Second Thoughts." Both theſe pieces appeared in 1703. Mr. Turner's publication was anſwered by Dr. Coward, in a pamphlet called " Farther Thoughts upon ſecond Thoughts." In Mr. Turner the Doctor acknowledged that he had a rational and candid adverſary. This doth not appear to have been the caſe with regard to Mr. Broughton; who, therefore, was treated by Dr. Coward with a ſuitable degree of ſeverity, in " An Epiſtolary reply to Mr. Broughton's Pſychologia," which reply was not ſeparately printed, but annexed to a work of the Doctor's, publiſhed in the beginning of the year 1704, and entitled " The grand Eſſay; or, A Vindication of Reaſon and Religion againſt Impoſthures of Philoſophy." In this laſt production, the idea of the human Soul's being an immaterial ſubſtance, was again vigorouſly attacked. From the " Epiſtolary Reply" we ſhall inſert two or three paſſages below, which while they ſerve to diſplay Dr. Coward's peculiar ſentiments, and his mode of writing, will tend to throw ſome light on his Chriſtian character [A]. A late Author (k), in ſpeaking of Mr. Broughton's Pſy-

(g) For this he quotes Eccleſ. ix. 19.

(h) Hiſtorical Review, p. 174, 175.

(i) Supplement to Swift's Works, vol. i. p. 287, 288.

(k) The Rev. T. Broughton, M. A.

[A] We ſhall inſert two or three paſſages below.] " Good Sir," ſays Dr Coward, (addreſſing himſelf to Mr Broughton) " do but conſider without paſ- " ſion, how you have anſwered that argument, drawn " from eternal life being the gift of God; ergo the " philoſopher ought not to give us an unwarrantable " immortality. This is the ſubſtance of Eſtibius's " argument. Anſ. 1. It is a ſuperlative gift to " have an immortal ſoul, p. 208. 2. We know it from " ſcripture revelation. 3. Life denotes happineſs in " ſcripture; ſo by a new and full aſſurance, it is by " ſcripture become a new gift. 4. The forfeited title " to this happineſs, was by the goſpel reſtored to man- " kind.——What is all this to the purpoſe? If I " ſay, immortality to man is a ſuperlative gift re- " vealed from ſcripture only, and this immortality " conſiſts in an happineſs of life after death, which " Adam forfeited and Chriſt reſtored, is not this as " good divinity as yours? Nay, I am ſure, yours " has not that probability of truth, as mine has, be- " cauſe your firſt propoſition is precarious and " groundleſs, unleſs you make it appear, that God " gave man an immortal ſoul at creation; and mine " has the whole religion of the goſpel to juſtify it. " Sir, but one queſtion more. Is immortal life a " gift to an immortal being? Yes, ſay you, hap- " pineſs ſuper-added to immortal life, is a gift; and " that is meant by immortal life in the ſcripture. " Then pray do you interpret ſcripture, if your head " can do it right, and tell us, that Chriſt promiſed " his believer only happineſs ſuperadded to our im- " mortal life in the next world, for he knew that we " had an immortal life before. Can you, with any " face, give ſuch a gloſs to the ſcriptures? Is not " the whole intent and purport of the goſpel to tell " us, that though we had forfeited eternal life by " Adam's tranſgreſſion, yet by Chriſt we ſhould be " reſtored to that again, who elſe would have died " eternally? Doth he not firſt promiſe life to a dead " lump of earth, rotted in the grave after ſeveral " thouſand years, by which we are put in a ſtate of " being capable of happineſs? And after this pro- " miſe of life, then if you do well, you ſhall have " happineſs ſuperadded to it, as a new gift. Away " with your trifling with a text. Is life a gift to a " dead carcaſe or no? If it be, it is a gift of God, " and no being elſe can poſſibly give it. If it be " not the gift of God, then the ſcripture is vain, and " the promiſe of none effect. For as to happineſs or " miſery attending that life, it is ſubſequent to it, " and depends upon yourſelf for the moſt part, to " perform the conditions of obedience God has ſet " before you." " Epiſtolary Reply, p. 233." After this, the Doctor proceeds as follows: " Ano- " ther argument like the former, is in relation to the " curſe denounced againſt Adam, In the day thou eat- " eſt thereof (viz. the forbidden fruit) thou ſhalt die. " What ſinned? ſaith Eſtibius. Soul as well as body, " and therefore both were liable to death. But ſay " you, by way of a nice queſtion, What is to be un- " derſtood by, thou? p. 279. Anſ. The whole Man, " or Perſon of Man. Then, ſay I, whole Man died. " —No, whole Man may be as well underſtood for a " part, as a part for the whole.—This is rare philo- " ſophy indeed! Whole Man died, therefore one- " half of him ſurvived," Epiſt. Rep. p. 239. Again. " As to thoſe arguments, Eſtibius urges from the na- " ture and end of a reſurrection and general judgment, " I be-Pſychologia, deſcribes it as a learned and ſolid anſwer to the "Second Thoughts;" but the great Mr. Locke entertained a very different opinion of the merit of the work. For in a letter to Mr. Collins, he ſays, "The other book you mentioned, I have ſeen, and am ſo "well ſatisfied by his fifth ſection, what a doughty Squire he is like to prove in the reſt, "that I think not to trouble myſelf to look farther into him. He has there argued very "weakly againſt his adverſary, but very ſtrongly againſt himſelf (l)."

(l) Hiſtorical View, p. 176. 181, 182. 305. Note.

So obnoxious were Dr. Coward's poſitions, that it was not deemed ſufficient to attempt the anſwering of them by the force alone of reaſon and argument. A more conciſe and effectual method of confuting them was ſought for, by an appeal to human authority. On Friday, the 10th of March, 1703-4, a complaint was made to the Houſe of Commons of the "Second Thoughts," and the "Grand Eſſay;" which books were brought up to the Table, and ſome parts of them read. The conſequence of this was, an order, "That a "Committee be appointed to examine the ſaid Books, and collect thereout ſuch parts "thereof as are offenſive; and to examine who is the author, printer, and publiſher "thereof." At the ſame time, the matter was referred to Sir Dudly Cullum, Colonel Stringer, Mr. Bromley, Sir Chriſtopher Muſgrave, Mr. Lownds, Mr. Topham, Mr. Smith, Sir Matthew Dudly, Mr. Colcher, Mr. Anneſley, Mr. How, Mr. Sambrooke, Sir William Whitlock, Mr. Fagg, Mr. Monćton, Sir John Holland, Mr. Boyle, Mr. St. John, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Moor, Mr. Sharp, Mr. Freeman, Mr. Crawford, Mr. Harley, and Sir Jervas Elwes; who were directed to meet that afternoon, and had power given them to ſend for perſons, papers, and records. Whether all or any of theſe Gentlemen (Mr. St. John, afterwards the famous Lord Bolingbroke, excepted) were acute and able Divines, doth not ſtand upon Record. If they were, it is probable that no ſubſequent Houſe of Commons could boaſt of having produced a ſuperior, or an equal number of ſkilful Theologues; and we aſſume ſome merit to ourſelves, for reſcuing them from the oblivion in which they have hitherto ſlept in this reſpect, and bringing them forward to public notice. But perhaps, after all, they might in part be endebted to the Chaplain of the Houſe, or to ſtill higher eccleſiaſtics, for their complete knowledge of the malignity of Dr. Coward's principles. Be this as it may, on the 17th of March, Sir David Cullum reported from the Committee, that they had examined the books, and had collected out of them ſeveral paſſages which they conceived to be offenſive; and that they found, that Dr. Coward was the author of them; that Mr. David Edwards was the printer of the one, and Mr. W. Pierſon of the other; and that both the books were publiſhed by Mr. Baſſett. Sir David Cullum having read the report in his place [B], and the ſame being read again, after

"I believe you foreſaw them unanſwerable, and "therefore was forced to recur to an intermediate "ſtate.—This dream has indeed relieved you one "way, but then it preſſes you very hard on the con- "fines of Purgatory. For what end are ſouls re- "ſerved in that ſtate? If wicked, and in torments, "then it cannot be leſs than a Purgatory. If "righteous, and in happineſs, though but initial, as "you term it, then you anſwer not well, for the "juſtice of God, who has, by ſuch his aſſignment, "atteſted them to be ſo far innocent, as to be in a "ſtate of certain ſalvation, and certain happineſs, "and yet he ſtill detains them from a perfect con- "ſummation and bliſs, ſo many thouſand years be- "fore a general reſurrection. If any man had for "that time no being at all, as Eſtibius avers it, it is "no injuſtice to a non-exiſtent man, becauſe he is "not capable of having injuſtice done him in a ſtate "of non-exiſtence. Again, the ſcriptures every "where, by the particle, then, relating to a fixed day "of a general judgment, ſeem plainly to teſtify "God's ordination on my ſide. But for God to give "our ſouls exiſtence in an intermediate ſtate, who "knew that they will have a certain happineſs full "and complete in all degrees, yet to detain them from "it ſo long, without ſhewing any ordination of his "from ſcripture to juſtify the truth of your opinion; "by your good leave, I think, ſeems a grand reflec- "tion and derogation to infinite juſtice; for which "opinion you deſerve Luſtration or Purgatory at "leaſt." Epiſt. Reply, p. 241. The advices which Dr. Coward gives to Mr. Broughton are worthy of being attended to by Controverſialiſts in general. "One word or two of advice to you, and I have "done. 1. Whenever you write again, get a man "of ſolid judgment and reading to ſuperviſe your "papers before they come haſtily into the world, "that your expreſſions may always be ſenſe, if they "bear little or no weight in argumentation. 2. Take "ſuch a man's judgment in examining the reaſons "you propoſe as demonſtrative, and eſpecially where "you attempt to reduce the adverſary to own abſur- "dities, and to ridicule him. 3. Never uſe calumny "for argument, by calling a man atheiſt, heretic, "irreligious, &c. either by inuendo or expreſs "words. For it becomes ſuch as are of your ſtation, "and of your function, to treat men with candour "and mildneſs of temper (whatever latitude a lay- "man may take) more particularly. This is a "breach of good-manners, and give me leave to tell "you, that when you preſume to call one atheiſt or "heretic, who is known conſtantly to frequent the "Sacrament often in the year, and ſeldom fails pub- "lic devotion in the week days, in the Church of "England, you, or any one elſe, do very ill to brand "ſuch an one with atheiſm, or irreligion, or as a "broacher of heretical opinions." p. 246 (1).

(1) An Hiſtorical View of the Controverſy concerning an intermediate State, p. 302—305. note.

[B] Read the report in his place.] The report was as follows:

In the "ſecond thoughts concerning human ſoul, "&c."

P. 84. "Now the notion of an immaterial, im- "mortal, ſubſtantial Being in Man, or Soul, was one "of thoſe principles I had by education ſo imbibed; "and having thought fit more ſtrictly to enquire into "the reaſons or foundation of this belief, I find it to "be only an opinion derived down to poſterity, as it "were, by truſt."

P. 85. "But theſe grounds of the framing an im- "material, immortal ſoul in a man, I look upon to "be idle and fabulous, and conceive it rather to be "the conſent and doctrine of the philoſophers in "general preaching, that virtue was to be rewarded, "and vice puniſhed; and when they uſually ſaw good "men die untimely deaths, and unrewarded too, "being ignorant of a reſurrection, taught their "ſcholars, that men's ſouls, after death, remained "alive to receive the ſame; i. e. good men rewards, "and ill men puniſhments."

P. 88. "Now after the piety of the primitive after it had been delivered in at the Clerk's Table, the Houſe proceeded to the examination of the evidence, with regard to the writing, printing, and vending of the two books. Sufficient proof having been produced with reſpect to the writer of them, Dr. Coward was called in. Being examined accordingly, he acknowledged that he was the author of the books; and declared, that he never intended any thing againſt Religion; that there was nothing contained in them, contrary either to Morality or Religion; and that if there were

" Chriſtians began, by ſecular intereſt, to be perverted, and the ambition of crafty prelates grew " ſo high, as to require to be ſupported in grandeur " and ſtate, then it became convenient to propagate " this doctrine to the height."

P. 144. " Thus, upon the whole, we find how " weak and inſufficient the arguments of philoſophy " are, to defend the opinion of an immaterial ſoul, " united to the body; what idle and trifling diſtinc- " tions they are forced to make to defend it; what " ſhifts and evaſions they frame to ſupport their " notion, inſomuch that a man may ſay, there is no " plea to ground a belief on the philoſophers argu- " ments, which pretend to eſtabliſh two diſtinct ſub- " ſtances, ſpiritual and material, in man, but only to " thoſe who are reſolved not to be informed, and " will know no better."

P. 176. " If we allow this conjunction of body " and ſoul to be the union of an immortal immate- " rial ſpirit to a mortal material body, where is then " the myſtery of the hypoſtatick union? The union " of the ſoul and body no man yet ever allowed to be " a myſtery of religion; therefore, either both muſt " be reputed ſo, or neither."

P. 206. " 1. That human ſoul will ceaſe when " the body dies (i. e. life and ſoul are the ſame thing " in Scripture) and conſequently the common notion " of a ſpiritual immortal ſubſtance, united to, or in " man, is erroneous."

" That, by the common courſe of Providence, " man's immortality begins not until after the reſur- " rection."

" As to the firſt propoſition, thus I argue: If it " appear by the whole current of ſcripture, that life is " properly the ſoul of man; and no text gives us a " ſufficient ground to call it an immaterial ſubſtance; " then the ſoul of man will ceaſe to be, when the " body dies. But it appears by the whole current " of Scripture, &c. ergo, the ſoul of man will ceaſe " to be, when the body dies; and, conſequently, the " notion of a ſpiritual immortal ſubſtance, united to, " or in, man, is erroneous."

P. 222. " Theſſalon. Cap. IV. Ver. 13, 14.—Who " will be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of " an eye, at the laſt trump: for this corruptible " muſt put on incorruption, and this mortal put on " immortality, before it can be pronounced, that " death is ſwallowed up of victory, 1 Cor. xv. ver. " 51, &c. Where it is very obſervable, that the " Apoſtle, in all the whole courſe of his writing, ſays, " we," not " our bodies;" who cannot be called " we:" As, " we ſhall not all ſleep;") " we ſhall " be raiſed incorruptible;" and, " we ſhall be " changed;" which could not be true, were our ſoul, " our better part, an incorruptible immortal being " already; for that has no change at all, but retains " its firſt immortal nature."

P. 278. Obj. 14. " Then ſhall the duſt return " to the earth as it was, and the ſpirit to God that " gave it: therefore, herein is a plain diſtinction of " ſoul and body; and that when we die, our ſouls " will certainly return to God:"

Anſwer: " This is the great Goliah argument, " generally brought to knock down all oppoſers; " though it argues not for an immaterial ſpiritual " ſubſtance, but is rather, and ought to be, explain- " ed as a confirmation of my opinion."

P. 280. " Thus far, I think, I have ſufficiently " anſwered all objections brought from the Old " Teſtament: and though there occur many of the " ſame nature in the Apocrypha, and, indeed, more " ſeemingly appoſite to my opinion, yet I ſhall here " paſs them by until the Apocrypha be proved ca- " nonical: and ſo proceed to objections extorted " from the New Teſtament."

" Firſt, The firſt I meet with, that ſeems ſignifi- " cant, is this: " Fear not them that kill the body, " but are not able to kill the ſoul; but rather fear " him which is able to deſtroy both body and ſoul in " hell." Matth. x. 28. Therefore there is a being " in man diſtinct from his body, capable of being " caſt into a place of torment; whereas the body " only lies in the power of man, and not the ſoul, to " be deſtroyed."

P. 283, 284. " Anſwer: If by this text was meant " a ſpiritual, ſubſtantial, immortal ſoul, no doubt " but that our Saviour knew it, and ſo did his Diſ- " ciples, to whom he then preached this doctrine; " therefore, for our Saviour to inſtruct them in a " doctrine, viz. The impoſſibility of man's power to " kill an immortal ſpirit, which they muſt know be- " fore, if true, would ſavour more of trifling, than " of giving real inſtructions in Chriſtianity; for it " might eaſily be returned, that all the world knows " an immortal ſpirit cannot be killed, ſo that ſuch " inſtructions are vain and uſeleſs."

P. 285, 286. Luke xxiii. 43. " This day (ſays " our Saviour to the thief on the croſs) thou ſhalt be " with me in Paradiſe. Therefore his ſoul muſt be " there with our Saviour, or elſe our Saviour's words " could not be admitted for truth; for, be ſure, the " thief's body was buried, and laid in the ground, " as others were."

Anſwer. " This objection, though oft brought, I " cannot ſee of what force it is, unleſs it be, to tell " us, that our Saviour ſpake to the ſoul of the thief, " when he ſaid, " Thou ſhalt be with me in Para- " diſe." " Thou ſoul of the thief, for owning me, " ſhall this day be with me in bliſs: but O thief! " thy body ſhall go to corruption, as other bodies " do." Now what a ſpeech muſt ſuch men make " for our Saviour, that gave ſuch an interpretation " of this text, let the learned judge."

In " The grand Eſſay, &c."

P. 185. " Theol. How could man come by this " immaterial ſubſtance, but at the firſt creation? " And it's plain there, by expreſs words, that he was " made no more than a living creature.

" Philoſ. You had as good throw your cap into the " air. All the Heathen Philoſophers preached up " man to be made of a ſoul, called immaterial ſub- " ſtance and body; and if you throw all the Old and " New Teſtament at that doctrine, you'll never con- " found it, or convince its believers to the contrary."

P. 186, 187. " Theol. Don't a man die if he loſe " his life?"

" Philoſ. No; he doth die in his body but not in " his ſoul; for that lives as well, if not better, than " it did in the body."

" Theol. Not one word of this, or like it, do I find " in the Bible. This is as much as to ſay, a man " doth die, and he doth not die. Pray what is meant " by dying in his body?"

" Philoſ. His material body dies."

" Theol. As far as I find it never lived, for it was " the ſoul lived all the while; and how can any thing " die which never lived?"

" Philoſ. It's no matter how; it is ſo: The ſoul, " or immaterial ſubſtance, gave the body life; and " now it is ſeparated the body is dead."

" Theol. What chapter and verſe, for your imma- " terial living ſubſtance, in the Bible?"

" Philoſ. I told you you were always for Scrip- " ture. It's ſo by Philoſophy, that's enough: and " ſo if a man is ſaid to ſleep in death, he is as fully " awake in his ſoul, the next minute of ſeparation, " as ever he was in his life in this world."

" Theol. A pretty way of ſleeping indeed! You " Philoſophers make us believe any thing. I'll be " ſtigmatized (for a fool)(2) all my life-time, if you " can bring the like caſe where ſo many abſurdities, " without any warrant from Scripture, or common " reaſon, are believed."

(2) Theſe words are ſupplied from the original Report.

any thing therein againſt Religion or Morality, he was heartily ſorry, and ready to recant the ſame. The Houſe then reſolved, "That the ſaid Books do contain therein divers "Doctrines and Poſitions, contrary to the Doctrine of the Church of England, and "tending to the Subverſion of the Chriſtian Religion;" and ordered, that they ſhould be burnt, next day, by the Common Hangman, in New Palace Yard, Weſtminſter (m), which order was carried into execution. One effect of this procedure was, that Dr. Coward's works were more generally read; for in the ſame year he gave to the world a new edition of his "Second Thoughts;" which was followed by a Treatiſe, entitled, "The juſt "Scrutiny; or, a ſerious Enquiry into the modern notions of the Soul (*).

(m) Journals of the Houſe of Commons, vol. xiv. p. 373. 379, 38c.

(*) Britiſh Muſeum.

After this, the Doctor returned to the ſtudies belonging to his profeſſion, and, in 1706, publiſhed a Tract, entitled "Ophthalmiatria," which he dedicated to his patron, Manuel Sorrel, Eſq. In this Dedication, Mr. Sorrel is complimented as a man of learning and judgment, in whoſe approbation of his works our author declares himſelf ſatisfied and happy, and enabled to deſpiſe the idle and profane mob of Scioliſts, whom certain pious agents of ſedition had encouraged to calumniate him. Dr. Coward, in the firſt chapter of his Ophthalmiatria, the title of which is, "De Oculo, ejuſque Partibus," ſpeaking of the manner wherein viſion is performed and accounted for, diverts himſelf with the notion of an immaterial ſubſtance reſiding in the pineal gland, by the help of which, he tells us, the Philoſophers of the day accounted for every phænomenon relating to ſenſation. Having expoſed this hypotheſis as empty and unphiloſophical, ſo far as relates to viſion, he adds, that he hath ſaid enough on the ſubject elſewhere, and exhorts the learned of all countries, to examine, thoroughly and candidly, what abſurd and ridiculous, and almoſt blaſphemous opinions, follow from this doctrine of an immaterial ſubſtance. He hints, at the ſame time, that his domeſtic adverſaries, not being able to confute him by reaſoning, had endeavoured to ſilence him by fire and faggot (n). Hence it is apparent that the burning of Dr. Coward's books had not had the leaſt effect in abating his zeal for his peculiar ſentiments, and that he retained a ſtrong ſenſe of the harſh treatment he had received. From a letter of our author to Dr. Hans Sloane, dated May 28, 1706, which is preſerved in the Britiſh Muſeum, and has lately been publiſhed in the Gentleman's Magazine, it appears that he was in the habits of intimacy with this eminent Phyſician and Naturaliſt. Dr. Sloane carried his friendſhip ſo far as to take upon himſelf the ſuperviſal of the Ophthalmiatria. He wiſhed Dr. Coward to alter what related to his private opinion concerning the Soul, and to add ſomething in commendation of the tender conſciences of Phyſicians in point of Religion. The former our author declared could not be done; and with regard to the latter, he thought that if he advanced any thing on that head, it would be interpreted rather as a piece of a ridicule, than a ſerious apology for his conduct. As the letter to Dr. Sloane is dated from the Green Bell over againſt the Caſtle Tavern, (near Holborn in Fetter Lane) there is reaſon to believe that Dr. Coward had quitted London, and was now only a viſitant in town, for the purpoſe of his publication (o). Indeed, the fact is aſcertained from the liſts of the College of Phyſicians, which are preſerved in the Britiſh Muſeum. In the Catalogue for 1706, Dr. William Coward, who ſtands under the head of Candidates, is then, for the firſt time, mentioned as reſiding in the country. The perſecution he had met with, and the unpopularity ariſing from his works, might be inducements with him to leave the metropolis. It doth not appear, for twelve years, to what part of the kingdom he had retired (p).

(n) Hiſtorical View, p. 180, 181.

(o) Gent. Mag. for Feb. 1787, p. 100.

(p) Liſts of the College of Phyſicians, in the Britiſh Muſeum.

From this period we hear no more of Dr. Coward as a Medical or Metaphyſical writer. Even when he had been the moſt engaged in abſtruſe and ſcientific enquiries, he had not omitted the ſtudy of polite Literature; for we are told that, in 1705, he publiſhed "The Lives of Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob, an Heroic Poem (q)." Of this work, as we have not been able to meet with it, we can give no account. It doth not ſeem to have had even the fate of Sir Richard Blackmore's productions, to be ſpoken of and abuſed for a time, and then to be neglected. As far as we are capable of judging, it was little noticed at firſt; and it has now ſunk into total oblivion. The ſubject of the Poem indicates our Author's regard for the Scriptures, and affords a farther proof how unjuſtly he has been repreſented as an enemy to Revelation. Concerning another poetical performance by Dr. Coward, and the laſt of his writings that has come to our knowledge, we are able to give more accurate intelligence. It was publiſhed in 1709, and is entitled, "Licentia "Poetica diſcuſſed; or the true Teſt of Poetry: without which it is difficult to judge of, "or compoſe a correct Engliſh Poem. To which are added Critical Obſervations on the "principal Ancient and Modern Poets, viz. Homer, Horace, Virgil, Milton, Cowley, "Dryden, &c. as frequently liable to juſt cenſure." This work, which is divided into two books, is dedicated to the Duke of Shrewſbury, and introduced by a long and learned preface. Prefixed are three copies of commendatory verſes, ſigned A. Hill, J. Gay, and Sam. Barklay. The two former, Aaron Hill and John Gay, were then young Poets, who afterwards, as is well known, roſe to a conſiderable degree of reputation. Coward is celebrated by them as a great bard, a title to which he had certainly no claim, though his "Licentia," conſidered as a didactic poem, and as ſuch poems were then generally written, is not contemptible. It is not ſo correct as Lord Roſcommon's Eſſay on tranſlated verſe; verſe; but it is little, if at all, inferior to the Duke of Buckingham's Eſſay on Poetry, which was ſo much extolled in its day. The rules laid down by Dr. Coward for poetical compoſition are often minute, but uſually, though not univerſally, founded on good ſenſe and a juſt taſte. He doth not approve of blank verſe, and had not felt the harmony and variety of Milton's numbers. Triplets, double rhimes, and Alexandrines are condemned by him; the laſt of which, however, he admits on ſome great occaſion. The notes, which are large and numerous, diſplay no ſmall extent of reading; and to the whole is added, by way of appendix, "A Political Eſſay," from which it appears that our author was a very zealous whig (r).

(q) Mag. ubi ſupra.

(r) Licentia. Poetica diſcuſſed. Paſſim.

In the Liſt of the College of Phyſicians for 1718, Dr. Coward begins to be mentioned as reſiding at Ipſwich. From this place he wrote, in 1722, a letter to his old Friend, Sir Hans Sloane, the occaſion of which is ſomewhat curious. He had learned, from the news-papers, that the Ducheſs Dowager of Marlborough propoſed to give five hundred guineas to any perſon who ſhould preſent her with an epitaph, ſuitable to the late Duke her huſband's character, "Now," ſays he, "I have one by me which gives him his juſt "character, without flattery or oſtentation, and which I verily believe may be acceptable "to any learned man." He adds, "that he hears it was to be approved by Dr. Hare, "Dr. Friend of Weſtminſter School, and Dr. Bland of Eton School;" and, if this be true, he begs that Sir Hans would give him leave to ſend it for his approbation and recommendation (s). From the omiſſion of Dr. Coward's name in the Catalogue of the College of Phyſicians, printed in 1725, it is evident that he was then dead. Though his medical works are now in no reputation, and his other writings are but little attended to, it is, nevertheleſs, certain that he was a man of conſiderable abilities and literature; and we have eſteemed it a duty incumbent upon us to reſcue his name from the injuſtice which hath been done it with reſpect to religion. However erroneous his peculiar ſentiments may have been, there is no reaſon to doubt of the ſincerity of his belief in the Goſpel, and of his zeal for its honour. The truth of Chriſtianity and the doctrine of eternal life ſtand upon their own firm ground, independently of all ſpeculations concerning the materiality or immateriality of the ſoul, and its ſeparate ſtate of exiſtence. Divines of the firſt eminence, whoſe faith in revelation is unqueſtionable, and who have been among its ableſt advocates, have concurred in opinion with Dr. Coward; and that ſuch men ſhould, on this account, have ever been ranked with unbelievers, can only have proceeded from the moſt contemptible ignorance and bigotry.

(s) Gent. Mag. ubi ſupra. From the Britiſh Muſeum.

We cannot diſmiſs this article without taking notice of a miſtake which was committed by the late Dr. Caleb Fleming; who, in the year 1758, publiſhed a treatiſe, entitled, "A Survey of the Search after Souls," imagining that he was writing againſt Dr. Coward. But the "Search after Souls" was the production of Henry Layton, Eſq; a Gentleman of an ancient family, and a handſome eſtate, at Rawden, in the county of York. Mr. Layton was educated at Oxford, and, ſtudying afterwards at Gray's Inn, was called to the bar; but never applied himſelf to the practice of the law. His knowledge of it, however, enabled him to do good offices among his neighbours, without fee or reward (t).] K.

(t) Hiſtorical View, ubi ſup. p. 182.

COWELL (JOHN), a learned Civilian in the latter end of the ſixteenth, and beginning of the ſeventeenth century, was born at Earnſborough in the pariſh of Swimbridge in Devonſhire (a), and educated at Eton-School, where he ſo diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his good parts and agreeable induſtry, that he was elected a Scholar of King's College Cambridge (b), in the year 1570 [A]. Here he applied himſelf cloſely to his ſtudies, and by his learning and unblameable courſe of life, grew up to ſo much reputation and intereſt in the Univerſity, that he was elected Fellow of that Houſe: and after he had taken the two degrees in Arts, he had the honour to be choſen one of the Proctors for the year 1585 (c). He particularly turned his thoughts to the ſtudy of the Civil-Law, by the advice of that active Prelate Richard Bancroft Biſhop of London (d), who had judgment to find the genius of our Author, and knew the great neceſſity the Church was in, to have men of abilities and integrity in that profeſſion. He was regularly admitted to the Degree of Doctor of Laws in his own Univerſity (e); and in 1600 was incorporated into the ſame degree at Oxford (f). His Reputation was now ſo well eſtabliſhed, that he was made the King's Profeſſor of Civil Law in the Univerſity of Cambridge; and about the ſame time, Maſter of Trinity-Hall; which two ſtations had as much Honour and Profit, as could poſſibly be beſtowed, in that place, on a man of his Profeſſion (g). In 1603 and 1604 he executed the office of Vice-chancellor of Cambridge (h). His chief patron Biſhop Bancroft being advanced to the See of Canterbury in December 1604, and projecting many things which he thought would be for the intereſt and honour of Church and State, employed ſeveral men in their proper profeſſions; imagining that to be the moſt effectual way

(a) Catal. Soc. Col. Reg. Cantab. MS. mentioned in Preface to Cowell's Interpreter, edit. London, 1708. N. B. It is not paged. Prince's Worthies of Devon. Exon. 1701, p. 194. Fuller's Worthies in Devon, p. 262.

(b) Wood, Faſti, vol. i. col. 160, edit. Lond. 1721.

(c) Ibid. He was choſen through the recommendation of William Lord Burghley. Strype's Annals, edit. 1728. vol. iii. p. 268, 269.

(d) See Epiſtle Dedicat. to the Interpreter, 1607.

(e) Preface to Cowell's Interpreter, edit. Lond. 1708.

(f) Wood, Faſti, ubi ſupra.

(g) Preface, ubi ſupra.

(h) T. Fuller's Hiſt. of the Univerſity of Cambridge, p. 157.

[A] He was elected a Scholar of King's College Cambridge, in the year 1570.] And there, in all probability, put under the tuition of his name-ſake and relation John Cowell Fellow of that Houſe, who had been one of the Univerſity-Proctors in the year 1561 (1).

(1) Faſti Cantab. MS.

(i) Preface to the Doctor's Interpreter, edit. 1708.

way to promote the public ſervice (i). Among the reſt, he ſolicited Dr. Cowell [B] to ſhow himſelf an antiquary, and a uſeful man, by giving the interpretation of ſuch words and terms, as created moſt difficulty to the Students of our Eccleſiaſtical, Civil, and Common Laws. This laborious taſk the Doctor performed with ſo much application and diligence, that his work was finiſhed in about three years time, and publiſhed under the title of THE INTERPRETER [C]. By this book the Archbiſhop was ſo well ſatisfied with the author's parts, induſtry, and courage, that upon the death of Sir Edward Stanhope, Vicar General to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, which happened on the 16th of March 1608, his Grace conferred that honourable place on Dr. Cowell, who had practiſed before as an Advocate in the Arches (k). In this ſtation, he carried himſelf with that fairneſs and integrity, that equity and honour, as raiſed him no enemies and loſt him no friends. If he was afterwards invidious as a writer, he was ſtill blameleſs as a judge: For, when the warmeſt objections were made againſt ſome expreſſions in his book, there was not any fault found with his adminiſtration of juſtice (l). For ſome time, his book paſſed uncenſured; but at laſt great offence was taken at it; becauſe, as was pretended, the author had ſpoken with too much liberty, and in too ſharp expreſſions, of the Common Law, and ſome eminent profeſſors of it, particularly Littleton. Moreover, he had recited Hottoman's reflections on his treatiſe of Tenures, and by reciting them was thought to make them his own. This eſpecially fired Sir Edward Coke, then Chief Juſtice of the Common Pleas, who was more particularly concerned for the honour of Littleton, whom he had commented upon; and valued himſelf as the Chief Advocate of his Profeſſion. Another thing ſeems to have put Dr. Cowell out of favour with this Judge: namely, within two years after the publication of the Interpreter, Archbiſhop Bancroft, ſenſible that the juriſdiction of the Spiritual Courts was perpetually obſtructed by the grant of Prohibitions from Weſtminſter-Hall, employed Dr. Cowell to draw up Reaſons and Exceptions againſt the too frequent grants of Prohibitions; which were delivered to King James I. in time of Parliament, under the title of Articuli Cleri, or the Clergy's Articles. Theſe Articles the King ordered to be argued by the Judges, and their Arguments are printed by Coke in his XIIth Report, who had the chief hand in them: and was now more and more incenſed againſt Dr. Cowell, whom he took for a profeſſed enemy to the Weſtminſter-Courts, and therefore directly or obliquely reflects upon him in ſeveral pages of his works [D]. But paper-reproofs not being ſatisfactory, Sir Edward Coke, who was of ſome authority with the King, and had good intereſt in the Houſe of Commons, repreſented Dr. Cowell as an enemy to both (*). He knew that nothing would ſo much excite the jealouſy of the King, who was very fond of Power, as to touch upon the point of Prerogative, and therefore he ſuggeſted, that Dr. Cowell 'had diſputed too nicely upon the 'myſteries of this our monarchy, yea in ſome points very derogatory to the ſupream power 'of this Crown (m);' and had aſſerted, 'That the King's prerogative is in ſome caſes 'limited (n).' The author, by touching upon ſo tender a point, was in great danger of being ruined; but, in all probability, was ſaved through the Archbiſhop's intereſt. His adverſaries hereupon turned the tables, and reſolved to make him a betrayer of the Rights and Liberties of the People, thinking this accuſation would do more with the Parliament, than the other had done with the King. The Complaint againſt him in the Houſe of Commons was carried on by men of parts and intereſt, and it came to this iſſue, that the author was committed to cuſtody, and his book publicly burnt (o). Moreover the Commons complained of him to the Lords, as equally ſtruck at, who reſolved to cenſure his

(*) Preface, as above.

(m) King James Iſt's Proclamat. 25 March 1610.

(n) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(k) Continuat. Hatcher's Ca. of Provoſts, F. lows, &c. of King's-Colle. Cambr. MS.

(l) Pref. to t. Interpreter, a. above.

(o) Pref. to t. Interpreter, a. above. The Common were very de. rous to proce. criminally again. him; nay even hang him, if t. King had no. interpoſed. See Memorials Affairs of Stat. &c. publiſhed b. Edm. Sawyer, Eſq; Lond. fol. 1725, vol. iii. p. 125, 131.

(3) W. Petyt's Miſcellanea Par. ubi ſupra. R. Coke's De. tion, edit. 1719, vol. i. p. 63.

[B] Among the reſt, he ſolicited Dr. Cowell —— to give the interpretation of the difficult words in our Laws.] This the Doctor hints at, in his Dedication of The Interpreter to the Archbiſhop, in theſe words. —'Yet the remembrance of thoſe your honourable 'Provocations, whereby at my coming to your Grace 'from the Univerſity, you firſt put me upon theſe 'Studies, at the laſt by a kind of neceſſity inforced me 'to this attempt; becauſe I could not ſee how well to 'avoid it, but by adventuring the hateful Note of 'Unthankfulneſs.'

[C] THE INTERPRETER.] The whole title of it was as follows, 'The Interpreter, or Book 'containing the ſignification of Words: wherein is ſet 'forth the true meaning of all, or the moſt part of 'ſuch Words and Terms, as are mentioned in the 'Law-writers, or Statutes of this Victorious and re'nowned Kingdom, requiring any Expoſition or In'terpretation. A work not only Profitable, but 'Neceſſary for ſuch as deſire throughly to be in'ſtructed in the Knowledge of our Laws, Statutes, or 'other Antiquities. Collected by John Cowell Doctor, 'and the King's Majeſties Profeſſor of the Civil Law 'in the Univerſity of Cambridge. In legum obſcuritate 'captio.' At Cambridge, Printed by John Legate, Anno 1607, 4*to*. It was re-printed in 1609, and ſeveral times ſince, particularly in 1638, for which Archbiſhop Laud was reflected upon, and it was made an Article againſt him at his trial, as if the impreſſion of that book had been done by his authority, or at leaſt with his connivance, in order to countenance the King's arbitrary meaſures (z). In 1677, and 1684 it was publiſhed, with large Additions, by Tho. Manley of the Middle-Temple, Eſq and again in 1708 with very conſiderable improvements by another hand. In all theſe later Editions, thoſe paſſages that were dubious or offenſive have been corrected or omitted.

(2) Hiſt. of th. Troubles and Tryal of Arch. biſhop Laud, P. 235, Lond. 1695.

[D] Sir Edward Coke reflects upon him in ſeveral pages of his Works.] Being the grand Oracle of the Common Law, as Dr. Cowell was of the Civil, emulation produced ſo great an ill-will between theſe two great men; eſpecially becauſe the Doctor, who was well ſkilled in both Laws, practiſed frequently at Weſtminſter-hall as well as at Doctors Commons; that Sir Edward took all occaſions to affront him, and uſed to call him in deriſion Doctor Cow-heel. It is to be obſerved, that at that time the conteſt ran very high between the Civilians and Common-Lawyers, the latter of which were diſcountenanced by the Court (*).

(*) Fuller's Worthies in Devon. p. 262.

errors

Errors and Boldneſs [E]; but upon the interpoſition of the King, who declared that the man had miſtaken the fundamental points and conſtitutions of Parliament, and promiſed to condemn the Doctrines of the book as abſurd, together with the author of them, they proceeded no farther (p). However, the King publiſhed a Proclamation (q) on the 25th of March 1610 [F], wherein 'he not only prohibited the buying, uttering, or reading of 'the ſaid book, but alſo ſtraitly commanded all and ſingular perſons whatſoever, who had 'or ſhould have any of them in their hands or cuſtody, that upon pain of his high diſ-'pleaſure and the conſequence thereof, they deliver the ſame, preſently upon the pub-'lication thereof, to the Lord Mayor of London, if they or any of them were dwelling 'in or near that city; or otherwiſe to the Sheriff of the county where they ſhould reſide; 'and, in the two Univerſities, to the Chancellor or Vice-chancellor there, to the intent 'that further order might be given for the utter ſuppreſſing thereof [G].' When Dr. Cowell had thus felt the diſpleaſure of the King, and the indignation of the people, he took his leave of the preſs, and retired to his College and his private ſtudies, where he lived inoffenſively and in good repute; but not averſe however to ſerve the public, either with his advice, or any other way. It was his misfortune to be afflicted with the ſtone, for which being cut, that operation proved fatal to him; for he died of it on the eleventh of October, 1611; and was buried in the Chapel of Trinity-Hall under the Altar (r), where there is an inſcription to his memory [H]. He wrote other things beſides the Interpreter above-mentioned [I]. He was a conſiderable benefactor to the College of which he had

(p) Miſcellanea Parliamentaria, by W. Petyt, Eſq; p. 64.

(q) Which is inſerted in Preface to the Interpreter, edit. 1708.

(r) Preface, as above.

[E] To cenſure his Errors and Boldneſs.] The Errors charged upon him, were, That he had aſſerted, 1. 'That the King was ſolutus à legibus, and not 'bound by his Coronation-oath. 2. That it was not 'ex neceſſitate, that the King ſhould call a Parliament 'to make Laws, but might do that by his abſolute 'Power; for voluntas Regis with him was Lex populi. '3. That it was a favour to admit the conſent of his 'ſubjects in giving of ſubſidies. 4. That he draws 'his Arguments from the Imperial Laws of the Roman 'Emperors, which are of no force in England (3). The Author of the Preface to the Edition of the Interpreter in 1708, obſerves, That theſe poſitions are ſo groſs and intolerable, that no Engliſhman would defend or excuſe them. But he ſays, that having run over moſt part of the firſt edition in 1607, 4*to.* he finds no ſuch abominable aſſertions in words at length, though there be many things too unadviſedly expreſſed which a wiſe author would have omitted, and a wiſe Government might have deſpiſed. But when a ſuſpected book is brought to the torture, it often confeſſeth all, and more than it knows.

(3) W. Petyt's Miſcellanea Parliamentaria, ubi ſupra. R. Coke's Detection, edit. 1719, vol. i. p. 63.

[F] The King publiſhed a Proclamation on the 25th of March 1610.] The beginning of this Proclamation is pretty remarkable, being as follows. 'This latter 'age and times of the World wherein we are fallen, 'is ſo much given to verbal profeſſion, as well of 'religion, as of all commendable moral virtues, but 'wanting the actions and deeds agreeable to ſo ſpe-'cious a profeſſion, as it hath bred ſuch an unſatiable 'curioſity in many mens ſpirits, and ſuch an itching in 'the Tongues and Pens of moſt men, as nothing is 'left unſearched to the bottom both in talking and 'writing. For from the very higheſt Myſteries in the 'God-head and the moſt inſcrutable counſels in the 'Trinity, to the very loweſt pit of hell, and the con-'fuſed actions of the devils there, there is nothing now 'unſearched into by the curioſity of men's brains. Men 'not being contented with the knowledge of ſo much 'of the will of God as it hath pleaſed him to reveal, 'but they will needs ſit with him in his moſt private 'cloſet, and become privy of his moſt inſcrutable 'counſels: and therefore it is no wonder, that men in 'theſe our days do not ſpare to wade in all the deepeſt 'myſteries that belong to the perſons and ſtate of 'Kings and Princes, that are Gods upon Earth: 'ſince we ſee (as we have already ſaid) that they 'ſpare not God himſelf.——

[G] That further order might be given for the ſuppreſſing thereof.] The reaſons alledged in the Proclamation for ſuppreſſing that book, are, That the author had fallen into many miſtakes; namely —— 'In ſome things diſputing ſo nicely upon the myſteries 'of this our Monarchy, that it may receive doubtful 'interpretations; yea in ſome points very derogatory 'to the ſupream power of this Crown: In other caſes 'miſtaking the true ſtate of the Parliament of this 'Kingdom and the fundamental conſtitutions and pri-'vileges thereof: And in ſome other points ſpeaking 'un-reverently of the Common Law of England, and 'the works of ſome of the moſt famous and ancient 'Judges therein: it being a thing utterly unlawful to 'any ſubject, to ſpeak or write againſt that Law 'under which he liveth.'—This whole Proclamation is manifeſtly in the ſtile of that pedantic Monarch, who then ſat upon the throne.

[H] Where there is an inſcription to his memory.] And which runs thus; Johannes Cowell, L.L.D. Cuſtos hujus Collegii, Juris Civilis in hac Academia Cantab. Profeſſor Regius, Vicarius Generalis Cantuarienſis Provinciæ ſub Domino Richardo Bancroft, Archiepiſcopo Cantuarienſi, hic expectat Reſurrectionem. Obiit undecimo die menſis Oct. Ann. Dom. 1611. i. e. 'John Cowell 'L. L. D. Maſter of this College, the King's Profeſſor of Civil Law in this Univerſity of Cambridge, 'and Vicar General of the Province of Canterbury, 'under Richard Bancroft Lord Archbiſhop of Canterbury, waits here for the Reſurrection. He died 'the eleventh day of October, in the year of our Lord '1611 (4).'

(4) Pref. ubi ſupra.

[I] He wrote other things beſides the Interpreter.] In 1605, he publiſhed Inſtitutiones juris Anglicani ad methodum & ſeriem inſtitutionum Imperialium compoſitæ & digeſtæ. Cantab. 8*vo.* i. e. 'Inſtitutes of 'the Laws of England in the ſame method as 'Juſtinian's Inſtitutes (5).' He alſo compoſed 'A 'Tract De Regulis Juris [of the Rules of the Law] 'wherein his intent was, by collating the caſes of both 'Laws to ſhew, that they both be raiſed of one 'Foundation, and differ more in Language and Terms 'than in ſubſtance, and therefore were they reduced 'to one method (as they eaſily might) to be attained '(in a manner) with all one pains.' But it doth not appear that this laſt was ever publiſhed (6). M.

(5) Wood, Faſti, vol. i. col. 160.

(6) See Pref. to the Reader, in the beginning of The Interpreter.

 [On the 27th of February, 1609-10, the Commons ſent a meſſage to the Lords, to acquaint them, 'That they had taken notice of a book lately publiſhed by one Dr. Cowell, which they conceive does contain matters of ſcandal and offence towards the High Court of Parliament, and is otherways of dangerous conſequence and example: That being deſirous there ſhould be a joint examination of the offenſive contents of the ſaid Book, and ſome courſe taken for the puniſhment of the perſon who publiſhed the ſame; they therefore deſire their Lordſhips to appoint a conference for that purpoſe.' To this meſſage the Lords returned a very civil anſwer, declaring, 'That they were willing to join with them in any cauſe proper to maintain the honour of that High Court, and to cheriſh a mutual correſpondence between both Houſes, which together make the body of the Parliament, whereof his Majeſty is the head.' Accordingly, a time and place were appointed for a conference, which having been held, the Report of it was made to the Peers on the third of March, when the had been Fellow, to the Hall of which he was Maſter, and to the Univerſity of which he had been Governor.

the Lord Privy Seal (Henry Howard Earl of Northampton) informed them, 'That the Attorney General, in delivering the ſenſe of the Lower Houſe, did very modeſtly and diſcreetly lay open the offence taken againſt the party, and the dangerous conſequence of the Book.' Afterwards, the Biſhop of London (Dr. George Abbot) read the particular exceptions which the Commons had made to Dr. Cowell's work. Theſe were, 1. On the word Subſidy; 2. On the word King; 3. On the word Parliament; 4. On the word Prerogative. On all theſe words Dr. Cowell had enlarged himſelf in ſo unadviſed a manner, that the Commons regarded his aſſertions as very offenſive, and likely to be productive of pernicious effects. When this report was made, the Lords, having taken a little time to conſider of it, thought proper to ſend a meſſage to the other Houſe, to deſire another conference concerning the Book; and in the mean while ordered their Clerk to ſearch for Precedents with reſpect to the mode of proceeding in matters of this nature. The next day, the Lord Treaſurer informed the Peers, that his Majeſty had taken notice of the buſineſs, and had lately peruſed the places in the book to which exceptions were taken; that he had called Cowell before him, and heard his anſwers; and that having duly conſidered of the errors committed by the Author, he was graciouſly pleaſed to deliver his Judgment and Reſolution to the Lords, to be by them communicated to the Committee of the Commons. What the Reſolution was doth not appear; for here the affair ended, ſo far as it ſtands upon the Journals of the Houſe. The King's interference was undoubtedly intended to ſcreen Dr. Cowell from the effects of Parliamentary Cenſure and Reſentment. It is ſaid that James the Firſt had declared his approbation of the Doctor's Book; and that he had let fall ſome expreſſions at his Table, in Derogation of the Common Law of England, and highly extolling the Civil Law, as far preferable to the other. As the King had given ſufficient indications of his love of arbitrary Government, it was wiſe in Parliament to ſeize every becoming opportunity of ſuppreſſing ſuch a diſpoſition in him, and of teſtifying their averſion to principles which were hoſtile to the freedom of the conſtitution (7).] K.

(7) Parliamentary Hiſt. vol. 5. p. 221—225. 2d. edit.

COWLEY (ABRAHAM), one of our beſt Poets of the XVIIth century, was born at London (in Fleet-ſtreet, near the end of Chancery-lane, in the pariſh of St. Dunſtan in the Weſt) in the year 1618, and fifteenth of King James I. His father, who was a Grocer, dying before the birth of this his ſon, his mother, by the intereſt of her friends, procured him to be admitted a King's Scholar in Weſtminſter-ſchool (a). His firſt, and early, inclination to Poetry was occaſioned by accidentally reading Spenſer's Fairy Queen [A], a Poem fitter for the examination of men, than the conſideration of a child: but in him it met with a fancy the ſtrength of which was not to be judged by the number of his years (b). In the ſixteenth year of his age, being ſtill at Weſtminſter-ſchool, he publiſhed a collection of Verſes, under the title of Poetical Bloſſoms [B], in which there were many things that might well become the vigour and force of a manly wit [C]. It is remarkable of Mr. Cowley, what he himſelf tells us (c), that he had this defect in his memory, that (a) Wood, Faſti Oxon. vol. ii. col. 120.

(b) Sprat's Account of the Life and Writings of Mr. Abraham Cowley, prefixed to his Works, edit. Lond. 1721, 12*mo*. p. 3.

(c) In his Eſſay on himſelf. See his Works, vol. ii. p. 718.

[A] His firſt, and early, inclination to Poetry was occaſioned by accidentally reading Spenſer's Fairy Queen.] This we learn from our Poet himſelf. 'I believe, 'ſays he (1), I can tell the particular little chance 'that filled my head firſt with ſuch chimes of verſes, 'as have never ſince left ringing there: for I remember when I began to read, and take ſome pleaſure in 'it, there was wont to lye in my mother's parlour (I 'know not by what accident, for ſhe herſelf never in 'her life read any book but of devotion) but there was 'wont to lye Spenſer's Works: this I happened to fall 'upon, and was infinitely delighted with the ſtories of 'the knights, and giants, and monſters, and brave 'houſes, which I found every where (though my 'underſtanding had little to do with all this) and by 'degrees with the tinckling of the rhyme, and dance 'of the numbers; ſo that I think I had read him all 'over before I was twelve years old, and was thus 'made a Poet as immediately as a child is made an 'eunuch.'

(1) In his Eſſay on himſelf. See Mr. Cowley's Works, Lond. 1721, 12*mo*. vol. ii. p. 719.

[B] He publiſhed a collection of verſes under the title of Poetical Bloſſoms.] They were publiſhed at London in 1633 (2), and conſequently in Mr. Cowley's fifteenth year; ſo that Dr. Sprat is miſtaken in ſaying (3) this book came out in the thirteenth year of his age. It contains among other pieces, Antonius and Melida, and The tragical hiſtory of Pyramus and Thiſbe. The firſt is dedicated to Dr. Williams Biſhop of Lincoln, and the other to his maſter Mr. Lambert Oſbaldeſton. Before both is his picture, and his age ſet over it, viz. 13, but erroneous. There are prefixed ſome recommendatory verſes by ſome of his ſchool-fellows; and at the end are two Elegies, one on Dudley Lord Carleton, and the other on his kinſman Richard Clerk of Lincoln's-Inn; and A Dream of Elyſium (4).

(2) Wood, Faſti Oxon. vol. ii. col. 120.

(3) Account of the Life and Writings of Mr. Abraham Cowley, prefixed to his Works, p. 4.

(4) Wood, ibid.

[C] — In which there were many things that might well become the vigour and force of a manly wit.] Mr. Cowley himſelf has given us (5) a ſpecimen in the latter end of an Ode, written when he was but thirteen years of age. The beginning of it, ſays he, is boyiſh, but of this part which I here ſet down, if a very little were corrected, I ſhould hardly now be much aſhamed.

(5) In his Eſſay on himſelf, ubi ſupra, p. 718.

IX.

This only grant me, that my means may lye,
Too low for envy, for contempt too high.
Some honour I would have
Not from great deeds, but good alone:
The unknown are better than ill known.
Rumour can ope' the grave:
Acquaintance I wou'd have, but when't depends
Not on the number, but the choice of friends.

X.

Books ſhou'd, not buſineſs, entertain the light,
And ſleep, as undiſturb'd as death, the night:
My houſe a cottage, more
Than palace, and ſhou'd fitting be
For all my uſe, no luxury:
My garden painted o'er
With nature's hand, not art's; and pleaſures yield,
Horace might envy in his Sabine field.

XI.

Thus wou'd I double my life's fading ſpace,
For he that runs it well, twice runs his race.
And in this true delight,
Theſe unbought ſports, that happy ſtate,
I wou'd not fear, nor wiſh my fate;
But boldly ſay each night,
To-morrow let my ſun his beams diſplay,
Or in clouds hide them, I have liv'd to day.

You may ſee by it, adds Mr. Cowley, I was even then acquainted with the Poets, for the concluſion is taken out of Horace; and perhaps it was the immature and immoderate love of them, which ſtampt firſt, or rather engraved, the characters in me: they were like letters cut in the bark of a young tree, which with the tree ſtill grow proportionably.

his

his teachers could never bring him to retain the ordinary rules of grammar; the want of which however he abundantly supplied by an intimate acquaintance with the books themselves, whence those rules had been drawn. With these extraordinary hopes, he was removed to Trinity-college in Cambridge, being elected a Scholar of that House in 1636 (d). Here the continuance and progress of his wit gained him the love and esteem of the most eminent Members of that Society. His exercises of all kinds were highly applauded, with this peculiar praise, that they were fit, not only for the obscurity of an academical life, but to have appeared on the true theatre of the world. And here it was that he wrote, or at least laid the designs of most of those masculine works, which he afterwards finished. In 1638, he published his Love's Riddle [D], a pastoral comedy, and a Latin comedy intitled Naufragium Joculare [E], or the Merry Shipwreck. The first occasion of his entring into business, was, an Elegy he wrote On the death of Mr. William Harvey [F]; which brought him acquainted with Mr. John Harvey, the brother of his deceased friend, from whom he received many offices of kindness through the whole course of his life (e). In 1643, being then Master of Arts, he was, among many others, ejected from his College and the University; whereupon, retiring to Oxford, he settled in St. John's College, and, that same year, under the name of a Scholar of Oxford, published a Satire (f), intituled The Puritan and the Papist [G]. His affection to the Royal Cause engaged him in the service of the King, and he was present in several of his Majesty's journies and expeditions. By this means he gained an acquaintance and familiarity with the great men of the Court and the Gown, and particularly had the entire friendship of my Lord Falkland, one of the Principal Secretaries of State. During the heat of the Civil War, he was settled in the family of the Earl of St. Alban's [H], and accompanied the Queen-Mother, when she was obliged to retire into France. He was absent from his native country about ten years [I]; which were wholly spent either in bearing a share in the distresses of the Royal Family, or in labouring their affairs. To this purpose he took several dangerous journies into Jersey, Scotland, Flanders, Holland, and elsewhere; and was the principal instrument in maintaining a constant correspondence between the King and his Royal Consort, whose letters he cyphered and decyphered with his own hand (g). His Poems intituled The Mistress, were published at London in 1647, and his comedy called The Guardian, afterwards altered and published under the title of Cutter of Coleman-street [K], in 1650 (h). In 1656 (i), it

(d) Wood, ubi supra.

(e) Sprat's Account, &c. ubi supra, p. 4, 5.

(f) Wood, ubi supra.

(g) Life, &c. p. 5, 6, 7.
(h) Wood, ib.
(i) Id. ibid.

[D] His Love's Riddle.] It was written at the time of his being a King's Scholar in Westminster-School, and dedicated by a Copy of Verses to Sir Kenelm Digby, to whom he thus apologizes for it:

Take it as early fruits, which rare appear,
Though not half ripe, but worst of all the year;
And if it please your taste, my muse will say,
The birch, which crown'd her then, is grown a bay.

(6) Account of the English Dramatick Poets, Oxf. 1691, 8*vo*. p. 82.

Langbain pretends (6), it was first printed with his Poetical Blossoms, in 4*to*, London, 1633, and afterwards printed with the second volume of his works in folio 1681.

[E] His Latin Comedy, intitled Naufragium Joculare.] It was acted before the University of Cambridge by the members of Trinity-College, February the second, and printed the same year at London, in octavo (7).

(7) Id. ib. p. 86; and Wood, ubi supra, col. 121.

[F] His Elegy on the death of Mr. William Harvey.] There appears to have been the strictest and most intimate friendship between Mr. Cowley and that Gentleman (8):

(8) See the Elegy among Mr. Cowley's Miscellanies in vol. i. p. 20.

He was my friend, the truest friend on earth;
A strong and mighty influence joyn'd our birth;
Nor did we envy the most sounding name
By friendship given of old to fame.

Their conversation was chiefly employ'd in the improvement of their minds:

Say, for you saw us, ye immortal lights,
How oft unwearied have we spent the nights,
'Till the Ledæan stars so fam'd for Love
Wonder'd at us from above?

We spent them not in toys, in lusts, or wine;
But search of deep philosophy,
Wit, Eloquence, and Poetry,
Arts which I lov'd, for they, my friend, were thine.

Mr. Cowley tells us, he communicated his poems, as fast as he wrote them, to Mr. Harvey, for his approbation:

To him my muse made haste with ev'ry strain,
Whilst it was new, and warm yet from the brain:
He lov'd my worthless Rhimes, and like a friend
Wou'd find out something to commend.

[G] He publish'd a Satire, intitled The Puritan and the Papist.] It was printed in one sheet and a half in quarto, and re-published at London in 1682, in quarto, in a book intitled, Wit and Loyalty revived in a Collection of some smart Satires in verse and prose on the late times. The writer of the Preface to this book complains, that this Satire of Mr. Cowley's was not published by the Editor of his first Collection of Poems, for which he assigns two presumptive reasons. He wonders likewise, that the Poem called Brutus, and that upon the Bishop of Lincoln's Enlargement from the Tower, which he imagines not to have been written by Mr. Cowley (*), had met with such good fortune as to have a place there (9).

(*) They are inserted in all the editions of his Works.

(9) Wood, ubi supra.

[H] He was settled in the family of the Earl of St. Alban's.] Dr. Sprat tells us (10), Mr. Cowley was obliged for this settlement to Mr. John Harvey, brother of his deceased friend Mr. William Harvey (11). But Anthony Wood tells us (12), that when Mr. Cowley came to Paris, he fell into the acquaintance of Dr. Stephen Goffe, a brother of the Oratory, by whose means he was placed and preferred in that noble family.

(10) Life, &c. p. 5.
(11) See the remark [F].
(12) Ubi supra; and Fasti Oxon. vol. i. col. 271.

[I] He was absent from his native country about ten years.] I assign this space of time for Mr. Cowley's absence upon the authority of Mr. Wood, who assures us (13), he left Oxford a little before the surrender of that city to the Parliament; which being in the year 1646, and Mr. Cowley returning in 1656, he could not be absent a longer term; though the author of his Life pretends he was twelve years abroad.

(13) Ubi supra.

[K] His Comedy called The Guardian, afterwards altered and published under the title of Cutter of Coleman-street.] The Guardian was acted before Prince Charles at Trinity College in Cambridge, March the 12th, 1641, and printed at London, in 4*to*. in 1650 (14). Mr. Cowley, in the Preface to his Poems (15), complaining of the publication of some things of his without his consent or knowledge, and those so mangled and it was thought proper by thoſe, on whom Mr. Cowley depended, that he ſhould come over into England, and, under pretence of privacy and retirement, ſhould give notice of the poſture of affairs in this nation (k). Upon his return, he publiſhed a new edition of all his Poems, conſiſting of four parts; viz. I. Miſcellanies [L]: II. The Miſtreſs, or Several Copies of Love-Verſes [M]: III. Pindarique Odes, written in imitation of the Style and manner of Pindar [N]: IV. Davideis, a ſacred Poem of the troubles of David, in four books.

(14) Id. ibid.
(15) Printed after his return into England. See his Works, vol. i. p. 44.

(k) Life, &c. p. 7.

and imperfect, that he could neither with honour acknowledge, nor with honeſty quite diſavow them; adds: 'Of which ſort was a Comedy called The 'Guardian, made and acted before the Prince, in his 'paſſage through Cambridge towards York, at the be- 'ginning of the late unhappy war; or rather neither 'made nor acted, but rough-drawn only and repeated: 'for the haſte was ſo great, that it could neither be 'reviſed or perfected by the author, nor learned with- 'out book by the Actors, nor ſet forth in any meaſure 'tolerably by the Officers of the College.' This Mr. Cowley thought fit to acquaint the Prince with in the Prologue addreſs'd to him (16), which concludes with theſe lines:

(16) It is printed together with the Epilogue, among his Miſcellanies.

Accept our haſty zeal; a thing that's play'd
E'er 'tis a Play, and acted e'er 'tis made.
Our ignorance, but our duty too we ſhow;
I would all ignorant people wou'd do ſo!
At other times expect our wit and art:
This comedy is acted by the heart.

And in the Epilogue:

But pow'r your grace can above nature give:
It can give pow'r to make abortives live;
In which if our bold wiſhes ſhou'd be croſt,
'Tis but the life of one poor week 't has loſt:
Though it ſhou'd fall beneath your mortal ſcorn,
Scarce cou'd it dye more quickly than 'twas born.

(17) Preface, ubi ſupra, p. 44.

'After the repreſentation, ſays our author (17) (which 'I confeſs, was ſomewhat of the lateſt), I began to 'look it over, and changed it very much, ſtriking 'out ſome whole parts, as that of the Poet and the 'Soldier: but I have loſt the copy, and dare not think 'it deſerves the pains to write it again, which makes 'me omit it in this publication, though there be ſome 'things in it, which I am not aſhamed of, taking the 'excuſe of my age, and ſmall experience in human 'converſation, when I made it. But, as it is, it is 'only the haſty firſt-ſitting of a picture, and therefore 'like to reſemble me accordingly.' This Comedy, Langbaine tells us (18), notwithſtanding Mr. Cowley's modeſt opinion of it, was acted, not only at Cambridge, but ſeveral times afterwards privately, during the prohibition of the Stage, and, after the King's return, publickly at Dublin, and always with applauſe. It was this, probably, which put the author upon reviſing it; after which he permitted it to appear publickly upon the Stage, under a new title, as indeed it was in a manner a new Play, calling it Cutter of Coleman Street. Under this name, it was acted at his Royal Highneſs's theatre, and printed at London in 1663, in 4*to*. It met with ſome oppoſition at firſt from ſome, who envied the author's unſhaken loyalty: but afterwards it was acted with univerſal applauſe, and was generally eſteemed an excellent Comedy.

(18) Ubi ſupra, p. 81.

[L] His Miſcellanies.] 'Some of theſe, ſays our 'author (†), were made when I was very young, 'which it is perhaps ſuperfluous to tell the reader. I 'know not by what chance I have kept copies of them; 'for they are but a very few in compariſon with thoſe 'I have loſt, and I think have no extraordinary virtue 'in them, to deſerve more care in preſervation, than 'was beſtowed upon their brethren; for which I am 'ſo little concerned, that I am aſhamed of the arrogancy 'of the word, when I ſaid I had loſt them.' This Collection conſiſts of Odes, Elegies, &c. with ſome imitations of Horace and Martial; together with eleven Anacreontiques, or paraphraſtical imitations of Anacreon.

(†) Ibid. p. 51.

[M] His Miſtreſs, or ſeveral Copies of Love-verſes.] Let us firſt hear what our Poet himſelf ſays of this part of his compoſitions. 'Poets, ſays he (19),

(19) Ibid.

'are ſcarcely thought free-men of their company, 'without paying ſome duties, and obliging them- 'ſelves to be true to love. Sooner or later they muſt 'all paſs through that trial, like ſome Mahometan 'Monks, that are bound by their order, once at leaſt 'in their life, to make a pilgrimage to Mecca.

'In furias ignemque ruunt, amor omnibus idem.

'But we muſt not always make a judgment of their 'manners from their writings of this kind, as the 'Romaniſts uncharitably do of Beza for a few laſcivi- 'ous Sonnets compoſed by him in his youth. It is 'not in this ſenſe that Poeſie is ſaid to be a kind of 'painting: it is not the picture of the poet, but of 'things and perſons imagined by him. He may be 'in his practice and diſpoſition a philoſopher, and 'yet ſometimes ſpeak with the ſoftneſs of an amorous 'Sappho.

'Feret et rubus aſper amomum.

'He profeſſes too much the uſe of fable (though with- 'out the malice of deceiving) to have his teſtimony 'taken even againſt himſelf. Neither would I here 'be miſunderſtood, as if I affected ſo much gravity, as 'to be aſhamed to be thought really in love. On the 'contrary, I cannot have a good opinion of any man 'who is not at leaſt capable of being ſo. But I ſpeak 'it to excuſe ſome expreſſions (if ſuch there be) which 'may happen to offend the ſeverity of ſupercilious 'readers: for much exceſs is to be allowed in love, 'and even more in poetry, ſo we avoid the two un- 'pardonable vices in both, which are, obſcenity and 'profaneneſs, of which, I am ſure, if my words be 'ever guilty, they have ill repreſented my thoughts 'and intentions.' What opinion Dr. Sprat had of Mr. Cowley's Miſtreſs appears by the following paſſage (20). If there needed any excuſe to be made that his Love-verſes take up ſo great a ſhare in his works, it may be alledged, that they were compoſed when he was very young. But it is a vain thing to make any kind of apology for that ſort of writings. If devout or virtuous men will ſuperciliouſly forbid the minds of the young, to adorn thoſe ſubjects about which they are moſt converſant, they would put them out of all capacity of performing graver matters, when they come to them. For the exerciſes of all mens wits muſt be always proper for their age, and never too much above it: and by practice and uſe in lighter arguments they grow up at laſt to excel in the moſt weighty. I am not therefore aſhamed to commend Mr. Cowley's Miſtreſs. I only except one or two expreſſions, which I wiſh I could have prevailed with thoſe that had the right of the other edition, to have left out. But of all the reſt I dare boldly pronounce, that never yet ſo much was written on a ſubject ſo delicate, that can leſs offend the ſevereſt rules of morality. The whole paſſion of Love is intimately deſcribed, with all its mighty train of hopes, and joys, and diſquiets. Beſides this amorous tenderneſs, I know not how in every copy there is ſomething of more uſeful knowledge very naturally and gracefully inſinuated, and every where there may be ſomething found, to inform the minds of wiſe men, as well as to move the hearts of young men or women.

(20) See Life, &c. p. 15, 16.

[N] His Pindarique Odes, written in imitation of the ſtyle and manner of Pindar.] The occaſion of Mr. Cowley's falling on the Pindaric way of writing, Dr. Sprat tells us (21), was, his accidentally meeting with Pindar's works, in a place where he had no other books to direct him. Having then conſidered at leiſure the height of his invention, and the majeſty of his ſtyle, he tried immediately to imitate it in Engliſh. And he performed it (ſays my author) without the danger that Horace preſaged to the man who ſhould dare books [O]. Soon after his return, he was ſeized on, through a miſtake, the ſearch being intended dare to attempt it. Dr. Sprat then vindicates the ſtyle and manner of Mr. Cowley's Pindariques. 'If any, 'ſays he, are diſpleaſed at the boldneſs of his meta-'phors, and length of his digreſſions, they contend 'not againſt Mr. Cowley, but Pindar himſelf, who 'was ſo much reverenced by all antiquity, that the 'place of his birth was preſerved as ſacred, when his 'native city was twice deſtroyed by the fury of two 'conquerors. If the irregularity of the numbers diſ-'guſt them, they may obſerve, that this very thing 'makes that kind of poetry fit for all manner of ſub-'jects; for the pleaſant, the grave, the amorous, the 'heroic, the philoſophical, the moral, the divine. 'Beſides this they will find, that the frequent alteration 'of the rhythm and feet affects the mind with a more 'various delight, while it is ſoon apt to be tired by 'the ſettled pace of one conſtant meaſure. But that, 'for which I think this inequality of numbers is chiefly 'to be preferred, is, its nearer affinity with proſe; 'from which all other kinds of Engliſh verſe are ſo 'far diſtant, that it is very ſeldom found, that the 'ſame man excels in both ways. But now this looſe 'and unconfined meaſure has all the grace and har-'mony of the moſt confined. And withal it is ſo 'large and free, that the practice of it will only 'exalt, not corrupt, our proſe: which is certainly 'the moſt uſeful kind of writing of all others; for it 'is the ſtyle of all buſineſs and converſation.' Mr. Cowley himſelf, ſpeaking of his Pindaric Odes (22), tells us, he is in great doubt whether they will be underſtood by moſt readers, nay, even by very many, who are well enough acquainted with the common roads and ordinary tracks of poeſie. They either are, ſays he, or at leaſt were meant to be, of that kind of ſtyle, which Dion Halicarnaſſus calls μεγαλοφυὲς καὶ ἡδὺ μετὰ δεινότητος, and which he attributes to Alcæus. The digreſſions are many and ſudden, and ſometimes long, according to the faſhion of all Lyriques, and of Pindar above all men living. The figures are unuſual and bold, even to temerity, and ſuch as I durſt not have to do withal in any other kind of poetry. The numbers are various and irregular, and ſometimes (eſpecially ſome of the long ones) ſeem harſh and uncouth, if the juſt meaſures and cadencies be not obſerved in the pronunciation. So that almoſt all their ſweetneſs and numeroſity (which is to be found, if I miſtake not, in the roughеſt, if rightly repeated) lies in a manner wholly at the mercy of the reader. Mr. Cowley adds: 'I have briefly de-'ſcribed the nature of theſe verſes, in the Ode in-'titled The Reſurrection: and though the liberty of 'them may incline a man to believe them eaſy to be 'compoſed, yet the undertaker will find it otherwiſe:

(21) Ibid. p. 16.

(22) Preface, ubi ſupra, p. 52.

——— Ut ſibi quivis
Speret idem, ſudet multum, fruſtraque laboret
Auſus idem.

The verſes our author refers to are theſe:

Stop, ſtop, my muſe, allay thy vigorous heat
Kindled at a hint ſo great.
Hold thy Pindarique Pegaſus cloſely in,
Which does to rage begin,
And this ſteep hill wou'd gallop up with violent courſe.
'Tis an unruly and a hard-mouth'd horſe
Fierce and unbroken yet,
Impatient of the ſpur or bit:
Now prances ſtately, and anon flies o'er the place,
Diſdains the ſervile law of any ſettled pace,
Conſcious and proud of his own natural force:
'Twill no unſkilful touch endure,
But flings writer and reader too that ſits not ſure.

Two of our greateſt poets, at the ſame time that they allow Mr. Cowley to have been a very ſucceſsful Imitator of Pindar, yet find fault with his numbers. Mr. Dryden, having told us (23), that our author brought Pindaric verſe as near perfection as was poſſible in ſo ſhort a time, adds: 'But if I may be allowed to ſpeak 'my mind modeſtly, and without injury to his ſacred 'aſhes, ſomewhat of the purity of Engliſh, ſomewhat 'of more equal thoughts, ſomewhat of ſweetneſs 'in the numbers, in one word, ſomewhat of a finer 'turn and more Lyrical verſe is yet wanting.' And Mr. Congreve, having excepted againſt the irregularity of the meaſure of the Engliſh Pindaric Odes, yet obſerves (24), that the beauty of Mr. Cowley's verſes are an atonement for the irregularity of his Stanzas; and that though he did not imitate Pindar in the ſtrictneſs of his numbers, he has very often happily copied him in the force of his figures, and ſublimity of his ſtyle and ſentiments.

(23) Preface to the firſt Part of Miſcellany Poems, Lond. 1716, 12mo. p. 32, 33.

(24) Preface to his Pindarique Ode to the Queen. See his Works, vol. iii. p. 344, 345, edit. Lond. 1716, 12mo.

[O] His Davideis, a ſacred Poem of the troubles of David in four books.] Our poet tells us himſelf (25), he deſign'd to have written this poem in twelve books, not for the ſake of the twelve tribes, but after the pattern of Virgil, and to have cloſed it with that moſt poetical and admirable Elegy of David's on the death of Saul and Jonathan. 'This, ſays he, was the whole 'deſign, in which there are many noble and fertile 'arguments behind; as, The barbarous Cruelty of 'Saul to the Prieſts at Nob, the ſeveral flights and 'eſcapes of David, with the manner of his living in 'the wilderneſs, the Funeral of Samuel, the Love of 'Abigail, the ſacking of Ziklag, the loſs and recovery 'of David's wives from the Amalekites, the witch of 'Endor, the war with the Philiſtines, and the Battle 'of Gilboa; all which I meant to interweave upon 'ſeveral occaſions, with moſt of the illuſtrious ſtories 'of the Old Teſtament, and to embelliſh with the 'moſt remarkable Antiquities of the Jews, and of other 'nations before or at that age. But I have had nei-'ther leiſure hitherto, nor have appetite at preſent to 'finiſh the work, or ſo much as to reviſe that part, 'which is done, with that care, which I reſolved to 'beſtow upon it, and which the dignity of the matter 'deſerves.' After diſplaying the great excellence and dignity of his ſubject, Mr. Cowley complains very pathetically of the great proſtitution of poetry to mean and unworthy purpoſes, and recommends the choice of divine ſubjects in terms, which, ſurely, merit the ſerious conſideration of every ſon of Apollo. 'It is not without grief and indignation, ſays he, that 'I behold that divine Science employing all her inex-'hauſtible riches of wit and eloquence, either in 'wicked and beggarly flattery of great perſons, or 'the unmanly idolizing of fooliſh women, or the 'wretched affectation of ſcurril laughter, or at beſt 'on the confuſed antiquated dreams of ſenſeleſs fa-'bles and metamorphoſes. Amongſt all holy and 'conſecrated things, which the devil ever ſtole and 'alienated from the ſervice of the Deity, as, altars, 'temples, ſacrifices, prayers, and the like, there is 'none that he ſo univerſally and ſo long uſurped, as 'Poetry. It is time to recover it out of the tyrant's 'hands, and to reſtore it to the kingdom of God, who 'is the father of it. There wants, methinks, but 'the converſion of that, and the Jews, for the accom-'pliſhment of the kingdom of Chriſt.—I do not 'wonder that the old poets made ſome rich crops 'out of theſe grounds (*); the heart of the ſoil was 'was not then wrought out with continual tillage. 'But what can we expect now, who come a gleaning, 'not after the firſt reapers, but after the very beggars? 'Beſides, though thoſe mad ſtories of the Gods and 'Heroes ſeem in themſelves ſo ridiculous, yet they 'were then the whole body (or rather chaos) of the 'Theology of thoſe times. They were believed by 'all, but a few Philoſophers, and perhaps ſome 'Atheiſts, and ſerved to good purpoſe among the 'vulgar (as pitiful things as they are) in ſtrengthening 'the authority of Law with the terrors of conſcience, 'and expectation of certain rewards and unavoidable 'puniſhments. There was no other religion, and 'therefore that was better than none at all. But to 'us, who have no need of them, to us who deride their 'folly, and are wearied with their impertinences, 'they ought to appear no better arguments for verſe, 'than thoſe of their worthy ſucceſſors the Knights-'errant. What can we imagine more proper for the 'ornaments of wit and learning in the ſtory of tended after another gentleman of conſiderable note in the King's party. The Uſurpers would fain have brought over Mr. Cowley to their intereſt, but, all their attempts proving fruitleſs, he was committed to a ſevere reſtraint, and with ſome difficulty at laſt obtained his liberty, upon the hard terms of a thouſand pounds bail, which burthen Dr. Scarborough very honourably took upon himſelf. Under theſe bonds he continued till the general redemption; when, taking the opportunity of the confuſions that followed upon Cromwell's death, he ventured back into France, and there remained in the ſame ſtation as before, 'till near the time of the King's return (l). This account is a ſufficient vindication of Mr. Cowley's unſhaken loyalty, which ſome endeavoured to call in queſtion [P]. During his ſtay in England, he wrote his Two Books of Plants, publiſhed firſt in 1662; to which he afterwards added four books more; and all ſix, together with his other Latin Poems, were printed at London in 1678 [Q]. It appears by Mr. Wood's Faſti Oxonienſes that

(*) The fabulous Stories of Paganiſm.

(25) Preface, ubi ſupra, p. 53, 54.

(l) Ibid.

'Deucalion, than in that of Noah? Why will not 'the actions of Sampſon afford as plentiful matter as 'the labours of Hercules? Why is not Jephthah's 'daughter as good a woman as Iphigenia? and the 'friendſhip of David and Jonathan more worthy 'celebration, than that of Theſeus and Pirithous? Does 'not the paſſage of Moſes and the Iſraelites into the 'Holy Land, yield incomparably more poetical variety, 'than the voyages of Ulyſſes or Æneas? Are the 'obſolete thread-bare tales of Thebes and Troy, half ſo 'ſtored with great, heroical, and ſupernatural actions '(ſince verſe will needs find, or make ſuch) as the wars 'of Joſhua, of the Judges, of David, and divers 'others? Can all the Tranſformations of the gods 'give ſuch copious hints to flouriſh and expatiate on 'as the true miracles of Chriſt, or of his Prophets and 'Apoſtles? Why do I inſtance in theſe few particulars? All the Books of the Bible are either already 'moſt admirable and exalted pieces of Poeſie, or are 'the beſt materials in the world for it.' Mr. Cowley's Davideis was written, ſays Dr. Sprat (26), in ſo young an age, that, if we ſhall reflect on the vaſtneſs of the argument and his manner of handling it, he may ſeem like one of the miracles, that he there adorns, like a boy attempting Goliah.—This perhaps may be the reaſon, that in ſome places there is more youthfulneſs and redundance of fancy, than his riper judgment would have allowed—But for the main of it, I will affirm, that it is a better inſtance and beginning of a Divine Poem, than ever I yet ſaw in any language. The contrivance is perfectly antient, which is certainly the true form of heroic poetry, and ſuch as was never yet out-done by any new devices of modern wits. The ſubject was truly divine, even according to God's own heart. The matter of his invention, all the treaſures of knowledge and hiſtories of the Bible. The model of it comprehended all the learning of the Eaſt. The characters lofty and various: the numbers firm and powerful: the digreſſions beautiful and proportionable: the deſign, to ſubmit mortal wit to heavenly truths. In all there is an admirable mixture of human virtues and paſſions, with religious raptures. (26) Life, &c. p. 18.

'The truth is, adds the Lifewriter (27), methinks, 'in other matters his wit excelled moſt other mens; 'but in his Moral and Divine works it out-did itſelf. 'And no doubt it proceeded from this cauſe, that, 'in the lighter kinds of poetry, he chiefly repreſented the humours and affections of others; but in 'theſe he ſat to himſelf, and drew the figure of his 'own mind.' We have the Firſt Book of the Davideis tranſlated out of Engliſh into very elegant Latin verſe by Mr. Cowley himſelf. (27) Ibid. p. 19.

[P] Mr. Cowley's loyalty was called in queſtion.] This, Dr. Sprat tells us (28), was occaſioned by a few lines in the preface to one of his books. 'The ob-'jection, ſays he, I muſt not paſs by in ſilence, be-'cauſe it was the only part of his life that was liable 'to miſinterpretation, even by the confeſſion of thoſe 'that envyed his fame. In this caſe perhaps it were 'enough to alledge for him to men of moderate minds, 'that what he there ſaid was publiſhed before a book 'of poetry, and ſo ought rather to be eſteemed as a 'problem of his fancy and invention, than as a real 'image of his judgment. But his defence in this 'matter may be laid on a ſurer foundation. This is 'the true reaſon to be given of his delivering that 'opinion. Upon his coming over, he found the ſtate 'of the royal party very deſperate. He perceived 'the ſtrength of their enemies ſo united, that, 'till it 'ſhould begin to break within itſelf, all endeavours 'againſt it were like to prove unſucceſsful. On the 'other ſide, he beheld their zeal for his Majeſty's 'cauſe to be ſtill ſo active, that it often hurried them 'into inevitable ruin. He ſaw this with much grief; 'and though he approved their conſtancy as much as 'any man living, yet he found their unſeaſonable 'ſhewing it did only diſable themſelves, and give 'their adverſaries great advantages of riches and 'ſtrength by their defeats. He therefore believed 'that it would be a meritorious ſervice to the king, 'if any man, who was known to have followed his 'intereſt, could inſinuate into the uſurpers minds 'that men of his principles were now willing to be 'quiet, and could perſwade the poor oppreſſed Roy-'aliſts to conceal their affections for better occaſions. 'And as for his own particular, he was a cloſe priſoner 'when he wrote that againſt which the exception is 'made; ſo that he ſaw it was impoſſible for him to 'purſue the ends for which he came hither, if he did 'not make ſome kind of declaration of his peaceable 'intentions. This was then his opinion; and the 'ſucceſs of the thing ſeems to prove that it was not 'very ill grounded. For certainly it was one of the 'greateſt helps to the King's affairs, about the latter 'end of that tyranny, that many of his beſt friends 'diſſembled their counſels, and acted the ſame deſigns, 'under the diſguiſes and names of other parties.' This Sir, adds the Life-writer, addreſſing himſelf to Mr. Martin Clifford, you can teſtify to have been the innocent occaſion of theſe words, on which ſo much clamour was raiſed. Yet ſeeing his good intentions were ſo ill interpreted, he told me, the laſt time that ever I ſaw him, that he would have them omitted in the next impreſſion, of which his friend Mr. Cook is a witneſs. However, if we ſhould take them in the worſt ſenſe of which they are capable, yet methinks, for his maintaining one falſe tenet in the political philoſophy, he made a ſufficient atonement by a continual ſervice of twenty years, by the perpetual loyalty of his diſcourſe, and by many of his other writings, wherein he has largely defended and adorned the royal cauſe. And, to ſpeak of him not as our friend, but according to the common laws of humanity, certainly that life muſt needs be very unblameable, which had been tried in buſineſs of the higheſt conſequence, and practiſed in the hazardous ſecrets of Courts and Cabinets; and yet there can nothing diſgraceful be produced againſt it, but only the error of one paragraph, and a ſingle metaphor. (28) Ibid. p. 8.

[Q] His Books of Plants, and his other Latin Poems, &c.] The occaſion of his chooſing the ſubject of his ſix books of Plants, Dr. Spratt tells us (29), was this. When he returned into England, he was adviſed to diſſemble the main intention of his coming over, under the diſguiſe of applying himſelf to ſome ſettled profeſſion: and that of Phyſic was thought moſt proper. To this purpoſe, after many anatomical diſſections, he proceeded to the conſideration of Simples; and having furniſhed himſelf with books of that nature, he retired into a fruitful part of Kent, where every field and wood might ſhew him the real figures of thoſe Plants of which he read. Thus he ſpeedily maſtered that part of the Art of Medicine. But then, as one of the Antients did before him in the ſtudy of the Law, inſtead of employing his ſkill for practice and profit, he preſently digeſted it into that form which we behold. The two firſt books treat of Herbs, in a ſtyle reſembling the Elegies of Ovid and Tibullus, (29) Ibid. p. 21.

(m) Vol. ii. col. 120.

(m), that our Poet was created Doctor of Phyſic at Oxford [R], December 2, 1657. After the King's reſtoration, Mr. Cowley, being then paſt the fortieth year of his age, the greateſt part of which had been ſpent in a various and tempeſtuous condition, reſolved to paſs the remainder of his life in a ſtudious retirement [S]. At firſt he was but ſlenderly provided for ſuch a retreat, by reaſon of his travels, and the diſtreſſes of his party, which had put him quite out of the road of gain. But, upon the ſettlement of the peace of the nation, he obtained a plentiful eſtate through the favour of his principal patrons the Duke of Buckingham and the Earl of St. Albans. Thus furniſhed for his retreat, he ſpent the laſt ſeven or eight years of his life in his beloved obſcurity [T], and poſſeſſed that ſolitude, which from his very childhood he had moſt paſſionately deſired (n). He choſe for the ſeats of his declining life, two or three villages on the banks of the Thames (o); particularly Chertſey, where he had a leaſe of a farm held of the Queen (p). This great Poet died [U] at a houſe called (n) Life, &c. p. 10, 11, 12.

(o) Ibid. p. 12.
(p) Ubi ſupra.

Tibullus, in the ſweetneſs and freedom of the verſe, but excelling them in the ſtrength of the fancy and vigour of the ſenſe. The third and fourth diſcourſe of Flowers, in all the variety of Catullus and Horace's numbers: for the laſt of which authors he had a peculiar reverence, and imitated him, not only in the numerous and ſtately pace of his Odes and Epodes, but in the familiar eaſineſs of his Epiſtles and Diſcourſes. The two laſt ſpeak of Trees, in the way of Virgil's Georgicks. Of theſe the ſixth book is wholly dedicated to the honour of his country. For, making the Britiſh Oak to preſide in the Aſſembly of the Foreſt Trees, upon that occaſion he enlarges on the hiſtory of our late troubles, the King's affliction and return, and the beginning of the Dutch War; and manages all in a ſtyle, that (to ſay all in a word) is equal to the greatneſs and valour of the Engliſh nation. Of Mr. Cowley's Latin Poetry in general the Life-writer gives this character (30), that in them 'he has 'expreſſed to admiration all the numbers of verſe, 'and figures of poeſie, that are ſcattered up and down 'amongſt the antients;' and that 'there is hardly to 'be found in them any good faſhion of ſpeech, or 'colour of meaſure, but he has comprehended it, and 'given inſtances of it, according as his ſeveral arguments required either a majeſtic ſpirit, or a paſſionate, or a pleaſant. This (he obſerves) is the 'more extraordinary, in that it was never yet performed by any ſingle poet of the antient Romans 'themſelves.'

(30) Life, &c. p. 19.

[R] He was created Doctor of Phyſic at Oxford.] Anthony Wood pretends (31), Mr. Cowley had this degree conferred upon him by virtue of a Mandamus from the then government. 'Afterwards (ſays he) 'complying with the men then in power (which was 'much taken notice of by the Royal party) he ob'tained an order to be created Doctor of Phyſic.' Allowing this ſtate of the fact to be true, though the Life-writer ſays not a word of it, Mr. Cowley's compliance with the men then in power could only be ſeemingly ſuch, for the better carrying on the deſign of his coming over under the pretence of ſtudying Phyſic.

(31) Ubi ſupra.

[S] He reſolved to paſs the remainder of his life in a ſtudious retirement.] Anthony Wood (32) aſcribes this reſolution to diſappointment, in not finding that preferment conferred upon him, which he expected, while others for their money carried away moſt places. But Dr. Sprat (33) repreſents his retirement as the effect of choice, not of diſcontent. 'He now thought, 'ſays that author, he had ſacrificed enough of his 'life to curioſity and experience. He had enjoyed 'many excellent occaſions of obſervation. He had 'been preſent in many great revolutions, which in 'that tumultuous time diſturbed the peace of all our 'neighbour ſtates, as well as our own. He had nearly 'beheld all the ſplendor of the higheſt part of mankind. He had lived in the preſence of princes, and 'familiarly converſed with greatneſs in all its degrees, 'which was neceſſary for one that would contemn it 'aright: for to ſcorn the pomp of the world before a 'man knows it, does commonly proceed rather from 'ill manners than a true magnanimity. He was now 'weary of the vexations and formalities of an active 'condition. He had been perplexed with a long compliance to foreign manners. He was ſatiated with 'the arts of Court; which ſort of life, though his 'virtue had made innocent to him, yet nothing could 'make it quiet. Theſe were the reaſons that moved 'him to forego all public employments, and to follow 'the violent inclination of his own mind, which, in 'the greateſt throng of his former buſineſs, had ſtill 'called upon him, and repreſented to him the true 'delights of ſolitary ſtudies, of temperate pleaſures, 'and of a moderate revenue, below the malice and 'flatteries of fortune.'

(32) Ibid.

(33) Life, &c. p. 10.

[T] His beloved obſcurity.] Mr. Cowley's Works, eſpecially his Eſſays in proſe and verſe, abound with the praiſes of ſolitude and retirement. His three firſt Eſſays are on the ſubjects of Liberty, Solitude, and Obſcurity; and moſt of the tranſlations are of ſuch paſſages of the Claſſic authors as relate to the pleaſures of a country life: particularly, Virgil's O fortunatos nimium, &c. Horace's Beatus ille qui procul, &c. The ſame author's Country Mouſe; Claudian's Old Man of Verona; and Martial's Vitam quæ faciunt beatiorem, &c. To theſe are ſubjoined the following epitaph, by the author, on himſelf, while living.

Epitaphium Vivi Auctoris.

Hic, O Viator, ſub Lare parvulo
Couleius hic eſt conditus, hic jacet
Defunctus humani laboris
Sorte, ſupervacuaque vita;
Non indecora pauperie nitens
Et non inerti nobilis otio,
Vanoque dilectis popello
Divitiis animoſus hoſtis.
Poſſis ut illum dicere mortuum,
En terra jam nunc quantula ſufficit!
Exempta ſit curis, viator,
Terra ſit illa levis, precare.
Hic ſparge flores, ſparge breves roſas,
Nam vita gaudet mortua floribus;
Herbiſque odoratis corona
Vatis adhuc cinerem calentem.

[U] He died.] His ſolitude, from the very beginning, had never agreed ſo well with the conſtitution of his body, as of his mind. The chief cauſe of it was, that, out of haſte to be gone away from the tumult and noiſe of the city, he had not prepared ſo healthful a ſituation in the country, as he might have done, if he had made his choice more at leiſure. Of this he ſoon began to find the inconvenience at Barn-elms, where he was afflicted with a dangerous and lingering fever. After that he ſcarcely ever recovered his former health, though his mind was reſtored to its perfect vigour. Shortly after his removal to Chertſey, he fell into another conſuming diſeaſe. Having languiſhed under this for ſome months, he ſeemed to be pretty well cured of its ill ſymptoms. But, in the heat of the ſummer, by ſtaying too long amongſt his labourers in the meadows, he was taken with a violent defluxion, and ſtoppage in his breaſt and throat. This he at firſt neglected as an ordinary cold, and refuſed to ſend for his uſual phyſicians, 'till it was paſt all remedies; and ſo, in the end, after a fortnight's ſickneſs, it proved mortal to him (34). 'Who can here 'forbear exclaiming on the weak hopes, and frail 'condition of human nature? For as long as Mr. 'Cowley was purſuing the courſe of ambition, in an 'active life, which he ſcarce eſteemed his true life, 'he never wanted a conſtant health and ſtrength of 'body. But as ſoon as ever he had found an opportunity of beginning indeed to live, and to enjoy himſelf called The Porch-houſe, towards the Weſt end of the town of Chertſey in Surrey, July 28, 1667, in the forty-ninth year of his age. His body, accompanied by a great number of perſons of the moſt eminent quality, was interred, the third of Auguſt following, in Weſtminſter-Abbey, near the aſhes of Chaucer and Spenſer, the two moſt famous Engliſh Poets of former times (q). King Charles II. was pleaſed to beſtow upon him the beſt epitaph, when, upon the news of his death, his Majeſty declared, that Mr. Cowley had not left a better man behind him in England (r). A monument was erected to his memory, in May 1675, by George Duke of Buckingham, with a Latin inſcription written by his friend Dr. Thomas Sprat [W], author of the Account of Mr. Cowley's Life and Writings, prefixed to his Works, and afterwards Biſhop of Rocheſter. Beſides Mr. Cowley's Works, already mentioned, we have by the ſame hand, A Propoſition for the Advancement of Experimental Philoſophy [X]; A Diſcourſe by way of Viſion concerning the government of Oliver Cromwell [Y]; and Several Diſcourſes by way of Eſſays in proſe and verſe [Z]. Mr. Cowley had deſigned alſo a Diſcourſe concerning Style [AA], and a Review of the principles of the primitive Chriſtian Church [BB], but was prevented by death (s). A ſpurious piece, entitled (q) Life, &c. p. 32, 33; and Wood, ubi ſupra.

(34) Ibid. p. 32.

(r) Life, &c. p. 34.
(s) Ib. p. 30, 31.

' himſelf in ſecurity, his contentment was firſt broken ' by ſickneſs, and at laſt his death was occaſioned by ' his very delight in the country and the fields, which ' he had long fancied above all other pleaſures (35).'

(35) Life, &c. p. 32.

[W] An inſcription on his monument, written by his friend Dr. Thomas Sprat.] It is this:

Abrahamus Couleius, Anglorum Pindarus, Flaccus, Maro, Deliciæ, Decus, Deſiderium, ævi ſui, hic juxta ſitus eſt.

Aurea dum volitant late tua ſcripta per orbem,
Et fama æternum vivis, divine Poeta,
Hic placida jaceas requie: cuſtodiat urnam
Cana Fides, vigilentque perenni lampade Muſæ.
Sit ſacer iſte locus, nec quis temerarius auſit
Sacrilega turbare manu venerabile buſtum.
Intacti maneant, maneant per ſæcula, dulcis
Couleii cineres, ſerventque immobile ſaxum.

Sic vovit, votumque ſuum apud poſteros ſacratum eſſe voluit, qui viro incomparabili poſuit ſepulchrale marmor, Georgius Dux Buckinghamiæ.

Exceſſit e vita anno ætatis ſuæ 49, et honorifica pompa elatus ex ædibus Buckinghamianis, viris illuſtribus omnium ordinum exequias celebrantibus, ſepultus eſt die 3 M. Auguſti, Anno Domini 1667.

[X] A Propoſition for the advancement of Experimental Philoſophy.] It is by a College, conſiſting of Profeſſors, Scholars, Chaplains, and other officers. Their buſineſs, to uſe Mr. Cowley's own words (36), ſhould be, to ſtudy the improvement and advantage of all other profeſſions, from that of the higheſt General, even to the loweſt artiſan——to employ their whole time, wit, learning, and induſtry, to theſe four, the moſt uſeful that can be imagined, and to no other ends: Firſt, to weigh, examine, and prove, all things of nature delivered to us by former ages; to detect, explode, and ſtrike a cenſure through all falſe monies, with which the world has been paid and cheated ſo long, and, as I may ſay, to ſet the mark of the college upon all true coins, that they may paſs hereafter without any farther tryal: Secondly, to recover the loſt inventions, and, as it were, drowned lands of the antients: Thirdly, to improve all arts, which we now have; and laſtly, to diſcover others, which we yet have not.

(36) Works, &c. vol. ii. p. 577.

[Y] A Diſcourſe by way of Viſion concerning the government of Oliver Cromwell.] Our author, having been a ſpectator of Cromwell's funeral proceſſion (which, to his thinking, ſomewhat repreſented the life of him for whom it was made: much noiſe, much tumult, much expence, much magnificence, much vain-glory; briefly a great ſhow, and yet, after all this, but an ill fight;) tells us, he was rocked aſleep by the different motions and agitations of his mind, and at laſt fell into this viſion. He finds himſelf on the top of a famous hill in the iſland of Mona, whence he had a proſpect of Great Britain and Ireland. After ſome melancholy reflections, and a poetical complaint of the preſent unhappy condition of theſe kingdoms, he is interrupted by a ſtrange and terrible apparition of the figure of a man, riſing out of the earth, taller than any giant. This phantom, which is there deſcribed at length, calls himſelf the North Weſt Principality, and Protector of the Common-wealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and undertakes the defence of Cromwell's character and government, againſt the ſevere cenſures and keen invectives of the author, who repreſents both in the blackeſt and moſt deteſtable colours. At laſt, the Evil Angel's fury being raiſed, the author is in great danger, but is preſerved by the deſcent of a good angel, the poetical deſcription of which concludes the viſion.

[Z] Several Diſcourſes, by way of Eſſays, in proſe and verſe.] Theſe, which are upon ſome of the graveſt ſubjects that concern the contentment of a virtuous mind, he intended, Dr. Sprat tells us (37), as a real character of his own thoughts upon the point of his retiring (38). Accordingly, it is obſervable, that, in the proſe of them, there is little curioſity of ornament; but they are written in a lower and humbler ſtyle than the reſt, and, as an unfeigned image of the ſoul ſhould be drawn, without flattery. He deſigned to have added many others to them, and to have dedicated them all to the Earl of St. Alban's, as a teſtimony of his entire reſpect to him, and a kind of apology for having left human affairs in the ſtrength of his age, while he might ſtill have been ſerviceable to his country.

(37) Life, &c. p. 24.
(38) See the remark [T].

[AA] He deſigned A Diſcourſe concerning Style.] In this he had deſigned to give an account of the proper ſorts of writing, that were fit for all manner of arguments; to compare the perfections and imperfections of the authors of antiquity with thoſe of the moderns; and to accommodate the whole to the particular uſe of the Engliſh Genius and Language (39). ' This ' ſubject, adds Dr. Sprat, he was very fit to perform, ' it being moſt proper for him to be the judge, who ' had been the beſt practiſer. But he ſcarce lived to ' draw the firſt lines of it. All the footſteps that I ' can find remaining of it, are only ſome indigeſted ' characters of antient and modern authors. And ' now for the future, I almoſt deſpair ever to ſee it ' well accompliſhed.'

(39) Life, &c. p. 30.

[BB]——and a Review of the principles of the primitive Chriſtian Church.] Though Mr. Cowley was in his practice exactly obedient to the uſages and precepts of the Church of England, nor was inclined to any uncertainty and doubt, as abhorring all contention in indifferent things, and much more in ſacred; yet, beholding the diviſions of Chriſtendom, and obſerving how many controverſies had been introduced by zeal and ignorance, and continued by faction; he had therefore an earneſt intention, for the eſtabliſhing his own mind in the faith he profeſſed, to look back to the original principles of the primitive Church; believing that every true Chriſtian had no better means to ſettle his ſpirit, than that which was propoſed to Æneas and his followers, to be the end of their wandrings, Antiquam exquirite matrem. This examination he purpoſed ſhould reach to our Saviour's and the Apoſtles lives, and their immediate ſucceſſors, for four or five Centuries, till intereſt and policy prevailed over Devotion. He hoped to have abſolutely compaſſed it in three or four years, and, when intituled The Iron Age, was publiſhed under Mr. Cowley's name [CC], during his abſence; and, in Mr. Dryden's Miſcellany Poems (t), we find A Poem on the Civil War, ſaid to be written by our author [DD], but not extant in any edition of his works. Dr. Sprat mentions, as very excellent in their kind, Mr. Cowley's Letters to his private friends [EE], none of which were publiſhed (u). That author gives us a moſt advantageous character of Mr. Cowley, both as a man [FF], and as a Poet [GG]. Mr. Addiſon has celebrated his when that was done, there to have fixed for ever, without any ſhaking or alteration in his judgment (40). 'Indeed, adds Dr. Sprat, it was a great damage to our Church, that he lived not to perform it. For very much of the primitive light might have been expected from a mind that was endued with the primitive meekneſs and innocence. And beſides, ſuch a work, coming from one that was no Divine, might have been very uſeful for an age, wherein it is one of the principal cavils againſt religion, that it is only a matter of intereſt, and only ſupported for the gain of a particular profeſſion.'

(t) P. iii. p. 225. edit. 1716.

(u) Life, &c. p. 23.

(40) Life, &c. p. 31.

[CC] A ſpurious piece, intituled The Iron age, was publiſhed under Mr. Cowley's name.] He ſpeaks of it himſelf (41), with ſome aſperity and concern. 'I wondered, ſays he, how one, who could be ſo fooliſh to write ſuch ill verſes, ſhould yet be ſo wiſe to ſet them forth as another man's rather than his own; though perhaps he might have made a better choice, and not fathered the baſtard upon ſuch a perſon, whoſe ſtock of reputation is, I fear, little enough for maintainance of his own numerous legitimate off-ſpring of that kind. It would have been much leſs injurious, if it had pleaſed the author to put forth ſome of my writings under his own name, rather than his own under mine. He had been in that a more pardonable Plagiary, and had done leſs wrong by robbery, than he does by ſuch a bounty: for no body can be juſtified by the imputation even of another's merit: our own coarſe cloaths are like to become us better than thoſe of another man, though never ſo rich. But theſe, to ſay the truth, were ſo beggarly, that I myſelf was aſhamed to wear them. It was in vain for me, that I avoided cenſure by the concealment of my own writings, if my reputation could be thus executed in effigy; and impoſſible it is for any good name to be ſafe, if the malice of witches have the power to conſume and deſtroy it in an image of their own making. This indeed was ſo ill made, and ſo unlike, that I hope the charm took no effect.'

(41) In the Preface to his Poems. See his Works, vol. i.

[DD] A Poem on the Civil War, ſaid to be written by our author.] It was printed, firſt, at London, in quarto, in 1679 (42). The publiſher tells us (43), that, meeting accidentally with this poem in manuſcript, and being informed that it was a piece of the incomparable Mr. Abraham Cowley's, he thought it unjuſt to hide ſuch a treaſure from the world. 'I remembered, ſays he, that our author, in the Preface to his Works, makes mention of ſome poems, written by him on the late Civil Wars, of which the following is unqueſtionably a part. In his moſt imperfect and unfiniſhed pieces you will diſcover the hand of ſo great a maſter. And (whatever his own modeſty might have adviſed to the contrary) there is not one careleſs ſtroke of his, but what ſhould be kept ſacred to all poſterity. He could write nothing that was not worth the preſerving, being habitually a poet, and always inſpired. In this piece the judicious reader will find the turn of verſe to be his; the ſame copious and lively imagery of fancy, the ſame warmth of paſſion, and delicacy of wit, that ſparkles in all his writings. And certainly no labour of a Genius ſo rich in itſelf, and ſo cultivated with learning and manners, can prove an unwelcome preſent to the World.' The paſſage of Mr. Cowley's Preface, here pointed at, is this. I 'have caſt away all ſuch pieces as I wrote during the time of the late troubles, with any relation to the differences that cauſed them; as among others, Three Books of the Civil War itſelf, reaching as far as the firſt Battle of Newbury, where the ſucceeding misfortunes of the party ſtopped the work.'

(42) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(43) In the Pref.

[EE] His Letters to his private friends.] Let us hear Dr. Sprat. 'In theſe he always expreſſed the native tenderneſs and innocent gaiety of his mind. 'I think, Sir (*), you and I have the greateſt collection of this ſort. But I know you agree with me, that nothing of this nature ſhould be publiſhed: and herein you have always conſented to approve the modeſt judgment of our countrymen, above the practice of ſome of our neighbours, and chiefly of the French. I make no manner of queſtion, but the Engliſh, at this time, are infinitely improved this way, above the ſkill of former ages, nay of all the countries round about us, that pretend to greater eloquence. Yet they have been always judiciouſly ſparing in printing ſuch compoſures, while ſome other witty nations have tired all their preſſes, and readers, with them. The truth is, the letters that paſs between particular friends, if they are written as they ought to be, can ſcarce ever be fit to ſee the light. They ſhould not conſiſt of fulſome compliments, or tedious politicks, or elaborate elegancies, or general fancies: but they ſhould have a native clearneſs and ſhortneſs, a domeſtic plainneſs, and a peculiar kind of familiarity; which can only affect the humour of thoſe for whom they were intended. The very ſame paſſages which make writings of this nature delightful among friends, will loſe all manner of taſte, when they come to be read by thoſe that are indifferent. In ſuch letters the ſouls of men ſhould appear undreſſed: and in that negligent habit they may be fit to be ſeen by one or two in a chamber, but not to go abroad into the ſtreets (44).'

(*) Addreſſing himſelf to Mr. Clifford.

(44) Life, &c. p. 23, 24.

[FF] His character, as a man.] He had a perfect natural goodneſs, which neither the uncertainties of his condition, nor the largeneſs of his wit could pervert. Nothing vain or fantaſtical, nothing flattering or inſolent, appeared in his humour. Nor was there any thing affected or ſingular in his habit, or perſon, or geſture. He underſtood the forms of good breeding enough to practiſe them, without burthening himſelf or others. He never had any emulation for fame, or contention for profit, with any man. His modeſty and humility were ſo great, that, if he had not had many other equal virtues, they might have been thought diſſimulation. His converſation was ſuch, as was rather admired by his familiar friends, than by ſtrangers at firſt ſight. In his ſpeech, neither the pleaſantneſs excluded gravity, nor was the ſobriety of it inconſiſtent with delight. He governed his paſſions with great moderation. Whatever he diſliked in others, he only corrected it by the ſilent reproof of a better practice. His wit was ſo tempered, that no man had ever reaſon to wiſh it had been leſs. He never willingly recited any of his writings; and none but his intimate friends ever diſcovered he was a great poet by his diſcourſe. His learning was large and profound, and fat exceeding cloſe and handſome upon him: it was not emboſſed on his mind, but enamelled. He never guided his life by the whiſpers, or opinions of the world. He was a paſſionate lover of liberty, and freedom from reſtraint both in actions and words. But what honeſty others receive from the direction of laws, he had by native inclination. He performed all his natural and civil duties with admirable tenderneſs. His friendſhips were inviolable: his thoughts never above nor below his condition. In a word, he was accompliſhed with all manner of abilities, for the greateſt buſineſs, if he would but have thought ſo himſelf (45).

(45) Ibid. p. 36, 37, 38.

[GG] —as a Poet.] In all the ſeveral ſhapes of his ſtyle, there is very much of the likeneſs and impreſſion of the ſame mind; the ſame unaffected modeſty, and natural freedom, and eaſy vigour and chearful paſſions, and innocent mirth, which appeared in all his manners. If he was not wonderfully curious in the choice and elegance of his words, on the other ſide he had no manner of affectation in them, but took them as he found them made to his hands. If his verſes in his praiſes with a mixture of blame [HH]. Sir John Denham has given us a fine copy of verſes on his death and burial among the antient Poets [II]; and Mr. Pope has ſome places ſeem not as ſoft and flowing, as ſome would have them, it was his choice, not his fault. Where the matter required it, he was as gentle as any man; but where higher virtues were chiefly to be regarded, an exact numeroſity was not then his main care. He had a perfect maſtery in both the languages in which he wrote, and excelled both in proſe and verſe. Though his fancy flowed with great ſpeed, he never runs his reader, nor his argument, out of breath, but always leaves off in ſuch a manner, that it appears it was in his power to have ſaid more. His invention is powerful, but ſeems all to ariſe out of the nature of the ſubject, and to be juſt fitted for the thing of which he ſpeaks. The variety of arguments that he has managed is ſo large, that there is ſcarcely any particular of the paſſions of men, or works of nature and providence, which he has paſſed by undeſcribed: yet to all theſe matters, ſo wide aſunder, he ſtill proportions a due figure of ſpeech, and a proper meaſure of wit (46). Whether Mr. Cowley's works have been always viewed in the ſame favourable light, will be ſeen in the following remark.

(46) Ibid. p. 13, 14, 15.

[HH] Mr. Addiſon celebrates his praiſes with a mixture of blame.] It is in his Account of the greateſt Engliſh Poets, addreſſed to Mr. Henry Sacheverell, April 3, 1694 (47). The Lines are theſe.

(47) See Mr. Addiſon's Works, edit. 12*mo.* 1726, vol. i. p. 35.

Great Cowley then, a mighty Genius, wrote,
O'errun with wit, and laviſh of his thought:
His turns too cloſely on the reader preſs;
He more had pleas'd us, had he pleas'd us leſs.
One glittering thought no ſooner ſtrikes our eyes
With ſilent wonder, but new wonders riſe;
As in the milky way a ſhining white
O'erflows the heav'ns with one continued light;
That not a ſingle ſtar can ſhew his rays,
Whilſt jointly all promote the common blaze.
Pardon, great poet, that I dare to name
Th' unnumber'd beauties of thy verſe with blame.
Thy fault is only wit in its exceſs;
But wit like thine in any ſhape will pleaſe.
What Muſe but thine can equal hints inſpire,
And fit the deep mouth'd Pindar to thy lyre?
Pindar, whom others in a labour'd ſtrain,
And forc'd expreſſions, imitate in vain.
Well-pleas'd in thee he ſoars with new delight,
And plays in more unbounded verſe, and takes a nobler flight.
Bleſt man! whoſe ſpotleſs life and charming lays Employ'd the tuneful prelate in thy praiſe.
Bleſt man! who now ſhall be for ever known
In Sprat's ſucceſsful labours and thy own.

In one of the notes on this author's tranſlations from Ovid's Metamorphoſes (48), we have the following account of the nature of mixed wit, of which Ovid, he tells us, among the antients, was the greateſt admirer, as our Cowley was among the moderns. 'Mr. Locke, 'in his Eſſay of Human Underſtanding, has given us 'the beſt account of wit in ſhort that can any where 'be met with. Wit, ſays he, lyes in the aſſemblage of 'Ideas, and putting thoſe together with quickneſs and 'variety, wherein can be found any reſemblance or 'congruity, thereby to make up pleaſant pictures and 'agreeable viſions in the fancy. Thus does true wit, 'as this incomparable author obſerves, conſiſt in the 'likeneſs of Ideas, and is more or leſs wit, as this 'likeneſs is more ſurprizing and unexpected. But as 'true wit is nothing elſe but a ſimilitude in Ideas, ſo 'is falſe wit the ſimilitude in words, whether it lyes 'in the likeneſs of letters only, as in anagram and 'acroſtic; or of ſyllables, as in Doggrel rhimes; or 'whole words, as Puns, Echo's and the like. Be'ſides theſe two kinds of falſe and true wit, there is 'another of a middle nature, that has ſomething of 'both in it: when in two Ideas, that have ſome re'ſemblance with each other, and are both expreſſed 'by the ſame word, we make uſe of the ambiguity of 'the word, to ſpeak that of one Idea included under 'it, which is proper to the other. Thus, for example, 'moſt languages have hit on the word which properly 'ſignifies Fire, to expreſs Love by, (and therefore we 'may be ſure there is ſome reſemblance in the Ideas 'mankind have of them;) from hence the witty poets 'of all languages, when they have once called Love a 'Fire, conſider it no longer as the paſſion, but ſpeak 'of it under the notion of a real fire, and, as the turn 'of wit requires, make the ſame word in the ſame 'ſentence ſtand for either of the ideas that is annexed 'to it. When Ovid's Apollo falls in love, he burns 'with a new flame; when the Sea-nymphs languiſh 'with this paſſion, they kindle in the water: the 'Greek Epigrammatiſt fell in love with one that flung 'a ſnow-ball at him, and therefore takes occaſion to 'admire how fire could be thus concealed in ſnow. 'In ſhort whenever the poet feels any thing in his love 'that reſembles ſomething in fire, he carries on this 'agreement into a kind of allegory: but if, as in the 'preceding inſtances, he finds any circumſtances in 'his love contrary to the nature of fire, he calls his 'love a fire, and by joining this circumſtance to it, 'ſurprizes his reader with a ſeeming contradiction.' Mr. Addiſon tells us elſewhere (49), that this ſort of wit abounds in Cowley, more than in any other author that ever wrote; and he gives us ſome examples of it, all borrowed from our Poet's Miſtreſs. He remarks, that 'Cowley, obſerving the cold regard of his 'miſtreſs's eyes, and at the ſame time their power of 'producing love, in him, conſiders them as burning-'glaſſes made of ice; and finding himſelf able to live 'in the greateſt extremities of love concludes the tor'rid zone to be habitable. When his miſtreſs has 'read his letter written in juice of lemon, by holding 'it to the fire, he deſires her to read it over a ſecond 'time by love's flames. When ſhe weeps, he wiſhes 'it were inward heat that diſtilled thoſe drops from 'the limbeck. When ſhe is abſent, he is beyond 'eighty, that is, thirty degrees nearer the pole, than 'when ſhe is with him. His ambitious love is a fire, 'that naturally mounts upwards; his happy love is 'the beams of heaven, and his unhappy love flames 'of hell. When it does not let him ſleep, it is a 'flame, that ſends up no ſmoke; when it is oppoſed 'by counſel and advice, it is a fire, that rages the 'more by the wind's blowing upon it. Upon the 'dying of a tree, in which he had cut his loves, he 'obſerves, that his written flames had burnt up and 'withered the tree. When he reſolves to give over 'his paſſion, he tells us, that one burnt like him for 'ever dreads the fire. His heart is an Ætna, that 'inſtead of Vulcan's ſhop incloſes Cupid's forge in 'it. His endeavouring to drown his love in wine, 'is throwing oil upon the fire. He would inſinuate 'to his miſtreſs, that the fire of love, like that of the 'ſun, (which produces ſo many living creatures) 'ſhould not only warm, but beget. Love, in another 'place, cooks pleaſure at his fire. Sometimes the 'poet's heart is frozen in every breaſt, and ſometimes 'ſcorched in every eye. Sometimes he is drowned 'in tears, and burnt in love, like a ſhip ſet on fire in 'the middle of the ſea.' The reader may obſerve, concludes Mr. Addiſon, in every one of theſe inſtances, that the poet mixes the qualities of fire with thoſe of love; and in the ſame ſentence ſpeaking of it both as a paſſion and as a real fire, ſurprizes the reader with theſe ſeeming reſemblances or contradictions, that make up all the wit in this kind of writing. He acknowledges, however, that the poet, out of whom he had taken theſe examples of mixed wit, had as much true wit as any author that ever wrote, and indeed all other talents of an extraordinary genius.

(48) Ib. p. 248.

(49) Spectator, vol. i. No. 62.

[II] Sir John Denham's verſes on Mr. Cowley's death and burial among the antient poets.] They contain the following Elegy on our bard (50).

(50) Denham's Poems, p. 90.

Old mother wit, and nature gave Shakeſpeare and Fletcher all they have;
In Spenſer and in Jonſon, Art
Of flower nature got the ſtart.

But

has paid the tribute of verſe to his memory, in his Windſor-Foreſt [KK].

But both in him ſo equal are,
None knows which bears the happieſt ſhare.
To him no author was unknown,
Yet what he wrote was all his own:
He melted not the antient gold,
Nor, with Ben Jonſon, did make bold
To plunder all the Roman ſtores,
Of Poets and of Orators.
Horace's wit, and Virgil's ſtate
He did not ſteal, but emulate;
And when he wou'd like them appear,
Their garb, but not their cloaths, did wear.
He not from Rome alone, but Greece,
Like Jaſon, brought the Golden Fleece.
On a ſtiff gale (as Flaccus ſings)
The Theban Swan extends his wings,
When thro' th' ætherial clouds he flies:
To the ſame pitch our Swan doth riſe;
Old Pindar's flights by him new reach'd,
When on that gale his wings are ſtretch'd.

[KK] Mr. Pope has paid the tribute of verſe to his memory, in his Windſor-Foreſt.] The lines are theſe (51):

(51) Pope's Works, 12*mo.* edit. 1736, vol. i. p. 78.

Here his firſt lays majeſtic Denham ſung;
There the laſt numbers flow'd from Cowley's tongue (‖).
O early loſt! what tears the river ſhed,
When the ſad pomp along his banks was led!
His drooping ſwans on ev'ry note expire,
And on his willows hung each Muſe's lyre.
Since fate relentleſs ſtopp'd their heav'nly voice,
No more the foreſts ring, or groves rejoice.
Who now ſhall charm the ſhades, where Cowley ſtrung
His living harp, and lofty Denham ſung?

B.

(‖) Mr. Cowley died at Chertſey on the borders of the foreſt.

 [From the numerous lives which have been written of Cowley, there are very few facts to be collected that are not recorded in the preceding article. Almoſt the whole of what has been done by Dr. Johnſon in this reſpect, is his having given, from the ſtrength and ſagacity of his mind, a new aſpect to ſome of the occurrences which he relates. But before we enter into theſe circumſtances, it will be proper to correct a miſtake into which the Doctor has fallen by having recourſe only to Biſhop Sprat. Following that author, he hath aſſerted, that a volume of Cowley's Poems was not only written but printed in his thirteenth year. But it has been ſhewn by Wood, and the writers of the Great General Dictionary, as well as by our predeceſſor, in Note [B], that this was not the caſe.

Dr. Johnſon hath treated with ridicule the account of Sprat, concerning Cowley's defect of memory at Weſtminſter School being ſo great, that his teachers never could bring it to retain the ordinary rules of Grammar. "This is an inſtance," ſays the Doctor, "of the natural deſire of man to propagate a wonder. "It is ſurely very difficult to tell any thing as it was "heard, when Sprat could not refrain from amply-"fying a commodious incident, though the book to "which he prefixed his narrative contained its confu-"tation. A memory admitting ſome things, and "rejecting others, an intellectual digeſtion that con-"cocted the pulp of learning, but refuſed the huſks, "had the appearance of an inſtinctive elegance, of a "particular proviſion made by nature for literary "politeneſs. But in the Author's own honeſt rela-"tion, the marvel vaniſhes. He was, he ſays, ſuch "an enemy to all conſtraint, that his maſter could "never prevail on him to learn the rules without "book. He does not tell that he could not learn "the rules, but that, being able to perform his ex-"erciſes without them, and being an enemy to con-"ſtraint, he ſpared himſelf the labour (52)."

(52) Johnſon's Lives of the moſt eminent Engliſh Poets, vol. i. p. 14.

Dr. Johnſon unites with Sprat in vindicating Mr. Cowley from Anthony Wood's charge, of his having complied with the men in power, when he returned to England in 1656. The Doctor obſerves that even in Wood's repreſentation not much wrong can be diſcovered. "How far Cowley complied with the "men in power, is to be enquired before he can "be blamed. It is not ſaid that he told them any "ſecrets, or aſſiſted them by intelligence, or any "other act. If he only promiſed to be quiet, that "they in whoſe hands he was might free him from "confinement, he did what no law of ſociety "prohibits (53)."

(53) Ibid. p. 13, 14.

When Cowley's "Cutter of Coleman-Street" was firſt repreſented on the ſtage, it was treated with great ſeverity; and was afterwards cenſured as a ſatire on the King's party. Dryden and Sprat were preſent at the exhibition; and upon their informing Cowley how little favour had been ſhewn him, he received the news of his ill ſucceſs, not with ſo much firmneſs as might have been expected from ſo great a man.

"For the rejection of this play, ſays Dr. Johnſon, it is difficult now to find the reaſon: it certainly has, in a very great degree, the power of fixing attention and exciting merriment. From the charge of diſ-affection he exculpates himſelf in his preface, by obſerving how unlikely it is that, having followed the Royal Family through all their diſtreſſes, "he ſhould "chuſe the time of their reſtoration to begin a quar-"rel with them." It appears, however, from the Theatrical Regiſter of Downes the prompter, to have been popularly conſidered as a ſatire on the royaliſts. That he might ſhorten this tedious ſuſpenſe, he publiſhed his pretenſions and his diſcontent, in an Ode called "The Complaint;" in which he ſtiles himſelf the melancholy Cowley. This met with the uſual fortune of complaints, and ſeems to have excited more contempt than pity. Theſe unlucky incidents are brought, maliciouſly enough, together in ſome ſtanzas, written about that time, on the choice of a laureat; a mode of ſatire, by which, ſince it was firſt introduced by Suckling, perhaps every generation of poets has been teazed.

"Savoy-miſſing Cowley came into the court,
Making apologies for his bad play;
Every one gave him ſo good a report,
That Apollo gave heed to all he could ſay:
Nor would he have had, 'tis thought, a rebuke,
Unleſs he had done ſome notable folly;
Writ verſes unjuſtly in praiſe of Sam Tuke,
Or printed his pitiful Melancholy (54)."

(54) Ibid. p. 19, 20.

In the ſixth Number of the Rambler, Dr. Johnſon hath made ſome admirable reflections on Mr. Cowley's vehement deſire of retirement. How unfortunately his retreat from the world ſucceeded, will be evident from the following letter, which has been preſerved by Peck.

"To Dr. Thomas Sprat.

"Chertſey, 21 May, 1665.

"The firſt night that I came hither I caught ſo "great a cold, with a defluxion of rheum, as made "me keep my chamber ten days. And, two after, "had ſuch a bruiſe on my ribs with a fall, that I am "yet unable to move or turn myſelf in my bed. "This is my perſonal fortune here to begin with. "And beſides, I can get no money from my tenants, "and have my meadows eaten up every night by "cattle put in by my neighbours. What this ſigni-"fies, or may come to in time, God knows; if it be "ominous, it can end in nothing leſs than hanging. "Another misfortune has been, and ſtranger than "all the reſt, that you have broke your word with "me, and failed to come, even though you told Mr. "Bois that you would. This is what they call "Monſtri ſimile. I do hope to recover my late hurt "ſo farre within five or ſix days (though it be un-"certain yet whether I ſhall ever recover it) as to "walk about again. And then, methinks, you and "I and the Dean might be very merry upon S. "Anne's Hill. You might very conveniently come "hither the way of Hampton Town, lying there one "night. I write this in pain, and can ſay no more: "Verbum ſapienti (55)."

(55) Ibid. p. 22, 23.

If

If Mr. Cowley thought that the Swains of Surrey had the innocence of thoſe of Sydney's Arcadia, he was ſoon undeceived by the perverſeneſs and debauchery of his own workmen, with whom, as we learn from Dr. Warton, it is ſaid that he was ſome times ſo far provoked, as even to be betrayed into an oath. "His income was about three hundred pounds a "year. Towards the latter part of his life, he ſhew-"ed an averſion to the company of women, and "would often leave the room if any happened to "enter whilſt he was preſent; but ſtill he retained a "ſincere affection for Leonora." The ingenious and learned writer to whom we are endebted for theſe circumſtances, has given us a new account of the cauſe of Mr. Cowley's death. It was occaſioned, he ſays, by a ſingular accident. "He paid a viſit on "foot with his friend Sprat to a Gentleman in the "neighbourhood of Chertſey, which they prolonged "till midnight. On their return home they miſtook "their way, and were obliged to paſs the whole "night expoſed under a hedge, where Cowley caught "a ſevere cold, attended with a fever, that termi-"nated in his death (56)." Dr. Warton hath not favoured the public with the authority on which this anecdote is grounded. This, however, would have been deſirable; as the ſtory is ſo very different from the account given by Dr. Sprat himſelf of the cauſe of Mr. Cowley's deceaſe, and which is inſerted in note [U].

(56) Eſſay on the Writings and Genius of Pope, vol. ii. p. 108—110. 1ſt. edit.

Sprat's inſcription on the monument of his friend has not eſcaped criticiſm. An anonymous writer, in an Eſſay on Epitaphs, publiſhed in the Gentleman's Magazine, has expreſſed himſelf in the following terms. "All alluſions to the heathen mythology "are abſurd, and all regard for the ſenſeleſs remains "of a dead man impertinent and ſuperſtitious. One "of the firſt diſtinctions of the primitive Chriſtians, "was their neglect of beſtowing garlands on the "dead, in which they are very rationally defended "by their apologiſt in Minutius Felix. We laviſh "no flowers nor odours on the dead, ſays he, becauſe "they have no ſenſe of fragrance or of beauty. We "profeſs to reverence the dead not for their ſake but "for our own. It is, therefore, always with indig-"nation or contempt that I read the Epitaph on "Cowley, a man whoſe learning and poetry were "his loweſt merits.—To pray that the aſhes of a "friend may lie undiſturbed, and that the divinities "that favoured him in this life, may watch for ever "round him, to preſerve his tomb from violation, "and drive ſacrilege away, is only rational in him "who believes the ſoul intereſted in the repoſe of "the body, and the powers which he invokes for its "protection able to preſerve it. To cenſure ſuch "expreſſions as contrary to religion, or as remains "of Heathen ſuperſtition, would be too great a de-"gree of ſeverity. I condemn them only as unin-"ſtructive and unaffecting, as too ludicrous for re-"verence or grief, for Chriſtianity and a tem-"ple (57)."

(57) Gentleman's Magazine, vol. x. p. 594. The whole Eſſay deſerves to be read.

The moral character of Mr. Cowley appears, from every account of it, to have been very excellent. "He is repreſented by Dr. Sprat," ſays Dr. Johnſon, "as the moſt amiable of mankind; and this "poſthumous praiſe may be ſafely credited, as it has "never been contradicted by envy or by fac-"tion (58)."

(58) Johnſon, ubi ſupra, p. 24.

Mr. Cowley's diſpoſition of mind is well diſplayed in the following lines of the late Mr. Robert Lloyd.

"Nor, Cowley, be thy Muſe forgot! which ſtrays
"In wit's ambiguous flowery maze,
"With many a pointed turn, and ſtudied art:
"Tho' affectation blot thy rhyme,
"Thy mind was lofty and ſublime,
"And manly honour dignified thy heart:
"Though fond of wit, yet firm to Virtue's plan,
"The Poet's trifles ne'er diſgrac'd the Man.

"Well might thy morals ſweet engage
"Th' attention of the mitred ſage,
"Smit with the plain ſimplicity of truth.
"For not ambition's giddy ſtrife,
"The gilded toys of public life,
"Which ſnare the gay unſtable youth,
"Could lure thee from the ſober charms,
"Which lapt thee in retirement's arms,
"Whence thou, untainted with the pride of ſtate,
"Could'ſt ſmile with pity on the buſtling great (59)."

(59) Lloyd's Poetical Works, vol. i. p. 152, 153.

Though Mr. Cowley's character is, in general, ſo well known, yet it is highly probable that we ſhould have ſeen much more of the peculiar turn of his mind, if a number of his private letters had been given to the world. Dr. Sprat's opinion, expreſſed at large in note [EE], that nothing of this nature ſhould be publiſhed, is remarkable; and the more ſo, as it is totally contrary to the ſentiments of the preſent Age. Mr. Maſon and Mr. Knox have very juſtly declared their diſapprobation of Dr. Sprat's notions and conduct in this reſpect (60). Indeed, the letters of eminent men are often inſtructive, intereſting, and entertaining; in which caſe the publication of them is a benefit to the community. But to retail every epiſtle, and every ſcrap of a deceaſed author, however trifling and inſignificant, can only be the reſult of a taſteleſs avidity, and only gratify a childiſh curioſity. We might enlarge upon the ſubject; but perhaps it may come more properly before us in the courſe of our future lucubrations.

(60) Maſon's Memoirs of the Life and Writings of Gray, p. 4, 2d. edit. Knox's Eſſays, vol. ii. p. 365.

While ſo little can be added with regard to the facts of Mr. Cowley's life, much hath been written concerning his genius and literary merit. Dryden's opinion of him, delivered at a period when he was ſtill often ſpoken of with indiſcriminate praiſe, is too ſenſible to be omitted. The name of Cowley is not, indeed, mentioned by Dryden; but there can be no doubt to whom he refers. "One of our late great "Poets," ſays he, "is ſunk in his reputation, be-"cauſe he could never forgive any conceit which "came in his way; but ſwept, like a drag-net, "great and ſmall. There was plenty enough, but "the diſhes were ill ſorted; whole pyramids of "ſweet-meats, for boys and women; but little of "ſolid meat for men. All this proceeded not from "any want of knowledge, but of judgment; neither "did he want that in diſcerning the beauties and "faults of other Poets; but only indulged himſelf "in the luxury of writing; and perhaps knew it was "a fault, but hoped the reader would not find it. "For this reaſon, though he muſt always be thought "a great Poet, he is no longer eſteemed a good "writer: and for ten impreſſions, which his works "have had in ſo many ſucceſſive years, yet at preſent "a hundred books are ſcarcely purchaſed once a "twelvemonth: for, as my laſt Lord Rocheſter ſaid, "though ſomewhat profanely, not being of God, he "could not ſtand (61)."

(61) Johnſon's Poets, vol. xv. p. 26, 27. This paſſage was pointed out to us by a learned Correſpondent.

Later authors in general have eſtimated Cowley with more critical exactneſs than was commonly done in and a little after his own time; and ſome of them have detracted too much from his merit. Of this number we may reckon Mr. Hume. "Cowley," ſays this ingenious hiſtorian, "is an author extremely "corrupted by the bad taſte of his age; but had he "lived in the pureſt times of Greece and Rome, he "muſt always have been a very indifferent Poet. "He had no ear for harmony; and his verſes are "only known to be ſuch by the rhyme, which ter-"minates them. In his rugged untuneable num-"bers are conveyed ſentiments the moſt ſtrained and "violent; long ſpun allegories, diſtant alluſions, and "forced conceits. Great ingenuity, however, and "force of thought, ſometimes break out amidſt theſe "unnatural conceptions: a few Anacreontics ſurprize "us by their eaſe and gaiety: his proſe writings "pleaſe, by the honeſty and goodneſs which they "expreſs; and even by their ſpleen and melancholy. "This author was much more praiſed and admired "during his life-time, and celebrated after his "death, than the great Milton (62)." We are far from agreeing with Mr. Hume in his aſſertion, that if Cowley had "lived in the pureſt times of Greece "and Rome, he muſt always have been a very indif-"ferent Poet." Such an aſſertion could only proceed from a want of candour or of judgment: for ſurely Cowley's genius would have enabled him to riſe to no ſmall degree of poetical excellence, had he not been miſled by the falſe taſte of the age.

(62) Hiſtory of England, vol. vii. p. 354.

Another author, almoſt as ſevere upon our Poet as Mr. Hume, is Mr. Knox.

" It was the lot, ſays this ingenious Eſſayiſt, of Cowley to be handed down to poſterity by a writer who was famous in his day for eloquence. Dr. Sprat probably undertook the office of a biographer, with a deſign to diſplay his talents in a ſpecies of oratory which the Roman rhetoricians called the demonſtrative. He diſcharged it well as an artiſt, but failed as an accurate hiſtorian. By placing Cowley in the firſt rank of poets, he has in effect degraded him from the ſubaltern ſtation which he had elſe preſerved unmoleſted. Dr. Sprat owed much of his own fame to the Poet who had compared his ſtyle to the gentle and majeſtic current of the Thames; and returned the compliment, perhaps from other motives than thoſe of gratitude; for the higher Cowley was exalted, the greater honour was reflected on thoſe whom he had commended. Of this celebrated Biſhop of Rocheſter, Lord Orrery has ſaid, few men have gained a greater character for elegance and correctneſs, and few men have deſerved it leſs. And of the Poet whom he praiſed, the great Dryden has with diffidence remarked, that ſomewhat of the purity of Engliſh, ſomewhat of more equal thoughts, ſomewhat of ſweetneſs in the numbers; in one word, ſomewhat of a finer turn and more lyrical verſe, is yet wanting.

" Whatever are his defects, no poet has been more liberally praiſed. Lord Clarendon has ſaid, he made a flight above all men; Addiſon, in his account of the Engliſh Poets, that he improved upon the Theban bard; the Duke of Buckingham upon his Tombſtone, that he was the Engliſh Pindar, the Horace, the Virgil, the Delight, the Glory, of his Times. And with reſpect to the harſhneſs of his numbers, the eloquent Sprat tells us, that if his verſes in ſome places ſeem not as ſoft and flowing as one would have them, it was his choice, and not his fault.

" Such is the applauſe laviſhed on a writer who is now ſeldom read. That he could ever be eſteemed as a pindaric poet, is a curious literary phænomenon. He totally miſtook his own genius, when he thought of imitating Pindar. He totally miſtook the genius of Pindar, when he thought his own incoherent ſentiments and numbers bore the leaſt reſemblance to the wild, yet regular ſublimity of the Theban. He neglected even thoſe forms, the ſtrophe, antiſtrophe, and epode, which even imitative dulneſs can copy. Sublime imagery, vehement pathos, poetic fire, which conſtitute the eſſence of the Pindaric Ode, are incompatible with witty conceits, accurate antitheſes, and vulgar expreſſion. All theſe imply the coolneſs of deliberate compoſition, or the meanneſs of a little mind; both of them moſt repugnant to the truly Pindaric Ode, in which all is rapturous and noble. Wit of any kind would be improperly diſplayed in ſuch compoſition; but to increaſe the abſurdity, the wit of Cowley is often falſe.

" If the end of poetry is to pleaſe, harmony of verſe is eſſential to poetry, for, without it, poetry cannot pleaſe. It is not poſſible, that any whoſe ear has been attuned to the melody of good compoſition, ſhould read a ſingle ode of Cowley without being ſhocked with diſcord. There is often nothing left but the jingle at the end to diſtinguiſh poems renowned for their ſublimity, from affected proſe. Such poetry may juſtly incur the ridiculous title of Proſe run mad.

" Yet is there ſometimes interwoven a purple patch, as Horace calls it; a fine expreſſion, a truly poetical thought, an harmonious couplet; but it occurs not often enough to repay the reader for the toilſome taſk of wading through a tedious aſſemblage of diſproportioned and diſcordant ſtanzas. Of ſuch conſiſt his Pindarics; which, though they procured him the greateſt ſhare of his reputation, deſerved it leaſt. Many of his other poems, if we conſider the rude ſtate of verſification, and the bad taſte of the times, have great merit; and had he made Tibullus his model, inſtead of Pindar, his claim to the firſt rank of poets had not been called in queſtion. The tenderneſs of love, and the ſoft language of complaint, were adapted to his genius. But he choſe to tread in the footſteps of Alcæus, as he ſays himſelf, who, according to the Halicarnaſſian, combined the μεγαλοφυες και ηδυ, or adopted the grand, as well as the ſweet.

" That he had a taſte for Latin poetry, and wrote in it with elegance, the well-known Epitaph on himſelf, upon his retirement, and an admirable imitation of Horace, are full proofs. But, ſurely, his rhetorical biographer makes uſe of the figure hyperbole, when he affirms that Cowley has excelled the Romans themſelves. He was inferior to many a writer of leſs fame in the Muſæ Anglicanæ. But ſtill he had great merit; and I muſt confeſs I have read his Latin verſes with more pleaſure, than any of his Engliſh can afford (63)."

(63) Knox's Eſſays, vol. ii. p. 363—365.

To Cowley's compoſitions in proſe Mr. Knox hath paid a very honourable teſtimony. He ſays that in this department he is an elegant, a pleaſing, a judicious writer; and that it is much to be lamented that he did not devote a greater part of his time to a kind of writing which appeared natural to him, and in which he excelled (64).

(64) Ibid.

Dr. Joſeph Warton obſerves, that it is no caricature of Cowley, to repreſent him as being poſſeſſed of a ſtrained affectation of ſtriving to be witty upon all occaſions. " It is painful," adds this excellent critic, " to cenſure a writer of ſo amiable a mind, " ſuch integrity of manners, and ſuch a ſweetneſs of " temper. His fancy was brilliant, ſtrong, and " ſprightly; but his taſte falſe and unclaſſical, even " though he had much learning. In his Latin " compoſitions, his ſix books on plants, where the " ſubject might have led him to a contrary practice, " he imitates Martial, rather than Virgil, and has " given us more epigrams than deſcriptions (65)." This opinion concerning Cowley's Latin Poetry, is not conſonant to that of Dr. Johnſon. " If the " Latin performances," ſays the Doctor, " of " Cowley and Milton be compared, for May I hold " to be ſuperior to both, the advantage ſeems to lie " on the ſide of Cowley. Milton is generally con- " tent to expreſs the thoughts of the ancients in their " language; Cowley, without much loſs of purity or " elegance, accommodates the diction of Rome to his " own conceptions (66)." In one reſpect, Dr. Warton pays a tribute to the ability of Cowley in Latin compoſition. " I do not remember, ſays he, " to have ſeen it obſerved, that Cowley had a moſt " happy talent of imitating the eaſy manner of " Horace's epiſtolary writings: I muſt, therefore, " inſert a ſpecimen of this his excellence.

(65) Warton, ubi ſupra, p. 104, 105.

(66) Johnſon, ubi ſupra, p. 17.

" Ergo iterum verſus? dices. O Vane! quid ergo
" Morbum ejuraſti toties, tibi qui inſidet altis,
" Non evellendus, vi vel ratione, medullis?
" Numne poetarum (merito dices) ut amantum
" Deriſum ridere deum perjuria cenſes?
" Parcius hæc ſodes, neve inclementibus urge
" Infelicem hominem dictis; nam fata trahunt me
" Magna reluctantem, et velut equum in vincla
" minacem.
" Helleborum ſumpſi fateor, pulchreque videbar
" Purgatus morbi; ſed luna potentior herbis
" Inſanire iterum jubet, et ſibi vendicat a-
" grum (67)."

(67) Warton, ubi ſupra.

Dr. Beattie has characterized Cowley in the following terms. " I know not whether any nation " ever produced a more ſingular genius than Cowley. " He abounds in tender thoughts, beautiful lines, " and emphatical expreſſions. His wit is inexhauſ- " tible, and his learning extenſive; but his taſte is " generally barbarous, and ſeems to have been form- " ed upon ſuch models as Donne, Martial, and the " worſt parts of Ovid: nor is it poſſible to read his " longer poems with pleaſure, while we retain any " reliſh for the ſimplicity of ancient compoſition. If " this author's ideas had been fewer, his conceits " would have been leſs frequent; ſo that in one re- " ſpect learning may be ſaid to have hurt his genius. " Yet it does not appear that Greek and Latin did " him any harm; for his imitations of Anacreon are " almoſt the only parts of him that are now remem- " bered or read. His Davideis, and his tranſlations " of Pindar, are deſtitute of harmony, ſimplicity, " and every other claſſical grace. Had his inclina- " tions led him to a frequent peruſal of the moſt " elegant authors of antiquity, his poems would cer- " tainly have been the better for it (68)." Dr. Beattie, in his laſt remark, is undoubtedly miſtaken.

(68) Beattie's Eſſays, p. 742.

It is evident from Mr. Cowley's writings, that no man could be more converſant with the moſt elegant authors of antiquity; but, notwithſtanding this, he was led aſtray by the falſe taſte of the age in which he flouriſhed.

The fate of Cowley's Pindaric Odes is a curious circumſtance in our literary hiſtory. We have ſeen, in the preceding quotations, how much they are now condemned; and Dr. Warton's cenſure of them may be added, who ſays, that they cannot be peruſed with common patience by a lover of antiquity (69). And yet, for nearly a century, they were received with almoſt boundleſs admiration; and they were as fooliſhly imitated as they were extravagantly praiſed. For a long time, the world was over-run with irregular compoſitions, under the name of Pindaric Odes. "This lax and lawleſs verſification," ſays Dr. Johnſon, "ſo much concealed the deficiencies of the bar-"ren, and flattered the lazineſs of the idle, that it "immediately overſpread our books of poetry; all "the boys and girls caught the pleaſing faſhion, and "they that could do nothing elſe could write like "Pindar. The rights of antiquity were invaded, "and diſorder tried to break into the Latin. A "Poem on the Sheldonian Theatre, in which all "kinds of verſe are ſhaken together, is unhappily "inſerted in the Muſæ Anglicanæ (70)." Dr. Watts is an eminent inſtance of the ſeduction produced by Cowley's example; for the poetical works of that ingenious and pious Divine abound with irregular Odes. Congreve had the good ſenſe to ſee and to repreſent how contrary ſuch Odes are to the whole mode of compoſition which was made uſe of by Pindar; but his obſervations, though approved of by the learned and the judicious, did not meet with all the attention they deſerved. It was reſerved for Mr. Gilbert Weſt entirely to diſpel the deluſion, and to ſet the matter in ſo clear a light as to produce a general reformation. Since that time, ſome Odes have appeared, in the true ſpirit, as well as in the form of Pindar; and ſince that time, other Odes have been publiſhed, which, while they have marched on in the regular order of Strophe, Antiſtrophe, and Epode, have not been eminently Pindaric.

(69) Warton, ubi ſupra, p. 106.

(70) Johnſon, ubi ſupra, p. 73.

So many of Cowley's productions being now eſteemed ſcarcely worthy of a peruſal, while others of them are diſtinguiſhed by their beauty, Dr. Hurd (the preſent Biſhop of Worceſter) thought proper to make a ſelection of them, which he publiſhed, in 1772, under the title of "Select Works of Mr. Abraham Cowley; "in two Volumes: with a Preface and Notes by the "Editor." The preface is as follows:

"It would be uſing moſt writers of name very ill, to treat them with that freedom, which I have preſumed to take with Mr. Cowley. But every thing he wrote, is either ſo good or ſo bad, that, in all reaſon, a ſeparation ſhould be made; leſt the latter, which, unhappily, is the greater part, ſhould, in the end, ſtifle and overlay the former.

"The reaſon of this ſtriking difference in the compoſitions of the ſame man, whoſe genius and learning are unqueſtionable, is, That he generally followed the taſte of his time, which was the worſt imaginable; and rarely his own, which was naturally excellent: as may be ſeen in the few pieces of his poetry, here ſelected from the reſt; and eſpecially, in his proſe works, which (except the notes on his Pindaric Odes, and Davideis) are given entire, and have no common merit.

"But the talents, by which he is diſtinguiſhed, as a polite writer, are the leaſt of his praiſe. There is ſomething in him, which pleaſes above his wit, and in ſpite of it. It is that moral air, and tender ſenſibility of mind, which every one perceives and loves in reading Mr. Cowley. And this character of his genius, though it be expreſſed, indeed, in his other writings, comes out eſpecially, and takes our attention moſt, in ſome of his ſmaller poems and eſſays; which, therefore, it ſeemed to be for the Author's credit, and the convenience of his Readers, to draw near to each other, and place together in one view. I have ſaid — for the convenience of his Readers: for, though all are capable of being entertained, perhaps inſtructed, by the image of a good mind, when ſet before them, yet few will be at the pains to ſeek that inſtruction or entertainment for themſelves, through the ſcattered works of ſo unequal and voluminous a Writer.

"To do juſtice to the memory of Mr. Cowley, in theſe two reſpects, I mean, in his capacity both of a polite and moral Writer, is the ſole end of this publication. Every man of taſte and virtue will read it with pleaſure. There are, indeed, many lines diſperſed through his other poems, which deſerve praiſe. But, on the whole, it is enough if this ſmall collection go down to poſterity: in that caſe, neither they, nor the Author, will have any great loſs, though the reſt be forgotten (71)."

(71) Select Works, Preface, p. v—viii.

In the account of this publication, which was given in the Monthly Review, Dr. Hurd's conduct was ſtrongly objected to, and various reaſons were urged againſt taking ſuch liberties with eminent writers. What the Critic has advanced with regard to Cowley in particular, is ſo ingenious, and throws ſo much light on ſome of his now neglected beauties, that it deſerves to be tranſcribed.

"All that can be ſaid in favour of the liberties Dr. Hurd has taken with Mr. Cowley's works, is, that he has, in general, ſhewn a proper judgment in his ſelection, and that he does not by any means hold forth this publication as a precedent for others of the like nature. The opening of his preface declares againſt it.

"When Mr. Pope aſks,

"Who now reads Cowley?"——

He aſſigns ſuch reaſons as occur to him, why he is ſtill read, viz. his moral, and the language of his heart.

"Who now reads Cowley? if he pleaſes yet,
His moral pleaſes, not his pointed wit.
Forgot his Epic, nay Pindaric art,
Yet ſtill, we love the language of his heart."

"Dr. Hurd likewiſe, following Mr. Pope in his idea, aſcribes Mr. Cowley's power of pleaſing to that moral air, and tender ſenſibility of mind, which are diſcoverable in his writings; and both the poet and the critic are right ſo far, that Mr. Cowley's writings do bear thoſe agreeable characteriſtics. But the real cauſe why they ſtill pleaſe is what Mr. Pope could not judge of, becauſe he was a ſtranger to it. It is enthuſiaſm; the genuine ſpirit of enthuſiaſm that breathes through all thoſe pages, where the poet is not profeſſedly in chace of wit.

"In that fine poem to the memory of Mr. William Harvey there are ſtrong traits of it. On peruſing this poem we could not but wonder that his Editor, who is likewiſe his Annotator, ſhould take no notice of that ſtriking paſſage in the thirteenth ſtanza, which has ſuch a peculiar felicity in the idea, that nothing in the poet's whole writings could be more worthy of his obſervation:

"So ſtrong a wit did nature to him frame,
As all things, but his judgment, overcame;
His judgment, like the heav'nly moon, did ſhow,
Temp'ring that mighty ſea below.'

There cannot be any thing, either in ancient or in modern poetry, ſuperior to the image conveyed in the two laſt lines. It is equally juſt, ſimple, and ſublime. The unruly ebullitions of wit are moſt happily repreſented by a tumultuous ſea; and judgment is no leſs beautifully depictured by a ſerene moon that ſeems to temper its inquietude. But though this diſtinguiſhed paſſage has been honoured with no ſtricture by the Annotator, he has let fall an obſervation, at the end of the poem, which might eaſily have been diſpenſed with. Cowley ſays of his departed friend,

"Thou doſt with holy pity ſee
Our dull and earthly poeſy,
Where grief and miſery can be join'd with verſe.'

The Critic ſays, the Poet here meant 'to inſinuate the prepoſterous levity and vanity of earthly poets, who can afford to be witty even on their own miſeries.' Now, with his good leave, the Poet certainly never meant to inſinuate the impropriety of a thing for for which no man was more notorious than himſelf. All he intended was, to lament the comparative inferiority of the earthly poetry, which was made the vehicle of ſorrow, while the heavenly poetry muſt be employed only on themes of happineſs.—Does the Critic mean, by poets being witty on their own miſeries, that there is an abſurdity in the idea of elegiac poetry? That, we preſume, he can hardly intend; for nothing can be more obvious than that there is a ſpecies of poetry, as well as of muſic, adapted to the expreſſion both of melancholy and of miſery. Indeed, if the learned Editor had in view only thoſe elegiac poets who are diſtinguiſhed for

" ——Flowery grief and impotence of pain, his cenſure is not unjuſt, otherwiſe it is certain that there are many circumſtances and ſubjects where, without any impropriety,

" —— Grief and miſery may be join'd with verſe.

" Dr. Hurd has thought proper to preſerve Mr. Cowley's imitation of Martial's Si Tecum mihi, &c. which, the firſt ſix lines excepted, is ſo much inferior to the original. Indeed, the latter part of it is both idle and abſurd. Cowley complains to his friend, in imitation of the Roman poet, that, for want of a proper allotment of their time, and employing it, among other objects, with

" A gentle Miſtreſs and a gentle Muſe,
They ſaw good ſuns, of which they were to give
A ſtrict account, ſet and march thick away.

The Poet was led into this abſurdity of being called to a ſtrict account, for want of employing his time with a gentle Miſtreſs, moſt probably, by Martial's imputantur, which he had conſtrued charged to his account, inſtead of reckoned in the tale of life. His Editor would have done well to have ſaved him the diſcredit of it.

" But with reſpect to what Dr. Hurd has admitted, we have much leſs reaſon to be diſſatisfied than for what he has rejected. Every thing in that collection of poems, which we have under the denomination of the Miſtreſs, is thrown out of this edition. It is true, that in thoſe poems are many exceptionable, many looſe and nugatory pieces, which could not poſſibly do honour to Cowley, in the idea of any age; but then there are many beautiful parts which might have been ſelected, many marks of tenderneſs, ingenuity, and enthuſiaſm that might have been preſerved, independently of the title, and the licentious idea of the Miſtreſs. The ſeverity of the Editor's virtue appears, in this matter, to have prevailed over his judgment. For he has publiſhed ſome poems, among the reſt, the Praiſe of Pindar, &c. which ought to have given place to many extracts from the Miſtreſs.

" Wherefore ſhould poſterity, by any arbitrary deciſion, be contented to loſe (what the Editor ſays would be no loſs) the native enthuſiaſm and poetical beauties of

THE WISH.

I.

" Well then, I now do plainly ſee
This buſy world and I ſhall ne'er agree;
The very honey of all earthly joy
Does, of all meats, the ſooneſt cloy.
And they, methinks, deſerve my pity
Who for it can endure the ſtings
The crowd, and buz, and murmurings,
Of this great hive, the city.

II.

" Ah! yet, ere I deſcend the grave,
May I a ſmall houſe, and large garden have!
And a few friends, and many books, both true,
Both wiſe, and both delightful too.
And ſince love ne'er will from me flee,
A Miſtreſs moderately fair
And good as guardian angels are,
Only belov'd and loving me!

III.

" Oh! Fountains, when in you ſhall I
Myſelf eas'd of unpeaceful thoughts, eſpy?
O fields! O woods! when, when ſhall I be made
The happy tenant of your ſhade?
Here's the ſpring-head of pleaſure's flood,
Where all the riches lie that ſhe
Hath mark'd and ſtamp'd for good.

IV.

" Pride and ambition here
Only in far-fetch'd metaphors appear;
Here nought but winds can hurtful murmurs ſcatter;
And nought but Echo flatter.
The gods, when they deſcended, hither
From heaven did always chuſe their way;
And therefore we may boldly ſay,
That 'tis the way too thither.

V.

" How happy here ſhould I
And one dear ſhe live, and embracing die?
She, who is all the world, and can exclude
In deſarts ſolitude!——
* * * *

" And ſhould we ſuffer nothing by loſing ſuch a poem as

THE DESPAIR.

I.

" Beneath this gloomy ſhade,
By Nature only for my ſorrows made,
I'll ſpend this voice in cries,
In tears I'll waſte theſe eyes
By love ſo vainly fed!
* * *
Ah wretched youth! ſaid I,
Ah wretched youth! twice did I ſadly cry:
Ah wretched youth! the fields and floods reply.

II.

" When thoughts of love I entertain,
I meet no words but never, and in vain.
Never, alas! that dreadful name
Which fewels the internal flame.
Never, my time to come muſt waſte;
In vain, torments the preſent and the paſt.
In vain! In vain! ſaid I,
In vain, In vain, twice did I ſadly cry;
In vain, In vain, the fields and floods reply.

III.

" No more ſhall fields, or floods do ſo;
For I to ſhades more dark and ſilent go:
All this world's noiſe appears to me
A dull, ill acted comedy:
No comfort to my wounded ſight,
In the ſun's buſy and impertinent light.
Then down I laid my head,
Down on cold earth, and for awhile was dead;
And my freed ſoul to a ſtrange ſomewhere fled.

IV.

" Ah, ſottiſh ſoul! ſaid I,
When back to its cage again I ſaw it fly;
Fool to reſume her broken chain
And row her galley here again.
Fool, to that body to return,
Where it condemn'd, and deſtin'd is to burn!
* * * * *

" There is in the two laſt ſtanzas ſomething ſo ſtrongly pictureſque and expreſſive of the ſubject, ſomething ſo morally mournful, that it could not poſſibly eſcape the celebrated Richardſon, who has given them a place in his Clariſſa.

" Should the harmony, the delicious ſweetneſs of the following ſtanza in THE CHANGE be for ever forgot!

" Love in her ſunny eyes does baſking play;
Love walks the pleaſant mazes of her hair;
Love does on both her lips for ever ſtray,
And ſows and reaps a thouſand kiſſes there.

" Something of the ſame beautiful image, in Mrs. Greville's ode to Indifference, where ſhe ſays that her heart

" ——— like the needle true,
Turns at the touch of joy, or woe,
But, turning, trembles too——

we find in that poem in Cowley's Miſtreſs, called, Reſolved to be beloved,

" The needle trembles ſo, and turns about,
Till it the northern pole find out.

" The late very ingenious Mr. Gray, too, has frequently borrowed from Cowley, and it is not in vain he has read this line in The Miſtreſs,

" Words that weep, and tears that ſpeak.

He has almoſt copied it in one of his odes.—Will it bear a queſtion, whether treaſures ſuch as theſe, from which the beſt and greateſt poets have ſo freely drawn, ſhould be conſigned to oblivion? If men of their taſte could be pleaſed with, and copy their beauties, what ſhould we think of that criticiſm which would pronounce 'the total loſs of them to be no loſs to the world?'

" And is "The Heart fled again" likewiſe to be loſt, becauſe it is found in the Miſtreſs?

I.

" Falſe, fooliſh heart, didſt thou not ſay,
That thou wouldſt never leave me more?
Behold, again 'tis fled away!
Fled as far from me as before!
I ſtrove to bring it back again,
I cried and hallooed after it in vain.

II.

" Even ſo the gentle Tyrian dame,
When neither grief, nor love prevail,
Saw the dear object of her flame,
Th' ingrateful Trojan hoiſt his ſail:
Aloud ſhe call'd to him to ſtay,
The wind bore him, and her loſt words away.

III.

" The doleful Ariadne ſo,
On the wide ſhore forſaken ſtood:
Falſe Theſeus, whither doſt thou go?
Afar falſe Theſeus cut the flood.
But Bacchus came to her relief;
Bacchus himſelf's too weak to eaſe my grief.

IV.

" Ah ſenſeleſs heart, to take no reſt,
But travel thus eternally:
Thus to be ſcorch'd in every breaſt!
And froze in every eye!
* * *

" The Editor has preſerved very few verſes equal to the many beautiful lines in this little poem. But when he who reads Cowley's Miſtreſs, finds that, in this edition, the poems for Hope and againſt Hope, are omitted, he will conclude all further objections to its reception unneceſſary, and recollect at the ſame time, not without ſome concern, what poor Cowley himſelf ſays of that Miſtreſs,

" Then ſhall thy name through all my verſe be ſpread,
Thick as the flowers in meadows lie,
And when, in future times, they ſhall be read,
(As SURE I THINK THEY WILL NOT DIE)
If any CRITIC doubt that they be mine—
* * *
Cætera deſiderantur (72)."

(72) Monthly Review, vol. xlviii. p. 13—18.

Another writer, in the Gentleman's Magazine, who has drawn a " Literary Portrait of Dr. Hurd," has likewiſe diſapproved of the Biſhop's ſelection from Cowley. " Sure I am, too," ſays this Critic, " that " his Lordſhip's " Select Works of Cowley" have " prevented us from acknowledging the ſuperiority " of his judgment upon that author. Though he " has cleared the works from many falſe thoughts, " ill-placed wit, and great puerilities, yet ſurely he " has deprived us of many flights of true poetry, and " of ſome peculiar marks which diſtinguiſh him " (Cowley) from every other Poet (73)."

(73) Gentleman's Magazine, vol. 46, p. 115.

On this occaſion, the Biſhop was not without a zealous and able advocate. A writer, in the ſame publication, made the following remarks upon the " Literary Portrait." " If the Painter of the Literary Portrait, in your Magazine for March, had " really entertained a regard for the critic and the " ſcholar, he would never have cenſured an edition " ſo critical and ſo ſcholar-like as that of Cowley " by Dr. Hurd. That edition evinces in no ſmall " degree the critical acumen of the Editor, and is in " every reſpect ſuch a ſelection as a judicious admirer " of Cowley would wiſh to be given to the world. I " heſitate not to affirm, that there is no compoſition " of Cowley's, The Cutter of Coleman-ſtreet ex- " excepted, ſufferable as a whole, which is not pre- " ſerved in this edition. How, then, does the Edi- " tor's judgment ſtand impeached? and where are " the marks of its inferiority to be found? That " there are many lines in the entire Cowley, written " in the true ſpirit of poetry, which have no place " in this ſelection, I am ſo far from denying, that " it was with pleaſure I committed them to my " Common Place Book; and nothing but the want " of your approbation, Mr. Urban, ſhall prevent my " tranſferring them to your miſcellany. But, in " every work, it is indiſpenſably neceſſary to regard " the Writer's end; and had it been any part of his " Lordſhip's to detach ſplendid paſſages, the remark, " that " he has deprived us of many flights of true " poetry," would have been well founded: as it was " not, it appears wanton and inſidious, and will " therefore fall to the ground. But wantonneſs of " cenſure is not the only fault in this literary por- " trait. The author, unfortunate alike in cenſure " and in praiſe, gives Hurd credit for what he never " once attempted to perform. That he has detected " many falſe thoughts, much ill-placed wit, and " many puerilities, I am ready to acknowledge: but " that he has cleared them of theſe deformities I am " conſtrained to deny. In juſtice, therefore, to his " Lordſhip, the more diſcriminating traits in whoſe " literary character your correſpondent ſeems either " deſtitute of genius to pencil or taſte to eſpy, you " will allot a portion of your approved collection to this free-will offering from Elidurus (74)."

(74) Ibid. p. 267.

Mr. Knox's ſentiments are in uniſon with theſe remarks. " A Critic, ſays he, whoſe genius and " judgment keep pace with each other, and who il- " luminates every ſubject on which he treats, has " allotted Cowley his juſt ſpecies of praiſe, and has " given the world, in a judicious ſelection of his " works, all that they poſſeſſed of real value (75)."

(75) Knox's Eſſay, vol. ii. p. 366.

Though the concluding aſſertion of this paſſage is not ſufficiently guarded, we cannot but expreſs our general agreement with the two preceding writers, in their approbation of Biſhop Hurd's ſelection. That ſelection is all that, for our own part, we ever wiſh to read again of Cowley. Nevertheleſs, it may not be amiſs for young perſons to peruſe, once at leaſt, the whole of his poems, that they may judge for themſelves, and be ſenſible of the occaſional beauties that are diſperſed amidſt his moſt defective compoſitions.

But of all the criticiſms on Cowley, thoſe of Dr. Johnſon are entitled to the principal regard. His life of this celebrated Poet is written with particular attention, and is only exceeded in importance by the articles of Milton, Dryden, and Pope. The Doctor's account of the metaphyſical Poets is uncommonly ingenious and curious; and what he has advanced upon the ſubject in general we ſhall lay before our readers. " Cowley, ſays he, like other poets who have written with narrow views, and inſtead of tracing intellectual pleaſure to its natural ſources in the mind of man, paid their court to temporary prejudices, has been at one time too much praiſed, and too much neglected at another. Wit, like all other things ſubject by their nature to the choice of man, has its changes and faſhions, and at different times takes different forms. About the beginning of the ſeventeenth century appeared a race of of writers that may be termed the metaphyſical poets; of whom, in a criticiſm on the works of Cowley, the laſt of the race, it is not improper to give ſome account.

"The metaphyſical poets were men of learning, and to ſhew their learning was their whole endeavour; but, unluckily reſolving to ſhew it in rhyme, inſtead of writing poetry, they only wrote verſes, and very often ſuch verſes as ſtood the trial of the finger better than of the ear; for the modulation was ſo imperfect, that they were only found to be verſes by counting the ſyllables. If the father of criticiſm has rightly denominated poetry τέχνη μιμητικὴ, an imitative art, theſe writers will, without great wrong, loſe their right to the name of poets; for they cannot be ſaid to have imitated any thing; they neither copied nature nor life; neither painted the forms of matter, nor repreſented the operations of intellect. Thoſe however who deny them to be poets, allow them to be wits. Dryden confeſſes of himſelf and his contemporaries, that they fall below Donne in wit, but maintains that they ſurpaſs him in poetry. If Wit be well deſcribed by Pope, as being "that which has "been often thought, but was never before ſo well "expreſſed," they certainly never attained, nor ever ſought it; for they endeavoured to be ſingular in their thoughts, and were careleſs of their diction. But Pope's account of wit is undoubtedly erroneous: he depreſſes it below its natural dignity, and reduces it from ſtrength of thought to happineſs of language. If by a more noble and more adequate conception that be conſidered as Wit, which is at once natural and new, that which, though not obvious, is, upon its firſt production, acknowledged to be juſt; if it be that, which he that never found it, wonders how he miſſed; to wit of this kind the metaphyſical poets have ſeldom riſen. Their thoughts are often new, but ſeldom natural; they are not obvious, but neither are they juſt; and the reader, far from wondering that he miſſed them, wonders more frequently by what perverſeneſs of induſtry they were ever found. But Wit, abſtracted from its effects upon the hearer, may be more rigorouſly and philoſophically conſidered as a kind of diſcordia concors; a combination of diſſimilar images, or diſcovery of occult reſemblances in things apparently unlike. Of wit, thus defined, they have more than enough. The moſt heterogeneous ideas are yoked by violence together; nature and art are ranſacked for illuſtrations, compariſons, and alluſions; their learning inſtructs, and their ſubtilty ſurpriſes; but the reader commonly thinks his improvement dearly bought, and though he ſometimes admires is ſeldom pleaſed. From this account of their compoſitions it will be readily inferred, that they were not ſucceſsful in repreſenting or moving the affections. As they were wholly employed on ſomething unexpected and ſurpriſing, they had no regard to that uniformity of ſentiment which enables us to conceive and to excite the pains and the pleaſure of other minds: they never enquired what, on any occaſion, they ſhould have ſaid or done; but wrote rather as beholders than partakers of human nature; as Beings looking upon good and evil, impaſſive and at leiſure; as Epicurean deities making remarks on the actions of men, and the viciſſitudes of life, without intereſt and without emotion. Their courtſhip was void of fondneſs, and their lamentation of ſorrow. Their wiſh was only to ſay what they hoped had been never ſaid before. Nor was the ſublime more within their reach than the pathetic; for they never attempted that comprehenſion and expanſe of thought which at once fills the whole mind, and of which the firſt effect is ſudden aſtoniſhment, and the ſecond rational admiration. Sublimity is produced by aggregation, and littleneſs by diſperſion. Great thoughts are always general, and conſiſt in poſitions not limited by exceptions, and in deſcriptions not deſcending to minuteneſs. It is with great propriety that Subtlety, which in its original import means exility of particles, is taken in its metaphorical meaning for nicety of diſtinction. Thoſe writers who lay on the watch for novelty could have little hope of greatneſs; for great things cannot have eſcaped former obſervation. Their attempts were always analytick; they broke every image into fragments; and could no more repreſent, by their ſlender conceits and laboured particularities, the proſpects of nature, or the ſcenes of life, than he, who diſſects a ſun-beam with a priſm, can exhibit the wide effulgence of a ſummer noon. What they wanted however of the ſublime, they endeavoured to ſupply by hyperbole; their amplification had no limits; they left not only reaſon but fancy behind them; and produced combinations of confuſed magnificence, that not only could not be credited, but could not be imagined. Yet great labour, directed by great abilities, is never wholly loſt: if they frequently threw away their wit upon falſe conceits, they likewiſe ſometimes ſtruck out unexpected truth: if their conceits were far-fetched, they were often worth the carriage. To write on their plan, it was at leaſt neceſſary to read and think. No man could be born a metaphyſical poet, nor aſſume the dignity of a writer, by deſcriptions copied from deſcriptions, by imitations borrowed from imitations, by traditional imagery, and hereditary ſimilies, by readineſs of rhyme, and volubility of ſyllables. In peruſing the works of this race of authors, the mind is exerciſed either by recollection or inquiry; either ſomething already learned is to be retrieved, or ſomething new is to be examined. If their greatneſs ſeldom elevates, their acuteneſs often ſurpriſes; if the imagination is not always gratified, at leaſt the powers of reflection and compariſon are employed; and in the maſs of materials which ingenious abſurdity has thrown together, genuine wit and uſeful knowledge may be ſometimes found, buried perhaps in groſſneſs of expreſſion, but uſeful to thoſe who know their value; and ſuch as, when they are expanded to perſpicuity, and poliſhed to elegance, may give luſtre to works which have more propriety, though leſs copiouſneſs of ſentiment. This kind of writing, which was, I believe, borrowed from Marino and his followers, had been recommended by the example of Donne, a man of very extenſive and various knowledge, and by Jonſon, whoſe manner reſembled that of Donne more in the ruggedneſs of his lines than in the caſt of his ſentiments. When their reputation was high, they had undoubtedly more imitators, than time has left behind. Their immediate ſucceſſors, of whom any remembrance can be ſaid to remain, were Suckling, Waller, Denham, Cowley, Cleveland, and Milton. Denham and Waller ſought another way to fame, by improving the harmony of our numbers. Milton tried the metaphyſick ſtile only in his lines upon Hobſon the Carrier. Cowley adopted it, and excelled his predeceſſors, having as much ſentiment, and more muſick. Suckling neither improved verſification, nor abounded in conceits. The faſhionable ſtile remained chiefly with Cowley; Suckling could not reach it, and Milton diſdained it (76)."

(76) Lives of the Poets, vol. i. p. 25—32.

Theſe critical remarks Dr. Johnſon has admirably illuſtrated by a variety of examples (77); after which he proceeds to examine particularly the works of Cowley, who was almoſt the laſt of the metaphyſical race of poets, and undoubtedly the beſt. As it would extend this article too far to follow our great Biographer minutely through his ſeveral obſervations, we muſt content ourſelves with adverting to a few paſſages, which occur in the courſe of his criticiſm.

(77) Ibid. p. 32—53.

Of Cowley's Miſcellanies Dr. Johnſon ſays, that ſuch an aſſemblage of diverſified excellence no other Poet has hitherto afforded. Speaking of the "Chronicle," the Doctor aſſerts that it is a compoſition unrivalled and alone. "Such gaiety of fancy, ſuch "facility of expreſſion, ſuch varied ſimilitude, ſuch "a ſucceſſion of images, and ſuch a dance of words, "it is in vain to expect except from Cowley. His "ſtrength always appears in his agility; his volatility "is not the flutter of a light, but the bound of an "elaſtic mind. His levity never leaves his learning "behind it; the Moraliſt, the Politician, and the "Critic mingle their influence even in this airy frolic "of genius. To ſuch a performance Suckling could "have brought the gaiety but not the knowledge; "Dryden could have ſupplied the knowledge, but "not the gaiety."

"The Verſes to Davenant," ſays Dr. Johnſon, "which are vigorouſly begun, and happily concluded, contain ſome hints of criticiſm very juſtly conceived and happily expreſſed. Cowley's critical "abilities

" abilities, have not been ſufficiently obſerved: the " few deciſions and remarks which his prefaces and " his notes on the Davideis ſupply, were at that time " acceſſions to Engliſh literature, and ſhew ſuch ſkill " as raiſes our wiſh for more examples."

Of the " Anacreontiques" Dr. Johnſon obſerves, that " theſe little pieces will be found more finiſhed " in their kind than any other of Cowley's works. " The diction ſhews nothing of the mould of time, " and the ſentiments are at no great diſtance from " our preſent habitudes of thought. Real mirth " muſt be always natural, and nature is uniform. " Men have been wiſe in very different modes; but " they always laughed the ſame way.——The Ana- " creontiques, therefore, of Cowley give now all " the pleaſure which they ever gave. If he was " formed by nature for one kind of writing more " than for another, his power ſeems to have been " greateſt in the familiar and the feſtive."

Concerning Cowley's " Miſtreſs," the Doctor remarks, that ſhe has " no power of ſeduction; ſhe " plays round the head, but comes not at the heart. " Her beauty and abſence, her kindneſs and cruelty, " her diſdain and inconſtancy, produce no correſ- " pondence of emotion. His poetical account of " the virtues of plants, and colours of flowers, is not " peruſed with more ſluggiſh frigidity. The compo- " ſitions are ſuch as might have been written for " penance by a hermit; or for hire by a philoſophi- " cal rhymer who had only heard of the other ſex; " for they turn the mind only on the writer, whom, " without thinking on a woman but as the ſubject " for his taſk, we ſometimes eſteem as learned, and " ſometimes deſpiſe as trifling, always admire as in- " genious, and always condemn as unnatural."

After a particular examination of the Pindarique Odes, Doctor Johnſon comes to the following concluſion. " The Pindarique Odes have ſo long en- " joyed the higheſt degree of poetical reputation, " that I am not willing to diſmiſs them with un- " abated cenſure; and ſurely, though the mode " of compoſition be erroneous, yet many parts de- " ſerve at leaſt that admiration which is due to great " comprehenſion of knowledge, and great fertility of " fancy. The thoughts are often new, and often " ſtriking; but the greatneſs of one part is diſgraced " by the littleneſs of another; and total negligence " of language gives the nobleſt conceptions the ap- " pearance of a fabric auguſt in the plan, but mean " in the materials. Yet ſurely thoſe verſes are not " without a juſt claim to praiſe, of which it may be " ſaid with truth, that no man but Cowley could " have written them."

The ſilence and neglect with which the Davideis has been treated, our biographical Critic ſhews to have ariſen partly from the choice of the ſubject, and partly from the performance of the work. After making ſeveral very judicious obſervations upon it in both theſe reſpects, not greatly to its honour, he ſays: " In the peruſal of the Davideis, as of all Cowley's " works, we find wit and learning unprofitably " ſquandered. Attention has no relief; the affec- " tions are never moved; we are ſometimes ſurpriz- " ed, but never delighted; and find much to admire, " but little to approve. Still, however, it is the " work of Cowley; of a mind capacious by nature, " and repleniſhed by ſtudy."

In taking a general review of Cowley's Poetry, Dr. Johnſon diſplays his uſual ſagacity. " It will be " found, ſays the Doctor, that he wrote with abun- " dant fertility, but negligent or unſkilful ſelection; " with much thought, but with little imagery; that " he is never pathetic, and rarely ſublime, but always " either ingenious or learned, either acute or " profound."

Cowley's proſe is diſtinguiſhed by a high encomium. " After ſo much criticiſm on his Poems, the " Eſſays which accompany them muſt not be for- " gotten. What is ſaid by Sprat of his converſa- " tion, that no man could draw from it any ſuſpi- " cion of his excellence in poetry, may be applied to " theſe compoſitions. No author ever kept his verſe " and his proſe at a greater diſtance from each " other. His thoughts are natural, and his ſtyle has " a ſmooth and placid equability, which has never " yet obtained its due commendation. Nothing is " far-ſought, or hard-laboured; but all is eaſy " without feebleneſs, and familiar without groſſneſs."

We ſhall finiſh this long addition to the article of our learned predeceſſor, with Dr. Johnſon's concluding paragraph in reſpect to Cowley. " It may be " affirmed, without any encomiaſtic fervour, that he " brought to his poetic labours a mind replete with " learning, and that his paſſages are embelliſhed " with all the ornaments which books could ſupply; " that he was the firſt who imparted to Engliſh " numbers the enthuſiaſm of the greater ode, and " the gaiety of the leſs; that he was qualified for " ſprightly ſallies, and for lofty flights; that he was " among thoſe who freed tranſlation from ſervility, " and, inſtead of following his author at a diſtance, " walked by his ſide; and that if he left verſification " yet improvable, he left likewiſe from time to time " ſuch ſpecimens of excellence as enabled ſucceeding " poets to improve it (78)."] K.

(78) Ibid. p. 53, 56, 57, 59, 60, 63, 64, 74, 88, 99, 100.

 [COWPER (WILLIAM), Earl Cowper, Lord High Chancellor of Great-Britain, was deſcended from an antient family [A], and ſon to Sir William Cowper, Baronet [B], who was Member of Parliament for the town of Hertford, in the reigns of Charles

[A] Deſcended from an antient family.] 'He was 'deſcended from John Cowper of Strode, in the 'county of Suſſex, who lived in the time of Edward 'IV. William, one of his anceſtors, was firſt a 'Baronet of Nova Scotia, and afterwards created a 'Baronet of England by King Charles I. He was 'the firſt of the family that was poſſeſſed of Hertford-'Caſtle, where he ended his days in peace, after he 'had been impriſoned in Ely-Houſe in Holborn, for 'his loyalty to King Charles I (1).' This Gentleman was great grandfather to Earl Cowper.

(1) Chronological Diary, in the Hiſtorical Regiſter for the Year 1723, p. 46.

[B] Son to Sir William Cowper, Bart.] This Gentleman 'was choſen one of the Members for 'Hertford, in the two laſt Parliaments called by 'Charles II. and was one, who, with the Earls of 'Shafteſbury and Huntingdon, with other Lords, 'preſented reaſons to the Grand Jury of Middleſex, 'June 16, 1680, for the indictment of James, Duke 'of York, for not coming to Church. He alſo 'ſerved in Parliament for the town of Hertford, in 'the firſt year of King William and Queen Mary, 'and in two other Parliaments in the reign of King 'William (2).' He married Sarah, daughter to Sir Samuel Holled, of London, by whom he had two ſons, William, the ſubject of this article, and Spencer Cowper, Eſq; who, 'on the acceſſion of George I. 'to the Throne, was appointed Attorney-General to 'the Prince of Wales, and on July 12, 1717, conſti- 'tuted Chief Juſtice of Cheſter. In 1727, he was 'made Attorney-General of the Duchy of Lancaſter; 'and on October 14 following, called to the degree 'of Serjeant at Law, and afterwards made one of the 'Judges of the Court of Common Pleas. He firſt 'married Pennington, daughter of John Goodere, 'Eſq; ſecondly Theodora, widow of John Stepney, 'Eſq; and departed this life at his Chambers in 'Lincoln's Inn, on December 10, 1728, leaving 'iſſue, by his firſt wife, three ſons, 1. William 'Cowper, Eſq; Clerk of the Houſe of Lords, who 'died at his houſe in the Old Palace Yard, Weſt- 'minſter, in Feb. 1739-40;—2. The Rev. Mr. John 'Cowper, Rector of Great Berkhamſtead in Hert- 'fordſhire, and one of the Chaplains in Ordinary to 'his Majeſty; and 3. Aſhley Cowper, Eſq; Coun- 'ſellor at Law, and Clerk of the Houſe of Lords (3).' (3) Ibid.

(2) Collins's Peerage of England, vol. iv. p. 352. edit. 1779.

Spencer Cowper, Eſq; brother to the Chancellor, who has been juſt mentioned in this note, was permitted, by the particular favour of the King, to hold

Charles II. and William III. He is ſuppoſed to have been born in the Caſtle of Hertford, of which his family had been a conſiderable time in poſſeſſion; but of the place, or time of his birth, or where he was educated, we have not been able to obtain any certain information [C]. It appears, however, that being brought up to the ſtudy of the law, he made ſo great a proficiency in it, that, ſoon after he was called to the Bar, he was choſen Recorder of Colcheſter (a). His eloquence, and ſkill in his profeſſion, rendered him very conſpicuous in it; and in the reign of King William, he was appointed one of his Majeſty's Council learned in the law (b). In 1695, he was choſen one of the repreſentatives in Parliament for the town of Hertford [D]; his father, at the ſame time, being elected the other Member for that borough (c). The following year, he appeared as Council for the Crown on the trials of Sir William Perkins (d), Brigadier Rookwood (e), Major Lowick (f) and Charles Cranburne (g), who were convicted of high treaſon, for being concerned in the plot to aſſaſſinate King William. The ſame year, he was alſo Council for the Crown on the trial of Captain Thomas Vaughan, for high treaſon on the high ſeas (h); and he likewiſe ſupported, in Parliament, the Bill of Attainder againſt Sir John Fenwick (i) [E]. In 1704, he made a Speech in the Houſe of Commons, in the famous caſe of Aſhby and White, in which he maintained, that an action did lie at common law, for an elector, who had been denied his vote for Members of Parliament (k). His practice and reputation continued greatly to increaſe; on the acceſſion of Queen Anne he was again appointed one of the Counſel to the Crown; and on the 11th of October, 1705, he was conſtituted Lord Keeper of the Great Seal of England [F] (l). Biſhop Burnet, ſpeaking of this promotion, expreſſes himſelf in the following terms: 'The ſeals being 'ſent for, they were given to Cowper, a Gentleman of a good family, of excellent parts, 'and of an engaging deportment, very eminent in his profeſſion; and who had for many 'years been conſidered, as the man who ſpoke the beſt of any in the Houſe of Commons. 'He was a very acceptable man to the Whig party. They had been much diſguſted with 'the Lord-Treaſurer, for the coldneſs he expreſſed, as if he would have maintained a 'neutrality between the two parties; though the one ſupported him, while the other 'deſigned to ruin him. But this ſtep went a great way towards the reconciling the 'Whigs to him (m).' A few days after Mr. Cowper's promotion, Queen Anne addreſſed both Houſes of Parliament in a Speech, which was well received, and which was ſaid to be written by the new Lord-keeper (n) [G]. The

(a) Collins's Peerage, vol. iv. p. 352. edition 1779.
(b) Id. ibid.
(c) Whitworth's Succeſſion of Parliaments, p. 207.
(d) State Trials, vol. iv. p. 641.
(e) Ibid. p. 654. 674.
(f) Ibid. p. 708, 709.
(g) Ibid. p. 687. 689.
(h) State Trials, vol. v. p. 22, 23.
(i) Ibid. p. 132, 133.
(k) Torbuck's Parliamentary Debates, vol. iv. p. 89—98.
(l) Collins, ubi ſupra, p. 353.
(m) Burnet's Hiſt. of his own Times, vol. ii. p. 426. edit. folio, 1734.
(n) Tindal's Continuation of Rapin's Hiſt. of England, vol. iii. p. 718. edit. fol. 1751.

hold to the end of his life the office of one of the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas, together with the office of Chief Juſtice of Cheſter. Before his promotion to either of theſe offices, he had been tried for murder at Hertford Aſſizes, but was acquitted. Vid. State Trials, Vol. v. p. 232. Mr. William Cowper, afterwards the Chancellor, attended this trial as a witneſs in behalf of his brother, as did alſo his Lady.

[C] We have not been able to obtain any certain information.] We travelled to Hertford, merely with a view of procuring ſome information about Lord Chancellor Cowper, his birth, &c. and were ſurprized to find, that not the leaſt memorial had been preſerved of him, by a family which owes to him ſo much of its ſplendour, in Hertingfordbury Church, near Hertford, in which he was interred. In that Church is a ſplendid mauſoleum for the family, in which is a very fine monument to the memory of the ſecond Earl Cowper, the Chancellor's ſon, and a ſmaller one in memory of Judge Cowper, the Chancellor's brother; but not the leaſt inſcription in memory of the Chancellor himſelf, who was by much the moſt diſtinguiſhed perſon of the family.

We examined alſo the pariſh Regiſters of the two Churches at Hertford, but could find no entry of the Chancellor's birth. In the Church-yard of Hertingfordbury is a monument to the memory of his mother, Sarah, Lady Cowper, who died in 1719, aged ſeventy-ſix. The monument was erected by her two ſons, the Chancellor and the Judge.

[D] Choſen one of the Repreſentatives in Parliament for the town of Hertford.] It has been obſerved, that on 'the very firſt day he ſat in the Houſe of Com-'mons, he had occaſion to ſpeak three times, and 'came off with univerſal applauſe (4).'

(4) Chronol. Diary, in the Hiſtorical Regiſter for the year 1723, p. 43.

[E] The Bill of Attainder againſt Sir John Fenwick.] There ſeems little reaſon to doubt, but that Sir John Fenwick was really guilty of the treaſonable practices with which he was charged; but as there was not legal evidence ſufficient for his conviction, the proceedings againſt him, in a legal and conſtitutional point of view, appear to have been extremely indefenſible. Mr. Cowper, however, was led, like many others, by his zeal for the Revolution, to ſupport the eſtabliſhment which then took place, in a manner not perfectly conſiſtent with the principles which gave riſe to that great event.

[F] Conſtituted Lord Keeper of the Great Seal of England.] He ſucceeded Sir Nathan Wright, of whoſe removal the Ducheſs of Marlborough expreſſes herſelf in the following terms: 'I prevailed with her 'Majeſty to take the Great Seal from Sir Nathan 'Wright, a man deſpiſed by all parties, of no uſe to 'the Crown, and whoſe weak and wretched conduct 'in the Court of Chancery, had almoſt brought his 'very office into contempt. His removal, however, 'was a great loſs to the Church, for which he had 'ever been a warm ſtickler. And this loſs was the 'more ſenſibly felt, as his ſucceſſor, my Lord Cow-'per, was not only of the Whig party, but of ſuch 'abilities and integrity, as brought a new credit to it 'in the nation (5).'

(5) Account of the Conduct of the Dowager Ducheſs of Marlborough, p. 147.

Dr. Smollett, ſpeaking of Cowper's promotion, ſays, he was 'a Lawyer of good extraction, ſuperior 'talents, engaging manners, and eminence in his 'profeſſion. He was ſtaunch to Whig principles, 'and for many years had been conſidered as one of 'their beſt Speakers in the Houſe of Commons (6).'

(6) Hiſt. of England, from the Revolution, vol. ii. p. 61.

Mr. Cunningham, in his "Hiſtory of Great Britain," ſays, 'Mr. Cowper, a man highly renown-'ed for his maſterly eloquence and ſkill in the law, 'and who was naturally inclined to ſteadineſs, juſtice, 'and moderation, was firſt made Lord-keeper of the 'Great Seal, and afterwards Lord Cowper, and Lord 'High Chancellor of the kingdom (*).' And in another place the ſame writer, ſpeaking of Lord Cowper, ſays, that in him 'all the ornaments and 'graces of eloquence were diſplayed in the greateſt 'perfection (†).'

(*) Hiſt. of Gt. Britain, vol. i. p. 458.

(†) Ibid. vol. ii. p. 79.

[G] Said to be written by the new Lord-Keeper.] Mr. Macpherſon ſays, 'The Queen addreſſed to the 'two Houſes a Speech, penned by Cowper, the new 'Lord-Keeper, which, though ſuitable to the times, 'ſhewed that the meaſures of the Court were no 'longer guided by Tory principles. She urged, 'with earneſtneſs, the neceſſity of proſecuting the 'war, to reſtore the balance of power, which, ſhe 'ſaid, the poſſeſſion of Spain by the Houſe of Bourbon 'had

The following year, Commiſſioners having been appointed for England and Scotland, to treat concerning an Union of the two kingdoms [H], they met, for the firſt time, at the Cockpit, Whitehall, on the 16th of April; when the Lord-Keeper Cowper, who had been appointed one of the Commiſſioners for England, made a Speech to the Lords Commiſſioners for Scotland, in which he obſerved to their Lordſhips, that the Parliament of England were actuated by the ſtrongeſt deſire to attain that Union, which had been ſo long thought neceſſary, by all that wiſhed well to the proſperity of both nations; and that the Engliſh Commiſſioners now met thoſe for Scotland, with hearts fully reſolved to uſe their utmoſt endeavours to remove all difficulties in the treaty, and to prevent all miſunderſtandings; to have the general and joint good of both kingdoms ſolely in their view, and not the ſeparate intereſt of either; and determined to act as if they were already united in intereſt, and had nothing left to conſider, but what ſettlements and proviſions were moſt likely to conduce to the common ſafety and happineſs of the whole iſland of Great Britain (o). He attended a variety of other meetings in the management of this important buſineſs; and on the 23d of July waited upon the Queen, at St. James's, with the articles agreed upon between the Commiſſioners of both kingdoms, as the terms or conditions upon which the intended Union was to take place. He was accompanied by the other Commiſſioners; and, in their names, made a Speech to her Majeſty on the occaſion (p). Another Speech was afterwards made, by the Lord Chancellor of Scotland, in behalf of the Commiſſioners for that kingdom, who attended at the ſame time: and the Articles of Union, agreed upon by the Commiſſioners, with ſome few alterations, were afterwards ratified by the Parliaments both of England and Scotland.

(o) Defoe's Hiſt. of the Union, p. 115. edit. 1786.

(p) Ibid. p. 194, 195.

Before that event had taken place, an extraordinary manœuvre of the Tories in Parliament, had thrown the Whigs, at leaſt ſuch of them as were in power, into ſome degree of embarraſſment. A motion was made by the Tory party in the Houſe of Peers, that an addreſs ſhould be preſented to the Queen, requeſting her Majeſty to invite the Princeſs Sophia, as preſumptive Heir to the Crown, to come and reſide in England. The Tories knew, that if the miniſtry ſupported this meaſure, they would give great offence to the Queen; and if they oppoſed it, they would probably be ſuſpected of being enemies to the Proteſtant ſucceſſion. The motion was, however, oppoſed by the Whigs; and rejected by a great majority. But two Bills were afterwards brought in, and paſſed, which were deemed a great ſecurity to the Proteſtant ſucceſſion. By the firſt, a Regency was appointed [I] on the event of the Queen's death; and the ſecond was a Bill for the naturalization of the Princeſs Sophia, and the iſſue of her body, being Proteſtants (q). When theſe Bills had received the Royal Aſſent, the Earl of Halifax was ſent with them to the Court of Hanover; and he alſo carried with him letters from the leaders of the Whig party, and in particular one from the Lord-Keeper to the Elector [K], expreſſive of the ſincerity of his attachment to the Proteſtant ſucceſſion (r).

(q) Macpherſon's Hiſt. of Great Britain, vol. ii. p. 332. Original Papers, vol. ii. p. 25; and Smollet's Hiſt. of England from the Revolution, vol. ii. p. 62, 63.

(r) Macpherſon's Original Papers, ubi ſupra, p. 32.

In

'had deſtroyed. She demanded the neceſſary ſup-
'plies, for ſupporting the operations of the allies, as
'well as for exerting the force of her own king-
'doms. She informed them of the act paſſed in 'Scotland, for treating concerning a Union; and ſhe
'concluded, with taking an obvious part with the 'Whigs, by declaring that the Church was in no
'danger; a circumſtance urged with vehemence by
'the Tories, to arm the prejudices of the populace to 'favour their own deſigns. This Speech was ſo
'ſuitable to the ſentiments of the prevailing party,
'and the ſubject in general ſo popular, that an addreſs
'of thanks was voted by the commons, without either
'debate, or one diſſenting voice (7).'

(7) Hiſtory of Great Britain, vol. ii. p. 331, 2d. edit.

[H] Commiſſioners—to treat concerning an Union of the two kingdoms.] It has been aſſerted of the Lord-Keeper Cowper, that 'his prudence and dexterity 'ſhone in the management of the famous Treaty of 'Union between England and Scotland; the whole 'weight of which arduous affair he ſuſtained almoſt 'alone, on the part of the Engliſh Commiſſioners (8).'

(8) Hiſtorical Regiſter for the Year 1723, Chron. Diary, p. 43.

[I] By the firſt, a Regency was appointed, &c.] Mr. Macpherſon remarks, that 'this Bill, by forming an 'eventual Regency, of the Firſt Officers of State, 'upon the death of the Queen, effectually ſecured 'the kingdom, by providing a continuation of legal 'government, till the ſucceſſor ſhould arrive, and 'aſſert his own authority (9).'

(9) Hiſtory of Great Britain, vol. ii. p. 334.

[K] One from the Lord-Keeper to the Elector.] The letter was as follows:

London, April 11, 1706.

'May it pleaſe your Electoral Highneſs,

'When I was firſt, by her Majeſty's great good-
'neſs, raiſed to the ſtation I am now in, I could not 'perſuade myſelf, that a ſubject of ſo little import'ance, would have then excuſed my preſumption in
'troubling your Electoral Highneſs in this manner
'upon that occaſion, though with the ſincereſt aſſur-
'ances, that my heart ſhould ever continue moſt
'firmly devoted to the ſervice of your E. H. and 'your E. H. ſerene houſe. But now, ſince I hope it
'is allowable for me, to expreſs to your E. H. the 'very great ſatisfaction I have, with every good Eng-
'liſhman, received from the effectual ſecurities lately
'provided by the Parliament, for the Proteſtant ſuc-
'ceſſion to the Crown of England; I beg leave
'humbly to preſent to your E. H. at the ſame time,
'his moſt faithful promiſe of a moſt ardent zeal for
'your E. H's. proſperity, and promiſe never to neglect
'any thing in my little power, that may poſſibly
'conduce to it;' being fully perſuaded, it is impoſ-
'ſible to be in the true intereſt of England, and not
'to be a faſt friend to that ſucceſſion, which the ſenſe
'of the kingdom hath ſo often declared to be its 'only defence from the moſt deplorable condition a 'people can be reduced to. I was one of thoſe, who 'have had the honour, for a long time paſt, conſtantly
'to have adhered to that opinion, for excluding a
'Romiſh ſucceſſor, even while it was unfaſhionable,
'and decried by thoſe that were in authority; and,
'therefore, that the ſame perſons ſhould now con-
'tinue firm to the ſame, when it is owned by the 'legiſlative authority, and the general bent of the 'people, can admit, I think, of no queſtion. This
'I choſe to mention, as an evidence of my ſincerity
'in what I profeſs, rather than multiply expreſſions,
'which are in every one's power to make; not that I
'am at all apprehenſive of thoſe endeavours, which 'have been uſed to render your E. H. and your E. H.
'ſerene

In conſideration of the Lord-Keeper's merit and ſervices, he was advanced, on the 9th of November, 1706, to the dignity of a Peer of this kingdom, by the ſtyle and title of Lord Cowper, Baron Cowper of Wingham in Kent (s); and on the 4th of May, 1707, her Majeſty in Council declared him Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain (t). When the ſecond Parliament of Great Britain aſſembled, on the 16th of November, 1708, which was ſoon after the death of Prince George of Denmark, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Lord-Chancellor Cowper, the Lord-Treaſurer, the Lord-Steward, and the Maſter of the Horſe, were appointed to repreſent her Majeſty in Parliament; and on this occaſion both Houſes were addreſſed in a Speech by Lord Cowper (u). On the firſt of March, 1708-9, by order of the Houſe of Peers, he returned thanks to the Duke of Marlborough, who had then returned from abroad, and taken his place in the Houſe, for the important ſervices performed by him during the preceding campaign (w); and the following year his Lordſhip preſided at the trial of Dr. Sacheverell. The ſame year, in conſequence of the intrigues of Harley and Mrs. Maſham, the Earl of Sunderland, ſon-in-law to the Duke of Marlborough, was removed from the office of Secretary of State; and it being apprehended, that this event would give ſo much diſguſt to that great general, that he might be induced to quit the command of the army, a joint letter was ſent to his Grace by Lord Cowper, the Dukes of Newcaſtle and Devonſhire, Lords Somers, Oxford, and Halifax, and Mr. Henry Boyle, then Secretary of State, in which they conjured him, in the ſtrongeſt terms, not to quit his command [L]. But ſoon after, on the 8th of Auguſt, 1710 (x), the Earl of Godolphin

(s) Collins, ubi ſupra, p. 353.
(t) Id. ibid.

(u) Tindal's Continuation, vol. iv. p. 105, 106.

(w) Ibid. p. 117.

(x) Salmon's Chronological Hiſtorian, p. 304.

'ſerene houſe diſguſted, with thoſe who have the 'trueſt concern for your ſervice; ſince it is impoſſible, 'that ſo excellent a judgment as that of your E. H. 'ſhould ever prefer the ſurprizing ſtarts of a ſudden 'unnacountable zeal, contrary to known principles, 'affected merely for popularity, and ſhewing itſelf in 'one particular only, (while all other means tending 'to the ſame are neglected) to a ſteady, uninterrupted, and uniform courſe of acting for the Proteſtant 'ſucceſſion, and flowing from principles, that were 'owned, when moſt diſcountenanced. But theſe 'endeavours in me to give your E. H. any ſatisfaction of this kind, are perfectly unneceſſary, ſince 'my Lord Halifax, who is ſo able and thoroughly 'verſed in all the affairs of this kingdom, and ſo acquainted with the inclinations and practices of all 'men in buſineſs here, is to be for ſome time in your 'E. H's Court, where none can ſo well diſperſe all 'unfair repreſentations of facts; and when that is 'done, your E. H. cannot but make the wiſeſt concluſion, and ſuch as next, under the bleſſing of 'God, may beſt tend to make yet more effectual, 'thoſe prudent proviſions which the wiſdom of this 'kingdom hath, on mature deliberation, thought fitteſt 'to be made for the intereſt and honour of your E. 'H's ſerene houſe and the public happineſs.

'I am, &c.

'WILLIAM COWPER (10).'

(10) Macpherſon's Original Papers, vol. ii. p. 32, 33.

To this letter his Electoral Highneſs wrote an anſwer, of which the following is a tranſlation:

'My Lord, June 20, 1706.

'I am very much obliged to you for the letter 'which you were at the trouble of writing to me; 'and for the aſſurances which it contains of your affection for me, and of your zeal for the intereſts of 'my family. I approve, more than any one, of the 'choice which the Queen made of a man of your 'merit, for an employment ſo conſiderable as that 'which ſhe truſted to you. I am already ſufficiently 'acquainted with your principles, and with the conſtancy with which you followed them in the moſt 'difficult times, to be perſuaded that her Majeſty 'could not place that employment in better hands. 'You are in the right to believe, that it will be 'always eaſy for me to diſtinguiſh thoſe who are truly 'zealous for the Proteſtant ſucceſſion. I know the 'rank which you hold among them, and the confidence which they place in you; and I ſhall be always 'very happy to find opportunities of ſhewing you 'how much I am,

'My Lord, &c (11).'

(11) Ibid. p. 54.

[L] They conjured him, in the ſtrongeſt terms, not to quit his command.] In this letter was the following paſſage: 'We are fully convinced, that it is impoſſible for your Grace to quit the ſervice at this 'time, without the utmoſt hazard to the whole alliance. And we muſt therefore conjure you, by the 'glory you have already obtained, by the many ſervices you have done your Queen and country, by 'the expectation you have juſtly raiſed in all Europe, 'and by all that is dear and tender to you at home, 'whoſe chief dependance is upon your ſucceſs, that you 'would not leave this great work unfiniſhed, but 'continue at the head of the army. This we look 'upon as the moſt neceſſary ſtep that can be taken to 'prevent the diſſolution of this Parliament. Your 'Grace's compliance with this our earneſt requeſt 'would be the greateſt obligation to us, and all that 'wiſh well to our country (12).'

(12) Account of the Conduct of the Dowager Ducheſs of Marlborough, p. 258, 259.

It has been aſſerted, that a ſcheme was formed to make the Duke of Marlborough General for life, and that it was prevented only by the refuſal of Lord Cowper to put the Great Seal to the commiſſion. Dr. Johnſon, ſpeaking of Dean Swift's "Conduct of the Allies," which was publiſhed in 1712, ſays, 'That is now no longer doubted, of which the 'nation was then firſt informed, that the war was 'unneceſſarily protracted to fill the pockets of Marlborough; and that it would have continued without 'end, if he could have continued his annual plunder. 'But Swift, I ſuppoſe, did not yet know what he has 'ſince written, that a commiſſion was drawn which 'would have appointed him general for life, had it 'not become ineffectual by the reſolution of Lord 'Cowper, who refuſed the ſeal (13).' The account given by Swift, to which Johnſon alludes, is as follows: 'Upon the admiſſion of theſe men (the Whig 'miniſtry) into employments, the Court ſoon ran 'into extremity of Low Church meaſures; and although, in the Houſe of Commons, Mr. Harley, 'Sir Simon Harcourt, Mr. St. John, and ſome 'others, made great and bold ſtands in defence of the 'conſtitution, yet they were always borne down by a 'majority. It was, I think, during this period of 'time, that the Duke of Marlborough, whether by a 'motive of ambition, or a love of money, or the raſh 'counſels of his wife the Ducheſs, made that bold 'attempt of deſiring the Queen to give him a Commiſſion to be General for life. Her Majeſty's anſwer was, "That ſhe would take time to conſider "of it;" and, in the mean while, the Duke adviſed 'with the Lord Cowper, then Chancellor, about the 'form in which the Commiſſion ſhould be drawn. 'The Chancellor, very much to his honour, endeavoured to diſſuade the Duke from engaging in ſo 'dangerous an affair; and proteſted, "he would "never put the Great Seal to ſuch a Commiſſion "(14)." It appears from this quotation, that Dr. Johnſon's ſtatement from Swift is not quite accurate; and that no ſuch Commiſſion was drawn, it being merely, ſuppoſing Swift's account to be true, a project

(13) Biographical Prefaces, vol. viii. Swift, p. 32. 1ſt. edit.

(14) Swift's Works, vol. xv. p. 16. edit. 8vo. 1775.

Godolphin was removed from the poſt of Lord-Treaſurer, and the other Whig Miniſters reſigned [M]. The Queen ſignified her inclination, notwithſtanding the change of miniſtry, that Lord Cowper ſhould ſtill continue in the poſt of Chancellor: but he alſo reſigned, as he did not chooſe to remain in office, when an adminiſtration was formed, conſiſting of men whoſe political ſentiments and views were totally different from his own [N]. Soon after the new Miniſtry came into office, Mr. Harley being at the head of the Treaſury, ſome inquiries were ſet on foot in order to criminate the late Adminiſtration; and a vote of cenſure was paſſed relative to the management of the war in Spain. Lord Cowper took an active part in the debates occaſioned by theſe inquiries [O]; and he joined in ject of the Duke himſelf; and it is perfectly conformable to Lord Cowper's character, that he ſhould firmly refuſe to put the Great Seal to ſo illegal and unconſtitutional a Commiſſion.

[M] The other Whig Miniſters reſigned.] Dr. Smollet ſays, 'There was not one Whig left in any office 'of State, except the Duke of Marlborough, who 'would have renounced his command, had not he 'been earneſtly diſſuaded by his particular friends 'from taking ſuch a ſtep as might have been prejudicial to the intereſt of the nation (15).'

(15) Hiſtory of England, from the Revolution, vol. ii. p. 178.

[N] He did not chooſe to remain in office, &c.] It is ſaid by one writer, that in the high ſtation of Lord-Chancellor of Great Britain, Lord Cowper's 'integrity, moderation, candour, humility, and diſintereſtedneſs, gained him the eſteem of all good men, 'and the particular regard and favour of his Royal 'Miſtreſs, who found in him the greateſt comfort ſhe 'had among all her ſervants, upon the loſs of her 'dear conſort. The Queen had ſo high an opinion 'of his virtue and merit, that when, by a train of 'Court-intrigues, and an inſuperable averſion to the 'Earl of Sunderland, ſhe had fixed a reſolution 'to change her Miniſters, and call a new Parliament, 'ſhe uſed all endeavours to bring the Lord Cowper 'into her meaſures. But his Lordſhip rightly foreſeeing, that the new ſcheme not only tended to the 'making a peace derogatory from the engagements 'of the grand alliance, but likewiſe to the weakening 'of the ſettlement of the Proteſtant ſucceſſion, which 'he ever had firmly at heart, reſiſted all temptations, 'and voluntarily reſigned the Seals; and, in the moſt 'difficult and dangerous junctures, acted with the 'utmoſt vigour, in concert with the ſtaunchеſt ſticklers for the moſt ſerene Houſe of Hanover (16).'

(16) Chron. Diary, in the Hiſtorical Regiſter for the Year 1723. p. 43, 44.

Mr. Macpherſon ſays, that "the Queen ſignified "her inclination, that the Lord Cowper ſhould con-"tinue Chancellor. He derived, perhaps, this favour "from his inſignificance (17)." The idea of Lord Cowper's inſignificance ſeems never to have entered the head of any man, but that of Mr. Macpherſon. Few circumſtances are better aſcertained in the hiſtory of this period, than that Lord Cowper was in high eſtimation with his own party. Mr. Macpherſon's repreſentation is undoubtedly contrary to the real ſtate of things; and, indeed, inconſiſtent with the facts ſtated in his own hiſtory (18). But this writer ſeems to have conceived a great prejudice againſt this Nobleman, of whom he ſays in another place, that he was "a man of heavy and confuſed parts (19)." He appears to have no other ground for this aſſertion, but Cowper's letter to the Elector of Hanover, which has been given in note [K]. That letter is not entitled to much commendation; but a formal letter of that kind is too ſlight a foundation for making ſuch a ſtatement of the abilities of the writer. His Lordſhip's letters to Mr. Hughes, as publiſhed by Mr. Duncombe, exhibit him in a very amiable light, and are written with perſpicuity and good ſenſe. It may be admitted, that Lord Cowper's abilities were not of the firſt rate; but they have certainly been very improperly and unjuſtly degraded by Mr. Macpherſon. This nobleman was perſonally known to Biſhop Burnet and Sir Richard Steele; and Burnet ſays of him, that he was conſidered, for many years, as the beſt Speaker in the Houſe of Commons; and Steele, ſpeaking of Lord Cowper, in the 130th number of the Tatler, ſays, 'Who is not pleaſed to ſee a 'perſon in the higheſt ſtation in the law, who was 'the moſt eminent in his profeſſion, and the moſt 'accompliſhed Orator at the Bar?' Is it credible, that a Nobleman, who is ſpoken of in ſuch terms, by Burnet and by Steele, could be "a man of heavy and "confuſed parts?"

(17) Hiſtory of Great Britain, vol. ii. p. 464.

(18) Vid. Hiſt. vol. ii. p. 531. 596; and Original Papers, vol. ii. p. 380. 482. 489.

(19) Original Papers, vol. ii. p. 25.

[O] Took an active part in the debates occaſioned by theſe inquiries.] Lord Galway and Lord Tyrawley were both examined before the Houſe of Peers, concerning the management of the war in Spain. Lord Galway readily anſwered the queſtions that were put to him, and gave in an account of his conduct in Spain to the Houſe in writing; but Lord Tyrawley declined anſwering, deſiring previouſly to be informed whether there was any accuſation againſt him. His Lordſhip inſiſted, that no man was obliged to accuſe himſelf; and that if he were accuſed, he ought to make his defence according to the forms of Courts of Judicature. Lord Cowper maintained, that 'the 'Houſe ought to declare, clearly and plainly, whether there was, or was not, any accuſation againſt 'the Lords Galway and Tyrawley. That the reputation of men of honour was their liberty and 'property; and that if the inquiry that was inſtituted 'tended to cenſure the reputation of the Lords Galway and Tyrawley, by what name ſoever it might 'be called, it was an accuſation. They, therefore, 'had a right to require it in writing, and ought to 'be allowed time to make good their anſwers.' He added, 'That he did not ſpeak this ſo much in favour of thoſe two Gentlemen, as for the honour of 'that illuſtrious Aſſembly (20).' His Lordſhip alſo aſſerted, in a ſubſequent debate, that, in that Houſe, 'in things eſſential to juſtice, the ordinary form of 'Courts of Judicature ought to be obſerved (21).'

(20) Parliamentary Debates, vol. v. p. 347. Hiſt. and Proceedings of the Houſe of Lords, vol. ii. p. 301.

(21) Parliamentary Debates, ubi ſupra, p. 359.

A reſolution being afterwards moved by the Earl of Scarſdale, importing, that the deſign of an offenſive war in Spain had been approved and directed by the Cabinet Council, which had contributed to the misfortunes in Spain; and the words Cabinet-council in the motion being afterwards altered to miniſters, and this alteration giving riſe to ſome debate, Lord Cowper ſaid, 'That the word miniſters was of an 'uncertain ſignification, and Cabinet-council a phraſe 'unknown in our law. That if that auguſt Aſſembly 'proceeded to a cenſure upon men, the world ought 'to know who they were. That he hoped the Lord 'who propoſed this queſtion would explain himſelf; 'and hoped, at the ſame time, that if any body were 'accuſed, it would appear to be without ground. 'That he had the honour to be one of the Miniſtry, 'and did not know whether it was deſigned to involve 'him in the ſame cenſure; but he proteſted, with the 'utmoſt ſincerity, that, while he was in that poſt, he 'gave his advice, and acted to the beſt of his underſtanding, and with an honeſt intention to ſerve the 'Queen and his country (22).'

(22) Ibid. p. 375.

A vote of cenſure having been propoſed againſt the late Miniſtry, on account of their having ſupported an offenſive war in Spain, Lord Cowper ſaid, that it was at that time the popular opinion; 'every body in 'England being then for an offenſive war. That he 'wiſhed every Member of that auguſt Aſſembly 'would lay his hand upon his heart, and ſay, in 'conſcience, whether he would not have been of the 'ſame opinion? That to have adviſed a lingering, 'expenſive, defenſive war, would, no doubt, have 'now been more criminal than this charge. That 'the raiſing the ſiege of Toulon could not, in reaſon, 'be imputed to the offenſive war in Spain, and to the 'loſs of the battle of Almanza; but rather to the 'expedition to Naples, the ſlow march of the German recruits through the country of the Griſons, 'and other unforeſeen accidents, which attend all 'human affairs. But if this queſtion ſhould paſs 'into a reſolution, it will be the comfort of thoſe on 'whom in ſeveral proteſts againſt the determinations of the Houſe of Peers concerning the conduct of that war (y). When Prince Eugene was in England, he is ſaid to have been conſulted about ſome dangerous ſchemes formed by that Prince and the Duke of Marlborough [P]. It may reaſonably be queſtioned, whether any ſuch ſchemes were ever really formed (y) Hiſtory and Proceedings of the Houſe of Lords, vol. ii. p. 331, 333, 344, 345.

'whom the cenſure will fall, that the world will 'judge, that it is founded on ſtrained deductions, 'and forced conſequences, foreign from the premiſes. 'My Lords, all Engliſhmen love action: it is their 'temper and inclination (23).'

(23) Ibid. p. 383.

The vote againſt the late Miniſtry, however, paſſed, by the influence of the new Miniſtry, united with the Tory party; but even Dr. Smollet acknowledges, that theſe reſolutions "were not the proceedings of "candour and national juſtice, but the ebullitions "of party zeal and rancorous animoſity (24)."

(24) Hiſtory of England, ubi ſupra, p. 182.

[P] Some dangerous ſchemes formed by that Prince and the Duke of Marlborough.] Of the nature of theſe ſchemes it may be here proper to give ſome account. Mr. Macpherſon ſays, that 'the Prince of Savoy 'had formed no doubt of being able to defeat the 'Treaty of Peace, by embarraſſing the Britiſh Mi'niſtry with ſplendid offers of advantage for conti'nuing the war. He had reſolved to propoſe, in the 'name of the Emperor, to leave Great Britain in 'abſolute poſſeſſion of the Commerce of Spain and 'America; to induce the King of Denmark and the 'Czar of Muſcovy to join in the grand confederacy; 'to make up the Imperial forces in Spain to thirty 'thouſand men; to pay one million of crowns, out 'of four, to be expended in the military operations 'on that ſide. Should either Houſe of Parliament 'accept theſe terms, in oppoſition to the Miniſtry, 'the Elector of Hanover was to have paſſed into 'Great Britain with an army. A revolution to be 'made in favour of that Prince would enable him to 'carry on the war to the laſt extremity againſt the 'Houſe of Bourbon. But when Prince Eugene per'ceived, that the Commons were firm in the ſupport 'of the Miniſtry; that a majority had been ſecured 'in the Houſe of Lords; that the Duke of Marlbo'rough was diſgraced, and rendered incapable to 'ſecond his views; that the Whigs, though obſtinate 'in their oppoſition, were divided in their Councils; 'that men of influence and property were inclined 'to a peace; that the mob of London were only cla'morous for war; he reſolved to ſpare no ſort of vio'lence to accompliſh his views.

'In forming his meaſures, the Prince of Savoy re'ſolved to conſult chiefly the Duke of Marlborough 'and the Baron de Bothmar, the Hanoverian Envoy 'at the Court of London. The Duke, at their firſt 'interview, chided the Prince for the unfortunate de'lay in his journey. His arrival, he ſaid, might 'have been of great advantage to the party, about a 'month before. He aſcribed his dilatorineſs to that 'Auſtrian gravity, which had been often fatal to the 'affairs of the Imperial family. He told him, that, 'at the opening of the Seſſion, their friends had a 'majority in the Houſe of Lords. That they could 'have ſent two or three of the oppoſite party to the 'Tower, without any difficulty. That their vacant 'places might be ſupplied with men willing to con'tinue the war. That now the whole ſtate of affairs 'was changed; that twelve new Peers had been cre'ated; that the Scottiſh Peers were arrived; that 'they muſt have recourſe to violence, or drop alto'gether their deſign; that three or four perſons, to'gether with the Lord-Treaſurer, who poſſeſſed the 'confidence of a filly woman, and governed her at 'pleaſure, muſt be removed. That the Prince muſt, 'in the mean time, behave himſelf with great mode'ration and diſcretion. That he ſhould endeavour 'to gain the good opinion of the Miniſter, and in'duce the Commons to grant ample ſupplies; and 'that the whole party ſhould watch ſuch accidents 'as might ariſe in the progreſs of time.

'The Duke deſcended from theſe particular facts 'to reflections more general. He affirmed, that the 'ſtate of the kingdom at preſent reſembled its ſitua'tion at the late Revolution; that the diſorders were 'ſimilar, and demanded the ſame remedies; that 'ſhould a Prince of the Electoral Family appear in 'Great Britain, under the cover of a manifeſto, ſet'ting forth, that the Pretender was coming with a 'Popiſh army, the mob might be deceived, and 'Queen Anne, like her father, would ſteal away to 'France. That then the Crown might be ſettled by 'the Whigs, and the war be carried on with redoub'led vigour. Theſe obſervations devolved the diſ'courſe on the Baron de Bothmar. He averred, that 'though the diſorders might be the ſame, the ſame 'remedies were impracticable; that the nation was 'not ſufficiently prepared for a revolution; that the 'prejudices of the vulgar, the great engine in ſuch 'daring enterprizes, were ſtill upon the ſide of the 'enemy; that though the Queen was ſuſpected of 'favouring a Popiſh ſucceſſor, ſhe herſelf was a ſtrict 'Proteſtant; that the jealouſy concerning religion 'was too feeble, on account of the diſtance of the 'danger; that though circumſtances had even been 'more favourable, the experiment would be ex'tremely dangerous; that a miſcarriage would in'evitably ruin the undertaking, load the Family of 'Hanover with the public hatred, and exclude them 'from the ſucceſſion to the Crown. The Duke 'of Marlborough ſuffered himſelf to be argued out 'of his obſervations by the eloquence of the Baron de 'Bothmar. But he is ſaid to have propoſed another 'project, more ſafe, and equally effectual. He ſug'geſted, that bands of ruffians ſhould be ſent through 'the ſtreets by night, to inſult the inhabitants, to 'raiſe diſturbances, and to excite mobs. That, 'ſhould people become accuſtomed to theſe nocturnal 'alarms, there would be no difficulty in aſſaſſinating 'ſuch perſons as the party might wiſh to remove, 'and to throw the whole blame on a licentious 'band.

'Though Prince Eugene rejected this project, his 'own was not diſtinguiſhed with more humanity. 'He propoſed to ſet fire to London, in different 'places, in the night; particularly to the Palace of 'St. James's, where the Queen reſided. He ſhewed, 'that the proper time for the execution of this de'ſign was when the Guards on duty were command'ed by an officer whom the party could truſt. That, 'in the midſt of the confuſion, the Duke of Marlbo'ſhould appear at the head of a party in arms. That 'he ſhould firſt poſſeſs himſelf of the Tower, the 'Bank, the Exchequer. That then he ſhould ſeize 'the perſon of the Queen, force her to diſſolve the 'Parliament, to call a new repreſentative, to make a 'free inquiry into the clandeſtine correſpondence 'with France, to puniſh the guilty with death. The 'Lords Somers, Cowper, and Halifax, were conſulted 'upon this ſcheme. They refuſed at firſt to declare 'their own opinion; but they at laſt abſolutely re'jected the violent propoſal of the Prince. They 'ſignified their inclination to proceed in the legal 'and ordinary way (25).'

(25) Hiſtory of Great Britain, vol. ii. p. 528, 529, 530, 531.

In ſupport of theſe extraordinary converſations, which in themſelves are certainly not very credible, and which ought not to be admitted without good evidence, Mr. Macpherſon refers his readers to Torcy's Memoirs, and to the Stuart Papers publiſhed in his own collection. As to the Marquis de Torcy, he has pretended to give an account of converſations between the Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene, at which he certainly was not preſent, and of which it is extremely improbable that he could be authentically informed of the particulars. Torcy, perhaps, received his information from Plunket; for it appears, from Macpherſon's papers (26), that Plunket ſometimes communicated information to Torcy: but the hearſay ſtories of ſuch a man ought not to be received as hiſtoric evidence. Indeed, it is manifeſt from ſome paſſages in Torcy's Memoirs, that he was himſelf conſcious, that he could not depend upon the truth of ſome of the facts mentioned by him. After men-formed by thoſe great men; but however that be, it is allowed on all hands, that they received no countenance or approbation from Lord Cowper.

(26) Original Papers, vol. ii. p. 296.

On the 6th of June, 1712, the Queen came to the Houſe of Peers, and made a Speech to both Houſes, in which ſhe ſtated the terms upon which her Miniſters were about to conclude a Treaty with the French at Utrecht. The following day, when the Houſe of Lords took her Majeſty's Speech into conſideration, the Duke of Marlborough, who was now removed from the command of the army, aſſerted, "That the meaſures, which had been "purſued for a year paſt, were directly contrary to her Majeſty's engagements with her "allies; that they ſullied the triumphs and glories of her reign; and would render the "Engliſh name odious to all nations." The Earl of Strafford ſaid, "That ſome of the "allies would not have ſhewn ſuch backwardneſs to a peace, as they had hitherto done, "had it not been for ſome Members of that illuſtrious Aſſembly, who had maintained a "ſecret correſpondence with them, and endeavoured to perſuade them to carry on the "war, feeding them with hopes that they ſhould be ſupported by a ſtrong party here." Lord Strafford, who had been ſome time abroad, expreſſing himſelf in but indifferent Engliſh, Lord Cowper ſaid, "That the noble Lord had been ſo long abroad, that he had "almoſt forgotten, not only the language, but the conſtitution of his own country. "According to our laws, it could never be conſidered as a crime in the meaneſt ſubject, "much leſs in any Member of that auguſt Aſſembly, to hold correſpondence with our "allies: ſuch allies eſpecially, whoſe intereſt her Majeſty had declared to be inſeparable "from her own, in her Speech at the opening of this Seſſion. Whereas it would be a "hard matter to juſtify, and to reconcile, either to our own laws, or to the laws of honour "and juſtice, the conduct of ſome perſons in treating clandeſtinely with the common "enemy, without the participation of the allies (z)." (z) Ibid. p. 375.

The part which Lord Cowper took, in oppoſition to the adminiſtration of the Earl of Oxford, occaſioned him to be attacked by Dean Swift, with much virulence, in the Examiner [Q]; and ſome reflections were thrown out againſt him, relative to his private mentioning a propoſal pretended to have been made by the Duke of Marlborough, he ſays, 'To the honour of Prince Eugene, it is ſaid, he rejected ſo 'odious a project; yet a much bolder ſcheme, and of 'a more deteſtable nature, is laid to his charge. It 'conſiſted, if we can depend upon the relations of ſome people, who perhaps were miſinformed, in ſetting fire to different parts of the City of London, and pitching 'upon a time to put that purpoſe in execution, when 'the Guards upon duty were commanded by an 'Officer whom they could truſt. Marlborough, at 'the head of a ſtrong party in arms, ſhould appear 'when the fire was ſpreading its devaſtation wideſt; 'then ſeize on the Tower of London; next on the 'Queen's perſon; afterwards oblige her to diſſolve 'the Parliament, and call a new one, in order to 'make a free inquiry into the correſpondencies and 'negociations eſtabliſhed with France, and to puniſh 'with the utmoſt ſeverity thoſe who had been con-'cerned in them (27).' After conſidering the whole of what is ſaid reſpecting theſe pretended plots of Prince Eugene and the Duke of Marlborough, we are of opinion, that theſe charges againſt theſe great men ought not to be admitted, without better evidence is produced in their ſupport, than has been exhibited by Mr. Macpherſon.

(27) Memoirs, vol. ii. p. 273, 274.

[Q] In the Examiner.] Particularly in Numbers 18, 23, and 27. In No. 23, folio edition, is the following paſſage relative to Will Bigamy, a name which is given to Lord Cowper in theſe papers. 'This 'Gentleman, knowing that marriage fees were a 'conſiderable perquiſite to the Clergy, found out a 'way of improving them cent. per cent. for the good 'of the Church. His invention was to marry a ſe-'cond wife while the firſt was alive, convincing her 'of the lawfulneſs by ſuch arguments, as he did not 'doubt would make others follow the ſame example. 'Theſe he had drawn up in writing, with intention 'to publiſh for the general good; and it is hoped he 'may now have leiſure to finiſh them.'

Swift has alſo drawn an unfavourable character of Lord Cowper, in his "Hiſtory of the Four laſt Years "of the Queen." It is as follows: "The Lord "Cowper—was conſiderable in the ſtation of a prac-"tiſing Lawyer; but as he was raiſed to be a Chan-"cellor and a Peer, without paſſing through any of "the intermediate ſteps, which in late times hath "been the conſtant practice, and little ſkilled in the "nature of Government, or the true intereſts of "Princes, farther than the Municipal or Common "Law of England, his abilities, as to foreign affairs, "did not equally appear in the Council. Some "former paſſages of his life were thought to diſqua-"lify him for that office, by which he was to be the "Guardian of the Queen's conſcience; but theſe "difficulties were eaſily over-ruled by the authors of "his promotion, who wanted a perſon that would be "ſubſervient to all their deſigns, wherein they were "not diſappointed. As to his other accompliſh-"ments, he was what we uſually call a piece of a "ſcholar, and a good logical reaſoner, if this were not "too often allayed by a fallacious way of managing an "argument which makes him apt to deceive the unwa-"ry, and ſometimes to deceive himſelf (*)." But Swift's characters, of thoſe who were of the oppoſite party to himſelf in politics, are written with ſuch a manifeſt diſregard to equity and candour, that they ſeem entitled to very little credit. In one of Lord Cheſterfield's letters to the Biſhop of Waterford, is a paſſage, in which he gives a character of Swift's "Hiſtory of the Four laſt "Years of the Queen," and alſo makes ſome reference to the ſtories propagated relative to Prince Eugene, and of which we have treated in note [P]. He ſays of Swift's work, "It is a party pamphlet, "founded on the lie of the day, which, as Lord "Bolingbroke who had read it often aſſured me, was "coined and delivered out to him, to write Exa-"miners, and other political papers upon. That "ſpirit remarkably runs through it. Macarteney, "for inſtance, murdered Duke Hamilton; nothing "is falſer, for though Macarteney was very capable "of the vileſt actions, he was guiltleſs of that, as I "myſelf can teſtify, who was at his trial in the "King's Bench, when he came over voluntarily to "take it, in the late King's time. There did not "appear even the leaſt ground for a ſuſpicion of it, "nor did Hamilton, who appeared in Court, pre-"tend to tax him with it, which would have been in "truth accuſing himſelf of the utmoſt baſeneſs, in "letting the murderer of his friend go off from the "field of battle, without either reſentment, purſuit, "or even accuſation, till three days afterwards. "This lie was invented to inflame the Scotch nation "againſt the Whigs; as the other, that Prince "Eugene intended to murder Lord Oxford, by em-"ploying a ſet of people called Mohocks, which ſoci-"ety, by the way, never exiſted, was calculated to "enflame the mob of London. Swift took thoſe "hints de la meilleure foi du monde, and thought them "materials for hiſtory. So far he is blameleſs (†)."

(*) Hiſtory of the Four laſt Years of the Queen, p. 22, 23.

(†) Miſcellaneous Works of Lord Cheſterfield, vol. ii. p. 498, 499.

character,

(28) Hiſt. p. 456.

character, which is said to have been somewhat licentious with respect to women [R].

As a public man, he continued to adhere stedfastly to the Whigs [S]; and when a debate took place relative to the Catalans, on the 2d of April, 1714, it was observed by Lord Cowper, and some other Lords, that the Crown of Great Britain having drawn in the Catalans to declare for the House of Austria, and engaged to succour and support them, those engagements ought to have been made good; and Lord Cowper moved for an address to her Majesty, importing, 'That her Majesty's endeavours for preserving to the Catalans 'the full enjoyment of their liberties, having proved ineffectual, their Lordships made it 'their humble request to her Majesty, that she would be pleased to continue her interpo-'sition, in the most pressing manner, in their behalf (a).' An address to this purpose, though with some alterations, was afterwards agreed to; but to which the Queen returned a very evasive answer. Lord Cowper strongly opposed giving any Parliamentary approbation to the Peace of Utrecht [T], in which he appears to have acted according to the full conviction of his own mind; and, indeed, though peace was at that time, as at all others, a very desireable object, it is manifest, from the manner in which the Treaty of Utrecht was commenced and concluded, that a due attention was not paid to the honour or interest of Great Britain; and that the chief object of those by whom the Treaty was negociated, on the part of England, was not the interest of their country, but the promotion of their own private views.

(a) Ibid. p. 411.

On the 5th of June following, when a debate took place concerning the Schism Bill [U], that [R] Somewhat licentious with respect to women.] The reflections that have been thrown out against Lord Cowper on this subject may, perhaps, receive some light from the following passage, in a book called the English Traveller, vol. ii. p. 315. 'Hertingfordbury, by some esteemed one of the pleasantest 'villages in England. The seat of the Earl Cowper 'here, called Hertingfordbury Park, was the estate of 'Mrs. Elizabeth Culling, who lies buried in the 'Church-yard. This Lady, having two natural 'children by that Lord, a son and daughter, the for-'mer dying soon after he came of age, the young 'Lady, his sister, sold this estate, in the year 1720, 'to her father's brother, the late Judge Cowper, for 'fifty year's purchase at least, and he again disposed 'of it to his brother, the late great Lord Cowper, 'Lord High Chancellor of England.' It has been said, that, in the early part of his life, a pretended marriage, without the forms of law, took place between Mr. Cowper, afterwards the Chancellor, and the Lady here mentioned, Mrs. Elizabeth Culling; and hence probably originated the story of the Chancellor having two wives, and the name given him by Swift of Will Bigamy.

[S] Continued to adhere stedfastly to the Whigs.] In one of Plunket's letters, extracts from which are given in Macpherson's Original Papers, vol. ii. p 390, it is said, that 'Cowper, the late Chancellor, if he 'could get off handsomely from the Whigs, would 'join with Princess Anne (meaning the Queen) in 'all her measures.' There is not the least probability in this assertion of Plunket's, as no man appears to have attached himself more firmly to the Whig party than Lord Cowper. But the vague assertions of this Irish Jesuit and spy are too often considered as evidence in Mr. Macpherson's History; and his surmizes, insinuations, and hearsay stories, received with a degree of credit to which they are in no respect entitled.

It may also be remarked, that it is not unusual for Mr. Macpherson to state facts in his History, which are not supported by his own authorities. Of this an instance occurs in an account of a Speech pretended to have been made by the Duke of Marlborough, Hist. vol. ii. p. 502. as an authority for which he refers to the Stuart Papers, Nov. 3, 1711; but those who will take the pains to examine the Speech given in these papers, by the Agents of the House of Stuart, will find that it materially differs from the Speech made for the Duke by Mr. Macpherson. It may likewise be observed, that manifest inconsistencies are not very uncommon in this gentleman's History. Thus he says of the Earl of Wharton, in one place, that he possessed "distinguished talents;" and in another, that "with talents which could scarce gain him "bread in any other line, he became considerable in "politics (28)."

(28) Hist. vol. ii. p. 456.

[T] Lord Cowper strongly opposed giving any Parliamentary approbation to the Peace of Utrecht.] 'A 'motion was made for taking into consideration the 'state of the nation, in relation to the Treaties of 'Peace and Commerce, and some Speeches were 'made on both sides thereupon, after which the De-'bate was adjourned to Friday the 16th of April. 'That day, the Whig Lords being apprehensive, that 'if any Debate arose about the Spanish Treaty, the 'other party would propose an Address to the Queen, 'approving of the said Treaty, they therefore agreed 'to say nothing against the Treaty that might draw 'them into a Debate. The Lord North and Grey 'stood up first, and said, that if any Lord had any 'objection against the Spanish Treaty, he was ready 'to answer them: and so, in a challenging manner, 'skirmished for some time. After he sat down, there 'was a silence for a quarter of an hour; and then the 'Lord Clarendon stood up, and said, "My Lords, "since no objections can be raised against the Spanish "Treaty, we should address her Majesty to return her "our most humble thanks, for having by a safe, ho-"nourable, and advantageous Peace with Spain, de-"livered these nations from a long consuming land "war, and to desire her Majesty, notwithstanding "any obstructions that may be thrown in her way, to "proceed to the settlement of Europe, according to "the principles laid down in her Majesty's most "gracious Speech." 'Lord Cowper now rose, and 'said, "My Lords, This is the most barefaced at-"tempt that ever was made by this, or any other "Ministry, to secure themselves by endeavouring to "get the sanction of this House. My Lords, are "not the Ministry themselves jealous, that their ac-"tions stand in need of the sanction of this House? "Else why this endeavour at an Address, to make "their act the act of the House? The noble Lord "that spoke first, acting like a soldier, would by "skirmishing have drawn on a general engagement; "the troops, however, are too well disciplined, to "fall into an ambuscade of his laying; but I cannot "remove my finger from the original of our misfor-"tune, the cessation of arms. We were then told, "that if a blow had been struck, it would have ru-"ined the peace. Would to God it had ruined this "peace (29)."

(29 Torbuck's Parliamentary Debates, vol. vi. p. 165, 166.

If Lord Cowper had lived to the present times, he would not have thought it any thing unusual, or extraordinary, that a Ministry should endeavour to procure a Parliamentary sanction to a Treaty of Peace.

[U] The Schism Bill.] By this arbitrary, unjust, and oppressive Bill, which passed both Houses, and received the Royal Assent, and which was entitled, 'An Act to prevent the growth of Schism, and for 'the farther Security of the Churches of England 'and Ireland, as by law established,' it was enacted, that Bill was very ſtrongly oppoſed by Lord Cowper, who obſerved, that 'No man was more ready 'than himſelf to do every thing that ſhould be neceſſary to attain the ſeeming intention 'of that Bill, namely, the preventing the growth of Schiſm, and the farther ſecuring of 'the Church of England; but that the enacting part would be ſo far from anſwering the 'title of it, that, in his opinion, it would have a quite contrary effect, and prove equally 'pernicious to Church and State. Inſtead of preventing Schiſm, and enlarging the pale 'of the Church, this Bill tended to introduce ignorance, and its inſeparable attendants, 'ſuperſtition and irreligion.' In ſupport of this idea of the tendency of the Bill, his Lordſhip farther remarked, 'That in many country towns, reading, writing, and grammar-'ſchools, were chiefly ſupported by the Diſſenters, not only for the inſtruction and benefit 'of their own children, but likewiſe of thoſe of the poor Churchmen; ſo that the ſup-'preſſing of thoſe ſchools would, in ſome places, ſuppreſs the reading of the Holy Scrip-(b) Ibid. p. 422. 'tures (b).' He alſo oppoſed that clauſe in the Bill, by which Juſtices of the Peace were empowered finally to hear and determine offences againſt it (c). The Bill, however, paſſed both Houſes, and received the Royal Aſſent; but a proteſt againſt it was entered, ſigned by Lord Cowper, twenty-ſix other Peers, and five Biſhops (d); and in the ſubſequent reign the Act was repealed.

(c) Id. ibid.

(d) Ibid. p. 428—430.

On the demiſe of Queen Anne, Lord Cowper was nominated one of the Lords Juſtices of the kingdom, till the arrival of King George I. from Hanover. On the 29th of Auguſt, 1714, he was appointed Lord Chancellor of Great Britain (e); and ſhortly after Lord Lieutenant and Cuſtos Rotulorum of the county of Hertford (f). When a new Parliament was aſſembled, on the 27th of March, 1715, King George I. declared from the Throne, "That he had ordered the Lord Chancellor to declare the cauſes of calling "this Parliament, in his Majeſty's name and words." He then delivered his Speech into Lord Cowper's hands, who read it to both Houſes (g). On the 6th of February, 1716, his Lordſhip was appointed Lord High-ſteward for the trial of the Rebel Lords (h); as he was alſo, the following year, at the trial of the Earl of Oxford [W], to whom he behaved on (e) Chronolog. Diary in the Hiſt. Regiſter, for the Year 1714, p. 8.

(f) Ibid. p. 15, 33.

(g) Torbuck's Parliamentary Debates, vol. vi. p. 311.

(h) Collins, ut ſupra.

That every perſon who ſhould, from and after the firſt day of Auguſt following, keep any public or private ſchool or ſeminary, or teach or inſtruct any youth as Tutor or Schoolmaſter, within that part of Great Britain called England, the dominion of Wales, or town of Berwick upon Tweed, before ſuch perſon or perſons ſhould have made a declaration before the Archbiſhop, Biſhop, or Ordinary of the Dioceſe, that they would conform to the Liturgy of the Church of England, and received a licence from the Archbiſhop, Biſhop, or Ordinary, in conſequence of ſuch declaration, they ſhould be committed to the common Gaol of ſuch county, riding, city, or town corporate, in which they ſhould be convicted, there to remain without bail or mainprize, for the ſpace of three months, to commence from the time that ſuch perſon or perſons ſhould be received into the ſaid gaol. It was alſo enacted, that no Licence ſhould be granted by any Archbiſhop, Biſhop, or Ordinary, unleſs the perſon or perſons who ſhould ſue for the ſame, ſhould produce a certificate of his or their having received the Sacrament, according to the uſage of the Church of England, in ſome pariſh Church, within the ſpace of one year before the grant of ſuch Licence, under the hand of the Miniſter, and one of the Churchwardens of the ſaid pariſh; and that any perſon who ſhould have obtained a Licence, and ſubſcribed the declarations required, and ſhould at any time after, during the time of his or their keeping any public or private ſchool or ſeminary, or inſtructing any youth as Tutor or School-maſter, knowingly or willingly reſort to, or be preſent at, any conventicle, aſſembly, or meeting, for the exerciſe of religion in any other manner, than according to the Liturgy and practice of the Church of England, ſhould be liable to the penalties in this Act, and ſhould from thenceforth be incapable of keeping any public or private ſchool or ſeminary, or inſtructing any youth, as Tutor or School-maſter. It was alſo farther enacted, that it ſhould be lawful for the Biſhop of the Dioceſe, or other proper Ordinary, to cite any perſon or perſons whatſoever, keeping ſchool or ſeminary, or teaching without licence, and to proceed againſt and puniſh them by Eccleſiaſtical cenſure; and that if any perſon licenſed, as aforeſaid, ſhould teach any other Catechiſm than the Catechiſm ſet forth in the book of Common Prayer, the licence of ſuch perſon ſhould from thenceforth be void, and ſuch perſon ſhould be liable to the penalties of this Act. A clauſe, however, was added, that this Act ſhould not extend to any perſon, who as a tutor or ſchool-maſter ſhould inſtruct youth in reading, writing, arithmetic, or any part of mathematical learning only, ſo far as ſuch mathematical learning related to navigation, or any mechanical art only, and ſo as ſuch reading, writing, arithmetic, or mathematical learning, ſhould be taught in the Engliſh tongue only.

Petitions were preſented to Parliament againſt this Bill from the Diſſenters and Quakers, and from the Dutch and French Proteſtant Churches in England; and it was ſtrongly oppoſed in both Houſes. In the Houſe of Commons it was remarked, that this Bill 'tended to raiſe as great a perſecution againſt our 'Proteſtant brethren, as the Primitive Chriſtians ever 'ſuffered from the Heathen Emperors, particularly 'Julian the Apoſtate (30).' Queen Anne died on the day in which this act took place, which was the firſt of Auguſt, 1714; and the Miniſtry of King George the Firſt had no inclination to put the Act in force; ſo that from them it received little countenance; and in the fifth year of that Prince's reign it was repealed (31).

(30) Ibid. p. 202.

(31) Neal's Hiſt. of the Puritans, vol. ii. p. 882. edit. 4to. 1754.

[W] At the trial of the Earl of Oxford.] Of the manner of his going to Weſtminſter-hall on this occaſion, the following account is given: 'About ten 'o'clock in the morning, (June 24, 1717), the Lord 'High Chancellor Cowper, in quality of Lord High 'Steward of Great Britain, appointed by his Majeſty 'for the trial of the Earl of Oxford, was attended 'from his houſe by all the Judges of his Majeſty's 'Courts in Weſtminſter-hall, in their robes; as alſo 'by Garter King of Arms, and the Gentleman Uſher 'of the Black Rod, to whom his Majeſty had deli-'vered the white wand to be carried before his 'Lordſhip; and ſet forward in his coach towards 'Weſtminſter, ſitting at the hinder end thereof; 'Garter, and the Gentleman who bore the Great 'Seal, ſitting both uncovered at the other end; one 'of the Serjeants at Arms, with his mace, being 'placed on the right ſide of the coach, and the Uſher 'of the Black rod carrying the white wand on the 'left; the Judges, and his Lordſhip's Gentlemen, 'following after in ſeveral coaches. Being thus come 'to the ſtairs-foot, aſcending to the Houſe of Peers, 'the Judges went up two and two together, the 'juniors firſt, next the Lord High Steward's Gen-'tlemen, after them the Serjeant at Arms with his 'mace, and the Seal-bearer; and laſtly, the Gentle-'man on that occaſion with great politeneſs [X]. When a Bill was brought in by Lord Stanhope, "for ſtrengthening the Proteſtant intereſt," which included in it a repeal of the Schiſm Act, ſome clauſes of the Bill were oppoſed by Lord Cowper (i), who thought they too much interfered with the Teſt and Corporation Acts: for though his Lordſhip had ſtrongly oppoſed the Schiſm Bill in the preceding reign, he appears not to have been ſufficiently enlightened on the ſubject of Toleration. A change taking place in the Miniſtry in the beginning of March, 1718, Lord Cowper reſolved to reſign the Great Seal; but, before his reſignation, the King, on account of his great merit and ſervices, on the 18th of that month, raiſed him to the dignity of a Viſcount and Earl, by the title of Viſcount Fordwich, in the county of Kent, and Earl Cowper (k). The preamble to his Patent was drawn up by Mr. Hughes [Y]. He reſigned the Great Seal [Z] in the month of April; Lords

(i) Hiſt. and Proceedings of the Houſe of Lords, vol. iii. p. 100, 101.

(k) Collins, ut ſupra.

'man Uſher of the Black Rod, bearing the white 'wand, Garter King of Arms going on his right; 'then his Lordſhip alone, his train borne by one of 'his Gentlemen. In this manner entering the Houſe 'of Peers, he found all the Lords in their ſcarlet 'robes, alſo the Biſhops in their rochets, and took 'his place upon the uppermoſt wool-pack. This 'done, and prayers ended, his commiſſion for Lord 'High Steward was read: and then the Lords ad'journed themſelves into the erected Court in Weſt'minſter Hall, where the Managers, and other 'Members of the Houſe of Commons, in a grand 'committee, had, by this time, taken their reſpec'tive places. The King, the Prince, and Princeſs 'of Wales, were alſo ſeated in the boxes prepared 'for the Royal Family; as were alſo the foreign Mi'niſters in the ſeats appointed for them; and the 'other part of the Amphitheatre was filled up with a 'vaſt number of Gentlemen, Ladies, and other per'ſons of diſtinction (32).'

(32) Torbuck's Parliamentary Debates, vol. vi. p. 490, 491.

[X] To whom he behaved on that occaſion with great politeneſs.] At the beginning of the trial, Lord Cowper addreſſed Lord Oxford in the following terms:

'Robert Earl of Oxford and Earl Mortimer,

'It has been uſual, before the Commons proceed, 'to ſay ſomething from this place to perſons in your 'Lordſhip's preſent condition; partly by way of ex'hortation to a reaſonable confidence in the great 'honour, juſtice, wiſdom, integrity, and candour of 'their Judges, their peers, the Houſe of Lords in 'Parliament aſſembled, and partly by way of direc'tion, to aſſiſt them in their behaviour and conduct 'during the courſe of their trial. But, conſidering 'the many great offices your Lordſhip has borne in the 'State, your long experience and known learning in 'all Parliamentary proceedings, I cannot but think 'it would ſeem improper for me to be ſpeaking to 'your Lordſhip in that manner. Wherefore I pro'ceed barely to acquaint your Lordſhip, and others 'whom it may concern, with ſuch orders as the Lords 'have made, which it is fit ſhould be taken notice of 'thus early in this trial, &c (33).'

(33) Hiſt. and Proceedings of the Houſe of Lords, vol. iii. p. 57, 58.

[Y] The preamble to his Patent was drawn up by Mr. Hughes.] It is as follows:

'Quemadmodum ſemper erit nobis in primis gratum, viros verè dignos titulis ornare, qui virtute fulgente, & claris animi dotibus, honores quos accipiunt decorant; ſtatuimus perquam fidelem & dilectum noſtrum GULIELMUM Dominum COWPER, Baronem de Wingham, Cancellarium Magnæ Britanniæ, in omni tempore optimè de nobis & de republicâ meritum, ad provectiorem nobilitatis gradum vocare. Quem, maximum in arduis regni conſiliis judicium, diu conſpecta probitas, ſemper inconcuſſa fides, ſumma legum peritia, & æqui bonique ſtudium, ſapientiæ non parum, multum eloquentiæ, non magis nobis quam patriæ ſuæ dilectum reddidêre. Regnante Annâ, vir tantis virtutibus præcellens, ad munus Cancellarii Magnæ Britanniæ maturè accerſitus eſt. Florente republicâ, omnia implevit conſiliarii ſolertis, ſubditi fidelis, bonique civis officia; periclitante poſtea libertate, otium honeſtum ſummis dignitatibus præpoſuit. Nec tamen deſtitit in ſenatu iniquitati temporum quantum potuit obviam ire, hoſteſque patriæ, & perdita conſilia, fortiter, ſagaciter, diligenter oppugnare. Quum verò res noſtræ, pene labefactatæ, in ſolido rurſus locatæ ſunt, ut primum, providentiâ divinâ, ad regnum noſtrum pervenimus, merito revocandus erat ad priora munera ſuſtinenda. Ex eo tempore ſatis ſuperque eſt nobis conſpectum, quantum meruit & meretur, & quam bene honores magis ampli, non tam quæſiti quam parti, ſummis virtutibus largiundi ſunt. Quapropter, &c (34).'

(34) Hughes's Letters, &c. publiſhed by Mr. Duncombe, vol. iii. Appendix, p. xxxvi.

[Z] He reſigned the Great Seal.] On this occaſion Mr. Hughes wrote his Lordſhip the following letter:

'My Lord, London, May 1718.

'Though I cannot help joining with the general voice in lamenting, with much concern, the loſs the public has ſuſtained in your Lordſhip's quitting that great truſt, which never has, nor can be placed in more worthy hands than your Lordſhip's; yet I think it my duty, at the ſame time, to congratulate your Lordſhip on your being honourably eaſed from a very great burden; the conſtant fatigue of which muſt have made it uneaſy, and might have proved prejudicial to your health. Your Lordſhip has been ſeen to act in every thing with that prudence, mature thought, and equal temper, that, I am ſure, the reſolution you had taken muſt have been founded on the beſt reaſons; and I moſt zealouſly and ſincerely wiſh your Lordſhip all the ſatisfaction in the conſequences of it, which you can expect or deſire.

'I never can expreſs to your Lordſhip the half of what I feel, as often as I think of your very generous and diſtinguiſhed favours to me; all the circumſtances of which will ever leave on my mind the moſt grateful impreſſions. I eſteem that ſhort ſpace of my life, in which I had the honour to attend your Lordſhip, as one of the happieſt parts of it; and if I cannot avoid, on this occaſion, having a proportionable concern, yet to your Lordſhip, who has ſhewn ſo very humane and tender a regard to my welfare, I think myſelf obliged in duty to declare, that I have no regret for any conſequences to myſelf, ſo much as that of being deprived of the ſanction of being near your Lordſhip, and the frequent opportunities of being honoured with a converſation filled with goodneſs and condeſcenſion, and every thing that could render it valuable and agreeable.

'I wiſh your Lordſhip increaſe of health and happineſs, and with the moſt dutiful regards to your Lordſhip and my Lady Cowper,

'I am, &c.

'JOHN HUGHES (35).'

(35) Hughes's Correſpondence, ut ſupra, p. 188, 189, 190.

Lord Cowper very generouſly patronized Mr. Hughes, and appears to have had a great regard for him; and he, on his part, had a high ſenſe of his Lordſhip's kindneſs to him. During the time that Lord Cowper held the Great Seal, Mr. Hughes addreſſed the following Ode to him:

ODE

"To the Lord Chancellor COWPER. In alluſion to Horace, Book II. Ode 20.

I.

"I'm rais'd, tranſported, chang'd all o'er!
Prepar'd, a tow'ring ſwan, to ſoar
Aloft; ſee, ſee the down ariſe,
And cloath my back, and plume my thighs!

My

Lords Commiſſioners were appointed for a few days; after which Lord Parker was appointed Chancellor.

After his reſignation, Lord Cowper diligently attended the public buſineſs in the Houſe of Peers, and frequently oppoſed the meaſures of the Court. He ſpoke and voted againſt the Peerage Bill (l); and the famous South-ſea ſcheme alſo received from him a very powerful oppoſition. Of the extraordinary infatuation which then prevailed in the kingdom, and which ſeems never to have been ſufficiently accounted for, he appears in ſome degree to have foreſeen the pernicious conſequences. For when a motion was made, that the South-ſea Bill ſhould be referred to a Committee of the whole Houſe, he obſerved, "That, like the Trojan horſe, the Bill was uſhered in, and received with great pomp and "acclamations of joy, but it was contrived for treachery and deſtruction (m)." He advanced a variety of arguments againſt the Bill [AA], but it was carried by a large majority, and was productive of great national evils. Lord Cowper alſo oppoſed a Bill which was brought in "for the more effectual ſuppreſſing of blaſphemy and profaneneſs [BB];" by which perſons were to be ſubjected to penalties, who denied the doctrine of the Trinity, or the inſpiration of the Scriptures; and by which any preachers, who ſhould deny any of "the fundamental articles of the Chriſtian Religion," were to be deprived of the benefit of the Act of Toleration. The Bill was ſupported by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Biſhops of London and Wincheſter, and by other Biſhops and ſome Lay-lords (n); but, after a debate, was rejected by the Houſe.

On the 13th of December, 1721, Lord Cowper made a motion in the Houſe of Peers, that a Bill ſhould be brought in, for repealing ſo much of an Act, which had paſſed the preceding Seſſion, relative to the plague, as gave a power to remove to a lazaretto, or peſt-houſe, any perſons whatſoever infected with the plague [CC], or healthy perſons out of an infected family, from their habitations, though diſtant from any other dwelling; and alſo ſo much of the ſaid Act, as gave power for drawing lines or trenches round any city, town, or place infected. His Lordſhip obſerved, that the powers given by the Act in queſtion were altogether unknown to our excellent conſtitution, inconſiſtent with the lenity of our free government, and ſuch as could never be wiſely or uſefully put in practice; and they were the more odious, becauſe they ſeemed to be copied from the arbitrary government of France, and could not be executed but by a military force (o). The motion was ſeconded by Lord Trevor, and ſupported by ſeveral other Lords; but was rejected by a majority. A proteſt was entered againſt the rejection of the motion [DD], ſigned

(l) Proceedings of the Houſe of Lords, ut ſupra, p. 112, 119.

(m) Torbuck's Parliamentary Debates, vol. viii. p. 299.

(n) Torbuck's Parliamentary Debates, vol. viii. p. 48, 49.

(o) Proceedings of the Houſe of Lords, ut ſupra, p. 199.

My wings ſhoot forth; I now will try
New tracts, and boldly mount the ſky,
Nor envy, nor ill fortune's ſpite,
Shall ſtop my courſe, or damp my flight.

II.

"Shall I, obſcure, or diſeſteem'd,
Of vulgar rank henceforth be deem'd?
Or vainly toil my name to ſave
From dark oblivion and the grave?
No—he can never wholly die,
Secure of immortality,
Whom Britain's COWPER condeſcends
To own, and numbers with his friends.

III.

"'Tis done—I ſcorn mean honours now;
No common wreaths ſhall bind my brow.
Whether the muſe vouchſafe t'inſpire
My breaſt with her celeſtial fire;
Whether my verſe be fill'd with flame,
Or I deſerve a poet's name,
Let fame be ſilent; only tell
That generous COWPER loves me well.

IV.

"Through Britain's realms I ſhall be known
By COWPER's merit, not my own:
And when the tomb my duſt ſhall hide,
Stripp'd of a mortal's little pride,
Vain pomp be ſpar'd, and every tear;
Let but ſome ſtone this ſculpture bear,
"Here lies his clay, to earth conſign'd,
"To whom great COWPER once was kind (36)."

(36) Ibid. p. 260, 261.

[AA] He advanced a variety of arguments againſt the Bill.] 'Earl Cowper urged, that in all public bargains the individuals in the Adminiſtration ought 'to take care, that they ſhall be more advantageous 'to the State than to private perſons; but that a 'contrary method had been followed in the contract 'made with the South-ſea Company; for, ſhould the 'ſtocks be kept at the advanced price to which they 'had been raiſed by the oblique arts of ſtock-jobbing, either that Company or its principal Members 'would gain above thirty millions, of which no 'more than one-fourth part would be given towards 'the diſcharge of the national debts. He apprehended, that the re-purchaſe of annuities would 'meet with inſuperable difficulties: and, in ſuch 'caſe, none but a few perſons who were in the ſecret, 'who had bought ſtocks at a low rate, and afterwards ſold them at a high price, would in the end 'be gainers by the project (37).'

(37) Smollet, ut ſupra, p. 362.

[BB] A Bill which was brought in for the more effectual ſuppreſſing of blaſphemy, &c.] Among others who oppoſed this Bill was the Earl of Peterborough, who ſaid, 'That though he was for a Parliamentary 'King, yet he did not deſire to have a Parliamentary 'God, or a Parliamentary Religion; and if the 'Houſe were for ſuch a one, he would go to Rome, 'and endeavour to be choſen a Cardinal; for he had 'rather ſit in the conclave, than with their Lordſhips 'upon thoſe terms (38).' The Biſhop of Peterborough alſo ſpoke on the ſame ſide, and ſaid, 'That 'neither himſelf, nor, he hoped, any of that Bench, 'would be executioners of ſuch a law, which ſeemed 'to tend to the ſetting up of an Inquiſition (39).'

(38) Torbuck's Parliamentary Debates, vol. viii. p. 48, 49.

(39) Id. ibid.

[CC] Any perſons whatſoever infected with the plague.] The plague which broke out in the year 1720, at Marſeilles, ſeems to have given riſe to this act.

[DD] A proteſt was entered againſt the rejection of the motion.] It was obſerved in this proteſt, that in the plague with which England was viſited in 1665, though none of the methods preſcribed by the late Act were made uſe of, 'much leſs authorized by 'Parliament, yet the infection, however great, was 'kept from ſpreading itſelf into the remoter parts of 'the kingdom; nor did the city of London, where it 'firſt appeared, and chiefly raged, ſuffer ſo long or 'ſo much, in proportion to the number of its inhabitants, as other cities and towns in France had ſuffered, where thoſe cruel experiments had been tried '(40).'

(40) Ibid. p. 185.

by

by Lord Cowper, and many other Lords (p). He alſo ſigned a proteſt againſt the rejection of the Bill, for the better ſecuring the freedom of election of Members to ſerve for the Commons in Parliament (q). This proteſt, which was ſigned by twenty-three Lay-Lords, and two Biſhops, though it contained much truth and good ſenſe, gave ſo much offence, that a vote was paſſed for expunging it [EE] from the Journals (r); and another vote was afterwards paſſed, at the motion of the Earl of Sunderland, for limiting the time allowed for entering proteſts (s).

(p) Proceedings of the Houſe of Lords, ut ſupra, p. 201.
(q) Ibid. p. 230.
(r) Ibid. p. 231.
(s) Ibid. p. 236.

When an inquiry was inſtituted, in 1722, relative to the great increaſe of the Navy Debt, Earl Cowper repeatedly ſpoke upon that ſubject, arraigned the proceedings of Government in that buſineſs, and ſigned ſeveral proteſts (t). He oppoſed the Bill for ſuſpending the Habeas Corpus Act for a year [FF]; as he did alſo the commitment of the Duke of Norfolk to the Tower, on the ſuſpicion of High Treaſon (u). A proteſt againſt the commitment of that Nobleman was alſo ſigned by Lord Cowper, and ſeveral other Peers (w). On the 20th of February, this year, his Lordſhip made a motion, in the Houſe of Peers, relative to the National Debt. He remarked, that the National Debt had been greatly increaſed for ſeveral years paſt, as appeared by the ſtate of the Public Debt, extracted from the books of the Treaſury, and this without any viſible occaſion; ſince every thing that had been aſked of the Parliament, had been readily granted and provided for, every one of thoſe years. He, therefore, moved, that it ſhould be reſolved by the Houſe, "That it appeared by the ſtate of the Public Debt before that Houſe, that "the ſame, excluſively of the Debt of the Navy, was encreaſed between the 31ſt of De-"cember, 1717, and the 31ſt of December, 1720, at leaſt the ſum of 2,300,000*l.* not-"withſtanding that the Sinking Fund had produced within that time 1,910,385*l.* 14*s.* 6½*d.*" This motion was ſeconded by Lord Bathurſt, and ſupported by ſeveral other Lords, but was rejected by the majority (x). A proteſt was entered on the occaſion, ſigned by Lord Cowper, and others, but which was expunged by a ſubſequent Order of the Houſe. Another motion was afterwards made, that it ſhould be reſolved by the Houſe, "That "the leſſening the Public Debt annually, by all proper methods, was neceſſary to the re-"ſtoring and preſerving the Public Credit." But the Miniſterial party evaded this motion, by putting the previous queſtion (y).

(t) Ibid. p. 188, 189, 190, 191, 193, 194, 195, &c.
(u) Ibid. p. 249.
(w) Ibid. p. 250, 251, 252.
(x) Ibid. p. 234.
(y) Ibid. p. 235.

In the year 1723, Chriſtopher Layer, who had been convicted of High Treaſon, underwent a long examination before a Secret Committee of the Houſe of Commons, relative to a conſpiracy for raiſing the Pretender to the Throne. The Report of this examination was printed by order of the Houſe of Commons; and it appeared from this Report, that Layer, in the courſe of his examination, had mentioned a club of diſaffected perſons, of which, he ſaid, John Plunket had told him, that Lord Cowper was one. This occaſioned his Lordſhip to remark in the Houſe of Peers, that after having on ſo many occaſions, and in the moſt difficult times, given undoubted proofs of his hearty zeal and affection for the Proteſtant Succeſſion, and of his attachment to his Majeſty's perſon and government, he had juſt reaſon to be offended, to ſee his name bandied about in a liſt of a chimerical club of diſaffected perſons, printed in the Report of the Secret Committee, on the bare hearſay of an infamous perſon, notoriouſly guilty of prevarication [GG]; and who, in the opinion even of the Secret Committee, "in order to magnify the number of the Pretender's "friends, did, in ſeveral liſts, inſert the names of perſons as well affected to the Pretender's "ſervice, without having the leaſt authority for ſo doing:" which alone was ſufficient to give an air of fiction to the whole conſpiracy. But, in juſtice to his own character, he thought it neceſſary to move, That John Plunket, from whom Layer pretended to have received the liſt of the club, mentioned in the Report of the Committee, ſhould be immediately ſent for to the Bar of that Houſe, to be there examined (z). This motion, after ſome debate, was rejected by the majority; and it was obſerved by Lord Townſhend, that as the Secret Committee had declared, that they were entirely ſatisfied of Lord Cowper's innocence, his Lordſhip's reputation could not have ſuffered upon that account (a). Lord

(z) Ibid. p. 266, 267.
(a) Id. ibid.

[EE] A vote was paſſed for expunging it.] Perhaps few things can be more abſurd, in any body of men whatever, than admitting a right of entering proteſts, with reaſons for ſuch proteſts, againſt the proceedings of the majority, and yet at the ſame time ſuppoſing, that the majority can have any right to expunge ſuch proteſts.

[FF] He oppoſed the Bill for ſuſpending the Habeas Corpus Act for a year.] 'The Earls of Angleſey, 'Cowper, Strafford, and Coningſby, the Lords 'Trevor, Bathurſt, and Bingley, repreſented, That 'the Habeas Corpus Act being, on all hands, admit-'ted to be the greateſt and ſtrongeſt bulwark of 'Engliſh liberty, it did not conſiſt with the wiſdom 'of Parliament, to ſuſpend it without an abſolute 'neceſſity. That, indeed, in caſes of actual rebel-'lion, or intended invaſion, that Act had been, at 'times before, ſuſpended; but yet this was done 'ſparingly, by degrees, and never for above the term 'of ſix months. That this conſideration put them 'under a very melancholy apprehenſion for the very 'being or effect of that excellent law; ſince the ſuſ-'penſion of it for a year, might be as good a prece-'dent for ſuſpending it, on another occaſion, for the 'term of two years, as any former precedent was now 'for the preſent ſuſpenſion (41).'

(41) Torbuck's Parliamentary Debates, vol. viii. p. 244.

[GG] Notoriouſly guilty of prevarication.] It had been reſolved by the Houſe of Commons, 'That it 'appeared to that Houſe, that Chriſtopher Layer, in 'his ſeveral examinations before the Lords of the 'Council, and the Committee of that Houſe, had 'groſsly prevaricated, ſuppreſſed the truth, contra-'dicted himſelf, &c (42).'

(42) Hiſt. Reg. vol. x. p. 150.

Cowper, however, thought proper to make a public declaration of his innocence [HH].

On the 15th of May, this year, Earl Cowper made a long Speech in the Houſe of Peers, in oppoſition to the Bill for inflicting pains and penalties on Biſhop Atterbury (b). He urged a variety of arguments to ſhew, that the evidence againſt the Biſhop was extremely inſufficient; and he pointed out the danger of ſuch a precedent, as that of inflicting pains and penalties on a man without law, and without proper evidence againſt him. His Lordſhip ſtrongly objected to the diſtinction that had been made in the debate, between real evidence, and legal evidence; and maintained, that the law required only "ſuch real and certain proof, as ought, in natural juſtice and equity, to be received."— "The wiſdom and goodneſs of our law, my Lords," ſaid he, "appear in nothing more "remarkably, than in the perſpicuity, certainty, and clearneſs of the evidence it requires, "to fix a crime upon any man, whereby his life, his liberty, or his property, might be con- "cerned. Herein we glory and pride ourſelves, and are juſtly the envy of all the neigh- "bouring nations. Our law, in ſuch caſes, requires evidence ſo clear and convincing, "that every by-ſtander, the inſtant he hears it, muſt be fully ſatisfied of the truth of it. "It admits of no ſurmizes, innuendoes, forced conſequences, or harſh conſtructions, nor "any thing elſe to be offered as evidence, but what is real and ſubſtantial, according to the "rules of natural juſtice and equity. Theſe are the rules the Judges go by, nor have they "any other in determining what is, or what is not to be admitted as evidence before them; "and, therefore, to ſay, that the law refuſes ſuch evidence as is real, and ought in natural "juſtice and equity to be admitted, is to caſt an imputation upon the law, which is not only "unjuſt, but entirely groundleſs (c)."

(b) Proceedings of the Houſe of Lords, ut ſupra, p. 383—398.

(c) Ibid. p. 388, 389.

The laſt public tranſaction, in which we find Earl Cowper engaged, was oppoſing the Bill for taxing the Papiſts; which he repreſented as an impolitic and indefenſible meaſure. He remarked, that it might afford a pretext to ſome foreign Princes for treating their Proteſtant ſubjects with ſeverity; and he obſerved, that no ſtate had ever got any thing by perſecuting its ſubjects. In France, he ſaid, perſecution had been the means of driving away the wealthieſt of their merchants, and their moſt induſtrious artificers; and this Bill might alſo force the Engliſh Roman Catholics to leave the kingdom, and carry eight or nine hundred thouſand pounds into foreign countries (d). The Bill, however, paſſed; but Lord Cowper, and ſeveral other Lords, ſigned a proteſt againſt it (e). His Lordſhip lived but a few months after; for he died at his ſeat at Colne Green, in Hertfordſhire [II], on the 10th of October, 1723; and on the 19th of that month, he was interred in Hertingfordbury Church, in the ſame county (f). A Pindaric Ode, occaſioned by his death, was publiſhed by Mr. Ambroſe Philips [KK].

(d) Ibid. p. 403.

(e) Ibid. p. 404.

(f) Collins, ut ſupra.

The

[HH] A public declaration of his innocence.] It was as follows:

'The declaration of William Earl Cowper, ſhewing that the matters contained in ſome hearſays, relating to him, in the examination of Chriſtopher Layer, are falſe and groundleſs.

'March 20, 1722-3.

'Though hearſay does not affect any one, either in law, or reaſon, yet it deſerves contradiction, where the truth will bear it, eſpecially if printed: and, therefore, finding that Layer, in his examinations of the 19th of January and 4th of February laſt, hath ſaid, that one Plunket told him, (as explaining what was meant by Burford's club,) that Lord Orrery was Chairman; and that Lord Cowper, and ſeven other Lords, and ſix Commoners named, were of that club; and that this club met monthly; as he, Layer, thought, at one another's houſes; and not doubting but my averment will be believed before any hearſay, eſpecially from one in Layer's ſad circumſtances; I do hereby declare and affirm upon my honour, That I do not know, or believe, and never heard, before the ſaid examinations were talked of, that there was any ſuch club, or meeting: That as to three of the Commoners named, viz. Sir Henry Goring, Mr. Dawkins, and Mr. Shippen, I do not know them ſo much as by ſight; and as for two of the remaining three Commoners, viz. Sir Conſtantine Phipps, and General Webb, I have not been in their, or either of their companies, at any time within ſixteen years laſt paſt: and as to the Lords, I never met them, or any of them, but either accidentally, on viſits of ceremony, or in the time of Parliament, and that, with other Lords, on the buſineſs of Parliament only. And for one of the ſaid Commoners, whom I am acquainted with, viz. Mr. Hutcheſon, I never once was at any meeting with him, together with any of the ſaid Lords or Commoners. And whereas Layer, in his examination of the 19th of September laſt, ſaid, that Lord Orrery told him, that Lord Cowper told him (Lord Orrery), that two hundred Tories, and ninety Grumbletonians, would try their laſt effort in the Houſe of Commons; and in another examination of the 21ſt of the ſame month, Layer repeats the ſame, except that he uſes the words angry Whigs, inſtead of the word Grumbletonians: I do hereby declare, and affirm upon my honour, that I never ſaid ſo to Lord Orrery, nor to that effect, nor any thing like it: and I do therefore verily believe, that Lord Orrery never ſaid that I did.

'COWPER (43).'

(43) Hiſt. Reg. for the Year 1723, p. 255, 256.

[II] At his ſeat at Colne-green, &c.] At this ſeat, now the property of the preſent Earl Cowper, which we lately viſited, we ſaw three portraits of the firſt Earl Cowper, one at full length, in his robes as Chancellor; another in his robes, three quarters; and a third in an undreſs. From theſe portraits he appears to have been a very handſome man, with an open and intelligent countenance.

In one of the rooms at this ſeat are hung up, in glaſs caſes, the purſes that contained the Great Seals when he held them; namely, the laſt Great Seal of England, the firſt Great Seal of Great Britain, and the Great Seal that he held after the acceſſion of King George I. and which are ſeverally inſcribed, Sigillum Angliæ Ultimum, Sigillum Britanniæ Prima, Sigillum Britanniæ Reſtitutum.

[KK] A Pindaric Ode, occaſioned by his death, &c.] From this Ode we ſhall ſelect two or three ſtanzas.

'Here we come, and hence we go,
'Shadows paſſing to and fro;
'Seen a while, forgotten ſoon:
'But thou, to fair diſtinction born,
'Thou COWPER, beamy in the morn
'Of life, ſtill brightening to the pitch of noon,

'Scarce

The eloquence and abilities of Earl Cowper were highly celebrated in his own time; he made a very conſpicuous figure at the Bar; he was a diſtinguiſhed Member of both Houſes of Parliament; his general character as a public man appears to have been extremely reſpectable; and in his conduct in the Court of Chancery he diſplayed great diſintereſtedneſs. He oppoſed the frequency and facility with which private bills paſſed in Parliament; and refuſed the New Year's Gifts, which it had been cuſtomary to preſent to thoſe who held the Great Seal [LL]. Dr. Smollet obſerves, that England, by his death, 'loſt a worthy Nobleman, who had twice diſcharged the office of Lord-chancellor, with 'equal diſcernment and integrity. He was profoundly ſkilled in the laws of his country; 'in his apprehenſion quick and penetrating; in his judgment clear and determinate. He 'poſſeſſed a manly eloquence: his manner was agreeable, and his deportment graceful (e).' Mr. Tindal ſays of him, that he 'was eminent for his integrity in the diſcharge of the 'office of Lord chancellor, which he had twice filled. There may have been Chancel-'lors of more extenſive learning, but none of more knowledge in the laws of England. 'His judgment was quick, and yet ſolid. His eloquence manly, but flowing. His 'manner graceful and noble [MM] (f).' Lord Cheſterfield, in his letters to his ſon (g), repreſents Earl Cowper as more diſtinguiſhed, as a Speaker, by the elegance of his language, and the gracefulneſs of his manner, than by the force of his arguments. He ſays, 'The late Lord-chancellor Cowper's ſtrength as an Orator, lay by 'no means in his reaſoning, for he often hazarded very weak ones. But ſuch was 'the purity and elegancy of his ſtyle, ſuch the propriety and charms of his elocution, 'and ſuch the gracefulneſs of his action, that he never ſpoke without univerſal ap-'plauſe. The ears and the eyes gave him up the hearts and the underſtanding of the 'audience.'

(e) Hiſt. of England, ut ſupra, p. 399.

(f) Continuation of Rapin, vol. iv. p. 676.
(g) Letter 173.

Earl Cowper was one of the Governors of the Charter-houſe, and a Fellow of the Royal Society (b). He was twice married. By his firſt wife, Judith, who was daughter and heireſs of Sir Robert Booth, of London, Knight, he had one ſon, who died young. Mary, his ſecond wife, who did not long ſurvive him, was daughter of John Clavering, Eſq; of Chopwell, in the Biſhopric of Durham. By this Lady he had iſſue two ſons and two daughters. His eldeſt ſon, William, ſucceeded him in his titles and eſtate; and his ſecond

(b) Collins, ut ſupra.

'Scarce verging to the ſteep decline,
'Hence ſummon'd while thy virtues radiant ſhine;
'Thou ſingled out, the foſterling of fame,
'Secure of praiſe, nor leſs ſecur'd from blame,
'Shalt be remember'd with a fond applauſe,
'So long as Britons own the ſame indulgent laws.'

* * * *

'Hear him ſpeaking, and you hear
'Reaſon tuneful to the ear!
'Lips, with thymy language ſweet,
'Diſtilling on the hearer's mind
'The balm of wiſdom, ſpeech refin'd,
'Celeſtial gifts!—Oh, when the nobles meet,
'When next, thou ſea-ſurrounded land,
'Thy nobles meet at Brunſwick's high command,
'In vain they ſhall the charmer's voice deſire!
'In vain thoſe lips of eloquence require;
'That mild conviction which the ſoul aſſails
'By ſoft alarms, and with a gentle force prevails.

'To ſuch perſuaſion, willing, yields
'The liberal mind, in freedom train'd;
'Freedom, which, in crimſon'd fields,
'By hardy toils our fathers gain'd;
'Inheritance of long deſcent!
'The ſacred pledge ſo dearly priz'd
'By that bleſt ſpirit, we lament.
'Grief-eaſing lays, by grief deviſ'd,
'Plaintive numbers, gently flowing,
'Soothe the ſorrows to him owing.'

* * * *

'Winning aſpect! winning mind!
'Soul and body aptly join'd;
'Searching thought, engaging wit,
'Enabled to inſtruct, or pleaſe.
'Uniting dignity with eaſe,
'By nature form'd for every purpoſe fit;
'Endearing excellence!—O, why
'Is ſuch perfection born, and born to die?
'Or, do ſuch rare endowments ſtill ſurvive,
'As plants remov'd to milder regions thrive
'In one eternal ſpring? And we bewail
'The parting ſoul, new-born to life that cannot fail (44).'

(44) Ode (in the manner of Pindar) on the Death of the Right Hon. W. Earl Cowper, by Mr. Philips, fol. 1723, p. 3. 5. 8.

[LL] And refuſed the New Year's Gifts, which it had been cuſtomary to preſent to thoſe who held the Great Seal.] Biſhop Burnet obſerves, that there was a general complaint made of Private Acts of Parliament, that they paſſed 'through both Houſes too 'eaſily, and in ſo great a number, that it took up a 'great part of the Seſſion to examine them,' though in a curſory way, which was found very inconvenient. But, he ſays, the fees that were paid for theſe, 'to the Speakers and Clerks of both Houſes, inclin-'ed them to favour and promote them.' Lord Somers propoſed ſuch a regulation concerning them, as it was ſuppoſed would prove beneficial for the future: and Lord Cowper, the Biſhop adds, 'did very ge-'nerouſly obſtruct theſe Private Bills, as much as his 'predeceſſor, (Sir Nathan Wright), had promoted 'them. He did another thing of a great example. 'On the firſt day of the year, it was become a cuſ-'tom, for all thoſe who practiſed in Chancery, to 'offer a New Year's Gift to the Lord who had the 'Great Seal. Theſe grew to be ſo conſiderable, 'that they amounted to 1,500*l.* a year. On this 'New Year's Day (1706), which was his firſt, he 'ſignified to all who, according to cuſtom, were ex-'pected to come with their preſents, that he would 'receive none, but would break that cuſtom. He 'thought it looked like the inſinuating themſelves 'into the favour of the Court; and that if it was not 'bribery, yet it came too near it, and looked too 'like it. This contributed not a little to the raiſing 'his character. He managed the Court of Chancery 'with impartial juſtice, and great diſpatch; and was 'very uſeful to the Houſe of Lords, in the promot-'ing of buſineſs (45).'

(45) Burnet, ut ſupra, p. 439.

[MM] His manner graceful and noble.] His manner was celebrated by Pope. In his imitation of the Second Epiſtle of the Second Book of Horace, (l. 133, 134.) he introduces two Serjeants at Law complimenting each other in the following terms:

'Twas, "Sir, your law;"—and "Sir, your elo-
"quence,"
"Yours, Cowper's manner,—and yours, Talbot's
"ſenſe."]

ſon,

(i) Collins, ubi supra.

ſon, Spencer, became Dean of Durham (i). His eldeſt daughter, Lady Sarah Cowper, who is ſaid to have been "diſtinguiſhed for her ſenſe and accompliſhments (k)," died unmarried in 1758. His youngeſt, Lady Anne, was married, in 1731, to James Edward Colleton, Eſq; of Haynes-hill in Berkſhire, and died in 1750 (l).

(k) Hughes's Correſpondence, vol. ii. p. 65.
(l) Collins, ut ſupra.

William, the ſecond Earl Cowper, was twice married; in 1732, to Lady Henrietta, youngeſt daughter and coheir of Henry D'Auverquerque Earl of Grantham; and in 1750, to Lady Georgina, daughter to Earl Granville, and widow of the Hon. John Spencer, Eſq; by whom ſhe was mother of John Earl Spencer. By Lady Georgina, Lord Cowper had no iſſue; but by his firſt Counteſs, who died in 1747, he was father of George Naſſau, now Earl Cowper, and of Lady Caroline, who was married, in 1753, to Henry Seymour, Eſq; who was only ſon and heir of Francis Seymour, Eſq; of Sherborne, in the county of Dorſet, brother to Edward, the eighth Duke of Somerſet of that family. The preſent Earl Cowper was created, in 1778, a Count of the Holy Roman Empire (m); and has reſided ſome years at Florence.] T.

(m) Ibid.

COX (RICHARD), a learned Biſhop in the XVIth century, was born at Whaddon in Buckinghamſhire, of mean parentage (a), in the year 1499 (b). He had, probably, his firſt education in the ſmall priory of Snelſhall in the pariſh of Whaddon; but being afterwards ſent to Eton-ſchool, he was thence elected into a Scholarſhip at King's-college in Cambridge, of which he became Fellow in the year 1519 (c). Having the ſame year taken his Bachelor of Arts degree, and being eminent for his piety and learning, he was one of thoſe bright Scholars, who were invited to Oxford by Cardinal Wolſey, to fill up his new foundation (d). He was accordingly preferred to be one of the Junior Canons of Cardinal-college (e); and on the 7th of December, 1525, was incorporated Bachelor of Arts at Oxford, as he ſtoood at Cambridge (f). Soon after, performing his exerciſes, he was, on the 8th of February following, licenſed to proceed in Arts, in which he took the degree of Maſter, July 2, 1526 (g). He was reputed one of the greateſt Scholars of his age; and his poetical compoſitions were in great eſteem among the beſt judges. His piety and virtue were not inferior to his learning, and commanded the reſpect of all impartial perſons. But ſhewing himſelf averſe to many of the Popiſh ſuperſtitions, and declaring freely for ſome of Luther's opinions, he incurred the diſpleaſure of the Governors of the Univerſity, who ſtripped him of his preferment, and threw him into priſon on ſuſpicion of hereſy (h). When he was releaſed from his confinement, he left Oxford; and, ſome time after, was choſen Maſter of Eton-ſchool, which was obſerved remarkably to flouriſh under his vigilant and induſtrious care (i). In 1537, he commenced Doctor in Divinity at Cambridge (k). And on the 4th of December, 1540, was made Archdeacon of Ely (l); as he was alſo appointed in 1541, the firſt Prebendary in the firſt ſtall of the ſame Cathedral, upon the new founding of it by King Henry VIII. on the 10th of September 1541 (m). He was likewiſe, the 3d of June 1542, preſented by the ſame King to the Prebend of Sutton with Buckingham in the Church of Lincoln, and inſtalled the 11th of that month. But this he ſurrendered up in 1547 (n). In the year 1543, he ſupplicated the Univerſity of Oxford, that he might take place among the Doctors of Divinity there, which was unuſual, becauſe he was not then incorporated into that Univerſity, as Doctor in Divinity; nor was he ſo till June 1545 (o). When a deſign was formed, of converting the Collegiate Church of Southwell into a Biſhoprick [A], Dr. Cox was nominated Biſhop of it (p). On the 8th of January 1543-4, he was made the ſecond Dean of the new-erected Cathedral of Oſney near Oxford; and in 1546, when that See was tranſlated to Chriſt-church, he was alſo made Dean there (q). Theſe promotions he obtained by the intereſt of Archbiſhop Cranmer and Biſhop Goodrich, to the laſt of whom he had been Chaplain; and, by their recommendation, he was choſen Tutor to the young Prince Edward, whom he inſtructed with great care in the true principles of religion, and formed his tender mind to an early ſenſe of his duty, both as a Chriſtian and a King (r). On that Prince's acceſſion to the Throne, he became a great favourite at Court, and was made a Privy-Counſellor, and the King's Almoner [B]. The 21ſt of May, 1547, he was elected Chancellor of the Univerſity of Oxford (s); inſtalled July 16, 1548, Canon of Windſor; and, the next year, made Dean of Weſtminſter (t). About the ſame time he was appointed one of the Commiſſioners to viſit the Univerſity of Oxon (u), in which he is accuſed

(a) Survey of the Cathedrals, &c. by Br. Willis, Eſq; Lond. 1730, vol. ii. p. 359. among the Biſhops of Ely.
(b) Life of Biſhop Cox, by S. Downes; prefixed to Sparrow's Rational. p. 115.
(c) Willis, as above; and Wood, Athen. edit. 1721, vol. i. col. 203. He was admitted in King's College in 1518. Fuller's Worthies, in Buckinghamſhire, p. 131.
(d) Downes, ubi ſupra; and Wood, Faſti, vol. i. col. 40.
(e) Wood, Athen. ubi ſupra; now ſwallowed up into Chriſt-church.
(f) Idem, Faſti, vol. i. col. 40.
(g) Idem, Ath. col. 203.
(h) Downes, as above, p. 115, 116.
(i) Ibid.
(k) Wood, Ath. ubi ſupra.
(l) Willis, as above, p. 374.
(m) Ibid. p. 376.
(n) Ibid. p. 248.
(o) Wood, Faſti, vol. i. col. 68, 70.
(p) Willis, ubi ſupra, p. 403.
(q) Wood, Ath. col. 203; & Hiſtor. & Antiq. Univerſ. Oxon. lib. ii. p. 253. He was made Dean of Chriſt-church, Nov. 4.
(r) Downes, ubi ſupra, p. 116.
(s) Wood, Faſti, vol. i. col. 71. He held it till the year 1552.
(t) Idem, Athen. col. 203.
(u) Idem, Hiſt. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. l. i. p. 269, 270, &c.

[A] When a deſign was formed, of converting the Collegiate Church of Southwell into a Biſhoprick, &c.] For, after the diſſolution of the Monaſteries, beſides the ſix new erected Biſhopricks of Oxford, Peterburgh, Glouceſter, Briſtol, Cheſter, and Weſtminſter, the King intended to have erected new Biſhopricks; at Dunſtable in Bedfordſhire, with 1140l. 5d. yearly revenue; Colcheſter in Eſſex with 1003l. 5d. Shrewſbury in the county of Salop; Bodmin with Launceſton in Cornwall; and Southwell in Nottinghamſhire. But, either the King's luxury and extravagance, or the greedineſs of his courtiers, ſwallowed up the revenues wherewith they were to be endowed (1).

(1) Survey of the Cathedrals, &c. by Br. Willis, Eſq; vol. ii. p. 402, 403, in Oxford.

[B] And the King's Almoner.] This office was granted him durante beneplacito, during the King's pleaſure: and he had afterwards a farther grant made him, of all the Goods and Chattels of Felons, as well within liberties as without, for the augmentation of the King's alms. In augmentationem Eleemoſynæ ſuæ, omnia Bona & Catalla Felonum de ſe tam infra Libertates quam extra, infra Regnum Angliæ habend. quamdiu in Officio prædict. ſteterit (2).

(2) Dyer's Reports, f. 77.

cuſed of having much abuſed his commiſſion [C]. In 1550, he was ordered to go down into Suſſex, and endeavour, by his learned and affecting ſermons, to quiet the minds of the people, who had been diſturbed by the factious preaching of Day Biſhop of Chicheſter, a violent Papiſt (w): and when the noble deſign of reforming the Canon Law was in agitation, he was appointed one of the Commiſſioners. Both in this and the former reign, when an act paſſed for giving all Chantries, Colleges, &c. to the King, through Dr. Cox's powerful interceſſion, the Colleges in both Univerſities were excepted out of that act (x). Soon after Queen Mary's acceſſion to the Crown, he was ſtripped of his preferments; and on the 15th of Auguſt 1553, committed to the Marſhalſea. He was indeed ſoon diſcharged from this confinement (y); but foreſeeing the inhuman perſecution likely to enſue, he reſolved to quit the realm, and withdraw to ſome place, where he might enjoy the free exerciſe of his religion, according to the form eſtabliſhed in the reign of King Edward (z). He went firſt to Straſburgh in Germany, where he heard with great concern of the raſh proceeding of ſome of the Engliſh exiles at Franckfort (a), who had thrown aſide the Engliſh Liturgy, and ſet up a form of their own, framed after the French and Geneva models [D]. On the 13th of March 1555, he came to Franckfort in order to oppoſe this innovation, and to have the Common-Prayer-Book ſettled among the Engliſh congregation there (b), which he had the ſatisfaction to accompliſh [E]. Then he returned

(w) Downes, ubi ſupra, p. 117.

(x) Ibid.

(y) Wood, Ath. ubi ſupra. He ſays, the Dr. was diſcharged 19 Aug. 1559, inſtead of 1553 or 1554.

(z) Downes, as above, p. 117.

(a) A brief Diſcourſe of the troubles begonne at Franckfort, Anno Domini 1544. Printed in 1575, 4to. p. 6, 7.

(b) Ib. p. 38.

[C] In which he is accuſed of having much abuſed his commiſſion.] For he, and the reſt of the Commiſſioners, made a dreadful havock among the Libraries; deſtroying, burning, or ſelling for the vileſt uſes, all the illuminated books, ſuch as had in them mathematical figures or other diagrams, under pretence that they tended to Popery or Conjuration: and alſo books of School-Divinity; and, in general, ſparing very few that had been compoſed by Roman-Catholic authors (3).

(3) See Wood, Hiſt. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. l. i. p. 271, 272, and l. ii. p. 60; and Catalogue of MSS. in England and Ireland, fol. 1697.

[D] Set up a form of their own, framed after the French and Geneva models.] Of which we have this account, 'After having peruſed the Engliſh Liturgy, 'it was concluded amongſt them, That the anſwering 'aloud after the Miniſter ſhould not be uſed; the litany, ſurplice, and many other things alſo omitted, 'becauſe in the reformed Churches abroad ſuch things 'would ſeem more than ſtrange. It was farther 'agreed upon, that the Miniſter, in the room of the 'Engliſh Confeſſion, ſhould uſe another, both of more 'effect, and alſo framed according to the ſtate and 'time. And the ſame ended, the people to ſing a 'pſalm in metre in a plain tune, as was and is ac'cuſtomed in the French, Dutch, Italian, Spaniſh, 'and Scottiſh Churches: that done, the Miniſter to 'pray for the aſſiſtance of God's holy Spirit, and ſo 'to proceed to the Sermon. After the ſermon, a ge'neral prayer for all eſtates, and for England, was 'alſo deviſed: at the end of which prayer was joined 'the Lord's Prayer, and a rehearſal of the Articles of 'the Belief; which ended, the people to ſing another 'pſalm as afore. Then the Miniſter pronouncing this 'bleſſing, The peace of God, &c. or ſome other of 'like effect, the people to depart. And as touch'ing the miniſtration of the Sacraments, ſundry 'things were alſo by common conſent omitted, as 'ſuperſtitious and ſuperfluous (4).'

(4) Brief Diſcourſe of the troubles begonne at Franckford, &c. p. 6, 7.

[E] Which he had the ſatisfaction to accompliſh.] The particulars of theſe remarkable tranſactions, were as follow. After the ſettling of the Form and Diſcipline mentioned in the laſt note, the Exiles adverti ſed their diſperſed countrymen at Straſburgh, Zuric, Weiſel, Emden, &c. of the ſingular benefit they enjoyed, of having a Church granted them, and endeavoured to perſwade them, to come and join with them. Thoſe at Straſburgh anſwered, That they had conſidered the contents of their letter, and perceived the effect of it was, to have one or two take the chief government of the congregation: and in caſe they could get Dr. Poinet, Mr. Scory, Dr. Bale, or Dr. Cox, or two of them, they ſhould be well provided; if not, they would appoint one at Straſburgh, and another ſhould come from Zuric. Accordingly, Mr. Grindall wrote to Mr. Scory at Emden, to deſire him to accept of the office; but before his anſwer came, the congregation had choſen Mr. Knox, Haddon, and Lever, for their Miniſters; not liking to have any Superintendent, as thoſe at Straſburgh propoſed, but to be governed by two or three Miniſters of equal authority (5). In the mean time, ſeveral members of the congregation were for retaining the Engliſh Liturgy, and did not approve of the Form ſet down in the laſt Note. This occaſioning very great contention, it was at length agreed, on the 6th of February 155$\frac{4}{5}$, That another Form ſhould be drawn up out of the Engliſh Liturgy, with ſome additions, to be uſed till the laſt day of April following. But Dr. Cox, and ſome others coming to Franckfort on the 13th of March, reſolved to ſtand up for the Engliſh Liturgy. Accordingly, they anſwered aloud after the Miniſter; for which being reproved by the Seniors of the Congregation, they made anſwer, That they would do as they had done in England, and would have the face of an Engliſh Church. On the Sunday following, one of Dr. Cox's company going up into the pulpit without the conſent of the congregation, read the Litany, whilſt Dr. Cox and his company made the reſponſes aloud. The ſame Sunday in the afternoon, Knox preaching, and reflecting upon theſe proceedings, was by Dr. Cox ſharply rebuked for it. The Tueſday following was appointed to talk of theſe things more at large. When they were aſſembled, requeſt was made, that Dr. Cox and his company ſhould be admitted to have votes in the congregation. The others anſwered, That matters ſtill in diſpute amongſt them ought firſt to be determined; and Dr. Cox and his friends ſubſcribe to the Diſcipline, as the reſt had done, before they were admitted into the congregation (6). Knox at laſt began to make intreaty, that they might have votes among the reſt; to which ſome yielding, the majority came thereby to be on their ſide, and they were accordingly admitted. But immediately after, Dr. Cox forbad Mr. Knox to meddle any more in that congregation (7). The next day, complaint of this being made to one of the Magiſtrates, he ordered, That two on each ſide ſhould conſult and agree upon ſome good order for divine ſervice, and make report of it to him. For that purpoſe, Dr. Cox and Mr. Lever were choſen on one ſide, and Mr. Knox and Whittingham on the other. But, when they came to a Conference, before they had gone through the Morning-ſervice (Dr. Cox being very earneſt for reſtoring the Liturgy, and the others as violent againſt it) they parted without coming to an agreement. The Puritans thereupon addreſſed the Senate, highly complaining of the others for endeavouring to force the Engliſh Liturgy upon them; and ſo far prevailed, that the Magiſtrates ordered the Congregation to agree with the French Church both in Doctrine and Ceremonies. Dr. Cox not being able to withſtand the torrent, ſaid, 'He had read the 'French order, and thought it to be both good and 'godly in all points, and therefore deſired the con'gregation to obey the Magiſtrates commandment.' Requeſting the magiſtrate at the ſame time, to ſhew unto him and his friends, his accuſtomed favour and goodneſs, notwithſtanding their ill behaviour. Nevertheleſs, theſe did not reſt here; but ſeeing that Knox was in great credit with many of the congregation, they accuſed him to the Senate of High-treaſon

(5) Ib. p. 13, 14.

(6) Ib. p. 37, 38, 39.

(7) Page 40.

turned to Straſburgh for the ſake of converſing with Peter Martyr, with whom he had contracted an intimate friendſhip at Oxford, and whom he loved and honoured for his great learning and moderation (c). After the death of Queen Mary he returned to England; and was one of thoſe Divines who were appointed to reviſe the Liturgy (d). When a diſputation was to be held at Weſtminſter between eight Papiſts and eight of the Reformed Clergy, he was the chief champion on the Proteſtants ſide (e). He preached often before Queen Elizabeth in Lent; and, in his ſermon at the opening of her firſt Parliament (f), exhorted them in moſt affecting terms, to reſtore religion to its primitive purity, and baniſh all the Popiſh innovations and corruptions. Theſe excellent diſcourſes, and the great zeal he had ſhewn in ſupport of the Engliſh Liturgy at Franckfort, ſo effectually recommended him to the Queen's eſteem (g), that in June 1559, ſhe nominated him to the Biſhoprick of Norwich (h); but her mind altering, ſhe preferred him to the See of Ely, in the room of Dr. Thirlby, who was deprived (i). His congé d'eſlire bore date July 15, 1559. He was elected the 28th day of the ſaid month, had the Royal Aſſent December the 18th, was confirmed in the Church of St. Mary le Bow the 20th of the ſame month, conſecrated at Lambeth the next day, and received the temporalities the 23d of March following (k). Before his conſecration, he joined with Dr. Parker elect Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Biſhops elect of London, Chicheſter, and Hereford, in a petition to the Queen, againſt an Act lately paſſed, for the alienating and exchanging the lands and revenues of the Biſhops; and ſent her ſeveral arguments from Scripture and reaſon againſt the lawfulneſs of it; obſerving withal, the many evils and inconveniencies both to Church and State that would thence ariſe (l). He enjoyed the epiſcopal dignity about twenty-one years and ſeven months, reckoning from the time of his conſecration; and was, all that time, one of the chief pillars and ornaments of the Church of England. Both to Archbiſhop Parker, and his ſucceſſor Grindal, he was very ſerviceable; and, by his prudence and induſtry, contributed to the reſtitution of our Church in the ſame beauty and good order, it had enjoyed in King Edward's reign. He was indeed no great favourite of the Queen; but that is to be imputed to his zealous oppoſition to her retaining the crucifix and lights on the Altar of the Royal Chapel [F], and his ſtrenuous defence of the lawfulneſs of the marriage of the Clergy, againſt which the Queen had contracted a moſt inveterate and unaccountable prejudice. He was a great patron to all learned men, whom he found well affected to the Church; and ſhewed a ſingular eſteem for Dr. Whitgift, afterwards Archbiſhop of Canterbury, whom he made his Chaplain, and to whom he gave the Rectory of Teverſham in Cambridgeſhire, and a Prebend of Ely (m). He did his utmoſt to get a body of Eccleſiaſtical Laws, (which was drawn up by Archbiſhop Cranmer, and other learned Divines, of whom himſelf was one, in the latter end of King Edward's reign) eſtabliſhed by authority of Parliament [G]; but through the unreaſonable oppo-

(c) Downes, ubi ſupra.

(d) Collier's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſt. vol. ii. p. 430.

(e) Fox's Acts and Monuments, in the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's reign. Burnet's Hiſt. of the Reformation, p. ii. 2d edit. p. 388. Strype's Ann. of the Reformat. vol. i. edit. 1725, p. 87, &c. See COLE (HENRY).

(f) Stow's Annales, edit. 1631, p. 636.

(g) Downes, as above.

(h) Wood, Ath. vol. i. col. 689.

(i) Godwin, de Præſul. edit. 1616, 4*to*. p. 334.

(k) Convent. Foedera, &c. publiſhed by Rymer, vol. xv. p. 537.

(l) Strype, ubi ſupra, p. 97, 98, 99, 100, 101.

(m) Life of Whitgift, &c. by J. Strype, f. 1718, p. 7. The Biſhop gave Whitgift that Prebend, Dec. 5. 1568, ibid.

ſon againſt the Emperor, his Son, and Queen Mary, on account of ſome virulent expreſſions of his againſt thoſe Princes, in a book intituled An Admonition to Chriſtians. Whereupon, the Senators commanded that he ſhould preach no more till their pleaſure were farther known; and ſoon after ordered him to depart the city of Franckfort (8). The 26th of March, Dr. Cox and his friends preſented a petition to the Magiſtrates, ſubſcribed by three Doctors, thirteen Bachelors of Divinity, and others, for the full uſe of the Engliſh Liturgy; which accordingly was eſtabliſhed. When Whittingham was acquainted with it, he ſaid, he did not doubt, but it might be lawful for him and others to join themſelves to ſome other church. But Dr. Cox deſired that it might not be ſuffered. Whereunto Whittingham anſwered, that it would be too great cruelty to force men, contrary to their conſciences, to obey all their diſorderly proceedings; offering, if the magiſtrate would be pleaſed to give them the hearing, to diſpute the matter againſt all the contrary party, and prove, that the order which they ſought to eſtabliſh, ought not to take place in any reformed Church: but herein they were not indulged. The 28th of March, Dr. Cox aſſembled all the Engliſh Clergy to his lodgings, and having declared to them, how the Magiſtrates had granted them the uſe of the Engliſh Liturgy, he ſaid, That he thought it requiſite they ſhould conſult together, whom they thought fitteſt to be Biſhop, Superintendant, or Paſtor, with the reſt of the officers, as Seniors, Miniſters, and Deacons (9). When that was ſettled, Dr. Cox proceeded to form a kind of Univerſity, and appointed a Greek, and a Hebrew Lecturer, a Divinity-Profeſſor, and a Treaſurer for the contributions remitted from England (10). The Puritans offered, as their laſt refuge, to refer the whole matter to four arbitrators, two choſen on each ſide; that it might appear where the fault lay, and they might have an opportunity of vindicating themſelves from the guilt of Schiſm. But that propoſal being rejected, they departed in a rage, and withdrew, ſome to Baſil, and others to Geneva (11).

(8) Page 44, 45.

(9) Page 46, 47.

(10) Collier's Eccleſ. Hiſt. vol. ii. p. 396.

(11) Troubles at Franckfort, as above, p. 55—59.

[F] His zealous oppoſition to the Queen's retaining the Crucifix and Lights on the Altar of the Royal Chapel.] He ſcrupled for a great while to officiate there upon that account; and when he did it, it was with a trembling conſcience, as he ſaid. To excuſe himſelf, and to give his humble advice to the Queen, he wrote to her a moſt ſubmiſſive Letter (12); wherein he ſets down 'certain conſiderations, why he could not yield to 'have Images ſet up in Churches.' And concludes in theſe words, 'yet my meaning is not hereby to enter 'into conſideration of ſuch as are otherwiſe minded, 'much leſs of your Majeſty (God forbid) who I believe 'meaneth not to uſe the thing to any evil end.—— 'Bear with me, moſt gracious ſoveraign; for the 'tender mercy of God, force not my conſcience ſo 'ſore (13).'

(12) Strype's Annals, vol. i. edit. 1725, p. 175.

(13) Appendix to vol. i. No. xxii. p. 59, 60, 61.

[G] He did his utmoſt to get a body of Eccleſiaſtical Laws —— eſtabliſhed by authority of Parliament.] That was, the famous book intitled Reformatio Legum Eccleſiaſticarum, compiled, by order of King Henry VIII. and Edward VI. out of the Canon and Civil Law. Thirty two perſons were commiſſioned for that work, but the perſon who had the chief hand in it, was Archbiſhop Cranmer: and it was put into proper and elegant Latin, by Sir John Cheke, and Dr. Haddon, Regius Profeſſor of the Civil Law in the Univerſity of Cambridge. For a farther account of that work, ſee Dr. Burnet's Hiſtory of the Reformation, 2d Edition, Part I. p. 330. Part II. p. 141. 196. and Part III. p. 208, and Strype's Eccleſiaſtical Memorials, oppoſition of ſome of the chief Courtiers, this noble deſign miſcarried a third time. As he had, in his exile at Franckfort, been the chief champion againſt the innovations of the Puritans; ſo he now continued, with ſome vigour and reſolution, to oppoſe their attempts, againſt the Diſcipline and Ceremonies of the Eſtabliſhed Church. At firſt he tried to reclaim, or win them over, by gentle means; but finding, that, inſtead of behaving themſelves with due moderation, they only grew more audacious, and reviled both Church and Biſhops in ſcurrilous libels, he thought timely ſeverities neceſſary (n). Therefore he wrote to Archbiſhop Parker, to go on vigorouſly in reclaiming or puniſhing them, and not be diſheartened at the frowns of thoſe Court-favourites who protected them; aſſuring him, that he might expect the bleſſing of God on his pious labours, to free the Church from their dangerous attempts, and to eſtabliſh uniformity. When the Privy-Council interpoſed in favour of the Puritans, and endeavoured to ſcreen them from puniſhment, he wrote a bold letter to the Lord-Treaſurer Burleigh; wherein he warmly expoſtulated with the Council, for meddling with the affairs of the Church, which, as he ſaid, ought to be left to the determination of the Biſhops; admoniſhed them to keep within their own ſphere; and told them he would appeal to the Queen, if they continued to interpoſe in matters not belonging to them (o). He is blamed by ſome (p) for giving up ſeveral manors and other eſtates belonging to his See [H]; but he rather, in ſome reſpects, deſerves commendation, for his great firmneſs in reſolving to part with no more, and for being proof againſt the ſtrongeſt ſolicitations, and moſt violent attacks. Several he had to encounter, even from thoſe who were moſt in favour at Court, and who were backed by Royal Command and Authority. In the years 1574 and 1575, Sir Chriſtopher Hatton, a noted favourite of the Queen, endeavoured to wreſt Ely-Houſe in Holborn from him (q); ſo that, in order to preſerve it to his See, he was forced to have a long and chargeable ſuit in Chancery, which was not determined in 1579 (r). The Lord North alſo attempted, in 1575, to oblige him to part with the manor of Somerſham, in Huntingdonſhire, one of the beſt belonging to his Biſhoprick; and with Downham Park (s); which he refuſing to yield, that Lord endeavoured to ſtir up the Queen's indignation againſt him, and do his utmoſt to have him deprived. For that purpoſe, North, and ſome others of the Courtiers, examined and ranſacked his whole conduct ſince his firſt coming to his See, and drew up a large body of articles againſt him, which he was to give anſwers to before the Privy-Council (t). But the Biſhop, in his replies, ſo fully vindicated himſelf from all aſperſions, and ſo clearly confuted the groundleſs and malicious calumnies of his enemies, that the Queen was forced to acknowledge his innocence (u); though the Lord North boaſted, he had found five Præmunire's againſt him (w). However, vexed and wearied with the implacable malice of the Lord North, and other his adverſaries, he deſired, in 1577, leave to reſign his Biſhoprick (x); but the Queen put him off (y). North, though diſappointed in his former attempt, yet not diſcouraged thereby, brings three actions againſt the poor old Biſhop for ſelling of wood (z); whereupon the Biſhop offered again, in 1579, to reſign; provided he had a yearly penſion of two hundred pounds out of his See, and Donnington, (the leaſt of five country houſes belonging to Ely Biſhoprick) for his reſidence during life (a). The Lord-Treaſurer Burleigh, at the Biſhop's earneſt deſire, obtained leave of the Queen for him to reſign; and in February 1579-80, upon the Biſhop's repeated deſires, forms of reſignation were actually drawn up (b). But the Court could not find any Divine of note, who would take that Biſhoprick on their terms, of ſurrendering up the beſt manors belonging to it. The firſt offer of it was made to Freak Biſhop of Norwich; and, on his refuſal, it was proffered to ſeveral others; but the conditions were ſo ignominious and baſe, that they all rejected it; by which means Biſhop Cox enjoyed it till his death, which happened on the 22d (c) of July 1581, in the 82d year of his age (d). By his will he left ſeveral legacies, amounting in all to the ſum of nine hundred and forty-five pounds; and died worth, in good debts, two thouſand three hundred and twenty-two pounds (e). He had ſeveral children [I]. His body

(n) Downes, ubi ſupra; from Mr. Strype's Life of Archb. Parker.

(o) Ibid.

(p) Willis, Survey of the Cathedrals, &c. vol. ii. p. 360, among the Biſhops of Ely.

(q) Strype's Annals, as above, vol. ii. p. 337, 338. 360; and Appendix to B. i. No. xlvii. p. 84.

(r) Strype, in the ſame volume, p. 579.

(s) Ibid. p. 361. The Queen ſent a letter to the Biſhop, to requeſt him to make a demiſe of Somerſham, to North, Ibid.

(t) Ibid. p. 361—370.

(u) Ibid. and Appendix to B. i. No. xlviii, xlix, l, li.

(w) Ibid. p. 364.

(x) Ibid. p. 488, 489.

(y) With a Nondum hoc fiet, i. e. Not yet; as he expreſſes it himſelf. Append. to B. ii. of Annals, &c. as above, No. xiv. p. 117.

(z) Strype, vol. ii. p. 580.

(a) Ibid. p. 581, 582, 583.

(b) Ibid. p. 583.

(c) Willis, ubi ſupra, p. 360. Wood, Athen. col. 204. Stow ſays, it was July 13. Annales, edit. 1631, p. 694.

(d) This appears from the time of his birth mentioned above.

(e) Strype's Annals, vol. iii. edit. 1728, p. 26, 27.

morials, Vol. II. p. 303. and Life of Cranmer, book I. ch. 30. It was firſt publiſhed, in 1571, by Archbiſhop Parker, or John Fox, with a preface; and again in 1640, 4*to*. The moſt probable reaſon why thoſe Laws were never ſuffered to be confirmed by Parliament, is that aſſigned by Dr. Burnet (14), becauſe it was found more for the greatneſs of the Prerogative and the Authority of the Civil Courts, to keep thoſe points undetermined.

(14) Hiſt. of the Reformat. P. i. p. 330.

[H] Giving up ſeveral manors and other eſtates belonging to his See.] In 1562, he alienated to Queen Elizabeth, the manors of Hatfield, Little Hadham, and Kelſhall. Moreover, he gave up Eaſt Dereham, Pulham, Bridgeham, the Hundred and manor of Mitford, the manors of Terrington, Walpole, Weſt-Walton, Brandon, Weſteringate, Battleſden, Hecham, Harthurſt, Berking, and Totteridge, in the counties of Norfork, Suffolk, Hertford, and Bedford, of the yearly value of 695*l.* 11*s.* 4*d.* in lieu of which, the Queen granted him, the tenths of his Dioceſe amounting to 384*l.* 14*s.* 9*d. per Annum*, and the Impropriations of Gildon-Morden, Swaffham-Bulbeck, Stokequi, Waterbech, St. Giles Cambridge, Comberton, Hinxton, Harleſton, Swaveſey, and Drayton, of the value of 207*l.* 10*s.* So that, as Browne Willis, Eſq; obſerves, he parted with about 700*l.* a year of the old Demeſnes, being a third part of the Revenues of the Biſhoprick (15). Before, whilſt he was Dean of Chriſt-Church, he had alienated the Parſonage-glebe, and a manor, at Harrow on the Hill; and the Rectory and Advowſon of Preſton on Stour in Glouceſterſhire, and Priory of Clatercote in Oxfordſhire (16).

(15) Willis's Survey of the Cathedrals, vol. ii. edit. 1730, p. 248. 338. in Ely.

(16) Ibid. p. 429. 550.

[I] He had ſeveral children.] Namely, John, whom he made his executor; Richard, who was knighted, and a Juſtice of Peace for Ely. After his father's deceaſe, he had a Grant from the Crown, of Dodington manor and palace. The Biſhop had alſo two daughters, married, to John Parker, and John Duport, Prebendaries body was interred in Ely-cathedral, near Biſhop Goodrich's monument, under a marble ſtone, with an inſcription; which having been defaced, there are only four verſes of it [K] now legible (f). Divers things, of which he was author, have been publiſhed, chiefly ſince his deceaſe [L]. As to his character; He was a man of a ſound judgment, and clear apprehenſion, and attained to great perfection in all polite and uſeful learning. He wanted no advantages of education, and improved them with ſuch diligence and induſtry, that he ſoon became an excellent proficient both in divine and human literature. The Holy Scriptures were his chief ſtudy; and he was perfectly well verſed in the original language of the New Teſtament. He was extremely zealous for the true intereſt of our Reformed Church, and a conſtant and vigorous defender of it againſt all the open aſſaults of its Popiſh adverſaries, and of the Puritans (g). He is accuſed by ſome (h) of having been a worldly and covetous perſon; and is ſaid to have made a great havock and ſpoil of his woods and parks, feeding his family with powdered veniſon to ſave expences. Several com-

(f) Willis, ubi ſupra.

(g) Willis, as above, p. 359, 360; and Sir J. Harrington, p. 77.

(h) Downes, ubi ſupra, p. 130.

bendaries of Ely; beſides other children, whoſe names are not mentioned (17).

(17) Willis, ubi ſupra, p. 360.

[K] Which having been defaced, there are only four verſes of it legible.] Being theſe;

— — — — — — — — — — —
Vita caduca vale, ſalveto vita perennis;
Corpora terra tegit, Spiritus alta petit.
In terra Chriſti Gallus Chriſtum reſonabam;
Da, Chriſte, in coelis te ſine fine ſonem.

i. e. 'Farewel, frail life, hail, life eternal; The 'earth covers my body, but my ſoul aſcends to heaven. 'I, who was Chriſt's Cock (*), made Chriſt's name 'ſound on earth. Grant, O Chriſt, that I may without 'end make thy praiſes reſound in heaven (18).' His monument was defaced in twenty years after his death; which ſome (19) look upon as a ſign of his being little beloved.

(*) Alluding to his name of Cocks or Cox.

(18) Willis, ibid. & Godwin. de Præſul. p. 335.

(19) Brief e View of the State of the Church of England, by Sir J. Harrington, 8*vo.* Lond. 1653, p. 77.

[L] Divers things, of which he was author, have been publiſhed chiefly ſince his deceaſe.] They are, I. 'An Oration at the beginning of the Diſputation of 'Dr. Treſham and others with Peter Martyr.' II. 'An Oration at the concluſion of the ſame.' Theſe two Orations, which are in Latin, were printed in 1549, 4*to.* and afterwards among Peter Martyr's works. The ſecond is alſo printed in the Appendix to the Memorials of Archbiſhop Cranmer, by J. Strype (20). III. He had a great hand in compiling the firſt Liturgy of the Church of England: and was one of the chief perſons employed in the review of it in 1559 (21). IV. He turned into verſe the Lord's Prayer, commonly printed at the end of Sternhold and Hopkins's Pſalms. V. When a new Tranſlation of the Bible was made in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, now commonly known by the name of the Biſhop's Bible, the Four Goſpels, the Acts of the Apoſtles, and the Epiſtle to the Romans, were allotted to him, for his portion (22). VI. He wrote, 'Reſolutions of ſome Queſtions con-'cerning the Sacraments;' in the collection of Records at the end of Dr. Burnet's Hiſtory of the Reformation (23). VII. He had a hand, in the 'Declaration concerning the Functions and Divine In-'ſtitution of Biſhops and Prieſts (24);' and in the 'Anſwers, to the 'Queries concerning ſome abuſes 'of the Maſs (25).' VIII. Several Letters, and ſmall pieces of his, have been publiſhed by the induſtrious Mr. Strype, in his Annals of the Reformation: namely, 1. A Letter to Wolfgang Weidner at Wormes, 20 May 1559 (26). 2. To the Queen, wherein, he excuſes himſelf for refuſing to miniſter in the Royal Chapel, on account of the Crucifix there (27). 3. To Bullinger, on occaſion of his anſwer to the Pope's Bull againſt the Queen (28). 4. To the Queen, upon her requiring his houſe in Holbourn for Mr. Hatton (29). 5. To the ſame, upon her deſiring him to ſurrender Somerſham (30). 6. Reaſons ſent to the Lord Burghley to tender the ſtate of God's Miniſters (31). 7. Anſwers to the accuſations of the Lord North, and others againſt him (32). 8. To the Lord Burghley, upon the Queen's having ordered Archbiſhop Grindall to be ſuſpended (33). 9. Letter congratulatory to the Queen in her progreſs, and to excuſe himſelf for not waiting upon her (34). 10. To the Lord Burghley, upon the Queen's granting him leave to reſign his Biſhoprick (35). 11. To the ſame, informing him he had received intelligence, that twelve thouſand Spaniards were to be ſent by the Pope and Spaniard againſt the realm, 1580 (36). 12. Account of his conference with Dr. Fecknam (37). 13. To the Lord Burghley, of the ill ſtate of St. John's College Cambridge, for want of Statutes (38). 14. Proofs and Evidences from ancient Grants, to ſhow, that his Manor and Houſe in Holborn is exempt from the juriſdiction of the city of London (39). He alſo had a hand in Lily's Grammar. M.

(20) Edit. 1694, fol. No. [xliv.] p. 119.

(21) Wood, Ath. vol. i. col. 204.

(22) Ibid.

(23) Appendix to P. i. 2d edit. p. 201, No. xxi. of Book iii.

(24) Ibid. among the Addenda, p. 321.

(25) Appendix to B. i. of P. ii. No. xxv. p. 133, &c.

(26) Appendix to Vol. i. B. i. No. xxi. p. 54.

(27) Ibid. p. 59.

(28) Ib. p. 100.

(29) Appendix to Vol. ii. p. 84.

(30) Ib. p. 85.

(31) Ib. p. 87.

(32) Ibid. p. 87—100.

(33) Ib. p. 111.

(34) Ib. p. 117.

(35) Ib. p. 131.

(36) Ib. p. 139.

(37) Ib. p. 142.

(38) Ib. p. 156.

(39) Appendix to Vol. iii. p. i. No. lviii. p. 124.

 [Of Biſhop Cox it is ſaid, in the preceding article, that his poetical compoſitions were in great eſteem among the beſt judges. Encomiums of this kind are frequent among our old Biographical writers, when there were very ſlender grounds for applauſe. The good Biſhop's verſion of the Lord's Prayer, at the end of Sternhold and Hopkins's Pſalms, will ſcarcely ſerve to raiſe him high in the character of a Poet. Perhaps he might compoſe ſome Latin verſes in his youth, which is a common thing with thoſe who have received a claſſical education; and it is probably upon this foundation that a great number of authors are repreſented as having been Poets, by Leland, Bale, and Anthony Wood, though there are no works remaining which can juſtify ſuch aſſertions.

If it be true, as is aſſerted in note [C], that Biſhop Cox, in conjunction with the reſt of the Commiſſioners, made a dreadful Havock among the libraries at Oxford, his memory, ſo far as this matter is concerned, deſerves to be held in execration. The bigotry and falſe zeal of reformers have done infinite miſchief to the intereſt of knowledge and literature. Many manuſcripts, and monuments of antiquity, have hence been deſtroyed, which were highly worthy of preſervation, either for their beautiful execution, or the light they were calculated to throw on the hiſtory, ſentiments, and manners of former ages. Even the books of School-divinity, which excited the indignation of our Prelate, might have been permitted to reſt in the oblivion to which they were tending.

When Biſhop Cox could not reclaim, or win over, the Puritans by gentle means, he thought timely ſeverities neceſſary. Such hath ever been the plea for perſecution; and if this plea is to be eſteemed valid, all the cruelties will be juſtified which have been exerciſed on a religious account, and which have reflected ſo much diſgrace on human nature. The conduct of our Prelate can only be extenuated by a conſideration of the narrow ſpirit of the times in which he lived.

Upon the whole, this Biſhop, though certainly a learned, and probably a good man, does not appear to have been of an amiable temper; and his faults were too numerous to render him the object of very high eſtimation.

A letter written by him, in 1569, directed to the Parſon of Downham, and found in the pariſh cheſt of that place, has lately been publiſhed in the Gentleman's Magazine. It relates chiefly to the ſtate and condition of the poor, before the ſtatutes of the 14th and 43d of Queen Elizabeth were enacted; and it ſhews that the Biſhop was animated with a very laudable zeal for engaging perſons of wealth and ſubſtance to contribute liberally, chearfully, and charitably to their indigent neighbours (40).] K. p. 1041.

(40) Gentleman's Magazine for Dec. 1786.

complaints, and long accuſations, were exhibited againſt him and his wife, in 1579, to Queen Elizabeth, upon theſe accounts, by ſome falſe and evil diſpoſed perſons; but the Biſhop fully vindicated himſelf, and ſhewed, that all theſe complaints were nothing but malicious calumnies, and groundleſs imputations (i). It is likewiſe ſaid, that he appears to have been of a vindictive ſpirit, by reaſon of his proſecution of, and ſeverity to, the deprived Catholics in his cuſtody; and eſpecially by his complaints againſt Dr. Feckenham the laſt Abbot of Weſtminſter (k). But the Biſhop alleges in his own excuſe, that the Doctor was a very troubleſome gueſt, and good for nothing (l): and that his endeavours to convert him, were by order of the Court (m). It muſt be remembered of this Biſhop, that he was the firſt who brought a wife to live in a College (n); and that he procured a new body of Statutes for St. John's College in Cambridge, of which, as Biſhop of Ely, he was Viſitor (o).

(i) Strype's Annals, vol. ii. Append. p. 87—100.

(l) Ibid. p. 658.

(m) Ibid. p. 525, 526.

(n) Willis, p. 359.

(k) Willis, ubi ſupra, p. 360. See Strype's Annals, vol. i. Append. p. 73; and vol. ii. p. 658.

(o) Strype's Annals, vol. ii. p. 372, 373. 664; and Appendix, p. 156.

 [COX (Sir RICHARD), Bart. Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and author of a Hiſtory of that kingdom, was ſon to Richard Cox, Eſq; Captain of a Troop of Horſe [A], and was born at Bandon, in the county of Cork, on the 25th of March, 1650 (a). He had the misfortune to become an Orphan before he was full three years of age; and was then taken care of by his mother's father, Walter Bird, Eſq; of Cloghnakilty. But his grandfather alſo dying when he was about nine years old, he was then taken under the protection of his uncle, John Bird, Eſq; who placed him at an ordinary Latin ſchool at Cloghnakilty, where he ſoon diſcovered a ſtrong inclination to learning. He ſeems, however, to have been very ill provided with books: for it is ſaid, that having no other ſchool-book but a Grammar, he conſtantly tranſcribed his leſſons from the books of his ſchool-fellows; by which means what he learned was deeply imprinted on his mind, and his writing was wonderfully improved without the aſſiſtance of a maſter. At this ſchool he continued till he had acquired as much knowledge as was to be obtained in ſuch a ſituation; and not having a fortune adequate to the expences of a regular education, he ſpent three years in the country, not in indolence, or diſſipation, but in the peruſal of ſuch hiſtories as he could procure the uſe of (b). In 1668, having attained the age of eighteen years, and being of a vigorous and active mind, he reſolved to engage in ſome profeſſion, which might tend to promote his advancement in the world. Accordingly by his uncle's conſent, and under his countenance, he practiſed as an Attorney in ſeveral Manor Courts, where his uncle was ſeneſchal, for three years: during which period, beſides ſupporting himſelf decently, he laid up the ſum of fifty pounds. He was now of age, and in poſſeſſion of his father's lot for his arrears, which fell in Galway, and yielded twenty-ſix pounds per annum. Beſides which he ſold an intereſt near Kilworth, which was left to him by his grandfather, for an hundred and fifty pounds; and with this ſmall ſtock, he reſolved to apply himſelf cloſely to the ſtudy of the law, with a view of being called to the Bar; and was accordingly entered at Gray's Inn in September, 1671. Here he was ſo much diſtinguiſhed by his great aſſiduity, and conſequent improvement, that in the ſummer of 1673 he was made one of the Surveyors at Sir Robert Shaftoe's reading. The Reader fell ill two days before he was to perform his part in the Hall, and Mr. Cox was pitched upon by Sir Robert himſelf to ſupply his place. Though the warning was ſhort, yet he argued the Reader's caſe ſo much to the ſatisfaction of a numerous auditory, that he was called to the Bar on the Monday following with great applauſe (c); and was offered very conſiderable advantages by Sir Francis Radcliff, afterwards Earl of Derwentwater, to ſettle near him in the North of England. Theſe offers, however, he gratefully declined, and returned to Ireland the ſame year. He ſoon after married Mrs. Mary Bourne, a Lady who had a right to a conſiderable fortune, and of which he naturally expected to obtain poſſeſſion. But her fortune being in the hands of her mother, a woman of bad œconomy, it was drawn from her in ſuch ſmall ſums, and with ſo little ſatisfaction, that Mr. Cox, whoſe education at Gray's Inn had conſumed the greater part of his ſmall fortune, was diſabled and diſcouraged from puſhing forward in his profeſſion. This diſappointment ſo much affected him, that in a fit of deſpondency, very unſuitable to the other parts of his life, he took a farm near Cloghnakilty, to which he retired for ſeven years. Being at length rouſed from his lethargy, by a great increaſe of his family, he was, by the intereſt of Sir Robert Southwell, who was much attached to him, elected Recorder of

(a) Harris's Tranſlation and Continuation of the Works of Sir James Ware, vol. ii. p. 207.

(b) Harris, ubi ſupra, p. 208.

(c) Id. ibid.

[A] Son to Richard Cox, Eſq; Captain of a Troop of Horſe.] 'Richard Cox, Eſq; Captain of a Troop in 'Major-general Jephſon's Regiment of Horſe, firſt 'employed in the ſervice of King Charles, afterwards 'of the Engliſh Parliament againſt the Iriſh Rebels, 'was third ſon to Michael Cox, a younger ſon of a 'reputable family, fixed for many years at Biſhops-'Cannings, near Devizes, in Wiltſhire, and deſcend-'ed from Dr. Richard Cox, one of the Compilers of 'the Liturgy, Tutor to King Edward VI. and in the 'reign of Queen Elizabeth Biſhop of Ely.'

'Captain Richard Cox was a man of great 'ſtrength and courage, and ſignalized himſelf in ſeve-'ral battles againſt the Iriſh; but was in July, 1651, 'baſely murdered by Captain Norton of the ſame 'regiment, by a ſtab with a pen-knife in his back; 'and his widow pined and languiſhed until the 'winter of the year 1652, and then died (1).'

Sir Richard Cox's mother was 'Catharine, daugh-'ter to Walter Bird, of Cloghnakilty, Eſq; firſt mar-'ried to Captain Thomas Batten, who was killed at 'the Siege of Dungarvan in the county of Water-'ford (2).'

(1) Hiſtory of the Writers of Ireland, in Harris's Tranſlation and Continuation of the Works of Sir James Ware, vol. ii. p. 207.

(2) Id. ibid.

Kinſale in the year 1680. He now removed to Cork, where he practiſed in the profeſſion of the law with great ſucceſs (d).

(d) Harris, ubi ſupra, p. 208.

But it is neceſſary here to relate an incident of his life, which happened ſome time before his being appointed Recorder of Kinſale, and which conſiderably operated upon his future fortune. In April, 1679, he was choſen Chairman at the Quarter-ſeſſions for the county of Cork. It was at a critical period, at a time when it was faſhionable for all perſons, who were ſolicitous to recommend themſelves at Court, to ridicule the Popiſh Plot. Mr. Cox, however, being a zealous Proteſtant, took occaſion, in his charge, to expoſe the cruelties, and the impoſtures of Popery, with ſuch ſpirit and acuteneſs, that he greatly animated the Proteſtants, and as highly exaſperated the Papiſts. The former, conſidering him as having rendered them an important ſervice, by a charge which they regarded as very ſeaſonable, publickly returned him thanks for it in a body; and one of them ſaid, that "he muſt expect, that the revenge of the Papiſts, if ever it fell into their power, "would be proportioned to his merit with the Proteſtants." Mr. Cox replied, that "he "was not in danger; for he had ſtudied them thoroughly, and therefore would never "truſt them, nor live under their juriſdiction." Accordingly in 1687, when the Earl of Tyrconnel was become Lord-deputy of Ireland, Mr. Cox, foreſeeing the ſtorm that would fall on the Proteſtants, quitted his practice, which was then very conſiderable, and his eſtate, which at that time amounted to 300*l. per annum*, and removed with his wife and five children to England, and ſettled at Briſtol (e). Great numbers of Proteſtants quitted Ireland about the ſame time with Mr. Cox [B]. At Briſtol, he was treated with much kindneſs and generoſity, as a ſufferer for the Proteſtant Religion; and he obtained ſufficient practice in his profeſſion to ſupport his family genteely, independently of his Iriſh eſtate (f). At his leiſure hours, he compiled the Hiſtory of Ireland, the firſt part of which he publiſhed ſoon after the revolution, in 1689, under the following title: 'Hibernia Anglicana; or the Hiſtory of Ireland, from the Conqueſt thereof by the Engliſh, to 'this preſent Time [C]: with an introductory Diſcourſe, touching the Antient State of 'that Kingdom, &c.' He dedicated this work to King William and Queen Mary [D]; and

(e) Harris, ubi ſupra, p. 209.

(f) Id. ibid.

(f) Id. ibid.

[B] Great numbers of Proteſtants quitted Ireland about the ſame time with Mr. Cox.] Dr. Leland, ſpeaking of the elevation of Tyrconnel to the office of Lord-deputy of Ireland, ſays, 'To this Popiſh 'delegate of a Popiſh Prince, Lord Clarendon re'ſigned the Sword of State, in a general and violent 'agitation of the kingdom. He embarked at the 'port of Dublin, attended by fifteen hundred Prote'ſtant families of Dublin, who abandoned a country 'where the peace, the property, and the lives of 'Proteſtants, were expoſed to the malice of the 'meaneſt and moſt malignant of a party now exult'ing in the fulneſs of their triumph, with their friend 'and patron in ſupreme authority, attended by 'Popiſh miniſters and officers of State (3).'

(3) Hiſtory of Ireland, vol. iii. p. 502.

[C] Hibernia Anglicana; or the Hiſtory of Ireland, from the Conqueſt thereof by the Engliſh, to this preſent time:] Our author brought his Hiſtory of Ireland no lower than the year 1653; but at the end of his ſecond part is 'A brief Account of the Tranſactions 'in that Kingdom, ſince 1653,' written by another hand, which brings the Hiſtory down to the landing of King James at Kinſale, and the Siege of Londonderry.

Some of the laws paſſed in Ireland, as recorded by Sir Richard Cox, are curious. In 1465, it was enacted,

'That any body may kill thieves, or robbers, or 'any perſon going to rob or ſteal, having no faithful 'men of good name, in Engliſh apparel, in their 'company.

'That the Iriſh within pale ſhall wear Engliſh 'habit, take Engliſh names, and ſwear allegiance, 'upon pain of forfeiture of goods.

'That Engliſh and Iriſh, ſpeaking Engliſh, and 'living with the Engliſh, ſhall have an Engliſh bow 'and arrows, on pain of two-pence (4).'

(4) Hibernia Anglicana, Part i. p. 169.

In 1472, it was likewiſe enacted, 'That every 'Merchant ſhall bring twenty ſhilling's worth of 'bows and arrows into Ireland, for every twenty 'pound's worth of other goods he imports from 'England (5).'

(5) Ibid. p. 171.

In 1494, 'That the ſoldier ſhall pay three-half'pence a meal, and his man a penny, and a penny 'for ſix field-ſheaves of oats, and litter accordingly; 'and whoever refuſes to quarter ſoldiers at this rate, 'forfeits twelve-pence a time, unleſs he be a man of 'twenty marks eſtate per annum, and except cities 'and corporate towns (6).'

(6) Ibid. p. 189.

In 1537, 'That no ſubject ſhall be ſhaved above 'his ears, or wear glibbs, or crommeals, (i. e. hair 'on the upper lip) or linen died in ſaffron, or above 'ſeven yards of linen in their ſhifts; and that no 'woman wear any kirtle, or coat tucked up, or em'broidered, or garniſhed with ſilk, or couched, nor 'laid with uſker, after the Iriſh faſhion, and that no 'perſon wear mantles, coats, or hoods, after the Iriſh 'faſhion, (except women, horſe boys, cow-boys, and 'ſoldiers, all which may wear mantles;) and that 'every body ſhall endeavour to learn the Engliſh 'language, and conform to the Engliſh faſhion.'

'And that benefices ſhall not be given to any that 'cannot ſpeak Engliſh, unleſs after four proclama'tions in the next market-town to the benefice, on 'four ſeveral market-days, a perſon that can ſpeak 'Engliſh, cannot be got; and that then an honeſt 'able Iriſhman may be admitted, on his oath, that 'he ſhall do his utmoſt endeavour to learn the Eng'liſh language, and obſerve the Engliſh order and 'faſhion, and teach thoſe under him to do the like, 'and ſhall keep an Engliſh ſchool in his pariſh to 'that purpoſe (7).'

(7) Ibid. p. 250.

In 1537, it was made treaſon "to marry with the "child of any man who had not ſworn allegiance "(8);" but this law was repealed, 11 Jac. I. cap. 5.

(8) Ibid. p. 251.

In 1542, 'that larceny above the value of four'teen-pence ſhall be puniſhed with the loſs of one 'ear the firſt time, and the other ear the ſecond time, 'and the third time with death (9).'

(9) Ibid. p. 271.

'No horſeman ſhall keep more boys than horſes, 'on pain of twenty ſhillings.'

'That Noblemen ſhall have but twenty cubits, or 'bandles of linen, in their ſhirts, horſemen eighteen, 'footmen ſixteen, garſons twelve, clowns ten; and 'that none of their ſhirts ſhall be dyed with ſaffron, 'on pain of twenty ſhillings (10).'

(10) Ib. p. 272.

[D] Dedicated this work to King William and Queen Mary.] Though Mr. Cox was a native of Ireland, he expreſſed himſelf in his dedication, as well as in other parts of his work, in a manner that would not be agreeable to the inhabitants of that kingdom at the preſent period. In his dedication, he ſays, 'It 'is of great advantage to it (Ireland), that it is a 'ſubordinate kingdom to the Crown of England; for 'it and in the following year published the second part of it. Bishop Nicolson, speaking of the first part of it, says, 'It was published at a time when Ireland was the seat of war and 'desolation, under the guidance of the late unfortunate King James the Second; which 'raised an extraordinary curiosity in inquiring after the affairs of this kingdom. This 'obliged the Author to hasten the continuation of his History; the second part whereof 'was, early in the next year, recommended to the press by two Secretaries of State (g). 'Such encouragements as these pushed the work a little too fast forward; so that it came 'into the world in somewhat of a looser dress than was, most certainly, at first intended 'by the compiler: who nevertheless found his own account in it; being soon after advanc-'ed to the highest posts of honour in the law (h).'

(g) The Earls of Shrewsbury and Nottingham.

(h) Irish Historical Library, p. 19. edit. 1776.

During the residence of Mr. Cox at Bristol, the vicinity of that city to Kingsweston afforded him opportunities of cultivating a more intimate acquaintance with Sir Robert Southwell; of whom we are told, that "the world could not shew a man of more religion, virtue, and wisdom (i)." He was, to the end of his life, a sincere and active friend, and great benefactor to Mr. Cox; who, on his part, ever retained the utmost respect and affection for Sir Robert. Mr. Cox had also the honour to be so much in the esteem and confidence of the first Earl of Burlington, that a constant correspondence was kept up between them; and from letters written by the Earl, it appeared, that his Lordship seldom did any thing of importance without first consulting Mr. Cox, of whose fidelity he had a high opinion, and whom he considered as having done him more service than all the world besides (k). This friendship continued during the whole of the Earl's life, and descended to his grandson, Henry Boyle, afterwards Lord Carleton (l).

(i) Harris, ut supra.

(k) Id. ibid.

(l) Id. ibid.

When the Prince of Orange arrived in London, Mr. Cox immediately left Bristol, and repaired to the metropolis; and the great question being then agitated, whether the Prince of Orange should be King or Regent, Mr. Cox printed 'A Sheet of Aphorisms, prov-'ing, by a fair deduction, the Necessity of making the Prince of Orange King, and of send-'ing speedy Relief to Ireland;' and he presented a copy to every Member who entered the Parliament House on the first day of the Convention. After the important business of the Revolution was accomplished, and the Prince and Princess of Orange were declared King and Queen, Mr. Cox published half a sheet, intitled, "A brief and modest Repre-"sentation of the present State and Condition of Ireland;" which was intended to excite the attention of the Legislature to the affairs of that kingdom, and to induce them to afford speedy relief to the Protestants there. His zeal for the promotion of the Revolution having been observed, and his abilities being well known, it was proposed, that he should go to Ireland as Secretary to the Duke of Schomberg. But that offer he thought proper to decline, on account of his not being acquainted with the French language (m). However, when his Majesty himself resolved to go in person to Ireland, Mr. Cox accepted the post of Secretary to Sir Robert Southwell, then appointed principal Secretary of State, and took upon him the chief care and business of that office.

(m) Id. ibid.

In this situation, Mr. Cox's knowledge of business, and dexterity in the management of it, greatly recommended him to the King. The most secret dispatches of the office, and the greatest part of the intelligence, passed through his hands (n). Of the goodness of his intelligence, as well as of his sagacity, a particular instance occurred, which made a very favourable impression on his Majesty. Before the Battle of the Boyne, there were in the English Camp several strong reports of the number and strength of the enemy, which Sir Robert Southwell, upon the credit of Mr. Cox, affirmed to the King to be false. But a day or two before the action, an officer came from the Irish Camp, and stated to his Majesty the posture and number of the enemy, in such magnified, and yet such regular and plausible terms, that the King was much disconcerted, and told Sir Robert, that "he was "certainly misinformed, and the Irish Forces were more than he imagined." Sir Robert immediately imparted the King's doubts, and the reasons of them, to Mr. Cox. He insisted on the goodness of his intelligence, and desired that the officer might be led from the King's presence about the English Camp. When he had surveyed it at his leisure, he was asked, "what he computed the number of the English Forces to be?" He confidently affirmed them to be more than double that number of which the King knew them to consist. His Majesty was then convinced, that the officer was a superficial and inaccurate observer, and was much pleased at the manner in which this was discovered (o).

(n) Ibid. p. 210.

(o) Id. ibid.

Upon King William's march to Dublin, after his signal victory over King James at the Boyne, he published his Declaration, called, "The King's Declaration at Finglass." This was drawn up by Mr. Cox, and not a single word was altered of the first draught; of which his Majesty was pleased to say, "that Mr. Cox had exactly hit his own mind (p)." After the surrender of Waterford, Mr. Cox was immediately made Recorder of that city;

(p) Id. ibid.

'it is from that Royal fountain that the streams of 'justice, peace, civility, riches, and all other im-'provements have been derived to it; so that the 'Irish are (as Campion says) beholden to God for 'being conquered. And yet Ireland has been so 'blind, in this great point of its true interest, that 'the natives have managed almost a continual war 'with the English, ever since the first conquest there-'of; so that it has cost your Royal predecessors an 'unspeakable mass of blood and treasure, to preserve 'it in due obedience.'

and his Majeſty, ſenſible of the importance and fidelity of his ſervices, and being willing to reward him in ſuch a manner as ſhould be moſt agreeable to himſelf, commanded Sir Robert Southwell to aſk him what employment he would chooſe. The office which he mentioned, as moſt acceptable to him, was that of Second Juſtice of the Court of Common Pleas; and accordingly he was ſworn into that office, on the fifteenth of September, 1690. He was now fixed in a reſpectable poſt, of his own chooſing, of moderate profit, and little buſineſs; and in this ſituation he hoped to be able to employ a great part of his time in the ſtudy of hiſtory, which was his favourite purſuit. It was his deſign to reviſe his Hiſtory of Ireland, which he was ſenſible had been publiſhed too haſtily, and would admit of great additions and improvements (q). But he was found too uſeful a perſon to the Government, to be long ſuffered to enjoy the quiet for which he wiſhed; and, therefore, was ſent with Robert Rochfort, Eſq; one of the Commiſſioners of the Great Seal, in October, that year, to execute a Commiſſion of Oyer and Terminer at Athirdee and Drogheda; and in December with Sir Richard Pine, another of the Commiſſioners of the Great Seal, to execute a ſimilar commiſſion at Wexford, Waterford, and Cork. They were alſo entruſted with an abſolute power of ordering and commiſſioning the Militia, delivering out arms and ſtores to them, and of granting protections to all thoſe Rebels who were willing to ſubmit to his Majeſty. The Commiſſioners proceeded to execute their truſt with ſo much zeal and diligence, that General Ginkle, by a letter from Clonmell, applied to them, among their other inquiries, to inſpect the behaviour of the officers and ſoldiers in Garriſons, that, upon their report, he might reform abuſes, and puniſh the offenders. The good conduct of the Commiſſioners in a great meaſure reſtored peace and order to the country through which they paſſed: and in January, Mr. Juſtice Cox received a letter from Lord Sidney, dated at Whitehall, 'acknowledging the great 'zeal and affection, which, upon all occaſions, he had ſhewn for his Majeſty's Service; 'and aſſuring him, that it would be remembered to his advantage (r).'

(q) Harris, ubi ſupra.

(r) Ibid. p. 211.

In March, 1691, Lord Chief Juſtice Reynel, and Mr. Juſtice Cox, went Judges of Aſſize to Cork and Waterford, which were the only places in Munſter abſolutely in the power of the Engliſh; and they carried inſtructions for promoting peace, and ſecuring thoſe two counties, and alſo a Commiſſion for inſpecting the ſtores of war, and for inquiring into embezzlements. Among their inſtructions was one, which was extremely cruel and arbitrary; but we are told, that it was "ſo wholeſome, and attended with ſo good cir-"cumſtances, that it is fit to be recorded (s)." It was as follows: "That as often as "any murder, or robbery, ſhall be committed within his Majeſty's quarters, all ſuch "parents in that county, who have ſons in the enemies quarters, ſhall be apprehended and "ſent to the common gaol, until reparation made, or they be otherwiſe delivered by due "courſe of law." And we are informed, that "the ſtrict execution of theſe inſtructions "contributed greatly to the ſettlement of thoſe two counties, even before the war was "finiſhed in other parts of the kingdom (t)." In April, the ſame year, the Lords Juſtices ſent for Mr. Juſtice Cox, and acquainted him, that it was their intention to appoint him Governor of the county and city of Cork; and that they expected, that he would immediately repair to his poſt, in order to put the Militia into a poſture of defence with all poſſible expedition. He was ſenſible of the weight of ſuch a charge, at a time when both ſides would probably make their utmoſt efforts for victory in the field; and that he ſhould have much to anſwer for, if matters ſhould not ſucceed well with him in that large county, at ſo critical a period. He, therefore, endeavoured to decline the acceptance of the office, by urging his want of military knowledge. But Lord Coningſby replied, 'That 'he was a popular man, and beloved by the Proteſtants, and that his zeal would ſupply 'his want of military ſkill.' Being at length prevailed upon to undertake the office, that he might be enabled to anſwer the expectations that were formed of him, he deſired, that he might be ſupplied with ſufficient arms and ammunition; and that poſitive orders ſhould be ſent, that no affront ſhould be offered on any occaſion to the Militia by the Army; that the regular troops ſhould be poſted in ſuch a manner, that no diſpute might ariſe about precedency; and that ſeven regiments of the Regulars ſhould be ordered to join in defence of that county. Theſe requiſitions were all complied with; and he arrived at Cork, on the 5th of May, furniſhed with ample powers for the execution of his office, and alſo with a Commiſſion of Oyer and Terminer (u).

(s) Id. ibid.

(t) Id. ibid.

(u) Id. ibid.

The ſituation of Mr. Cox, as a Judge, and a military Governor, was ſomewhat ſingular; and he was certainly not deficient in zeal for the Government, whatever objections may be made to his conduct on the principles of juſtice and humanity. A proclamation, which was iſſued by him on the 18th of the ſame month, was extremely arbitrary and ſevere. All Papiſts were forbidden by it 'to be out of their dwellings, from nine at night till five 'in the morning, or to be found two miles from their places of abode, except in a high-'way to a market-town, and on market-days, or to keep or conceal arms or ammunition, 'on pain of being treated as rebels.' It was likewiſe ordered, 'That hue-and-cry ſhould 'be made after murderers or robbers; and that all perſons ſhould, on their allegiance, en-'liſt themſelves in the Militia; and that none ſhould traffick, correſpond with, or ſend 'proviſions to the enemy, or ſhelter or entertain Tories, Rapares, &c. that no protected 'perſon

'perſon ſhould deſert his habitation, or go to the enemy, or otherwiſe abſent himſelf above 'three days, on pain of the impriſonment of his wife and family, and the demoliſhing of 'his houſe.' It concluded, with promiſing 'impartial juſtice, without diſtinction of na- 'tion (w).' This proclamation, we are told, produced wonderful effects; and by the help of it, and by Governor Cox's care to place the Gentlemen of the county in the Militia according to their quality and fortune, he raiſed in three weeks eight regiments of Dragoons, and three of Foot. The men entered ſo cordially into the ſervice, that they were not long in learning diſcipline, and ſoon became capable either of attack or defence (x). When the Engliſh army was ready to take the field, the Lords Juſtices ſent the Governor full inſtructions for his conduct, and particularly empowering and directing him to try the Militia for breach of military diſcipline, and to adminiſter to them an oath of allegiance to the King and Queen, and of obedience to their officers. In a letter from the Lords Juſtices, dated the 23d of May, he was alſo told, 'that if any thing happened 'amiſs in his county, it would lie at his door; and that, therefore, ſince the army was 'marched every where, it concerned him to be more than ordinarily vigilant.' This language might have intimidated a man of leſs reſolution than Governor Cox; and the rather, as the ſtrongeſt garriſon of the Iriſh, that of Limerick, was not far from the borders of his county. But he had put the county into ſuch a ſtate of defence, and ſo well diſciplined the Militia, that when he found the Engliſh army was entering on action, he wrote to General Ginkle, "that if he wanted, he could ſpare him five regiments of the "ſeven he had of the army to defend the county." This offer was very thankfully accepted by the General, who accordingly drew off one regiment of Horſe, one of Dragoons, and three of Foot. Indeed, the Cork Militia had acquired ſo high a reputation, that in Auguſt General Ginkle wrote for one thouſand of them to aſſiſt him at the Siege of Limerick; and they were poſted at Killaloe, a paſs of great importance, which they effectually ſecured, as long as the General thought it neceſſary (y). And on this occaſion an inſtance occurred of Governor Cox's conduct, which was afterwards highly commended by the great Duke of Marlborough. The detachment from the city of Cork, which was to complete the thouſand men to go to Limerick, conſiſted of 160; who grew mutinous in their march, and at laſt abſolutely refuſed to leave their county; ſo that their Commander, Colonel Rogers, after having ineffectually endeavoured to bring them to compliance, rode to the Governor, and complained of their diſobedience. The Governor calmly anſwered, that he would make them march. Accordingly, accompanied by ſeveral Gentlemen, he came up to the head of the refractory men, and aſſuming as much ſeverity in his countenance as he could, he aſked them, Why they did not march? One of them then began to anſwer for the reſt: but the Governor ſtopped him ſhort, and ſaid, 'That he ſcorned to make uſe of the power which the Government had given him 'to puniſh them, conſidering that ſome of them might be cuckolds, and ſome cowards, 'whoſe company he did not deſire; but that he was ſure there were many among them, 'who loved their King and country, and were not afraid to fight for them; and that 'ſuch would follow him. As to the reſt, they had liberty to return to their own houſes.' They all inſtantly and eagerly preſſed forward, and did ſignal ſervice at the ſiege (z).

(w) Harris, ubi ſupra, p. 212.

(x) Id. ibid.

(y) Id. ibid.

(z) Id. ibid.

During the time of Mr. Cox's Government, which continued till the reduction of Limerick, though he had a frontier of eighty miles extent to defend, and twenty places to garriſon, beſides Cork and the Fort of Kinſale, where the two regiments of Regulars were poſted, yet he did not loſe a ſingle inch of ground. The Militia under his command made daily incurſions into the enemy's quarters, and obtained plunder to the amount of thirty thouſand pounds; of which, though he had a right to the tenth ſhare, yet he generouſly refuſed to take any part. His great ſervices to the Proteſtant cauſe were ſo well known, and ſo generally acknowledged, that every poſt brought him grateful acknowledgments of them from the Government, or from ſome abſentee, who had a property within his line. The Earl of Burlington, in a letter from London, dated the 29th of October, expreſſed himſelf in the following terms: 'I am very ſenſible of the 'great pains and care you took laſt ſummer for the preſervation of the county of Cork, 'and particularly of my concerns therein, and of thoſe parts adjacent thereunto, which 'lie on the Black Water; for which I return you moſt thankful acknowledgments; aſſur- 'ing you, that I ſhall be ready upon all occaſions to expreſs the ſenſe I have thereof.' The Grand Juries of the county and city of Cork, who had been the witneſſes of his actions, alſo preſented him with addreſſes of thanks, 'for the indefatigable pains he had 'taken in their Majeſties ſervice, and for the benefit of the country, and for the affec- 'tionate concern he had in all his actions manifeſted for the inhabitants of the county; 'and to beſeech, that he would, if it ſtood with his convenience, remain among them; 'or wherever he was, that he would always perſevere in the ſame affections for the county 'and city (a).'

(a) Ibid. p. 213.

On the 12th of April, 1692, Mr. Juſtice Cox was ſworn Deputy Governor of the Royal Fiſhery Company under Lord Sidney, who was Governor of that Company; and on the 13th of the ſame month he was ſworn a Privy Counſellor. Some apprehenſions were about this time entertained of an invaſion from France; which occaſioned Mr. Juſtice Cox to be again ſent into Munſter, but with a more extenſive commiſſion than formerly. He was inveſted with the Command of the Militia of the cities of Cork and Limerick, and of the counties of Cork, Limerick, Clare, and Kerry, and carried with him orders to the Store-keepers to deliver to him whatever arms and ammunition he ſhould demand. He had alſo a ſecret commiſſion to diſarm the Iriſh, and other Papiſts, on the 20th of May, which was the day appointed for doing that buſineſs throughout the kingdom: and for that purpoſe he was ordered to diſtribute the Militia in ſmall parties, ſo that no ſuſpicion might ariſe of the deſign, but that the blow might fall with its full force. On the 24th of the ſame month, orders were alſo ſent him to ſeize all ſerviceable horſes in the poſſeſſion of Papiſts, or perſons diſaffected to their Majeſties Government; with which he received a diſcretionary power to truſt arms in the hands of the Papiſts for the deſtruction of Raparrees [E]. But the great naval victory, which was gained over the French this month at La Hogue, having removed all fears of an invaſion, orders were ſent to Governor Cox to reſtore all the horſes which he had ſeized, in purſuance of his former directions. He continued, however, to act as Governor of Munſter, the inhabitants of which were much ſecured againſt the Raparrees by his prudent management of the Militia, till Lord Chief Juſtice Reynel carried down a Commiſſion of Aſſize for that province, directed to him and Mr. Juſtice Cox, who then went the Summer Circuit, and afterwards returned to Dublin. On the 5th of November following, Mr. Juſtice Cox was Knighted with the Sword of State, in the Caſtle of Dublin, by Lord Sidney, Lord Lieutenant, who gave him all the marks of favour and eſteem that were in his power, during the time that he continued Chief Governor of Ireland, and afterwards continued his friendſhip and good offices to him during his Lordſhip's life (b).

(b) Harris, ubi ſupra, p. 213.

On the 26th of April, 1693, at a meeting of the Philoſophical Society, at the Provoſt's lodgings in Trinity College, Dublin, Sir Richard Cox read "A Geographical Deſcription "of the City and County of Derry, and of the County of Antrim," being part of an entire Geographical Deſcription of the whole kingdom, which he intended to complete; and in which alſo was to be contained "A Natural Hiſtory of Ireland," in which all the natural productions of the Iſland were to be deſcribed. Theſe deſigns he never executed: however, upon reading his Geographical Deſcription, before mentioned, he was admitted a Fellow of the Philoſophical Society at Dublin, together with Dr. John Veſey, Archbiſhop of Tuam, and Francis Roberts, Eſq; younger ſon to the Earl of Radnor. About this time Sir Richard Cox was made one of the Juſtices of the King's Bench; and in May, this year, he went to England, and was received by the perſons in power in a very diſtinguiſhed manner. Lord Godolphin, who was at the head of the Treaſury, told him, "that his ſervices were ſo conſiderable, that they were all obliged to do what they could "for him." As an evidence of the ſincerity with which his Lordſhip ſpoke, he afterwards delivered to him an order from the Treaſury for the abatement of one moiety of his quit-rent for ever; and a reſervation was afterwards made for grants of this kind in the famous Act of Reſumption, chiefly in favour of Sir Richard Cox, whoſe zeal for the Proteſtant intereſt had recommended him to all parties at that time in power. It was this favourable opinion of him, which induced the Lords of the Treaſury, without any application from him, to nominate him one of the Commiſſioners for Forfeitures, with a ſalary of 400*l. per annum*, into which office he was ſworn on the 10th of February, 1694 (c).

(c) Ibid. p. 214.

But though the ſervices of Sir Richard Cox were thought very important in England, as well as in Ireland, it appears that his conduct, in ſome reſpects, procured him many enemies in the latter kingdom. Much, however, of the animoſity that was conceived againſt him, aroſe from particulars in his conduct which were wholly unexceptionable. At the ſurrender of Limerick to the arms of King William, in 1691, more equitable and liberal terms were granted to the Papiſts, than were agreeable to the more zealous Proteſtants. Many of the latter, who were enflamed and exaſperated at the barbarities which had recently been committed by the Iriſh Catholics, were extremely diſguſted at theſe conceſſions made "in favour of vanquiſhed Rebels, who had exerciſed ſuch acts of "cruelty and rapine." They complained, that they themſelves, who had deeply ſuffered by their attachment to the cauſe of King William, were neglected, and obliged to ſit down with their loſſes, while their enemies, who had ſhed ſo much blood in oppoſing his govern-

[E] For the deſtruction of Raparrees.] Thoſe lawleſs Iriſh plunderers, who were called Raparrees, were ſo termed, Dr. Leland obſerves, 'from the Iriſh 'name of their half pike, a weapon eaſily procured 'by the moſt barbarous. Many were influenced by 'example, and many driven by neceſſity to unite with 'them. They who received protections from Wil'liam's Generals, and were yet plundered by his ſol'diers, ran with particular animoſity to ſwell the 'numbers of theſe ravagers. In Summer they hung 'about the Engliſh camp; every ſtraggling ſoldier 'they killed, even for the ſake of his arms or cloath'ing; and, in the rage of national hatred, frequently 'mangled his dead body. In winter, they appeared 'in the different quarters with all the marks of hu'mility and abaſement. Their weapons were care'fully concealed, but lay ready for execution. They 'aſſembled in the dead of night in ſolitary 'places, projected their excurſions, ruſhed ſuddenly 'on their prey, vaniſhed at the firſt appearance of 'oppoſition, and were again readily collected (11).'

(11) History of Ireland, vol. iii. p. 588, 589.

ment,

ment, were indemnified by the articles of the capitulation, and even favoured with particular indulgencies (d). Some of the Proteſtants are alſo ſuppoſed to have been the more averſe to the articles of Limerick, becauſe they expected to derive advantage from the forfeitures which would have been obtained from the Papiſts, if the terms granted to them had been more rigorous; though it is ſaid, that more liberal terms were at firſt intended, than thoſe that were at laſt granted [F]. However, it was contended by many, that the articles of Limerick "ought not to be obſerved; and that it was High Treaſon even to "capitulate with the King (e)." Doctrine ſimilar to this was inculcated even from the pulpit [G]. But Sir Richard Cox was one of thoſe Proteſtants who reſolutely maintained, that the articles of Limerick ſhould be inviolably obſerved; and the firmneſs and zeal, with which he aſſerted this opinion, procured him many enemies. Favourable articles had been granted to the Papiſts at Galway, as well as at Limerick; and when Sir Richard Cox came to appear openly in a Court of Judicature, as a Commiſſioner of Forfeitures, he made ſo eloquent a Speech in behalf of the Galway men, inſiſted ſo ſtrongly on the heinouſneſs of breaking the public faith, and on the ingratitude that it would manifeſt to King William, as well as to the General who had granted thoſe conditions, that he brought over the reſt of the Commiſſioners to his opinion, and ſaved the eſtates of the claimants, to the great diſſatisfaction of thoſe who hoped to have ſhared in the Iriſh Forfeitures (f).

(d) Smollet's Hiſt. of England from the Revolution, vol. i. p. 227. edit. 1785. Crawford's Hiſt. of Ireland, vol. ii. p. 224.

(e) Harris, ubi ſupra, p. 215.

(f) Ibid. p. 216.

The influence of his enemies at length ſo far prevailed againſt him, that in June, 1695, he was ſuperſeded from the Council, though with high compliments for his paſt ſervices, and an apology for his diſmiſſion from the Council, drawn from "the jealouſy the ſub-"ject began to entertain of ſo many Judges ſitting at the Council-board, which began to "look like, and might ſoon grow into a Court of Judicature (g)." An indirect attack was afterwards made againſt him, by an attempt to get a vote in Parliament, that "the "Iriſh Forfeitures were miſmanaged." But Sir Richard Cox being heard before a Committee, inſiſted, "that as there had been ſeveral Commiſſions of Forfeitures, common "juſtice required, that they ſhould point out the particular miſmanagements, that it might "be known to whom to object them, and that the innocent might not be confounded with "the guilty." Sir Richard Bulkely then produced a liſt of objections againſt the Commiſſioners, which were immediately, and without any preparation, anſwered in ſo ſatisfactory a manner by Sir Richard Cox, that the deſign of a vote againſt the Commiſſioners was dropped. The Commiſſion of Forfeitures was, however, diſſolved, and the buſineſs transferred to thoſe perſons who had the management of the revenue, under the idea of ſaving the ſalaries of the Commiſſioners to the public (h).

(g) Ibid. p. 217.

(h) Id. ibid.

When a Bill was brought into the Iriſh Parliament "for liberty of conſcience," Sir Richard Cox did not oppoſe it, but he endeavoured, and with too much ſucceſs, to render it circumſcribed and limited; for, on this ſubject, his ſentiments ſeem not to have been ſufficiently liberal and enlightened. In 1696, he went over again into England, for the recovery of his health, which had been ſomewhat impaired, by the great variety of buſineſs that he had gone through ſince the Revolution. King William was in Flanders, during the whole time of Sir Richard's ſtay in England; ſo that he had no opportunity of preſenting, as he intended, a Petition to his Majeſty, ſetting forth the unjuſt treatment that he had met with from his Majeſty's ſervants, who ought to have protected, and not oppreſſed him. But after his return to England, before the end of the year, he had the ſatisfaction to receive a letter from his friend, Sir Robert Southwell, by which he was informed, that the King was well pleaſed with the reſolute ſtand that he had made in ſupport of the articles of Limerick. The four following years Sir Richard Cox had no public employment, excepting that which reſulted from his duty as a Judge; and at this period he wrote, "An Eſſay for the Converſion of the Iriſh;" in which he laboured to convince

[F] More liberal terms were at firſt intended, than thoſe that were at laſt granted.] Mr. Harris ſays, that King William, 'hoping thereby to put a ſpeedy end 'to the Iriſh war, ſent to the Lords Juſtices inſtructions for a declaration, by which the Iriſh were to 'be aſſured of much more favourable and extenſive 'conditions, than they afterwards obtained by the 'articles of Limerick. His Majeſty's inſtructions 'were reduced into a proclamation, which was afterwards ſtyled the Secret Proclamation; becauſe, 'though it was printed, yet it never was publiſhed. 'For the Lords Juſtices, finding that Limerick was 'reduced to a capitulation, ſmothered the proclamation, of which they thought there was then no 'need, and went in all haſte to the Engliſh camp, 'that they might hold the Iriſh to as hard terms, as 'the King's affairs would admit of. This they did 'very effectually, and put an happy end to a war, 'which had nigh deſtroyed the kingdom (12).'

(12) Hiſtory of the Writers of Ireland, ubi ſupra, p. 214.

[G] Doctrine ſimilar to this was inculcated even from the pulpit.] The Biſhop of Meath, on the very next Sunday after the Lords Juſtices returned from the camp, preaching before the Government at Chriſt-church, argued, 'That the peace ought not to be 'obſerved with a people ſo perfidious; that they kept 'neither articles nor oaths longer than was for their 'intereſt; and that therefore the articles, which were 'intended for a ſecurity, would prove a ſnare, and 'would only enable the rebels to play their pranks 'over again on the firſt opportunity.' The Biſhop of Kildare mounted the pulpit the following Sunday, and ſhewed the obligation of keeping the public faith. Dean Synge afterwards preached in the ſame pulpit, and maintained, "that the Papiſts were not to be "truſted, but the articles were to be performed; that "they deſerved no favour, yet they were entitled to "juſtice, even for the ſake of conſcience and ho-"nour." The ſermon of the Biſhop of Meath gave ſo much offence to the Government, that he was on account of it removed from the Privy Council, and the Biſhop of Kildare was appointed in his room (13).

(13) Ibid. p. 215.

Thoſe Proteſtants who were deſirous that the articles of Limerick ſhould not be obſerved, ſeem to have been ambitious of emulating thoſe Roman Catholics, who have maintained, that "Faith was not to be "kept with Heretics."

them

them of their errors, and is ſaid to have had the ſatisfaction to ſee a proper effect wrought on ſeveral perſons of great underſtanding (i). Another piece is attributed to him, which was printed at Dublin, in 4*to*. in 1698, entitled, "Some Thoughts on the Bill depending "before the Right Honourable the Houſe of Lords for prohibiting the Exportation of "the Woollen Manufactures of Ireland to Foreign Parts. Humbly offered to their "Lordſhips (k)."

(i) Harris, ubi ſupra, p. 218.

(k) Id. ibid.

On the 16th of May, 1701, Sir Richard Cox was ſworn in Lord Chief Juſtice of the Court of Common Pleas; and in a few days after a Member of the Privy Council. It was notified to him by the Earl of Rocheſter, the Lord Lieutenant, that his Majeſty had granted him this preferment, "as a reward of his long and faithful ſervices in the ſtations he had "been in, and to give him an opportunity of doing more." In this ſituation he had acquired an high reputation, when the Duke of Ormond, in 1702, was appointed Lord Lieutenant in the room of the Earl of Rocheſter. Queen Anne had now aſcended the Throne; and Lord Chief Juſtice Cox received a letter from the Earl of Nottingham, dated the 16th of February, 1703, acquainting him, 'That her Majeſty having under her 'conſideration many matters relating to Ireland, in which he might be very uſeful to her 'ſervice, had commanded him to write, that he ſhould go to London, as ſoon as conveni-'ently he could, that ſhe might have his advice.' He received this letter when he was on the Connaught circuit, and immediately ſet forward on his journey. During his attendance on the Queen in England, ſundry important meaſures were propoſed by him, and which were afterwards adopted for the ſecurity of the Proteſtant intereſt in Ireland, and the benefit of the inhabitants of that kingdom. Among other ſubjects upon which he was conſulted, one was, What would be the moſt convenient time for the ſitting of the Iriſh Parliament? and another, Which manufacture, linen or woollen, it would be moſt the intereſt of England to encourage in Ireland? As to the firſt of theſe points, he adviſed, 'that the meeting of Parliament ſhould be put off, if poſſible, until the proceed-'ings of the Truſtees of Confiſcated Eſtates, appointed in conſequence of the Act of 'Reſumption [H], ſhould be in ſome meaſure forgotten: for the grievances which the 'people, eſpecially the Proteſtants, had undergone from the arbitrary power lodged in 'their hands by the Engliſh Parliament, and their actions purſuant to that power, were ſo 'great, that whilſt the nation was in a ferment on that account, no great good could be 'expected from a Parliament, which would probably bring with it the temper of the peo-'ple (l).' With reſpect to the other of thoſe points, he was clearly of opinion, 'That it 'was the intereſt of England to encourage the woollen manufacture in Ireland, in the 'coarſe branches of it, which would prevent the wool and the manufactures from being 'carried to France, and would not interfere with the manufacture of England. He 'thought it was the moſt impolitic ſtep, which was ever taken by England, to prohibit 'the whole exportation of woollen manufactures from Ireland. He ſaid, that if, at the 'time of making the law, the fine ſorts only had been prohibited, the manufacturers would 'never have turned themſelves to the making them even for the conſumption of Ireland. 'If they had had the free exportation of the coarſe ſort, England would for ever have had 'the Iriſh market for fine cloths. But, as the caſe ſtood, thoſe workmen who choſe to 'ſtay in Ireland, muſt of neceſſity fall to the making of cloths for the future wearing of 'the inhabitants, becauſe no other manufacture was left to them; and the remaining wool 'would be carried to France. France would be always able to give a greater price 'than England for the wool, being ſure to have an allowance for the difference in the 'cheapneſs of the work. So that England, far from being a gainer by the project, would 'in time loſe the whole Iriſh market for fine cloths, and gain no new ſhare in the foreign 'trade; but would run a great hazard of loſing the whole, by having ſo cheap a country 'as France for its rival (m).' It would have been happy if the ſound and judicious ſen-timents of Sir Richard Cox upon this ſubject had been attended to; but a narrow, unjuſt, and illiberal policy then prevailed, which was not only oppreſſive reſpecting Ireland, but eventually highly injurious to both kingdoms.

(l) Harris, ubi ſupra, p. 219.

(m) Id. ibid.

(e) Harris, ubi ſupra, p. 220.

(f) Ibid. p. 221.

(p) Ibid. p. 223.

(q) Id. ibid.

[H] In conſequence of the Act of Reſumption.] After the reduction of Ireland by King William, many eſtates which had been forfeited by their owners having engaged in the Rebellion, were granted to officers who had aſſiſted in the ſuppreſſion of the Rebellion, and to other favourites of the King and the Miniſtry. The Engliſh Parliament, however, were of opinion, that his Majeſty and his Miniſters had been abundantly too liberal in their grants of this kind. An act, therefore, was paſſed for the reſumption of the Iriſh Forfeitures. In order to compel the King to give his aſſent to it, it was tacked to a Bill of ſupply (14). Mr. Crawford obſerves, 'That ſome juſtice 'might be done to the perſons affected by it, the Act 'of Reſumption was not abſolute. A number of 'Truſtees were named in it, in whom were veſted all 'the confiſcated eſtates. In determining all claims, 'and diſpoſing of the lands to purchaſers, they were 'veſted with uncontroulable authority. The Truſtees 'paſſed over to Ireland. After ſpending ſome time 'in the buſineſs, in one of their Reports they de-'clare, that they had not as yet thought fit to leave 'any thing to the determination of the people of 'this country. Iriſhmen were much obliged to 'them for this favourable opinion of their honeſty. 'A number of claims were determined by them in 'favour of Roman Catholicks; notwithſtanding they 'violated, in many inſtances, the articles of Lime-'rick and of Galway. Their appointment was very 'offenſive to the nation, and their conduct equally 'obnoxious. They were charged with injuſtice, 'venality, and corruption (15).'

(14) Macpherſon's Hiſtory of Great Britain, vol. ii. p. 176.

(15) Hiſtory of Ireland, vol. ii. p. 246.

Though the Engliſh Miniſtry did not adopt all the meaſures recommended by Sir Richard Cox, he yet gave great ſatisfaction to them, and received from them very high compliments, together with a preſent from the Queen of five hundred pounds, to defray the expences of his journey. He returned to Ireland with the Duke of Ormond; and in July, 1703, was nominated, by her Majeſty in Council, Lord Chancellor of that Kingdom. This appointment met with very general applauſe; and it is ſaid that all the Members of the Council, who had either eſtates in Ireland, or who by their employments were acquainted with the characters of conſiderable men there, expreſſed their hearty approbation of her Majeſty's choice (n). From the time of his return to Ireland, it was generally known that he was to be Chancellor; and the Engliſh Miniſtry, therefore, correſponded with him about the Bills tranſmitted by the Council, and all other matters of State, before he had entered on that high office. On the 6th of Auguſt he was ſworn Lord Chancellor, and on the 10th iſſued writs for a new Parliament. On the 24th of September the Parliament aſſembled; and Sir Richard Cox was now to appear in a character which was quite new to him, that of Speaker to the Houſe of Lords. But though it was a buſy and critical Seſſion, and various attempts were made by his enemies to confound him, and even to expoſe him to ridicule, he yet diſcharged the duties of his ſtation with ſo much ability, that Archbiſhop Veſey, who had long been a Member of that Houſe, and who was well known to be a competent judge, repeatedly ſaid, "that no perſon in his time had guided "the Debates of that Houſe with ſo much readineſs, impartiality, and dignity, as Sir Richard Cox (o)."

(n) Harris, ubi ſupra, p. 220.

(o) Ibid. p. 221.

Among other Bills, which were promoted by him, and tranſmitted by the Council to England, during the time that he held the office of Chancellor, were the following: A Bill "for quieting poſſeſſions, and diſpoſing of the undiſpoſed and plus acres;" by which all contention with the Crown about lands not granted, was taken away, and the ſecurity of the ſubject preferred to the profit or power of the Crown; a Bill "to prevent Popiſh "Prieſts from coming into the Kingdom;" a Bill "to make it High Treaſon to im-"peach the Succeſſion to the Crown as limited by ſeveral Acts of Parliament;" a Bill "to prevent the Growth of Popery;" and a Bill "for the Recovery of ſmall Debts in a "ſummary way [I]." On the 23d of March, 1704, the Lord Lieutenant having quitted the kingdom, the Lord Chancellor was ſworn one of the Lords Juſtices, with Hugh Earl of Mount Alexander, and Lieutenant-general Thomas Earl. During their Adminiſtration, there was a conſiderable embarkation of Troops to Portugal; in the promoting of which the Lord Chancellor Cox was ſo remarkably active and expeditious, that he received a letter of thanks from the Earl of Galway, then Commander of the Forces in Portugal. About this time an Act of Parliament was paſſed in England, for permitting the Iriſh to export their linen directly to the Plantations; a law which was firſt projected and propoſed by Sir Richard Cox (p). On the 27th of June, 1705, he was again ſworn one of the Lords Juſtices, with Lord Cutts, Commander in Chief of the Queen's Forces; and in October, 1706, he was created a Baronet, as a mark of her Majeſty's favour, and in conſideration of his many public ſervices (q). His colleague, Lord Cutts, died on the 26th of January following; and this event involved Sir Richard Cox in ſome conſiderable difficulties [K]. However, the Primate of Ireland, and the Chancellor, were ſworn in as Lords

(p) Ibid. p. 223.

(q) Id. ibid.

[I] A Bill "for the Recovery of ſmall Debts in a ſummary way."] Mr. Harris ſays, that Sir Richard Cox was 'thoroughly acquainted with the general 'poverty of the kingdom, and well knew, that the 'inferior people were often injured by men of riches 'and power, and by many of their own degree, for 'want of a method to recover their debts with ſmall 'expence, and of having their demands ſpeedily de-'termined, which the uſual courſe of the common 'law would not admit of, eſpecially if they had liti-'gious perſons to deal with, who would lay hold of 'every advantage the law gave them to delay, vex, 'and diſappoint their adverſaries. The Chancellor, 'therefore, ſupported this Bill with all his reaſon 'and intereſt, though he had a diſcouraging oppoſi-'tion to contend with. For Sir Simon Harcourt, in 'a letter, dated January the 8th, wrote to him in the 'following manner: "The Bill for Recovery of "ſmall Debts is a great alteration of the Common "Law, for which your Lordſhip, I am ſure, notwith-"ſtanding your preſent ſtation, will always have "the greateſt regard imaginable. I am not able to "anſwer for its ſucceſs." But the Chancellor ſoon 'convinced him, as well as the Privy Council of 'England, of the neceſſity there was for ſuch a law 'in Ireland, and he had the pleaſure to hear, that 'his opinion had determined them to paſs it. Sir 'Gilbert Dolben, who was a zealous Solicitor at 'London in matters relating to Ireland, wrote to him 'thus: "The Bill for the Recovery of ſmall Debts "will return with very little alteration.—The au-"thority of your Lordſhip's opinion has been the "main ſupport of the Bill; otherwiſe the great "alteration it makes in the Common Law would, "probably, have overthrown it." Though the law 'has been much altered in this matter, yet it is but 'improved on the plan of the Act paſſed at this 'time; and the effect has been ſo beneficial to rich 'and poor, that they cannot with too much grati-'tude remember the perſon, who ſo early laboured 'for their relief (16).'

(16) Hiſtory of the Writers of Ireland, ubi ſupra, p. 222.

[K] This event involved Sir Richard Cox in ſome conſiderable difficulties.] Mr. Harris, after obſerving, that, by the death of Lord Cutts, the Commiſſion of the Lords Juſtices was diſſolved, ſays, that 'the 'Statute of Henry VIII. required, "that the Chan-"cellor ſhould iſſue writs to the King's Counſellors "in the ſhires of Dublin, Cork, Kerry, &c. to elect "a Governor, upon the avoidance of every the "King's Lieutenant, Deputy or Juſtice of the "Realm by Death, Surrender or Departure out of "the Realm; and upon the election, that he ſhould "ſeal Letters patent, and ſuch perſon, being ſworn, "ſhould have like authority, pre-eminence, and "dignity, to every purpoſe and reſpect, as the "King's Lieutenant or Deputy there next before "him uſed to have, &c. until the King do admit "and authorize one to be his Lieutenant or Gover-"nor,

Lords Juſtices in leſs than three weeks after the death of that Nobleman. But the Duke of Ormond being ſoon after removed from the Government of Ireland, and the Earl of Pembroke appointed Lord Lieutenant in his room, Sir Richard Cox was alſo removed from the Chancellorſhip. It was on the 30th of June, 1707, that he delivered up the Great Seal to the Lord Lieutenant; and he did this with ſo much chearfulneſs and compoſure, that from his behaviour, it was ſaid, he might be ſuppoſed to have received a favour from the Government. He afterwards entered into no oppoſition againſt the meaſures of Adminiſtration, but promoted the ſervice of the Crown, as much as he could in a private ſituation; having no inclination to diſturb the Government, becauſe he had no ſhare in it.

" nor, and until he be ſworn as accuſtomed." The ' Lord Chancellor met the Council at the Caſtle the ' morning after Lord Cutts's death, and deſired their ' advice how he ſhould proceed. The Council were ' at firſt unanimouſly of opinion, that he ought im- ' mediately to iſſue writs, and proceed to an election; ' and ſome of the moſt zealous for this method of- ' fered to elect him ſole Governor, as Sir Charles ' Porter was elected on the death of Lord Capel, ' hoping by that bait to draw him into the ſnare. ' But he, who could not deceive thoſe who had in- ' truſted him, declared frankly, " that it was his " opinion, he could not in the preſent caſe proceed " to an election, but muſt wait the Queen's nomi- " nation of new Juſtices: Becauſe, 1. The Statute " plainly related to Head Governors only, and the " Lord Lieutenant was Head Governor. For the " Lords Juſtices by their Patent were to act by his " inſtructions, even after his departure. His autho- " rity was to continue by an expreſs clauſe in their " Patent; he ſigned all Commiſſions of the Army, " and all orders from the Queen were directed to " him. 2. There was no avoidance of his Com- " miſſion by departure; for he was abſent by licence, " and therefore within the Statute. 3. The words, " Until the King authorize a new Governor, and until " he be ſworn, demonſtrate, that the Statute cannot " operate where there is a Governor in being, autho- " rized by the Queen and ſworn already; and there- " fore he concluded, that the Government was not " Void, but unſupplied. He added, that he thought " it would be very dangerous, and of evil conſe- " quence, if he ſhould aſſume a power not warranted " by the Statute; but that no detriment could ariſe " from deliberating and conſidering well what ought " to be done; and ſince even proceeding on ſuch " writs would take up at leaſt a fortnight, and that " he might reaſonably expect to know her Majeſty's " pleaſure within that time, having ſent two expreſſes " for that purpoſe, there was no reaſon to be preci- " pitate, unleſs the kingdom were in danger, or " there were ſome manifeſt inconvenience now in " view." Theſe reaſons contented all moderate ' men; but others expected hereby to vacate the ' Lord Lieutenant's Commiſſion, and therefore ' threatened the Lord Chancellor heavily. But he ' applied himſelf to examine into precedents, and found ' them all expreſſing the words Void or Vacant, where ' the Head Governor failed. The only precedent ' from the time of making the Act ſuitable to the ' preſent caſe, was that of Lord Deputy Wandesford, ' who died December the 3d, 1640, the record of ' which ſaid, " the Government was unſupplied," ' which juſtified the Chancellor's diſtinction: and ' though the Earl of Strafford, Lord Lieutenant, was ' then a priſoner in the Tower, and the times trou- ' bleſome, yet there being a Head Governor, they did ' not proceed to an election, but took the ſame ' courſe as the Lord Chancellor choſe to take at this ' time. He referred his reaſons, and the precedent, ' to the Judges, Prime Serjeant, and Attorney and ' Solicitor General, who (one or two excepted) ' agreed, that the Chancellor ought not to iſſue ' writs. The Queen and the Lawyers of England ' applauded his conduct: but the Stateſmen diſliked ' it; becauſe it drove them to the neceſſity of diſ- ' placing the Duke of Ormond, which was the thing ' they would have avoided, having no deſign to pro- ' vide for him in England, in ſuch an honourable ' manner as was cuſtomary when perſons returned ' from that Government with merit.

' This was the moſt critical juncture of the Chan- ' cellor's life: for his judgment, his courage, and ' his integrity, were all put to a trial. His judg- ' ment was at firſt a little ſhaken by the univerſality ' of the opinions againſt him; but the precedent ' being found, and many of the loudeſt againſt him ' being convinced, his judgment was confirmed and ' eſteemed. His courage was attacked by threats of ' an impeachment; but his integrity ſupported his ' courage, and both eaſily prevailed on him to de- ' ſpiſe the vain boaſtings of his enemies. The buſi- ' neſs being at length laid before the Attorney-gene- ' ral of England, he prepared a letter for the Lords ' Juſtices, purſuant to the practice on the Death of ' Lord Deputy Wandesford; a Patent paſſed accord- ' ingly; and on the 15th of February, 1706, the ' Primate and Chancellor were ſworn Lords Juſtices ' in leſs than three weeks from Lord Cutts's death ' (17).'

(17) Hiſtory of the Writers of Ireland, ubi ſupra, p. 223, 224.

The conduct of Sir Richard Cox in this buſineſs gave, however, conſiderable offence to the Iriſh Houſe of Commons. Accordingly they reſolved, " That " on the death, ſurrender, or departure of a Lieute- " nant, Deputy, Juſtice, or other Head Governor of " the Realm, ſo that the Kingdom becomes deſtitute of a " Governor thereby, it is the indiſpenſible duty of the " Lord Chancellor, or Keeper of the Great Seal, to " iſſue writs for the electing a new Governor, or " Governors, purſuant to the Stat. 32 Hen. VIII." Mr. Harris obſerves, ' that the reſolution was pro- ' poſed without theſe words, So that the Kingdom be- ' comes deſtitute of a Governor thereby. But Sir ' Richard Cox's friends inſiſted on theſe words as an ' amendment to the queſtion, and to make it conſo- ' nant to the Act of Parliament; and, indeed, the ' amendment was ſo obvious, and agreeable to law ' and reaſon, that it could not be refuſed. But it ' quite diſconcerted the ſcheme for that time. How- ' ever, enough was not yet done; and, therefore, ' within a few days, the ſubject was reſumed; and ' then they reſolved, " 1. That by the death of the " Lord Cutts, on the 26th of January, the king- " dom became deſtitute of a Governor reſiding in " the ſame, till the 15th of February following. 2. " That no writ was iſſued by Sir Richard Cox, Lord " Chancellor, for electing a Juſtice, purſuant to the " Statute of 33 Hen. VIII. from the 26th of Janu- " ary till the 15th of February, 1706, at which time " the Primate and Lord Chancellor were conſtituted " Lords Juſtices under the Great Seal. 3. That it " was and is the indiſpenſible duty of the Lord " Chancellor, or Lord Keeper, when the kingdom is " deſtitute of a Lieutenant, Deputy, or other Chief " Governor reſiding within this kingdom, immedi- " ately to iſſue writs to ſummon the Privy Counſel- " lors to elect a Chief Governor, purſuant to the " Statute of 33 Hen. VIII." The reſolution of the ' firſt day was approved of, by the moſt eminent ' Lawyers, as a fair conſtruction of the Statute. But ' the work of the laſt day was done againſt precedent, ' and againſt the opinions of the Attorney and Soli- ' citor-general of England, and ten of the Judges ' and moſt eminent Lawyers in Ireland: ſo that Sir ' Richard ſuffered by it neither in fortune nor repu- ' tation; rather indeed he gained credit by what he ' had done. For from thence it appeared, that in- ' clination and induſtry were not wanting to detect ' ſome miſbehaviour in his judicial capacity, or ſome ' miſcarriage in his conduct as Lord Juſtice; neither ' of which being done, it was concluded none ſuch ' could be found out (18).'

(18) Ibid. p. 225.

When

When the Iriſh Parliament broke up, Sir Richard Cox went over into England, and was very favourably received at Court. After his return to Ireland, he ſpent his time chiefly in retirement, in the cultivation of his mind, in the converſation of his family and friends, and in adorning and improving his eſtate (r). He was much addicted to the ſtudy of divinity, and at this period particularly applied himſelf to the peruſal of a variety of eccleſiaſtical writers, of different ages and denominations. In 1709, he publiſhed at Dublin, in 12*mo*. "An Addreſs to thoſe of the Roman Communion in England, occa-"ſioned by the late Act of Parliament to prevent the Growth of Popery, recommended "to thoſe of the Roman Communion in Ireland upon a late like Occaſion." The following year he went again into England, and publiſhed at London, in 1711, in 8*vo*. "An "Enquiry into Religion, and the Uſe of Reaſon in Reference to it." About this time he was offered by the Miniſtry the poſt of Lord Chief Juſtice of the Court of Queen's Bench; an offer which, it is ſuppoſed, they did not expect him to accept; as they did not imagine that he would take an office inferior to what he had formerly enjoyed (s). He did not, however, ſtand upon that punctilio; but accepted the office, and immediately entered upon the duties of it. Party animoſity at that time ſo much prevailed, that he ſoon found his ſituation attended with little tranquillity. He acted in a treble capacity, in the Queen's Bench, in the Privy Council, and as Judge of Aſſize; in each of which he was often obliged to give judgment between the contending parties [L]: in the Queen's Bench, and as Judge of Aſſize, in criminal proſecutions; and in the Council, in ſtruggling for intereſts in Corporations (t). On the death of Queen Anne, and the acceſſion of King George the Firſt, Sir Richard Cox, with the other principal Iriſh Judges, was removed from his office, and alſo from the Privy Council [M]. He then retired to his ſeat in the county of Cork, where he hoped to have ended his days in peace; but his tranquillity was diſturbed by ſeveral attacks which were made againſt him in the Iriſh Parliament. On the 18th of November, 1715, it was ordered by the Houſe of Commons, "That Sir Richard "Cox ſhould attend that day fortnight, to give an account what proceedings were had "againſt Jacob Twiſleton, who had been a ſervant to the Pretender; and by Order of "the Houſe, in 1713, was delivered to the Lord Chief Juſtice." As he was at the diſtance of an hundred miles from Dublin, at the time when this Order was made, he wrote to the Speaker, and requeſted, "That on the account of his age, (which was then ſixty-five), "the badneſs of the roads, and the ſhortneſs of the days, and in conſideration that he "could ſay little more about Twiſleton, than the Officers of the Court might inform the "Houſe, the Order might be adjourned to the 5th of December." This was accordingly complied with; and at the time appointed, Sir Richard appeared before a Committee of the whole Houſe, and ſufficiently cleared himſelf with reſpect to the caſe of Jacob Twiſleton, which was found, upon examination, to be a very trifling buſineſs [N]. But about the (r) Harris, ubi ſupra, p. 226.

(s) Id. ibid.

(t) Ibid. p. 227.

[L] Often obliged to give judgment between the contending parties.] Mr. Harris ſays, 'That every 'where his conſcience and his judgment were the 'directors of his actions, and conſequently each party 'in its turn had the benefit of his juſtice. But theſe 'conſiderations little availed him: for each grudged 'the right done to the other, which was deemed in-'juſtice to itſelf. It was no time for cool reaſoning; 'and ſo he became ſuſpected by the violent men of 'that party, and of which he was reputed one, and 'hated by the furious men of the other. A better 'teſtimony could not be given of his moderation. 'But he had the comfort to be much in the eſteem of 'the Duke of Shrewſbury, who was Lord Lieutenant 'for the greater part of thoſe mad times, and who 'was known to be a Nobleman of great integrity, 'candour, and good nature (19).'

(19) Hiſtory of the Writers of Ireland, ubi ſupra, p. 227.

[M] Removed from his office, and alſo from the Privy Council.] The removal of Sir Richard Cox, and the other Judges, from their offices, and from the Privy Council, ſeems to have been chiefly occaſioned by their refuſal, in conjunction with the other Members of the Privy Council, to comply with the directions of the Lords Juſtices of Great Britain, reſpecting the election of Magiſtrates for the city of Dublin. Great conteſts having ariſen concerning the election of Lord Mayor for the city of Dublin, the Britiſh Regency, after the death of Queen Anne, in order to put an end to theſe conteſts, directed the Iriſh Privy Council "to approve of the perſon elected (for Lord Mayor) "without entering into the merits of the election." Upon this occaſion, Sir Richard Cox made a Speech, in which, among other things, he ſaid, "That as to "the qualifications of the party the Council was mi-"niſterial, and ought in obedience to the Lords "Regents to approve of any perſon, who ſhould be "lawfully elected. But as to the legality of elec-"tion, the Council acted in a judicial capacity, and "could not approve of any election tha twas unlaw-"ful (20)." In October, 1714, new Lords Juſtices having been appointed for the Government of Ireland, the Archbiſhop of Dublin, who was one of them, demanded of the Privy Council, "Whether they "would without difficulty, or entering into any "conſideration of the merits of the election of Ma "giſtrates for the city of Dublin, approve the per-"ſon who ſhould be returned for Lord Mayor by "the majority of the Board of Aldermen, purſuant "to the directions of the Lords Juſtices of Great "Britain." To which the Privy Council unanimouſly anſwered, "That they ſhould always pay a "due regard to the Lords Juſtices of Great Britain; "but that they were not then ripe to give their opi-"nion, unleſs an election of Magiſtrates ſhould be "certified and brought before them." Upon this anſwer the Council was diſſolved, and the Judges diſplaced (21).

(20) Ibid. p. 244.

(21) Ibid. p. 245.

[N] The Caſe of Jacob Twiſleton, which was found, upon examination, to be a very trifling buſineſs.] Mr. Harris informs us, that 'Twiſleton was a noted good 'trumpeter, and had travelled through moſt parts of 'Europe for his profit. His fame was ſo great, that 'all perſons were deſirous to hear him. At ſome 'place abroad, he was hired to ſound the trumpet 'before the Pretender, and afterwards came to Ire-'land, and ſounded for hire before Sir Conſtantine 'Phipps (22).' Twiſleton was brought before Sir Richard Cox, as a ſervant of the Pretender, in purſuance of an Order of the Houſe of Commons, of the 12th of December, 1713. He committed him to Newgate, upon an information of a Member of the Houſe; and Twiſleton remained there till the latter end of the following term. He was then bailed, according to the cuſtom of the Court, for want of an indictment

(22) Ibid. p. 230.

the ſame time the following reſolutions were alſo paſſed by the Houſe of Commons: " I. That by the Laws of the Land, and by the conſtant uninterrupted uſage of the " Court of King's Bench, all Juries in criminal caſes ought to be nominated and returned " by the Sheriff, or Sheriffs only; unleſs there be a legal challenge to his or their making " ſuch return. II. That the Rule made in the Court of Queen's Bench, in the caſe of " Dudley Moore, Eſq[O]; whereby the Clerk of the Crown was ordered to ſtrike a Jury " for his Trial, was unprecedented, arbitrary, and illegal, and an high invaſion of the " Rights and Liberties of the Subjects of Ireland. III. That Sir Richard Cox, late Lord " Chief Juſtice of the ſaid Court, by making ſuch Rule, acted partially, arbitrarily, illegally, and contrary to his oath and duty of a Judge." The ſame reſolution was paſſed againſt each of the other Judges of that Court (u). It muſt be confeſſed, that in the affair to which theſe votes refer, Sir Richard Cox, and his brother Judges, appear to have been influenced by that partiality in favour of the crown, by which other Judges have too frequently been actuated: but in their conduct in this reſpect they were countenanced by the conduct and opinions of Engliſh Judges and Crown Lawyers. In June, 1716, ſeveral votes were alſo paſſed, by the Houſe of Commons, againſt Sir Richard Cox, and the other Judges, cenſuring their conduct and determinations reſpecting the election of Lord Mayor of the city of Dublin [P]. It was reſolved, that " they had acted partially and corruptly;" and indictment againſt him, which the information could not ſupport, and was continued on his bail until Trinity Term, 1714 (23).

(u) Harris, ubi ſupra, p. 228.

(23) Hiſtory of the Writers of Ireland, ubi ſupra, p. 230.

[O] The Caſe of Dudley Moore, Eſq.] The Caſe of Mr. Moore was this. The Government had forbidden a Prologue to be ſpoken at the Theatre on the 4th of November, 1712, to the Play of Tamerlane. Mr. Moore, ſupported by ten or twelve Gentlemen, repeated one on the ſtage in ſpite of the actors. The perſons in Adminiſtration, conſidering this action as a deſigned affront to themſelves, ordered Mr. Moore, and his companions, to be proſecuted for a riot. They were accordingly indicted in the Court of Queen's Bench. But the Queen commanded, that the proſecution ſhould ceaſe againſt all but Mr. Moore. Sir Richard Cox thought the offence ſo ſlight, that he diſcharged Mr. Moore's bail, and took his own recognizance for his appearance, on which he was never called. Upon Mr. Moore's pleading, and entering into a recognizance to proſecute his traverſe, the Attorney-general moved, " That the partiality of Juries returned by Sheriffs " having appeared lately in many inſtances, the " Court would be pleaſed to order their Officer to " ſtrike an indifferent Jury out of the Book of Freeholders to be returned by the Sheriffs, to try the " iſſue between the Queen and Traverſer, as was " conſtantly done in England in like caſes." This motion was oppoſed, and learnedly argued on both ſides. The Court took time to conſider, and procured in the mean time certificates of the practice of the Queen's Bench in England, and conſulted the reſt of the Judges of Ireland, who ſolemnly delivered their opinions in favour of the motion. And then, being preſſed by Mr. Moore's Council at three ſeveral times to give judgment, at laſt gave it in favour of the Queen, for ſeveral reaſons, among which were the following:

I. ' Becauſe the Common Law of England and ' Ireland is the ſame, and is preſerved in Ireland by ' the juriſdiction which the Court of Queen's Bench ' in England hath over that Court in Ireland: and, ' for this reaſon, the Queen's Bench in Ireland is ' always governed by the practice and authorities of ' the Queen's Bench in England. For if the judg- ' ments of Ireland differed from thoſe in England, ' they would be ſet aſide as erroneous.

II. ' This has been the conſtant practice of the ' Queen's Bench in England for one hundred years ' paſt. In the reigns of Queen Elizabeth, King ' James the Firſt, Charles the Firſt and Second, James ' the Second, and King William the Third. It was ' done in the trial of the Seven Biſhops, and never ' was complained of or mentioned in the Bill of ' Rights; as it would certainly have been, if it had ' been thought either illegal, or a grievance (24).'

(24) Ibid. p. 228.

[P] Reſpecting the Election of Lord Mayor of the city of Dublin.] Mr. Crawford ſays, ' One of the ' many diſputes, occaſioned by the party ſpirit which ' became every day more violent in both kingdoms, ' was that which aroſe in Dublin, in 1713, relative ' to the election of a Lord Mayor. That office was ' then filled by Sir Samuel Cooke, whoſe principles ' were hoſtile to the Revolution. In his abſence, ' the Aldermen elected Mr. Pleaſants, a Whig, as ' his ſucceſſor. By certain late regulations, calculated to promote the intereſt of the Tory party, the ' Lord Mayor had been inveſted with a right to nominate three Aldermen, one of whom, unleſs to ' them all reaſonable objections could be made, muſt ' be choſen to ſucceed him. Sir Samuel would not ' acquieſce in the election, which, upon the matter ' being referred to their determination, was ſet aſide ' by the Privy Council. The Aldermen then were ' ſummoned by the Lord Mayor, to make a new ' choice. To one of the three, whom he propoſed ' to their conſideration,—twenty of them objected. ' Before any thing could be determined, the Court ' was diſmiſſed. This conteſt communicating to the ' friends and the connexions of the oppoſite parties, ' threw the city into a flame, which was attended by ' the greateſt diſorder and confuſion, and continued ' to the death of the Queen. It was raging when ' the Duke of Shrewſbury arrived to take upon him ' the Government of Ireland (25).'

(25) Hiſtory of Ireland, vol. iii. p. 262, 263.

Of the diſputes and proceedings concerning the election of Lord Mayor of the city of Dublin, a very copious account is given by Mr. Harris, in his Continuation of Sir James Ware's Hiſtory of the Writers of Ireland (26); but it is extended to ſo great a length, that it would probably be thought extremely dull and unintereſting by moſt of our Readers. We ſhall, therefore, only mention a few particulars relative to this ſubject. It appears, that by a Charter granted in the reign of King Henry the Third, the Citizens of Dublin had a right to chooſe their own Mayor; but by an Act made in the reign of King Charles II. the Lord Lieutenant, or other Chief Governor or Governors, and Council of Ireland, had power given them " to make Rules for the " electing Magiſtrates, and other Officers, and for " inflicting ſuch penalties for the breach thereof, as " they in their wiſdom ſhould think fit;" and it was farther enacted, that theſe " rules, when made, ſhould " be as good and effectual in law, as if the ſame had " been eſtabliſhed by Parliament." By this Act the Citizens of Dublin were deprived of their right of electing their Chief Magiſtrate; for one of the new Rules which were made for that city was, " That " the election of Lord Mayor, Sheriffs, &c. ſhall be " by Lord Mayor and Aldermen only, eight " Aldermen being always preſent." Another Rule was, " That the names of Lord Mayor, and Sheriffs, " &c. elected, ſhall be by the Corporation preſented " within ten days after election to the Lord Lieute- " nant, or other Chief Governors, and the Council, " to be approved by them, and the perſons elected " ſhall be incapable to ſerve until approved of under " their hands; and if not approved of in ten days " after they are preſented, the Corporation ſhall pro- " ceed

(26) P. 230—244.

and been "guilty of high crimes and misdemeanours:" and it was also voted, "That the "removing the Lord Primate, and Sir Constantine Phipps from the Government of that "kingdom, the dissolving the late Privy Council, and displacing the late Judges and "Queen's Council, was a seasonable instance of his Majesty's justice, and tender regard "for the welfare and happiness of that kingdom (w)." It was likewise resolved by the House of Commons, in the same Session, "That an humble Address be presented to their "Excellencies the Lords Justices, desiring their Excellencies to lay before his Majesty the "humble Request of this House, that the original Representation of the late Privy Council "in the Case of the City of Dublin, and the Report of the late Judges [Q]; and also the "farther Report of the late Judges and Queen's Council, in the Case of the Aldermen and "Sheriffs of Dublin, transmitted to her late Majesty, may be returned to this Kingdom, "to be given in Evidence against the Persons who made the same, when this House shall "have the Opportunity to proceed against them for the High Crimes and Misdemean-"ours, of which this House hath voted them guilty (x)."

(w) Harris, ubi supra, p. 231, 232.

(x) Ibid. p. 243.

These votes were not followed by any farther proceedings against Sir Richard Cox, or the other Judges. Their conduct in the affair of the election of Lord Mayor of the city of Dublin appears to have been censurable; but the votes against them were carried with too much heat and violence. Insinuations were thrown out against Sir Richard Cox, in the Irish Parliament, as if he had been attached to the interest of the Pretender; but these insinuations seem to have been totally destitute of the least foundation. He had taken that side, in the business relative to the election of the Magistrates of Dublin, which was considered as the Tory side; but as he was eminently active and zealous in the promotion of the Revolution, so he appears to have been a firm friend to the Protestant succession in the House of Hanover. After his removal from office, he passed his time chiefly in retirement. He divided his latter days between study, making improvements on his estate, and acts of benevolence. But in April, 1733, he was seized by a fit of apoplexy, which ended in a palsy, under which he languished till the 3d of May that year, when he expired, without pain, at the age of eighty three years, one month, and a few days (y).

(y) Ibid. p. 248.

Sir Richard Cox was in his person tall, and well-proportioned; his features were regular, and his complexion fair; his countenance was agreeable, his eyes full and lively, and his carriage easy and graceful. His private life was virtuous, and he was regular and exact in his attendance on the duties of religion. He was an affectionate husband, a tender parent, a sincere friend, and a kind master to his domestics (z). His memory was very retentive, and he applied himself much to the studies of History and Geography, in both of which his knowledge was extensive. He was also well read in Divinity, and had a strong inclination to Poetry, in which he made some attempts, but was dissuaded from any farther efforts of that kind [R]. In his freer hours, he was a chearful and entertaining companion, and in his general behaviour he was affable and courteous. As a Judge, he was patient and attentive, and diligent in the discharge of the duties of his office. He was considered as a very able Chancellor, and his decrees were seldom reversed. Mr. Harris says, that "if he had lived in quiet times, he would have been "revered by all his contemporaries for his moderation and integrity (a)." He appears, however, to have been too complaisant a Courtier, and too ready to concur in the measures of Government, without sufficiently inquiring into the rectitude of those measures. In judging of some parts of his conduct, allowance should, indeed, be made, for the critical state of Ireland at that period, and the effects which had been produced upon men's minds, by the barbarities and murders that had been committed by the Papists. The massacre of Ireland, and other Popish cruelties, were then fresh in the minds of men; and the Roman Catholics were not considered as objects either of justice or humanity. Too much injustice had undoubtedly been committed on both sides; but, in judging of the (z) Ibid. p. 252.

(a) Id. ibid.

"ceed to a new election, and shall in like manner "present the names, until they shall choose persons "who shall be approved of (27)."

(27) Harris, ubi supra, p. 232, 233.

The Act by which these Rules were enforced, passed in the reign of Charles II. was only a temporary Act, and yet the rules were continued to be acted upon as if they were perpetual. The citizens at large were deprived of their right of election, and even the Aldermen were not allowed a free election. Sir Samuel Cooke was continued two years in office, without being elected for the second year even by the Aldermen; but he was agreeable to the then Administration, and was, therefore, arbitrarily continued in office. In the part which was taken by Sir Richard Cox, and the other Judges, in this business, there was too manifest a partiality in favour of the Administration; and not that attention, which there ought to have been, to the rights of the Citizens of Dublin.

[Q] The Report of the late Judges.] Complaint was made, that the Report of Sir Richard Cox, and the other Irish Judges, which was transmitted to England, relative to the Election of Lord Mayor for the city of Dublin, contained a false statement of the case, and was calculated to deceive the Queen and her Ministers; and, indeed, the Report appears to have been by no means fair and impartial.

[R] Was dissuaded from any farther efforts of that kind.] Mr. Harris says, 'He had a strong bent to 'Poetry, which appeared in a piece, much approved, "On General Ginkle's success in Ireland," and of "which he printed but a few copies; and in another "On the death of Lord Chancellor Porter." But 'the last being transmitted to his friend Sir Robert 'Southwell, he wrote to him, "That poetry was "not the way to preferment, but a weed in a Judge's "garden." This kind rebuke checked his poetical 'progress, and turned him to more serious and more 'useful studies (28).']

(28) Ibid. p. 251.

perſons and characters of that age, ſome attention muſt be paid to the ſentiments and views by which different parties were at that time actuated. As an Hiſtorian, Sir Richard Cox is entitled to more applauſe for the aſſiduity of his reſearches into the Hiſtory of Ireland, than for any merit in his arrangement or compoſition. He was the author of thoſe Remarks upon Ireland, which were printed in Biſhop Gibſon's Tranſlation of Camden's Britannia, edit. 1695. Of many children, only one ſon and one daughter ſurvived him; but he had many grand-children, and great grand-children. His eldeſt ſon, Richard, died in 1725; but his ſecond ſon, Michael, became Biſhop of Oſſory. One of his daughters was married to Sir William Manſel, Bart (b).] T.

(b) Harris, ubi ſupra, p. 248.

 [CRAIG (WILLIAM), (*) an excellent Divine of the Church of Scotland, was the ſon of a reſpectable Merchant in Glaſgow. He was born there in February 1709: and in the Seminaries of education in that city, he began and proſecuted his ſtudies. At College he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his early taſte and uncommon proficiency in claſſical learning; and in applying to this ſort of literature, he received great aſſiſtance and encouragement from his kinſman the Reverend Mr. Clerk, Miniſter of the Goſpel at Neilſton in Renfrewſhire. That deſerving young man, who died at an early period of his life, and before his worth became ſufficiently known, was one of the firſt Clergymen in the Weſt of Scotland, who began to ſtudy and teach Chriſtianity in a manner different from that uſually practiſed ſince the Reformation; and who thought the intereſts of true religion could be promoted by ſuch elegance of compoſition, and knowledge of Philoſophy, as might be derived from ancient Authors. To ſtudies of this ſort, therefore, the excellent perſon who is the ſubject of this memoir, incited by his own original inclination, and aſſiſted by his ingenious friend, was very early attached. The moral Philoſophy of the antients engaged his attention in a very particular manner: and the moral writers of Greece and Rome were his favourite authors. By the attentive peruſal of their works, and of the moral Poets of Antiquity, he had committed to his memory a great number of their moſt ſtriking paſſages; and uſed to apply them occaſionally in the company of his ſelect friends with great eaſe, judgment, and ingenuity. In this he had an excellent example in the practice of his friend and inſtructor the juſtly celebrated Doctor Hutcheſon, who was elected to the Profeſſorſhip of moral Philoſophy, in the Univerſity of Glaſgow, about the time that Craig had nearly finiſhed his theological and philoſophical courſe. With this amiable and eminent Philoſopher he was early and intimately connected. Hutcheſon diſcerned in him that character which he eſteemed: and he expreſſed his regard by aſſociating with him, by entering into, and aſſiſting him in his literary labours. Early inclined by temper and diſpoſition to the ſtudy and profeſſion of Theology, Craig derived every advantage from the converſation of a friend ſo highly enlightened; and whom he regarded with juſt and affectionate deference. Commencing Preacher in the year 1734, his philoſophical Monitor embraced every opportunity of hearing him; and with a frankneſs which ſhewed the opinion he entertained of the candour and abilities of his diſciple, he offered ſuch remarks on his Sermons as he thought neceſſary. He particularly admoniſhed him againſt a propenſity to which young Clergymen of ability are very liable, of indulging themſelves in abſtruſe and philoſophical diſquiſition. He adviſed him, becauſe he knew he was able to follow the advice, "to preach to and from the heart." He did ſo. Habitually pious, ardently devout, and deeply intereſted in the welfare of thoſe who liſtened to his inſtruction, he delivered himſelf with genuine and becoming earneſtneſs. This was the ſpirit that directed his manner. Loud exclamation, outrageous action, violence of look or geſture, were not the characters of his delivery. It was ſolemn, yet animated; earneſt, but correct; and though correct, not formal. He arreſted the attention without alarming the imagination: he touched the heart without rouſing the paſſions. His manner was elegant, and he pleaſed: he ſpoke as he felt, and was affecting.

(*) Written and communicated by Mr. Richardſon, Profeſſor of Humanity in the Univerſity of Glaſgow.

It is not to be ſuppoſed that a Preacher of ſuch eminence, eſpecially at a time when this mode of preaching was rare, ſhould remain unknown or unnoticed. He ſoon received a preſentation from Mr. Lockhart, of Cambuſnethan, to be Miniſter of the pariſh of Cambuſnethan; and was ſettled in that charge in the year 1737. About this time great oppoſition was made by the populace of Scotland, and particularly by thoſe of Clydeſdale, to the manner of appointing Miniſters by preſentations from Lay-Patrons. On this account, therefore, and perhaps, becauſe his Sermons inculcated active virtue more frequently, and more earneſtly, than his audience, who would have been better pleaſed with obſcure and myſtical theology, thought neceſſary, he encountered conſiderable oppoſition. Zealous, however, in the diſcharge of his duty, and hoping, in the conſcious ardour of his endeavours, to reconcile his pariſhioners to that ſyſtem of inſtruction which he thought beſt ſuited to their condition, and moſt conſiſtent with Chriſtianity, he refuſed a preſentation to a Church in Airſhire, offered him by Mr. Montgomery of Coilsfield; and another offered him by the amiable but unfortunate Earl of Kilmarnock. At length, he accepted of a preſentation to a Church in Glaſgow, the place of his nativity, where moſt of his relations reſided; where he could have opportunities of converſing with his literary friends; and where the field for doing good was more extenſive. He was firſt appointed Miniſter of the the Wynd Church in that city: and after the building of St. Andrew's Church, one of the moſt elegant places of public worſhip in Scotland, he was removed thither. His audience was at no time ſo numerous, but eſpecially during the laſt twenty-five years of his life, as thoſe who valued good compoſition and liberality of ſentiment, apprehended that he deſerved. Inſtead of the abſtruſe tenets of ſpeculative theology, and the myſterious doctrines inculcated by many popular Clergymen in the Church of Scotland, he thought his flock would be better edified by ſuch a plain expoſition of their duty, as was laid down in the precepts and example of Jeſus Chriſt; and by ſuch a direct, but judicious application to themſelves, as in their ſituation ſeemed requiſite. "A Miniſter of the Goſpel," he tells us, in his excellent Sermon on the character and obligations of a Miniſter, "will, with "unvariable conſtancy and fortitude, declare unto his people the whole counſel of God. "He will faithfully and fairly ſet before them the whole extent of their religious and moral "obligations, and with all that minuteneſs and detail with which they are delivered in "the Sacred Scriptures, and which he ſees the circumſtances of his people may require. "No averſion which their ignorance, their prejudice, or ſinful paſſions, may ſuggeſt on "this account, no unpopular injurious epithets that may be given him as a legal or a "moral Preacher, will prevail upon him either to conceal or to diſguiſe any part of that "divine religion, upon which, with the deepeſt earneſtneſs, he founds the proſpect of his "own ſalvation. He will ſearch, with all the diligence and candour that he can, the "Holy Bible; look for genuine religion there; and from thence, rather than from any "human ſyſtem upon earth, learn what he is to teach as a Miniſter of Chriſt."—But this mode of inſtruction has never been very faſhionable. Not much reliſhed in Galilee and Jeruſalem, when practiſed by one "who ſpake as never man ſpake," it was not likely to become more popular in Clydeſdale and the city of Glaſgow. But though Craig might regret, what ſeemed to him the miſguided or miſtaken ſentiments of many who profeſſed themſelves Chriſtians; yet ſtedfaſt in his own opinions, founded on mature reflection, and unmoved by the undiſcriminating praiſe or blame of the multitude, he ſtill perſiſted in the delivery of ſuch doctrines as his reaſon convinced him were moſt eſſential to the real improvement and eternal welfare of his hearers. As his Church was not much frequented by the vulgar, neither was it very generally reſorted to by thoſe exalted by their opulence to a higher rank. Early and conſtantly engaged in commercial purſuits, they did not give much attention to ſuch diſtinctions in doctrine or compoſition, as would otherwiſe have induced them, perhaps, to have given a preference to thoſe of Craig. But though he diſdained every unworthy art to captivate popular applauſe, he was ſo ſincerely attached to thoſe who ſeemed to profit by his inſtruction, that he declined the propoſals of Provoſt Alexander, and ſome of his friends in Edinburgh, who wiſhed at one time to have removed him thither. He had the ſatisfaction alſo of knowing, that in another quarter, perſons whoſe opinion he valued, were not inſenſible to his merits. He was propoſed by his friends to be the ſucceſſor of Profeſſor Potter, in the Profeſſorſhip of Divinity in the Univerſity of Glaſgow. Doctor Leechman, lately Principal in that Univerſity, then Miniſter of the Goſpel at Beith; and the Reverend Mr. M'Laurin, brother to the celebrated Mathematician, were alſo candidates. Leechman and Craig were united in the cloſeſt friendſhip: their religious ſentiments were ſimilar, and alike obnoxious to the popular Clergy. M'Laurin was a man of worth and ſincere piety; he was believed to entertain religious opinions of a kind very agreeable to the multitude: and if both the other two had continued candidates, he would probably have ſucceeded. But Craig, apprehending that the intereſts of religion would be better ſerved by the appointment of Leechman, and influenced perhaps by the intimacy ſubſiſting between them, prevailed with his friends to transfer their voices to him, and withdrew from the conteſt. Accordingly, by the caſting vote of George Bogle, Eſq; of Daldowie, then Lord Rector of the Univerſity, a man of unblemiſhed integrity and real zeal for the public good, Dr. Leechman was choſen. How much this meaſure contributed to promote the intereſts of religion, learning and claſſical taſte, among the Students in that Seminary, is very generally known, and will be long remembered.—In truth, though Craig's early attention to good compoſition, and to what was accounted liberality of opinion in religious matters, ſhewed a turn of mind a good deal different from the ſpirit and improvement of the times, he was not altogether ſingular. Clerk, Miniſter of the Goſpel at Neilſton, Paton at Renfrew, Fleming at Kilmacolm, Warner at Kilbarchen, Dr. Wiſhart, his Predeceſſor in the Wynd Church, and Dr. Leechman, his contemporaries or intimate friends, were eminent promoters of true learning, correct taſte, and ſuch views of religion, as ſeemed to them more agreeable to the original form of Chriſtianity, than thoſe uſually recommended by many popular Preſbyterian Preachers.

Craig was married about this time to the daughter of Mr. Anderſon, a conſiderable Merchant in Glaſgow. She lived with him ſixteen years; and by her he had ſeveral children: two of whom, namely William, an eminent Lawyer at the Scottiſh Bar; and John, a Merchant in Glaſgow, ſurvived their father. But the excellent underſtanding and amiable diſpoſitions of his wife, which rendered his married ſtate happy, contributed, by their painful recollection, to embitter the ſufferings of his declining age. She died in the the year 1758: and though he was afterwards very happily married to the daughter of Gilbert Kenedy, Esq; of Auchtifardale, he scarcely ever recovered the shock of his first separation. Several years before he died, his strength and health gradually declined: his spirits were overwhelmed with melancholy: he seemed to have lost the power of enjoying happiness: no amusement could relieve his depression: he lamented that he was become useless; and that he felt not only his body, but the faculties of his soul impaired. His sufferings were heightened by many additional afflictions; particularly by the death of his son Alexander, a very agreeable young man, who had been bred a Merchant, but who was strongly inclined to the study of polite literature: and soon after by the death of his second wife, whose affectionate assiduities had been invariably employed in endeavouring to solace and support his infirmities. In this state of feebleness and dejection, notwithstanding the unwearied attention of his surviving sons, he continued to languish: and, at length, in the seventy-fifth year of his age, he was released by an easy death.—Great sensibility seems to have given the general and prevailing colour to his character. It rendered his piety devout, his benevolence tender, and his friendship affectionate. In the culture of his understanding it inclined him to those studies that please by their beautiful imagery, or touch the heart with agreeable feelings. He was, therefore, very early addicted to classical learning; and cherished those views of religion that represent both God and man in a favourable light. Such sentiments and propensities, though not altogether singular at the time that he commenced his studies, were however so rare among Students of Theology, that speaking figuratively, we may call them singular. But singularity of disposition or opinion is usually disliked or opposed. The man of fortitude and strong nerves encounters the opposition; and either makes converts, or, by a bold authoritative tone, though he does not conciliate affection, imposes respect. But the man of extreme sensibility, yielding to his native biass, is afraid of the struggle, declines the contest, and, excepting in the retirements of confidential friendship, not only appears, but really becomes shy and reserved. This disposition is nearly allied to modesty, and even humbleness of mind; yet the appearance of distance it so often assumes, is misapprehended by the undiscerning multitude; and by a violent misapplication of terms, is misconstrued pride. Effects almost of an opposite appearance, are produced by the same principle, yet tend in their final issue to confirm this mistaken reserve. The man of sensibility, conscious of powers, exerts them; and conscious of his own candour, expects suitable returns. He is disappointed. The observation of men is otherwise engaged: accidental circumstances, and other causes than such as arise from perversion of mind, carry away their attention from the merit that claims and deserves their notice. Of these the man of shy and retired sensibility is not aware; he becomes still more cautious in his intercourse with mankind; more shy and more retired. But Craig, under the sacred shade, and in the retirements of intimate and confidential friendship, was unreserved, open, and even ardent. The spirit of real enjoyment, with which in his better days he engaged in literary and familiar conversation with his friends, displayed the most interesting view of his character. Conversations on the merits of elegant authors, both antient and modern, but above all, the liberal discussion of moral and religious topics, were the joy of his soul. On these occasions, his eyes, naturally animated, sparkled with additional lustre; his voice, naturally musical, became delightfully mellow; his features brightened, for his heart glowed. These were blessed intervals, anticipations perhaps of what he now enjoys. By degrees this glowing mood became tinged with melancholy: at first it was amiable and interesting; but became at last distressful. The sensibility which gave him such moments of rapture, had not perhaps been duly managed; and contributed to, or occasioned his sufferings. It had rendered him averse to indiscriminate society, and thus precluded him from many innocent means of relieving the lassitude, or alleviating the weight of declining age. It quickened his sense of misfortune, and rendered his affliction for the loss of friends too poignant. It overwhelmed him with too much sorrow if at any time he apprehended that the affection of those, in whose love he trusted, had suffered change. The errors and delusions, as he conceived, into which many believers in Christianity had fallen, gave him the anxious solicitude which a father feels for the apprehended failings of a darling child; and he regretted that many teachers of religion, to whom popularity gave extensive influence, seemed not sufficiently aware that these errors were full of danger. His sensibility too, especially after the publication of some celebrated works in favour of scepticism, was painfully affected by the progress, as he apprehended, of irreligion. His sense of Deity was strong and lively. Even though the dejection and the despondency of affliction might at times have brought a gloomy cloud between him and the radiance of heaven, the cloud was transient: his religious opinions, founded not merely on feeling but on conviction, were permanent: and even in the earlier periods of his life, when he was not so anxiously alarmed at the growth of impiety as afterwards, he often lamented that men of worth and integrity were not pious; and though they performed many charitable and disinterested actions from very laudable motives, yet that their conduct did not seem to be founded on any principles of religion. It might be friendship, it might be compassion, it might be benevolence, but it wanted "those aids, those supports and comforts which alone could "arise

" ariſe from hope and truſt in God." It is unneceſſary to ſay of ſuch a character, that he was juſt, charitable, and temperate. His virtues were thoſe of a Chriſtian; his failings were thoſe incident to the weakneſs of human nature; and his ſufferings were occaſioned, or much aggravated by his failings. It is conſiſtent with his own opinions to ſay, that if there is a region beyond the grave into which human weakneſs can have no admiſſion, where there is employment for every excellent talent, and objects for every worthy affection, he is ſupremely bleſſed.

To this account of his life I ſhall ſubjoin a ſhort account of his writings.—In the year 1761, he publiſhed at Glaſgow a Sermon on the " Reverence due to the name of God." His Sermon on the " Character and Obligations of a Miniſter of the Goſpel" was publiſhed in the year 1764. Previouſly to this publication he had the degree of Doctor in Divinity conferred upon him by the Univerſity of Glaſgow. In the year 1767 he publiſhed his Eſſay on the " Life of Jeſus Chriſt." This work met with great approbation; and its deſign may be ſeen in the following extract from the Preface. " The principal " deſign of the following Eſſay is to delineate the character of Jeſus Chriſt from the facts " recorded in the hiſtory of his life.—Many uſeful obſervations have been made by dif- " ferent writers on this ſubject; and the ſeveral virtues and perfections which appeared " in the life of Jeſus have been marked. But what theſe writers have obſerved gives us " rather a detail of ſcattered though beautiful particulars, than a ſingle and connected " view of the whole character at once. It would appear, however, from the records of " the Goſpel, that the character of Jeſus Chriſt was formed in every part of it upon the " influence of one great and leading principle; and that the whole tenor of his life pro- " ceeding from this influence was one united and conſiſtent thing. To give this ſimple " and united view is the deſign of what is offered in the ſecond and third Sections, &c." Two editions of this Eſſay were printed with great elegance, by the Foulis's at Glaſgow: and a French tranſlation appeared on the continent, ſoon after its firſt publication.—In the year 1775 " Twenty Diſcourſes on various Subjects, by William Craig, D.D." were publiſhed in London. Some of theſe Diſcourſes are practical and others ſpeculative. Of the practical, thoſe that are employed in delineating and drawing obſervations from Scripture characters, deſerve particular notice. Thoſe on the characters of Judas Iſcariot, and Pontius Pilate, are executed in a maſterly manner; and ſhew that the author's powers of obſervation were very conſiderable. Of the ſpeculative Diſcourſes, thoſe that diſcuſs the Scripture Doctrine of Regeneration demand the ſerious and deep attention of every one who would really underſtand this important doctrine. But though they require ſerious and deep attention, it is not on account of their being compoſed in a dry, abſtruſe, or metaphyſical manner. They are clear and obvious: they contain a natural and eaſy explanation of paſſages in the New Teſtament that treat of Regeneration: they are addreſſed with plainneſs and ſimplicity to the common ſenſe of mankind: and by a tranſition which affords a preſumption in favour of the Author's argument, they connect ſpeculation with practice.—The ſtile and compoſition of Dr. Craig's Eſſay and Diſcourſes, no leſs than the ſentiments, have been admired. They reſembled his manner. His excellent taſte, early formed by the peruſal of the beſt claſſical authors, preſerved him alike from the groveling, quaint, and verboſe jargon of mere illiterate, and from the trim ornaments, the ſtudied figures, and laboured imagery of mere artificial eloquence. If a figure or image preſented itſelf, ſuggeſted as all ſuch embelliſhments ought to be, by the preſent diſpoſition, he gave them admiſſion. He neither anxiouſly ſolicited, nor affectedly refuſed their aſſiſtance. Accordingly, as imagination was not his moſt powerful faculty, his images are not very frequent. He wiſhed alſo to be correct in the uſe of words, and the ſtructure of ſentences; but thought it unneceſſary to be very nicely correct. He did not think that ſuch attention ſuited the ſerious and ſolemn dignity of the pulpit. Nor at the time when he began to write, had the critics of language become faſtidious. Hence, perhaps, more careleſſneſs and inaccuracy of expreſſion may be diſcovered in his ſtile, than if he had begun to write at a later period. But the age that cenſures with ſeverity the ſtile of Hume and of Addiſon, will not be merciful to that of Craig. Perhaps the method, ſtructure, or what is properly the compoſition of his Diſcourſes, may appear leſs exceptionable than the expreſſion. They poſſeſs a great ſhare of that excellence which is conferred by unity of deſign, and perſpicuity of arrangement. The diviſions are natural; the parts are eaſily connected with one another; and the leading obſervations or propoſitions are often ſo ſtationed in regard to their importance or ingenuity, that by a delightful progreſs, they ſeem to riſe on the mind. But in order to point out more particularly our author's own opinion of pulpit eloquence, I will conclude this account with the following paſſages from his Sermon on the character of a Miniſter. " In the Diſcourſes of our bleſſed Lord, we meet with nothing of that laboured " eloquence which is the mark of human art, and tends rather to excite a vain applauſe " and admiration of the art itſelf, than a ſerious impreſſion of the things which it is de- " ſigned to repreſent.—On this account, a man of a diſcerning and unbiaſſed mind will " be able to perceive a mighty difference betwixt the Goſpel, as it lies before us in its " native and original ſimplicity, and thoſe deſcriptions that are given of it in the laboured " artificial forms into which it has been modelled by the hand of man; a difference not

" unlike to what is found in all the other works of God and man. The works of God " are ſolemn and majeſtic, and by their inexpreſſible grandeur and ſimplicity enlarge and " elevate the heart. The works of man, though modelled by the niceſt art and ſkill, are " but little and diminutive; and, however they may amuſe the fancy, ſeldom raiſe any " great or elevating emotions in the heart. For this reaſon it might at leaſt deſerve " inquiry, if it would not better ſerve the original intentions of the Goſpel, to repreſent it " to the world, as nearly as poſſible, in that artleſs and divine ſimplicity in which it was " delivered by its bleſſed Author."]

CRANMER (THOMAS), the moſt eminent Archbiſhop that ever ſat in the See of Canterbury, was the ſon of Thomas Cranmer, Eſq [A]; and of Agnes daughter of Laurence Hatfield of Willoughby in Nottinghamſhire (a). He was born at (*) Aſlacton in that county, July 2, 1489 (b), and educated in Grammar-learning under a rude and ſevere Pariſh-Clerk, of whom he learned little, and endured much (c). In 1503, at the age of fourteen, he was admitted into Jeſus College in Cambridge, of which he became Fellow (d). Here he ſtudied the Sophiſtry, and uſeleſs learning of thoſe times, till the age of twenty-two. For the next four or five years he applied himſelf to polite Literature; and for three years more, to the ſtudy of the Scriptures (e). After he was Maſter of Arts, he married a Gentleman's daughter, named Joan (f), living at the Dolphin, oppoſite Jeſus-Lane (g). Loſing by that his Fellowſhip, he went and lived with her at the Dolphin, and became Reader of the common Lecture in Buckingham, now Magdalen, College (h). But his wife dying in child-bed within a year, he was again admitted Fellow of Jeſus College (i). Upon Cardinal Wolſey's foundation of his new College at Oxford, Cranmer was nominated to be one of the Fellows; but he refuſed the offer (k). In 1523, and the 34th year of his age, he was made Doctor of Divinity, Reader of the Theological Lecture in his own College, and one of the Examiners of thoſe that took the degrees in Divinity (l). The moſt immediate cauſe of his advancement to the greateſt favour with King Henry VIII. and, in conſequence of that, to the higheſt dignity in the Church of England, was the Opinion he gave in the matter of that King's Divorce. For having, on account of the plague at Cambridge, retired to Waltham-Abbey in Eſſex, at the houſe of one Mr. Creſſy, whoſe wife he was related to, and whoſe ſons were his pupils at the Univerſity; Edward Fox the King's Almoner, and Stephen Gardiner the Secretary, happened accidentally to come to that houſe (m). Here, the converſation turning upon what then moſtly employed the Nation's thoughts, namely, the King's Divorce; Cranmer, who was well known to the two others, being deſired by them to ſpeak upon that point, delivered it as his opinion, that 'it would be much better, to have this queſtion, Whether a man may marry his brother's wife, or no? decided and diſcuſſed by the Divines, and by the authority 'of the word of God, than thus from year to year to prolong the time by having recourſe 'to the Pope: that there was but one truth in it, which the Scripture would ſoon declare 'and manifeſt, being handled by learned men; and that might be done as well in England 'in the Univerſities here, as at Rome, or elſewhere (n).' This opinion being communicated by Dr. Fox to the King, his Majeſty approved of it much; ſaying, 'that that 'man (meaning Cranmer) had the ſow by the right ear (o).' Whereupon Cranmer was ſent for to Court, made the King's Chaplain, ordered to write upon the ſubject of the Divorce, furniſhed with books for that purpoſe, and placed in the family of Thomas Boleyn Earl of Wiltſhire and Ormond (p). When he had finiſhed his book [B], he went to Cambridge to diſpute upon that point, and brought ſeveral over to his opinion (q). About this time he was preſented to a Living, and made Archdeacon of Taunton (r). In 1530 he was ſent, with ſome others, into France, Italy, and Germany, to diſcuſs the affair of the King's Marriage (s). At Rome he got his book preſented to the Pope, and offered to diſpute openly againſt the validity of King Henry's Marriage; but no one choſe to engage him (t). While he was at Rome, the Pope conſtituted him his Pœnitentiary throughout England, Ireland, and Wales (u). In Germany he was ſole Embaſſador upon the forementioned affair; and in 1532 concluded a Treaty of Commerce between England and the Low-Countries (w). He was alſo employed on an Embaſſy to the Duke of Saxony, and other Proteſtant Princes (x). During his reſidence in Germany, he married, at Nuremberg, a ſecond wife, named Anne, niece of Oſiander's wife (y). Upon the death of Archbiſhop Warham in Auguſt 1532, Cranmer was nominated for his ſucceſſor; but he refuſed to accept of that Dignity, unleſs he was to receive it immediately from the King without the Pope's intervention (z). Before his conſecration, the King ſo far engaged him in the buſineſs

(a) Memorials of T. Cranmer, &c. by J. Strype, fol. Lond. 1694, p. 1, 2, 419.
(*) Or Aſfelacton.
(b) Ibid.
(c) Ibid. p. 2.
(d) Ibid. and Fox's Acts and Monuments, vol. ii. p. 1860, edit. 1583.
(e) Memorials, &c. by Strype, p. 2.
(f) Ibid. p. 2. 417.
(g) Ibid. and Fox, ubi ſupra, p. 1860, 1877. She was related to the miſtreſs of the inn.
(h) Strype, ubi ſupra, p. 3.
(i) Ibid.
Fox, p. 1860. and Antiquitat. Britannicæ, edit. Hanov. p. 331.
(k) Strype, ubi ſupra, p. 3. Fox, p. 1860.
(l) Strype and Fox, ibid. The author of Antiquitat. Britannicæ, ſays, he was upon the road to Oxford, but was perſuaded to return back to Cambridge, p. 331.
(m) Godwin, de Præſul. edit. 1616, p. 196. Fox, ubi ſupra, p. 1860.
(n) Fox, ubi ſupra, p. 1860.
(o) Ibid. p. 1861. Burnet's Hiſt. of the Reformation, vol. i. p. 79.
(p) Fox ibid. and Strype's Mem. of Archbp. Cranmer. p. 4, 5.
(q) Strype, ibid. p. 5, 6.
(r) Ibid. p. 14.
(s) Ibid. p. 11.
(t) Ibid. p. 9. Fox, ubi ſupra, p. 1861.
(u) Godwin, de Præſul. Lond. 1616, 4*to*. p. 197. Burnet, ubi ſupra, p. 95.
(w) Strype, ubi ſupra, p. 11.
(x) Ibid. p. 13.
(z) Strype, ubi ſupra, p. 16. Biſhop Burnet's Hiſt. of the Reformation, vol. i. p. 128.
(y) Ibid. p. 417. Fox, ubi ſupra, p. 1870.
(1) Fox, Acts and Monument. p. 1859. Strype's Memorials, &c. p. 1. 126. Burnet's Hiſt. of the Reformation, vol. i. p. 336.
(2) Fox, ubi ſupra, p. 1861. Strype, ubi ſupra, p. 394.

[A] Son of Thomas Cranmer, Eſq.] That Family is ſaid to have come in with William the Conqueror, and to have been fixed for many generations in Nottinghamſhire, and in Lincolnſhire, where there is a Houſe ſtill called Cranmer-hall. There were ſtill in France ſome of his name and family in King Henry the VIIIth's time; one whereof came in company with the French Embaſſador; to whom, for name, or relation ſake, our Biſhop gave a noble Entertainment. The Family's Arms, were, Three Cranes; but King Henry the VIIIth altered them to Three Pelicans (1).

[B] When he had finiſhed his book.] In that book, he ſhowed, by the authorities of the Scriptures, of general Councils, and ancient writers, that the Biſhop of Rome (or the Pope) had no ſuch authority, as that he might diſpenſe with the word of God (2).

of

of his Divorce, that he made him a party and an actor almoſt in every ſtep he took in that affair (a). It was he that pronounced the ſentence of Divorce between King Henry and Queen Catharine at Dunſtable, May the 23d, 1533; and he likewiſe it was who married him to Anne Boleyn [C], and confirmed her marriage on the 28th following. March the 30th, 1533, he was conſecrated Archbiſhop of Canterbury (b), by the Biſhops of Lincoln, Exeter, and St. Aſaph, when he made an unuſual Proteſtation [D]. The Temporalities of the Archbiſhoprick were reſtored to him the 29th of April following (c). Soon after he forbad all preaching throughout his Dioceſe, and viſited it this year in December (d). The Pope threatning him with excommunication, on account of his ſentence againſt Queen Catharine, he appealed from his Holineſs to a general Council; and, in the enſuing Parliaments, ſtrenuouſly diſputed againſt the Pope's ſupremacy (e). All along he ſhowed himſelf a zealous promoter of the Reformation; and, as the firſt ſtep towards it, procured the Convocation to petition the King that the Bible might be tranſlated into Engliſh. When that was obtained, he diligently encouraged the printing and publication of it, and cauſed it to be recommended by Royal Authority, and to be diſperſed as much as he poſſibly could (f). Next, he forwarded the diſſolution of the Monaſteries [E], which were one of the greateſt obſtacles to a reformation (g); and, in every point, he endeavoured by all gentle and human means to reſtore the Church of England to its true and original purity. In 1535 he performed a Provincial Viſitation, in order to recommend the King's Supremacy (h); and preached upon that ſubject in ſeveral parts of his Dioceſe [F]. In 1536, he divorced King Henry from Anne Boleyn (i). In 1537 he viſited his Dioceſe, and endeavoured to aboliſh the ſuperſtitious obſervation of Holidays (k). In 1538, he was in a commiſſion againſt the Anabaptiſts, and viſited the Dioceſe of Hereford (l). The next year, he and ſome of the Biſhops fell under the King's diſpleaſure, becauſe they could not be brought to give their conſent in Parliament, that the Monaſteries ſhould be ſuppreſſed for the King's ſole uſe (m). He alſo ſtrenuouſly oppoſed the Act for the ſix Articles, in the Houſe of Lords, ſpeaking three days againſt it (n); and upon the paſſing of that Statute ſent away his wife into Germany (o). In 1540 he was one of the Commiſſioners for inſpecting into matters of Religion, and explaining ſome of its chief Doctrines (p). The reſult of their commiſſion was, the book intitled 'A neceſſary Erudition of any 'Chriſtian man.' After Lord Cromwell's death, (in whoſe behalf he had written to the King), he retired, and lived in great privacy, meddling not at all with State affairs (q). In 1541, he gave orders, purſuant to the King's directions, for taking away ſuperſtitious Shrines: and exchanging Biſhopſbourn for Bekeſbourn, united the latter to his Dioceſe (r). In 1542, he procured the 'Act for the advancement of true Religion, and the aboliſhment 'of the contrary;' which moderated the rigour of the Six Articles (s). But, the year following, ſome enemies preferring accuſations againſt him [G], he had like to have been ruined, had not the King interpoſed in his behalf (t). Nay, he was complained of in the Houſe of Commons [H], and in the Privy-Council [I], and was very near being ſent to

(a) Strype, ubi ſupra, p. 17. Burnet, ubi ſupra, p. 131; and Collect. of Records, p. 120, 121.

(b) Burnet, ubi ſupra, p. 128, 129. Strype's Memorials, &c. p. 18. Fuller's Church Hiſt. B. v. p. (185).

(c) Rymer's Fœd. vol. xiv. p. 456.

(d) Strype, ibid. p. 21.

(e) Ib. p. 22, 23. and Fox, ubi ſupra, p. 1862.

(f) Strype, ibid. p. 24, 57, &c. Burnet's Hiſt. of the Reformat. vol. i. p. 171, &c. 249, &c.

(g) Strype, ubi ſupra, p. 35. Burnet, ubi ſupra, p. 190.

(h) Strype, ibid. p. 30. 32.

(i) Ibid. p. 49.

(k) Ibid. p. 55.

(l) Ibid. p. 70.

(m) Ibid. p. 72.

(n) Fox, ubi ſupra, p. 1185. Antiquit. Brit. p. 332.

(o) Strype, ibid. p. 72.

(p) Idem. p. 773 and Burnet, ubi ſupra, vol. i. p. 286, &c.

(q) Strype, ibid. p. 86.

(r) Ib. p. 91. 93.

(s) Ib. p. 99; and Burnet, ubi ſupra, vol. i. p. 321.

(t) Fox, ubi ſupra, p. 1866, &c. This whole affair is related at full length in Antiq. Britann. p. 335—337.

[C] He likewiſe it was who married him to Ann Boleyn.] This is expreſsly aſſerted by the author of Antiquitates Britannicæ (3). But the Lord Herbert ſays (4), they were privately married by Rowland Lee afterwards Biſhop of Coventry and Litchfield; none being preſent but the Lady Ann's father, mother, and brother; Dr. Cranmer, and the Duke of Norfolk.

(3) Edit. Hanov. p. 329. See Strype's Mem. of Cranmer, p. 18.

(4) Hiſt. of King Henry VIII.

[D] When he made an unuſual Proteſtation.] The curious Reader may ſee the form of it, in the Appendix to Strype's Memorials of Archbiſhop Cranmer, N° V. p. 9. His Deſign was by this expedient to ſave his Liberty, to renounce every clauſe in his Oath which barred him doing his duty to God, the King, and his Country. A certain Church Hiſtorian (5) who loves upon all occaſions to blacken our firſt Reformers, thinks there was ſomething of human infirmity in this management, becauſe it was not made at Rome to the Pope, nor by Cranmer's proxies there, before the obtaining of the Bulls.

(5) Collier, Eccl. Hiſt. vol. ii. p. 74.

[E] He forwarded the diſſolution of the Monaſteries.] Inſtead of thoſe nurſeries of Idleneſs, and out of their Revenues, he had projected, That there ſhould be a Proviſion made, in every Cathedral, for Readers of Divinity, and of Greek and Hebrew, and a great number of Students to be both exerciſed in the daily worſhip of God, and trained up in ſtudy and devotion; whom the Biſhop might tranſplant out of this nurſery, into all the parts of his Dioceſe. And thus every Biſhop ſhould have had a College of Clergymen under his eye, to be preferred according to their merit. But this Deſign miſcarried (8).

(8) Burnet, ubi ſupra, vol. i. p. 302.

[F] Preached upon that ſubject, in ſeveral parts of his Dioceſe.] In his Sermons, he ſhowed, 1. That the Biſhop of Rome was not God's vicar upon earth, as he was taken. Here he declared by what arts and crafts the Biſhop of Rome had obtained his uſurped authority. 2. That the Holineſs that See ſo much boaſted of, and by which name Popes affected to be ſtiled, was but a Holineſs in name; and that there was no ſuch Holineſs at Rome. And here he launched out into the Vices of the Court of Rome. 3. He inveighed againſt the Biſhop of Rome's Laws; which were miſcalled Divinæ Leges, and Sacri Canones (9).

(9) Strype, ubi ſupra, p. 30, 31.

[G] Some enemies preferring accuſations againſt him.] Theſe enemies were, Richard Thornden Suffragan of Dover, Arthur Sentleger, Richard Parkhurſt, William Gardiner, John Milles, all Canons of Canterbury. And Robert Serles, and Edmund Shether, two of the ſix Preachers there: with Dr. Willoughby, the King's Chaplain. The ſum of their Accuſations againſt the Archbiſhop and his Chaplains was, That they oppoſed the ſix Articles, and other parts of Popery. See Strype's Memorials of Archbiſhop Cranmer (10).

(10) P. 109, &c.

[H] He was complained of in the Houſe of Commons.] By Sir John Goſtwick, one of the Knights for Bedfordſhire; for preaching hereſy againſt the Sacrament of the altar. But the King ſeverely rebuked Goſtwick for his impertinence (11).

(11) Ib. p. 123, &c.

[I] And in the Privy-Council.] The ſubſtance of his Accuſation there, was, 'That he, with his learned 'men, had ſo infected the whole Realm with their 'unſavoury Doctrine, that three parts of the land were 'become abominable hereticks. And that it might 'prove dangerous to the King, being likely to produce 'ſuch commotions and uproars, as were ſprung up in 'Germany. And therefore they deſired, that the 'Archbiſhop might be committed to the Tower, till 'he could be examined.' The whole was a contrivance of Gardiner's (12).

(12) Ib. p. 124. Antiq. Britan. p. 334.

the

the Tower; but the King again protected him, and gave him his Ring, as a token that he took the affair into his own hands (u). In the year 1545, he undertook to reform the Canon-Law; but the book he compiled upon that subject was, through Bishop Gardiner's artifices, never confirmed by the King. He likewise corrected some Service or Prayer-books (w). Upon King Henry's decease, he was one of the Executors of his Will, and one of the Regents of the Kingdom (x). February the 20th, 1545-6, he crowned King Edward VI. to whom he had been godfather; as he was also to the Lady Elizabeth (y). Soon after, he took out a Commission for executing his office of Archbishop (z); and caused the Homilies to be composed, being himself the author of some of them; and likewise encouraged the translation of Erasmus's paraphrase on the New Testament (a). He also laboured earnestly in the Reformation of Religion: and, for that purpose, procured the repeal of the Six Articles; the establishment of the Communion in both kinds; and a new office for that Sacrament; the revisal and amendment of the rest of the Offices of the Church; frequent preaching; a Royal visitation to inspect into the manners and abilities of the Clergy; and visited his own Diocese himself for the same purpose (b). He likewise showed himself a patron to the Universities, in defending their Rights, securing their Revenues, and encouraging the Learning there professed and taught (c). In 1549, he was one of the Commissioners for examining Bishop Bonner, with a power to imprison or deprive him of his Bishoprick (*). Upon the insurrection in Devonshire, he expressed his zeal for Religion and his Prince, by giving an excellent and full answer to the Rebels articles, and ordered Sermons to be composed and preached upon that occasion (d). The same year he ordained several Priests and Deacons according to the new form of Ordination in the Common-Prayer-Book; which, through the Archbishop's care, was now finished and settled by Act of Parliament [K]. A review was made of this book towards the end of the next year, and several things changed or amended that were thought to savour too much of superstition (e). In 1552, it was printed again with amendments and alterations, by the Archbishop's care, and authorized by Parliament [L]. This same year, he and some others compiled the Articles of Religion, and caused them to be enjoined by the King's authority (f). He confined not his care to the Church of England, but extended it also to those Protestant Foreigners who fled to England [M], by obtaining Churches for them, and recommending them to the favour and protection of the Crown (g). Another point that much employed his thoughts, was, to preserve the Revenues of the Church, which the greedy Courtiers were swallowing up without mercy, and parcelling out among themselves (h). As the Archbishop had in 1534 endeavoured to save the lives of Bishop Fisher and Sir Thomas More (i); so now, when Tonstal Bishop of Durham came into trouble, and a Bill was brought into the House of Lords for attainting him for misprision of Treason, Cranmer spoke freely, nay protested, against it, though they two were of different persuasions (k). In 1553, he opposed the new settlement of the Crown upon Lady Jane Gray, and would no way be concerned in that affair, (though at last, through many importunities, he was prevailed upon to set his hand to it,) neither would he join in any of Dudley's ambitious projects (l). However, upon King Edward the VIth's decease, he appeared for Jane Gray. Soon after, it being reported that he had offered to sing mass at the funeral of the late King, he vindicated himself in a Declaration (m). But now his Troubles came upon him apace, after Queen Mary's accession to the Throne. He was, first, ordered to appear before the Council, and bring an inventory of his Goods; which he did August the 27th, when he was commanded to keep his house, and be forth-coming. September the 13th, he was again summoned before the Council, and enjoined to be at the Star-Chamber the next day, when he was committed to the Tower (n); partly, for setting his hand to the instrument of the Lady Jane's succession; and, partly, for the public offer he had made a little before, of justifying openly the religious Proceedings of the late King (o). Some of his friends, foreseeing the storm that was likely to fall upon him, advised him to fly, but he absolutely refused [N]. In the ensuing Parliament, on November the 3d, he was attainted, and at Guild-hall found guilty of High Treason; whereupon the (u) Antiq. Brita. p. 334. 336. Strype, ubi supra, p. 109—126. Burnet, ibid. p. 327, &c. 342.

(w) Strype, ibid. p. 132.
(x) Rymer's Fœd. vol. xv. p. 110.
(y) Strype, p. 142.
(z) Id. p. 141.
(a) Ib. p. 149, 150, &c.
(b) Idem, p. 146, 157, &c. 182. Burnet's Hist. of the Reformat. vol. ii. p. 25. 72, &c.
(c) Strype's Memorials of T. Cranmer, p. 162, &c.
(*) Rymer, Fœd. vol. xv. p. 191.
(d) Strype, p. 185, &c.
(e) Ibid. p. 193. 210, 289. Burnet, ubi supra, vol. ii. p. 71, 72, &c. — 79. 155, 169.
(f) Strype, ubi supra, p. 272. 293.
(g) Ibid. p. 234.
(h) Ibid. p. 247.
(i) Page 26—28.
(k) Ibid. p. 289.
(l) Fox, ubi supra, p. 1870. Burnet's Hist. of the Reformat. vol. ii. p. 224. Strype, ubi supra, p. 454.
(m) Ibid.
(n) Ibid. p. 230.
(o) Strype, p. 307. 314. See Burnet's Hist. of the Reformat. vol. ii. Collect. p. 249.

[K] The Common-prayer-book — — — — was now finished and settled by Act of Parliament.] The persons by whom it was composed, were Thomas Cranmer, Archbishop of Canterbury; Nicolas Ridley, Bishop of Rochester, afterwards of London; Tho. Goodrich, Bishop of Ely; Henry Holbech, Bishop of Lincoln; John Skip, Bishop of Hereford; Tho. Thirlby, Bishop of Westminster, afterwards of Ely; Geo. Day, Bishop of Chichester; Dr. John Taylor, Dean, afterwards Bishop, of Lincoln; Dr. Richard Cox, Chancellor of Oxford, and Dean of Christ-Church and Westminster, afterwards Bishop of Ely; Dr. William May, Dean of St. Paul's; Dr. Tho. Robertson, Archdeacon of Leicester, afterwards Dean of Durham; Dr. Simon Heines, Dean of Exeter; and Dr. John Redmayne, Master of Trinity College in Cambridge (13).

[L] Authorized by Parliament.] And it was enacted, That it should begin to be used every where by All-Saints-day next following (14).

[M] He extended his care to those Protestant Foreigners, &c.] They were, Martin Bucer, made Professor of Divinity, and Paulus Fagius, Professor of the Hebrew tongue, at Cambridge: Peter Martyr, Professor of Divinity at Oxford: John a Lasco, the first Minister of the Dutch Church at London: Peter Alexander, Bernardine Ochinus, Matthew Negelinus, Immanuel Tremellius, Valerand, &c (15).

[N] Some of his friends — — — advised him to fly, but he absolutely refused.] Saying, 'It would be no 'ways fitting for him to go away, considering the post 'he was in; and to shew, that he was not afraid to 'own all the Changes that were by his means made in 'Religion, in the last reign (17).'

(13) Appendix, containing an historical Account of the compiling of the Liturgy, in Sam. Downes's edit. of Bp. Sparrow's Rationale, &c. edit. 1722, p. cxlvii. cxlix.
(14) Stat. 5 & 6 Edw. VI.
(15) Strype, ubi supra, p. 195, &c. and Godwin, ubi supra,
(16) Strype, ubi supra, p. 314.

fruits

fruits of his Archbiſhoprick were ſequeſtered. However, upon his humble and repeated application, he was pardoned the Treaſon, but it was reſolved he ſhould be proceeded againſt for hereſy (p). In April 1554, he, and Ridley and Latimer, were removed to Oxford, in order for a public diſputation with the Papiſts (q); which was accordingly held there towards the middle of the month, with great noiſe, triumph, and impudent confidence on the Papiſts ſide, and with as much gravity, learning, modeſty, and convincing ſufficiency on the ſide of the Proteſtant Biſhops [O]. The 20th of April, two days after the end of theſe diſputations, Cranmer and the two others were brought before the Commiſſioners, and aſked, whether they would ſubſcribe (to Popery)? which they unanimouſly refuſing, were condemned as hereticks (r). From this ſentence the Archbiſhop appealed to the juſt judgment of the Almighty; and wrote to the Council, giving them an account of the diſputation, and deſiring the Queen's pardon for his treaſon, which it ſeems was not yet remitted (s). By the Convocation, which met this year, his 'Defence of the true and 'Catholic Doctrine of the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of our Saviour Chriſt,' was ordered to be burnt (t). Some of his friends petitioned the Queen in his behalf; putting her in mind, how he had once preſerved her in her father's time, by his earneſt interceſſions with him for her [P]; ſo that ſhe had reaſon to believe he loved her, and would ſpeak the truth to her, more than all the reſt of the Clergy. But all his friends endeavours were ineffectual (u). The Sentence pronounced againſt him by Weſton at Oxford being void in Law, becauſe the Pope's authority was not yet re-eſtabliſhed in England, a new Commiſſion was ſent from Rome for his trial and conviction. Accordingly, on September the 12th, 1555, he appeared before the Commiſſioners [Q] at St. Mary's Church, Oxon, where he was accuſed of blaſphemy, perjury, incontinency, and hereſy [R], againſt all which he vindicated himſelf (w). At laſt, he was cited to appear at Rome within eighty days, to anſwer in perſon; which he ſaid he would do, if the King and Queen would ſend him, but no care was taken to ſend him. Therefore, the Pope diſpatched, on December the 14th, his Letters executory to the King and Queen, and to Bonner and Thirlby Biſhops of London and Ely, to degrade and deprive him (x). In theſe Letters, Cranmer was declared contumacious, for not appearing at Rome within eighty days, according to his citation: which was a moſt ſhameleſs and infamous allegation; for, how could he poſſibly appear at Rome, when he was all the while kept a priſoner? However, upon the coming of the letters, Bonner and Thirlby, with Dr. Martin and Dr. Story the King's and Queen's Proctors, went to Oxford to degrade him. They dreſſed him in all the garments and ornaments of an Archbiſhop, only in mockery every thing was of canvas, and old clouts: and then he was, piece by piece, ſtript of all again. When they came to take the Croſier out of his hand, he refuſed to part with it, and pulled out an Appeal, whereby he appealed to the next general Council (y). After he was degraded, they put him on a poor yeoman-beadle's gown, thread-bare, and a towns-man's cap, and remanded him to priſon (z). From thence he wrote Letters to the Queen, to give her a true and impartial account of what had paſſed at his degradation, to prevent miſ-reports, and to juſtify himſelf in what he had ſaid and done (a). Hitherto the Archbiſhop had manifeſted a great deal of courage, wiſdom, and fortitude in his ſufferings, but at laſt human frailty made him commit ſuch a fault, as was the greateſt blemiſh of his life. For, through flatteries, promiſes, importunities, threats, and the fear of death, he was prevailed upon to ſign a Recantation [S], wherein he renounced the Proteſtant Religion, and embraced again all the Errors of Popery;

(p) Strype, p. 320, 321. Burnet, ubi ſupra, p. 257.

(q) Strype, ubi ſupra, p. 334, &c. Burnet, p. 280, &c.

(r) Fox, ubi ſupra, p. 1871, &c.

(s) Strype, p. 341.

(t) Ibid. p. 348.

(u) Ibid. p. 368. Burnet, ubi ſupra, vol. ii. p. 241.

(w) Strype, p. 371. Fox, ubi ſupra, p. 1871, &c. Burnet, ubi ſupra, vol. ii. p. 331.

(x) Strype, ubi ſupra, p. 375.

Feb. 14, 1555-6.

(y) Fox, ubi ſupra, p. 1882, 1883.

(z) Ibid.

(a) Strype, ubi ſupra, p. 377, &c.

[O] He, and Ridley, and Latimer, were removed to Oxford in order for a public Diſputation, &c.] The Queſtions there diſputed upon, were theſe, 1. In the Sacrament of the Altar, the natural body of Chriſt conceived of the Virgin Mary, and his natural blood, are really preſent, under the ſpecies of bread and wine, by virtue of the divine word pronounced by the Prieſt. 2. After the conſecration, there doth not remain the ſubſtance of bread and wine, nor any other ſubſtance, but the ſubſtance of Chriſt, God and man. 3. In the maſs, there is a lively propitiatory ſacrifice of the Church, for the ſins as well of the living as of the dead (*).

(*) Strype, p. 354.

[P] How he had preſerved her in her father's time, &c.] Namely, when the King was reſolved to ſend her to the Tower, and to make her ſuffer as a ſubject: becauſe ſhe would not obey the Laws of the Realm, in renouncing the Pope's Authority and Religion (18).

(18) Strype, p. 368. 431.

[Q] He appeared before the Commiſſioners.] Brooks Biſhop of Glouceſter was appointed upon this occaſion Subdelegate to Cardinal Puteo, to whom the Pope had committed this proceſs; and Martin, and Story, Doctors of the Civil Law, were the Queen's Commiſſioners (19).

(19) Ibid. p. 371.

[R] Where he was accuſed of blaſphemy, perjury, incontinency, and hereſy.] He was accuſed of blaſphemy and hereſy for his writings againſt Popery; of perjury, for breaking his oath to the Pope; and of incontinency, or adultery, on account of his being married (20).

(20) Ib. p. 372.

[S] He was prevailed upon to ſign a Recantation.] We are informed by the induſtrious Mr. Strype (21), that Archbiſhop Cranmer was ſubtilly drawn in by the Papiſts to ſubſcribe ſix different Papers; the firſt being expreſſed in ambiguous words, capable of a favourable conſtruction, the five following were added as explanations of it. That firſt Recantation was in theſe words, 'For as much as the King's and Queen's Ma-'jeſties, by conſent of their Parliament, have received 'the Pope's Authority within this Realm, I am con-'tent to ſubmit myſelf to their Laws herein, and to 'take the Pope for chief Head of this Church of 'England, ſo far as God's Laws, and the Laws and 'Cuſtoms of this Realm, will permit.' In the next, he ſubmitted himſelf to the Catholic Church of Chriſt, and unto the Pope, ſupreme Head of the ſame Church. In the third, he ſubmitted to the King and Queen, and to all their Laws, as well concerning the Pope's ſupremacy, as others: and promiſed, that he would ſtir and move all others to live in quietneſs and obedience to their Majeſties. As for his Book, he was content to ſubmit to the Judgment of the Catholic Church, and the next General Council. This was followed by a fourth, wherein he profeſſed firmly, ſtedfaſtly, and aſſuredly to believe in all Articles and Points

(21) Eccl. Mem. vol. iii. p. 232—238.

Popery; which Recantation was immediately printed and diſperſed about by his enemies (b). Notwithſtanding that, the mercileſs Queen, not ſatisfied with this conqueſt, reſolved to glut her revenge, by committing Cranmer to the flames. Accordingly, ſhe ſent for Dr. Cole, Provoſt of Eton, and gave him inſtructions to prepare a Sermon for that mournful occaſion (c). And on the 24th of February a Writ was ſigned for the burning of Cranmer (d). The 21ſt day of March, which was the fatal day, he was brought to St. Mary's Church, and placed on a kind of ſtage over againſt the pulpit, where Dr. Cole was to preach. While Cole was haranguing, the unfortunate Cranmer expreſſed great inward confuſion; often lifting up his hands and eyes to heaven; and frequently pouring out floods of tears (e). At the end of the Sermon, when Cole deſired him to make an open profeſſion of his Faith, as he had promiſed him he would; he, firſt, prayed in the moſt fervent manner; then made an exhortation to the people preſent, not to ſet their minds upon the world; to obey the King and Queen; to love each other; and to be charitable. After this he made a Confeſſion of his Faith, beginning with the Creed, and concluding with theſe words, 'And I believe every word and ſentence taught by our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, 'his Apoſtles and Prophets, in the Old and New Teſtament.—And now, added he, I 'come to the great thing, that ſo much troubleth my conſcience more than any thing I ever 'did or ſaid in my whole life; and that is the ſetting abroad a writing contrary to the 'truth, which I here now renounce as things written with my hand contrary to the truth 'which I thought in my heart, and written for fear of death, and to ſave my life if it might 'be; that is, all ſuch bills and papers which I have written or ſigned with my hand ſince 'my degradation, wherein I have written many things untrue. And foraſmuch as my 'hand offended, writing contrary to my heart, my hand ſhall firſt be puniſhed; for, may 'I come to the fire, it ſhall be firſt burned. As for the Pope, I refuſe him as Chriſt's 'enemy and antichriſt, with all his falſe doctrine. And as for the Sacrament, I believe 'as I have taught in my book againſt the Biſhop of Wincheſter (f).' Thunderſtruck as it were with this unexpected Declaration, the enraged Popiſh crowd admoniſhed him not to diſſemble: 'Ah, replied he with tears, ſince I lived hitherto, I have been a hater of 'falſhood, and a lover of ſimplicity, and never before this time have I diſſembled (g).' Whereupon, they pulled him off the ſtage with the utmoſt fury, and hurried him to the place of his martyrdom, over-againſt Baliol-College (h); where he put off his clothes in haſte, and ſtanding in his ſhirt, and without ſhoes, was faſtened with a chain to the ſtake (i). Some preſſing him to agree to his former recantation, he anſwered, ſhowing his hand, 'This is the hand that wrote it, and therefore it ſhall firſt ſuffer puniſhment (k).' Fire being applied to him, he ſtretched out his right hand into the flame, and held it there unmoved (except that once with it he wiped his face) till it was conſumed, crying with a loud voice, 'This hand hath offended;' and often repeating, 'This unworthy right 'hand (l).' At laſt, the fire getting up, he ſoon expired, never ſtirring or crying out all the while, only keeping his eyes fixed to heaven, and repeating more than once, 'Lord 'Jeſus receive my ſpirit.' Such was the end of the renowned Thomas Cranmer, in the 67th year of his age. As to his Character: He is repreſented as a man of an open and generous Mind, of great Sincerity and Candour, a lover of Truth, and a declared enemy to Falſhood and Superſtition: Humble and affable; and in every condition the ſame. Gentle and mild in his Temper; always ready to forgive, and be reconciled: Not ſoon heated, nor apt to give his opinion raſhly of perſons, or things. And though his Gentleneſs often expoſed him to his Enemies, who from it took an advantage to uſe him ill, yet it did not lead him into ſuch a weakneſs of Spirit, as to conſent to every thing that was uppermoſt: But, in general, he never diſſembled his opinion, nor diſowned his friend. His Charity and Munificence to the indigent were extenſive, and his Hoſpitality well regulated, not beſtowed upon the Rich and the Powerful, but on his honeſt and poor Neighbours. He

(b) Fox, ubi ſupra, p. 1884.

(c) Strype, ubi ſupra, p. 383. Burnet's Hiſt. of the Reformation, vol. ii. p. 334.

(d) Rymer's Fœd. vol. xv. p. 432. Burnet, ubi ſupra, and Collection of Records, p. 300.

(e) Fox, ubi ſupra, p. 1886.

(f) Fox, ubi ſupra, p. 1887.

(g) Ibid. Strype, ubi ſupra, p. 388.

(h) Burnet's Hiſt. of the Reformation, vol. ii. p. 334, &c.

(i) Strype ubi ſupra, p. 389. Fox, ubi ſupra, p. 1889.

(k) Strype, ubi ſupra, p. 389.

(l) Fox, ibid. Strype, ibid.

Points of the Chriſtian Religion and Catholic Faith, as the Catholic Church doth believe. Moreover, as concerning the Sacraments, he declared he believed unfeignedly in all points as the ſaid Catholic Church did. In the fifth Paper, which is that in Fox (22), and has been thought to be his only Recantation, they required of him, to renounce and anathematize all Lutheran and Zuinglian hereſies and errors; to acknowledge the one only Catholic Church, to be that whereof the Pope is the Head; and to declare him Chriſt's Vicar. Then followed an expreſs acknowledgment of Tranſubſtantiation, the ſeven Sacraments, and of all the Doctrines of the Church of Rome in general. A ſixth was ſtill required of him, which was drawn up in ſo ſtrong terms, that nothing was capable of being added to it. For it contained a large acknowledgment of all the Popiſh errors and corruptions, and a moſt grievous accuſation of himſelf as a blaſphemer, enemy of Chriſt, and murderer of Souls, on account of his being the author of King Henry's divorce, and of all the calamities, ſchiſms, and hereſies of which that was the fountain. This was ſubſcribed on the 18th of March. Theſe ſix Papers were, ſoon after his death, ſent to the preſs by Bonner, and publiſhed with the addition of another, which they had prepared for him to ſpeak at St. Mary's, before his Execution: and though he then ſpoke to a quite contrary effect, and revoked his former Recantations, Bonner had the confidence to publiſh this to the world, as if it had been approved and made uſe of by the Archbiſhop.——In 1736, William Whiſton, M. A. publiſhed a little book entitled, 'An Enquiry 'into the Evidence of Archbiſhop Cranmer's Recan-'tation: or Reaſons for a ſuſpicion that the pretend-'ed Copy of it is not genuine.' In that book he ſuppoſes, that what Cranmer ſigned, was only the firſt part of the Recantation printed in Fox's Acts and Monuments, as far as the words——'without which 'there is no Salvation,'—that the reſt was added by the Papiſts, but that Cranmer never ſet his hand thereto.

(22) Page 1884.

had

had a good Judgment, but no great quickneſs of apprehenſion, nor cloſeneſs of ſtile, which was diffuſed (m). However, he was a man of great Learning in Divinity, and in the Civil and Canon Laws (n). He generally ſpent about three parts of the day in ſtudy (o); and being of a moſt wonderful Diligence, he drew out of all the Authors he read, every thing that was remarkable, digeſting thoſe quotations into Common-place. He publiſhed, and left behind him in manuſcript, ſeveral works [T]. As he was a lover of Learning,

(m) Burnet, Hiſt. of the Reformat. vol. ii. p. 336.
(n) Strype, ubi ſupra, p. 439.
(o) Ibid. p. 431.

[T] He publiſhed, and left behind him in manuſcript, ſeveral works.] His printed works are, I. An account of Mr. Pole's book, concerning King Henry VIIIth's marriage (23). II. Several Letters, to divers perſons ——To King Henry VIII—To Secretary Cromwel. ——To Sir William Cecil. —— To foreign Divines (24). III. Three Diſcourſes, upon his review of the King's book, intituled, The Erudition of a Chriſtian man (25). IV. Other Diſcourſes of his (26). V. The Biſhops Book, in which he had a part. VI. Anſwers to the fifteen Articles of the Rebels in Devonſhire in 1549 (27). VII. The examination of moſt points of Religion (28). VIII. A Form for the alteration of the Maſs into a Communion (29). IX. Some of the Homilies. X. A Catechiſm, intituled, A ſhort Inſtruction to Chriſtian Religion, for the ſingular profit of Children and young People (30). XI. Againſt Unwritten Verities (31). XII. A Defence of the true and Catholic Doctrine of the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of our Saviour Chriſt; with a Confutation of ſundry Errors concerning the ſame: Grounded and eſtabliſhed upon God's holy word, and approved by the conſent of the moſt ancient Doctors of the Church. This was tranſlated into Latin by John Young. In oppoſition to it, Gardiner publiſhed, 'An Explication and Aſſertion of the true 'Catholic Faith touching the moſt bleſſed Sacra-'ment of the Altar, with the Confutation of a book 'wrote againſt the ſame.' XIII. Cranmer replied in the following book, 'An Anſwer by the Reve-'rend Father in God, Thomas Archbiſhop of Can-'terbury, Primate of all England, and Metropolitan, 'unto a crafty and ſophiſtical Cavillation, deviſed by 'Stephen Gardiner, Doctor of Law, late Biſhop of 'Wincheſter, againſt the true and godly Doctrine of 'the moſt Holy Sacrament of the Body and Blood of 'our Saviour Chriſt. Wherein is alſo, as occaſion 'ſerveth, anſwered ſuch Places of the Book of Dr. 'Richard Smith, as may ſeem any thing worthy the 'anſwering. Alſo a true Copy of the book written, 'and in open Court delivered by Dr. Stephen Gar-'diner, not one word added or diminiſhed, but faith-'fully in all Points agreeing with the original.' Lond. 1551. reprinted 1580. It was tranſlated into Latin by Sir John Cheke. An Anſwer was alſo made to this book by Ste. Gardiner, under the feigned name of Marcus Antonius Conſtantinus, and entituled, Confutatio cavillationum, quibus ſacroſanctum Euchariſtiæ Sacramentum ab impiis Capernaitis impeti ſolet. Paris 1552. XIV. Cranmer began an Anſwer to this, and finiſhed three parts of it, but lived not to compleat the whole (32). XV. Preface to the Engliſh tranſlation of the Bible. XVI. A Speech in the Houſe of Lords, concerning a general Council (33). XVII. Letter to King Henry VIII. in juſtification of Anne Boleyn, May 3, 1535 (34). XVIII. The Reaſons that led him to oppoſe the Six Articles (35). For this he had like to come into great trouble, as may be ſeen in Fox (36). XIX. Reſolution of ſome Queſtions concerning the Sacrament (37). XX. Injunctions given at his viſitation within the Dioceſe of Hereford (38). XXI. A collection of paſſages out of the Canon-Law, to ſhow the neceſſity of reforming it (39). XXII. Some Queries in order to the correcting of ſeveral abuſes (40). XXIII. Concerning a farther reformation, and againſt ſacrilege (41). XXIV. Anſwers to ſome Queries concerning Confirmation (42). XXV. Some conſiderations offered to King Edward VI. to induce him to proceed to a farther reformation (43). XXVI. Anſwer to the Lords of the Privy-Council (44). XXVII. Manifeſto againſt the Maſs (45).

Thoſe works of his which ſtill remain in manuſcript, are I. Two large Volumes of Collections out of Holy Scripture, and the ancient Fathers, and later Doctors and Schoolmen. The firſt Volume contains 545 pages, and the ſecond above 559. They are chiefly upon the points controverted between us and the Church of Rome; namely, about their ſeven Sacraments, Invocation of Saints, Images, Relicks, of true Religion and Superſtition, the Maſs, Prayer, the Virgin Mary, &c. Theſe two Volumes are in the King's Library (46). When they were offered to ſale, they were valued at 100*l.* but Biſhop Beveridge, and Dr. Jane, appraiſers for the King, brought down the price to 50*l* (47). II. The Lord Burleigh had ſix or ſeven Volumes more of his writing (48). III. And Dr. Burnet mentions two Volumes beſides, that he ſaw, but they are ſuppoſed to be now loſt (49). IV. There are alſo ſeveral Letters of his in the Collections of Sir Robert Cotton (50). M.

(23) Memorials of T. Cranmer, by J. Strype, p. 6. and Append. p. 3.
(24) In ſeveral parts of the ſame book.
(25) Append. ubi ſupra, p. 57.
(26) Ibid.
(27) Ib. p. 86.
(28) Ib. p. 77; and Burnet's Hiſt. of the Reformation, vol. i. Collect. No. 21. p. 201.
(29) Strype, ubi ſupra, p. 139.
(30) Ibid. p. 159.
(31) Page 160.
(32) Ibid. p. 254, 255, 256. 259, 260, 261, 262. 370. Fox, p. 1870.
(33) Burnet, Hiſt. of the Reformation, vol. i. p. 174.
(34) Ibid. p. 200.
(35) Ibid. p. 265.
(36) Page 1185.
(37) Burnet, ubi ſupra. Coll. of Records, p. 201.
(38) Ibid. p. 182.
(39) Ib. p. 257.
(40) Addenda to vol. i. p. 317.
(41) Burnet, vol. iii. Collect. p. 236.
(42) Ib. p. 319.
(43) Ib. p. 320.
(44) Ib. Collect. p. 187.
(45) Ibid. p. 249.
(46) Royal Libr. 7 B. xi. xii. See Burnet's Hiſt. of the Reformat. vol. i. p. 171.
(47) Caſley's Catalogue of the Royal Library, p. 124, 125.
(48) Burnet, ubi ſupra.
(49) Ibid.
(50) Cleopatra, E. & F. 20.

 [The character of Archbiſhop Cranmer was in many reſpects extremely amiable, but it muſt at the ſame time be acknowledged, that there were ſeveral parts of his conduct which were very cenſurable. Some juſt obſervations on this ſubject have been made by the ingenious Mr. Gilpin, in his elegant Life of Archbiſhop Cranmer, publiſhed, in 8*vo.* in 1784. That Gentleman remarks, that 'the character of 'Archbiſhop Cranmer hath been equally the ſubject 'of exaggerated praiſe, and of undeſerved cenſure '(51).' The moſt indefenſible parts of the Archbiſhop's character are the readineſs with which he ſometimes concurred in the unjuſtifiable proceedings of Henry VIII. and the inſtances wherein he ſhewed himſelf to be actuated by intolerant principles.

(51) Pref. to the Life of Archbiſhop Cranmer, p. i.

He firſt recommended himſelf to Henry by the zeal which he diſplayed in promoting the King's Divorce from Queen Catharine; and Mr. Gilpin, ſpeaking of his undertaking to collect the opinions of the foreign Univerſities in Henry's behalf, makes the following obſervations: 'This expedition ſo readily 'projected, and ſo chearfully undertaken, does not 'perhaps place Dr. Cranmer in the moſt advanta-'geous point of light. There were good political 'reaſons, no doubt, to induce the King to wiſh for a 'divorce. His marriage with Catharine was by no 'means generally approved, either at home, or 'abroad: the legitimacy of Mary, in treaties of 'marriage with neighbouring Princes, had been 'queſtioned; and the terrible effects of the late civil 'wars in England, occaſioned by diſputed titles, 'were wounds not yet entirely healed. Male iſſue 'to the King, which might prevent ſuch conſe-'quences, was therefore very deſirable to all men. 'But reaſons of State, however admiſſable in a Cabi-'net, ſhould never be ſuppoſed to influence a church-'man. We allow, that Dr. Cranmer might think 'the marriage wrong: but though it poſſibly might 'be a point of conſcience with the King, it could 'however be none with him; and there was mani-'feſtly a difference between adviſing not to do a 'thing; and adviſing to undo it, when already done; 'at leaſt in a matter of ſo diſputable a nature. He 'knew, that, in the Old Teſtament, the marriage of 'a ſiſter was allowed; and among the Patriarchs 'often practiſed: and that the marriage of a brother's 'wife was, in ſome caſes, enjoined. The New 'Teſtament was ſilent on the ſubject. There 'could, therefore, be no moral turpitude in it: nor 'any thing but the common law, and uſage of na-'tions, to reſtrain it.

'On the other hand, the baſeneſs, and ungenerous 'behaviour, which followed the contrary part, were 'evident at ſight. To repudiate a woman, with 'whom the King had cohabited near twenty years 'as his wife; and to illegitimate a daughter, bred 'up in the higheſt expectations, and now marriage-'able, were acts of ſuch cruelty, that it ſeems to in-'dicate a want of feeling to be in any degree acceſ-'ſary to them. To this may be added, that the no-'toriety of the King's paſſion for Anne Boleyn, 'which all men believed to be, if not the firſt mover,

Learning, ſo was he alſo an encourager of it; allowing yearly Salaries to many Scholars in Germany, and other places (p). With regard to ſome of his Opinions; he had the ſame

(p) Ibid. p. 285. Fox, p. 1864.

'at leaſt the principal ſpring of his pretended ſcru-
'ples, threw a very indelicate imputation on all who 'had any concern in the affair. No ſerious Church-
'man, one would imagine, could be fond of the idea
'of adminiſtering to the King's paſſions. It is with 'concern, therefore, that we ſee a man of Dr. Cran-
'mer's integrity and ſimplicity of manners, acting ſo
'much out of character, as to compound an affair of 'this kind, if not with his conſcience, at leaſt with
'all delicacy of ſentiment; and to parade through 'Europe, in the quality of an Ambaſſador, defend-
'ing every where the King's pious intentions.

'But the cauſe animated him. With the illega-
'lity of the King's marriage, he endeavoured vir'tually to eſtabliſh the inſufficiency of the Pope's
'diſpenſation; and the latter was an argument ſo
'near his heart, that it ſeems to have added merit to
'the former. We cannot, indeed, account for his
'embarking ſo zealouſly in this buſineſs, without
'ſuppoſing his principal motive was to free his 'country from the tyranny of Rome, to which this
'ſtep very evidently led. So deſirable an end would,
'in ſome degree, he might imagine, ſanctify the
'means (52).'

(52) Life of Archbiſhop Cranmer, p. 19—22.

Of two of the inſtances of perſecution, in which Archbiſhop Cranmer was concerned, Mr. Gilpin gives the following account. 'Joan Bocher and
'George Paris were accuſed, though at different 'times, one for denying the humanity of Chriſt; the 'other for denying his divinity. They were both
'tried, and condemned to the ſtake: and the Arch-
'biſhop not only conſented to theſe acts of blood;
'but even perſuaded the averſion of the young King
'into a compliance. "Your Majeſty muſt diſtin-
"guiſh (ſaid he, informing his Royal Pupil's con-
"ſcience) between common opinions, and ſuch as
"are the eſſential articles of faith. Theſe latter we
"muſt on no account ſuffer to be oppoſed." Mr. Gilpin juſtly obſerves, that 'nothing even plauſible
'can be ſuggeſted in defence of the Archbiſhop on
'this occaſion; except only that the ſpirit of Popery
'was not yet wholly repreſſed (53).' Theſe in-ſtances of injuſtice and barbarity were, indeed, totally indefenſible, and a great diſgrace to Cranmer, and to all who were concerned in them. It does not appear, that he endeavoured to promote the death of Lambert; but, as Mr. Gilpin obſerves, "it were to "be wiſhed he had rid his hands of the diſputation
"likewiſe (54)." The public diſputation, in which Cranmer bore ſome part, proved the means of bringing Lambert to the ſtake.

(53) Ibid. p. 131, 132.

(54) Ibid. p. 59.

It has been obſerved in the text, that Cranmer "was one of the examiners of thoſe that took the "degrees in Divinity." In this office he was eminently uſeful. Mr. Strype ſays, that 'out of the 'value the Univerſity had of his learning, he was 'appointed one of the examiners of ſuch as com'menced Bachelors and Doctors in Divinity. Ac'cording to whoſe approbations, the Univerſity
'allowed them to proceed. In which place he did
'much good; for he uſed to examine theſe candi'dates out of the Scriptures. And by no means
'would let them paſs, if he found they were unſkil-
'ful in it, and unacquainted with the Hiſtory of the 'Bible. So were the Friars eſpecially, whoſe ſtudy
'lay only in ſchool-authors. Whom, therefore, he
'ſometimes turned back as inſufficient, adviſing them
'to ſtudy the Scriptures for ſome years longer, be'fore they came for their degrees, it being a ſhame
'for a Profeſſor in Divinity to be unſkilled in the 'book, wherein the knowledge of God, and the 'grounds of Divinity lay. Whereby he made him-
'ſelf from the beginning hated by the Friars. Yet
'ſome of the more ingenuous ſort of them afterwards
'rendered him great and public thanks for refuſing
'them; whereby, being put upon the ſtudy of God's 'word, they attained to more ſound knowledge in 'religion. One of theſe was Dr. Barat, a White
'Friar, who lived afterwards in Norwich (55).'

(55) Memorials of Archbiſhop Cranmer, p. 3.

One of the moſt honourable tranſactions of Archbiſhop Cranmer's life, was the firm ſtand that he made againſt the Act of the Six Articles. This Act was ſo ſtrongly ſupported by the King, that even the Proteſtants in Parliament made little oppoſition to it. But Cranmer oppoſed it with great zeal and ſteadineſs. 'The good Archbiſhop,' ſays Mr. Gilpin, 'never appeared in a more truly Chriſtian light, than
'on this occaſion. In the midſt of ſo general a de'fection, (for there were numbers in the Houſe, who
'had hitherto ſhewn great forwardneſs in reforma-
'tion), he alone made a ſtand. Three days he 'maintained his ground; and baffled the arguments
'of all oppoſers. But argument was not their wea-
'pon; and the Archbiſhop ſaw himſelf obliged to ſink
'under ſuperior power. Henry ordered him to leave
'the Houſe. The Primate refuſed: "It was God's "buſineſs," he ſaid, "and not man's." And 'when he could do no more, he boldly entered his
'proteſt. Such an inſtance of fortitude is ſufficient
'to wipe off many of thoſe Courtly ſtains, which have
'faſtened on his memory (56).'

(56) Life, p. 71.

His behaviour in the caſe of the Duke of Norfolk was alſo entitled to great commendation. 'The laſt
'Act of this reign,' ſays Mr. Gilpin, 'was an Act of 'blood; and gave the Archbiſhop a noble opportu'nity of ſhewing, how well he had learned that great
'Chriſtian leſſon of forgiving an enemy. Almoſt
'without the ſhadow of juſtice, Henry had given di'rections to have the Duke of Norfolk attainted by 'an Act of Parliament. The King's Mandate ſtood
'in lieu of guilt; and the Bill paſſed the Houſe with 'great eaſe. No man, except the Biſhop of Win-
'cheſter, had been ſo great an enemy to the Arch-
'biſhop as the Duke of Norfolk. He had always
'thwarted the Primate's meaſures; and oftener than 'once had practiſed againſt his life. How many 'would have ſeen with ſecret pleaſure the workings
'of Providence againſt ſo rancorous an enemy; ſa-
'tisfied in having themſelves no hand in his unjuſt
'fate! But the Archbiſhop ſaw the affair in another
'light: he ſaw it with horror; and although the
'King had in a particular manner intereſted himſelf
'in this buſineſs, the Primate oppoſed the Bill with
'all his might; and when his oppoſition was vain, he 'left the Houſe with indignation, and retired to 'Croydon (57).'

(57) Ibid. p. 109, 110.

He was remarkable for the placability of his temper, and for ſhewing kindneſs to thoſe by whom he had been greatly injured. Hence it is mentioned, in Shakeſpeare's Henry the Eighth, as a common ſaying concerning him:

——— "Do my Lord of Canterbury
"But one ſhrewd turn, and he's your friend for "ever."

Biſhop Burnet takes notice of ſome malevolent accuſations that had been privately brought to the King againſt Cranmer, with a view to ruin him, including a charge of hereſy, and on which ſubject his Majeſty converſed with him; and the Biſhop adds: 'His
'candour and ſimplicity wrought ſo on the King,
'that he diſcovered to him the whole plot that
'was laid againſt him; and ſaid, that inſtead of 'bringing him to any trial about it, he would
'have him try it out, and proceed againſt thoſe
'his accuſers. But he excuſed himſelf, and ſaid
'it would not be decent for him to ſit Judge in 'his own cauſe. But the King ſaid to him, he was
'reſolved none other ſhould judge it, but thoſe he 'ſhould name. So he named his Chancellor, and 'his Regiſter; to whom the King added another:
'and a commiſſion being given them, they went into
'Kent, and ſat three weeks to find out the firſt con-
'trivers of this accuſation. And now every one
'diſowned it, ſince they ſaw he was ſtill firmly rooted
'in the King's eſteem and favour. But it being ob-
'ſerved, that the Commiſſioners proceeded faintly,
'Cranmer's friends moved, that ſome man of courage
'and authority might be ſent thither, to canvas this
'accu-

(58) Hiſt. of the Reformation, vol. i. p. 328, 329 same notions as Calvin about Predestination and Grace. He also was zealous at first for the real presence, but afterwards altered his mind (q). And he seemed to make Ecclesiastical

(q) Strype, ubi supra, p. 65, 66.

' accusation more carefully. So Dr. Lee, Dean of ' York, was brought up about Allhallow-tide, and ' sent into Kent. And he, who had been well ac- ' quainted with the arts of discovering secrets, when ' he was one of the visiters of the Abbies, managed ' it more vigorously. He ordered a search to be ' made of all suspected persons; among whose papers ' letters were found, both from the Bishop of Win- ' chester, and Dr. London, and some of those whom ' Cranmer had treated with the greatest freedom and ' kindness, in which the whole plot against him was ' discovered. But it was now near the Session of ' Parliament: and the King was satisfied with the ' discovery, but thought it not fit to make much noise ' of it. And he received no addresses from the ' Archbishop to prosecute it further: who was so ' noted for his clemency, and following our Saviour's ' rule of doing good for evil, that it was commonly ' said, the way to get his favour was to do him an ' injury. These were the only instances in which he ' expressed his resentments. Two of the conspira- ' tors against him had been persons signally obliged ' by him. The one was the Bishop Suffragan of ' Dover; the other was a civilian, whom he had em- ' ployed much in his business. But all the notice he ' took of it was to shew them their letters, and to ' admonish them to be more faithful and honest for ' the future. Upon which he freely forgave them, ' and carried it so to them afterwards, as if he had ' absolutely forgotten what they had contrived ' against him. And a person of quality coming to ' him about that time, to obtain his favour and as- ' sistance in a suit, in which he was to move the King, ' he went about it, and had almost procured it: but ' the King calling to mind, that he had been one of ' his secret accusers, asked him whether he took him ' for his friend. He answered that he did so. Then ' the King said, the other was a knave, and his mortal ' enemy; and bad him, when he should see him next, ' call him knave to his face. Cranmer answered, ' that such language did not become a Bishop. But ' the King sullenly commanded him to do it; yet his ' modesty was such, that he could not obey so harsh a ' command. And so he passed the matter over. ' When these things came to be known, all persons, ' that were not unjustly prejudiced against him, ' acknowledged, that his behaviour was suitable to ' the example and doctrine of the meek and lowly ' Saviour of the world: and very well became so ' great a Bishop, and such a reformer of the Chris- ' tian Religion; who in those sublime and extraor- ' dinary instances practised that which he taught ' others to do (58).'

(58) Hist. of the Reformation, vol. i. p. 328, 329.

Archbishop Cranmer was a great friend and patron of learned foreigners, who had been persecuted for their attachment to the principles of the Reformation. Mr. Gilpin says, ' the suffering professors of Protes- ' tantism, who were scattered in great numbers about ' the various countries of Europe, were always sure ' of an asylum with him. His Palace at Lambeth ' might be called a seminary of learned men; the ' greater part of whom persecution had driven from ' home. Here, among other celebrated reformers, ' Martyr, Bucer, Alesius, Phage found sanctuary. ' Martyr, Bucer, and Phage were liberally pensioned ' by the Archbishop, till he could otherwise provide ' for them. It was his wish to fix them in the two ' Universities, where he hoped their great knowledge, ' and spirit of inquiry, would forward his designs of ' restoring learning; and he at length obtained Pro- ' fessorships for them all. Bucer and Phage were ' settled at Cambridge; where they only shewed ' what might have been expected from them, both ' dying within a few months after their arrival. But ' at Oxford, Martyr acted a very conspicuous part; ' and contributed to introduce among the Students ' there a very liberal mode of thinking.

' Alesius had been driven from Scotland, his native ' country, for the novelty of his opinions. The ' cause in which he suffered, added to his abilities ' and learning, so far recommended him to the Uni- ' versity of Leipsic, to which he retired, that he was ' chosen a Professor there. At this place he became ' acquainted with Melancthon, who having written a ' treatise on some part of the controversy between the ' Papists and Protestants, was desirous of consulting ' the Archbishop on a few points; and engaged ' Alesius, otherwise not averse to the employment, to ' undertake a voyage into England for that purpose. ' In the course of the conference, the Archbishop was ' so much taken with his simplicity and learning, ' that he settled a pension on him, and retained him ' in his family.

' The misfortunes of the times drew Alasco also ' into England, where the Archbishop became an ' early patron to him; and shewed, on this occasion ' at least, the candour and liberality of his senti- ' ments, by permitting a person, who held many ' opinions very different from his own, to collect his ' brethren, and such as chose to communicate with ' him, into a Church. At the head of this little ' assembly Alasco long presided; exhibiting an emi- ' nent example of piety and decency of manners.

' Among other learned foreigners, John Sleidan ' was under particular obligations to the Archbishop. ' Sleidan was, at that time, engaged in writing the ' History of the Reformation; a work from which ' much was expected; and which the Archbishop, by ' allowing him a pension, and opportunities of study, ' enabled him to prosecute with less difficulty, than had attended the beginning of his labours (59).'

(59) Life of Cranmer, p. 133, 134, 135.

As Archbishop Cranmer was a learned man him- self, so he was also a great patron of all solid learn- ing, and of whatever he thought calculated to promote it. Mr. Gilpin observes, that ' the Arch- ' bishop always thought himself much interested ' in the welfare of both the Universities, but of ' Cambridge in particular; and though he does not ' appear to have had any legal power there, yet such ' was his interest at Court, and such was the general ' dependence of the more eminent Members of that ' Society upon him, that scarcely any thing was done ' there, either of a public or a private nature, with- ' out consulting him. It was his chief endeavour to ' encourage, as much as possible, a spirit of inquiry; ' and to rouse the Students from the slumber of their ' predecessors; well knowing, the libertas philoso- ' phandi was the great mean of detecting error, and ' that true learning could never be at variance with ' true religion. Ascham, and Cheke, two of the ' most elegant scholars of that age, were chiefly relied ' on, and consulted by the Archbishop in this ' work (60).'

(60) Ibid. p. 129.

Mr. Gilpin also observes, that ' Leland, the first ' British Antiquarian, was among the Archbishop's ' particular friends. Leland had a wonderful faci- ' lity in learning languages; and was esteemed the ' first Linguist in Europe. The Archbishop soon ' took notice of him; and, with his usual discern- ' ment, recommended him to be the King's Libra- ' rian. His genius threw him on the study of anti- ' quities; and his opportunities, on those of his own ' country. The Archbishop, in the mean time, by ' procuring preferment for him, enabled him to make ' those inquiries, to which his countrymen have been ' so much indebted.

' Among others, who were under obligations to ' the Archbishop's generosity, was the amiable Bishop ' Latimer; who not choosing to be reinstated in his ' old Bishopric, and having made but an indifferent ' provision for his future necessities, spent a great part ' of his latter life with the Archbishop, at Lambeth.

' Besides this intimacy with learned men at home, ' the Archbishop held a constant correspondence with ' most of the learned men in Europe.

' The great patron of Erasmus had been Archbi- ' shop Warham; than whom, to give Popery its due, ' few churchmen of those times led a more apostolical ' life. When Cranmer succeeded Warham, Erasmus ' was in the decline of age. He found, however, during ſtical Functions and Offices wholly dependant on the Magiſtrate, as much as the Civil were (r). What was moſt blameable in his Conduct (beſides his Recantation) was the part

(r) Burnet, vol. i. p. 172.

' during the ſhort time he lived, as beneficent a ' friend under the new Archbiſhop, as he had loſt in ' the old one.

' The Primate correſponded alſo with Oſiander, ' Melancthon, and Calvin, His foreign correſpond- ' ence, indeed, was ſo large, that he appointed a ' perſon with a ſalary at Canterbury, whoſe chief ' employment it was, to forward, and receive, his ' packets.

' Among the moſt eminent of his correſpondents, ' was Herman, Archbiſhop and Elector of Cologn. ' This Prelate had been early impreſſed with the ' principles of the Reformation by Melancthon; and ' had uſed all his influence to introduce them in his ' Electorate. But he met with powerful oppoſition; ' the Pope and Emperor combining againſt him, the ' former in his ſpiritual, the latter in his temporal ' capacity. So potent a combination cruſhed him. ' Terms, indeed, were offered; but he would hearken ' to no diſhonourable compromiſe. " Nothing," ' he would ſay, " can happen to me unexpectedly: " I have long ſince fortified my mind againſt every " event." Inſtead of a ſplendid life, therefore, at ' variance with his opinions, he choſe a private ſta- ' tion; in which he enjoyed the pleaſures of ſtudy, ' the friendſhip of good men, and the tranquility of ' a good conſcience (61).'

(61) Life of Cranmer, p. 136, 137, 138.

Of the learning of Archbiſhop Cranmer, Mr. Gilpin remarks, that ' it was chiefly confined to his ' profeſſion. He had applied himſelf in Cambridge ' to the ſtudy of the Greek and Hebrew languages; ' which though eſteemed at that time as the mark of ' hereſy, appeared to him the only ſources of attain- ' ing a critical knowledge of the Scriptures. He ' had ſo accurately ſtudied canon-law, that he was ' eſteemed the beſt canoniſt in England: and his ' reading in theology was ſo extenſive, and his col- ' lections from the Fathers ſo very voluminous, that ' there were few points, in which he was not accu- ' rately informed; and on which he could not give ' the opinions of the ſeveral ages of the Church from ' the times of the Apoſtles. " If I had not ſeen " with my own eyes," ſays Peter Martyr, " I could " not eaſily have believed, with what infinite pains " and labour, he had digeſted his great reading into " particular chapters, under the heads of Councils, " Canons, Decrees, &c." His parts were ſolid, ' rather than ſhining; and his memory ſuch, that it ' might be called an index to the books he had read, ' and the collections he had made (62).'

(62) Ibid. p. 217, 218.

' He was a ſenſible writer, rather nervous than ' elegant. His writings were entirely confined to ' the great controverſy which then ſubſiſted; and ' contain the whole ſum of the theological learning ' of thoſe times. His Library was filled with a very ' noble collection of books; and was open to all men ' of letters. " I meet with authors here, Roger " Aſcham would ſay, which the two Univerſities " cannot furniſh." At the Archbiſhop's death, the ' greater part of his original MSS. were left at his ' Palace of Ford near Canterbury, where they fell ' into the hands of his enemies. In the days of Eli- ' zabeth, Archbiſhop Parker, who had an intimation, ' that many of them were ſtill in being, obtained an ' order from Lord Burleigh, then Secretary of State, ' in the year 1563, to ſearch for them in all ſuſpected ' places; and recovered a great number of them. ' They found their way afterwards into ſome of the ' principal Libraries of England; but the greateſt col- ' lection of them were depoſited in Benet-College in ' Cambridge (63).'

(63) Ibid. p. 220, 221.

Mr. Gilpin, after remarking that Archbiſhop Cranmer preached often, wherever he viſited, ſays, ' In his ſermons to the people he was very plain and ' inſtructive; inſiſting chiefly on the eſſentials of ' Chriſtianity.'—' Sir Richard Morriſon, a Gentle- ' man who had been much employed in embaſſies ' abroad, both under Henry the eighth and Edward ' the ſixth, gives us this character of the Archbiſhop's ' ſermons, of which he was a frequent auditor. " The ſubjects of his ſermons, for the moſt part, " were, from whence ſalvation is to be fetched; and " on whom the confidence of man ought to lean. " They inſiſted much on doctrines of faith and " works; and taught what the fruits of faith were, " and what place was to be given to works. They " inſtructed men in the duties they owed their " neighbour; and that every one was our neighbour, " to whom we might any way do good. They de- ' clared, what men ought to think of themſelves, " after they had done all; and laſtly, what promiſes " Chriſt hath made; and who they are, to whom he " will make them good. Thus he brought in the " true preaching of the Goſpel, altogether different " from the ordinary way of preaching in thoſe days, " which was to treat concerning ſaints, to tell legen- " dary tales of them, and to report miracles wrought " for the confirmation of tranſubſtantiation, and " other Popiſh corruptions. And ſuch a heat of " conviction accompanied his ſermons, that the peo- " ple departed from them with minds poſſeſſed of a " great hatred of vice; and burning with a deſire of " virtue (64)."

(64) Ibid. p. 161, 162, 163.

He was a great œconomiſt of his time. Mr. Gilpin ſays, ' He roſe commonly at five o'clock; and con- ' tinued in his ſtudy till nine. Theſe early hours, ' he would ſay, were the only hours he could call his ' own. After breakfaſt he generally ſpent the re- ' mainder of the morning either in public, or private ' buſineſs. His Chapel-hour was eleven; and his ' dinner-hour twelve. After dinner, he ſpent an ' hour either in converſation with his friends, in ' playing at cheſs, or in what he liked better, over- ' looking a cheſs-board. He then retired again to ' his ſtudy, till his Chapel-bell rang at five. After ' prayers, he generally walked till ſix, which was, in ' thoſe times, the hour of ſupper. His evening meal ' was ſparing. Often he ate nothing; and when ' that was the caſe, it was his uſual cuſtom, as he ſat ' down to table, to draw on a pair of gloves; which ' was as much as to ſay, that his hands had nothing ' to do. After ſupper, he ſpent an hour in walking, ' and another in his ſtudy, retiring to his bed-cham- ' ber about nine. This was his uſual mode of liv- ' ing, when he was moſt vacant; but very often his ' afternoons, as well as his mornings, were engaged ' in buſineſs. To this his cheſs-hour after dinner ' was commonly firſt aſſigned, and the remainder of ' the afternoon, as the occaſion required. He gene- ' rally however contrived, if poſſible, even in the ' buſieſt day, to devote ſome portion of his time to ' his books beſides the morning. And Mr. Fox ' tells us, he always accuſtomed himſelf to read and ' write in a ſtanding poſture; eſteeming conſtant ſit- ' ting very pernicious to a ſtudious man (65).'

(65) Ibid. p. 216, 217.

Mr. Gilpin alſo obſerves, that ' he was a very ' amiable maſter in his family; and admirably pre- ' ſerved the difficult medium between indulgence and ' reſtraint. He had, according to the cuſtom of the ' times, a very numerous retinue; among whom the ' moſt exact order was obſerved. Every week the ' Steward of his houſhold held a kind of court in the ' great Hall of his Palace, in which all family affairs ' were ſettled; ſervants wages were paid; complaints ' were heard; and faults examined. Delinquents ' were publickly rebuked, and after the third admo- ' nition diſcharged.

' His hoſpitality and charities were great and no- ' ble, equal to his ſtation, greater often than his abi- ' lities. A plentiful table was among the virtues of ' thoſe days. His was always bountifully covered. ' In an upper room was ſpread his own; where he ' ſeldom wanted company of the firſt diſtinction. ' Here a great many learned foreigners were daily ' entertained, and partook of his bounty. In his ' great Hall a long table was plentifully covered, ' every day, for gueſts, and ſtrangers of a lower ' rank; at the upper end of which were three ſmaller ' tables, deſigned for his own Officers, and inferior ' Gentlemen. The learned Tremellius, who had part he had in Lambert's death (s), and in Joan Bocher's and Van Pare's (t). But notwithstanding theſe blemiſhes, he muſt be allowed to have been the Glory of England, and one of the chief Founders and Ornaments of the Reformation.

' himſelf

(s) Burnet, ubi ſupra, vol. i. p. 253.

(t) Idem, vol. ii. p. 111, 112.

' himſelf often been an eye-witneſs of the Archbi-
' ſhop's hoſpitality, gives this character of it:
' Archiepiſcopi domus, publicum erat doctis, et piis om-
' nibus hoſpitium; quod ipſe hoſpes, Mecænas, et pater,
' talibus ſemper patere voluit, quoad vixit, aut potuit;
' homo φιλοξενος nec minus φιλολογος.'

' Among other inſtances of the Archbiſhop's
' charity, we have one recorded which was truly
' noble. After the deſtruction of monaſteries, and
' before hoſpitals were erected, the nation ſaw no
' ſpecies of greater miſery, than that of wounded
' and diſbanded ſoldiers. For the uſe of ſuch miſe-
' rable objects, as were landed on the ſouthern coaſts
' of the iſland, the Archbiſhop fitted up his Manor-
' houſe of Beckeſburn in Kent. He formed it indeed
' into a compleat Hoſpital; appointing a Phyſician,
' a Surgeon, Nurſes; and every thing proper, as well
' for food, as phyſic. Nor did his charity ſtop here.
' Each man, on his recovery, was furniſhed with ' money to carry him home, in proportion to the
' diſtance of his abode (66)."

(66) Life of Cranmer, p. 233.

It appears, that in his youth, and even after he became an Archbiſhop, Cranmer was a good horſeman, and not unpractiſed in field-ſports and exerciſes. Mr. Strype ſays, ' Though his father were minded
' to have his ſon educated in learning, yet he would
' not he ſhould be ignorant of civil and gentleman-
' like exerciſes. Inſomuch that he uſed himſelf to ' ſhoot. And many times he permitted himſelf to ' hunt and hawk, and to ride rough horſes. So that ' when he was Biſhop, he feared not to ride the
' rougheſt horſes that came into his ſtables; which he ' would do very comely. As otherwiſe, at all times,
' there was not any in his houſe that would become ' an horſe better. And after his ſtudies, when it was ' time for recreation, he would both hawk and hunt,
' the game being prepared for him. And ſometimes
' he would ſhoot in the long bow, and many times
' kill his deer with the croſs-bow, though his ſight
' was not perfect; for he was pore-blind (67).'

(67) Memorials of Archbiſhop Cranmer, p. 2.

It has been taken notice of in the text, that after the paſſing of the Act for the Six Articles, Archbiſhop Cranmer ſent his wife into Germany. But ſhe afterwards returned again to England; and Mr. Strype informs us, that ' in the time of King Edward, when
' the marriage of the Clergy was allowed, he brought ' her forth, and lived openly with her (68).' Mr. Gilpin ſays, ' He left behind him a widow and chil' dren; but as he always kept his family in obſcurity,
' for prudential reaſons, we know little about them.
' They had been kindly provided for by Henry the ' Eighth; who, without any ſolicitation from the ' Primate himſelf, gave him a conſiderable grant
' from the Abbey of Welbeck in Nottinghamſhire;
' which his family enjoyed after his deceaſe. King
' Edward made ſome addition to his private fortune:
' and his heirs were reſtored in blood by an Act of ' Parliament, in the reign of Elizabeth (69).'

(68) Ibid. p. 418.

(62) Life, p. 235.

Mr. Hume ſays, that Archbiſhop Cranmer was ' undoubtedly a man of merit; poſſeſſed of learning
' and capacity; and adorned with candour, ſincerity,
' and beneficence, and all thoſe virtues which were
' fitted to render him uſeful and amiable in ſociety.
' His moral qualities procured him univerſal reſpect;
' and the courage of his martyrdom, though he fell
' ſhort of the rigid inflexibility obſerved in many,
' made him the hero of the Proteſtant party (70).']

(70) Hiſtory of England, vol. iv. p. 461. edit. 2vo. 1763.

T.

 [CRASHAW (RICHARD), (*) an accompliſhed Scholar and a devout Poet of the laſt century, whoſe genius and virtue, though celebrated by one of the moſt eloquent among his poetical cotemporaries, have ſuffered ſuch unmerited neglect, that his name was omitted in the firſt edition of this work. The ſingular incidents of his life, and the peculiar turn of his conmpoſitions may, in great meaſure, account for the oblivion into which he ſunk for ſo conſiderable a period. Few particulars of his perſonal hiſtory can be traced; and for theſe we are chiefly indebted to Anthony Wood; who placing the name of Craſhaw in his Liſt of Perſons admitted to Degrees in Oxford [A] Ann. Dom. 1641, 17 Car. I. proceeds to inform us, that he was the ſon of an eminent Divine whoſe name was William; that he was educated at the Charterhouſe, that he became a Student of Pembroke-hall, and a Fellow of Peterhouſe in Cambridge, where he was diſtinguiſhed for his poetical talents in 1637; for it appears from the ſignature to one of his academical Latin Poems, that he was at this time Fellow of Peterhouſe (a). As the reſearches which have been made in the two ſocieties of Cambridge to which this amiable ſcholar belonged, have furniſhed no new memorials of his perſon or his genius, we muſt content ourſelves with repeating the few melancholy incidents which have hitherto formed the ſlender hiſtory of his life. In 1644, when the Earl of Mancheſter, under the authority of the Parliament, new-modelled the Univerſity of Cambridge, by expelling ſuch Members as refuſed the Covenant, Craſhaw, on the loſs of his Fellowſhip, ſought a refuge in France, and embraced the religion of that country [B]. Being found there in great diſtreſs by Cowley, his generous

(*) This article has been obligingly preſented to the Editor by William Hayley, Eſq.

(a) Nichol's Poems, vol. vii. p. 103.

[A] Degrees in Oxford.] Not that it appears ſo in the public Regiſter, ſays Wood, but in the private obſervations of a certain Maſter of Arts, that was this year living in the Univerſity; but in what degree he was incorporated thoſe obſervations mention not (1).

(1) Ath. Oxon. vol. ii. Faſt. p. 3.

The name of Richard Craſhaw occurs in the Index to the manuſcript Lives of illuſtrious men, educated at Cambridge, which were compiled by Morris Drake Morris, and are preſerved in the Harleian collection. But this Index ſeems to comprize a Liſt of all the Lives, which the author intended to execute; for in his work itſelf, which he left unfiniſhed, no article is allotted to our Poet.

[B] The religion of that country.] Thoſe who have attributed the converſion of Craſhaw to motives of intereſt, muſt have been utterly unacquainted with the extreme tenderneſs and enthuſiaſm of his character. So far from being induced to change his religion from any worldly motives, he ſeems rather to have been converted by his paſſionate admiration for that fair canonized enthuſiaſt, St. Tereſa of Spain: her pious compoſitions appear to have been his favorite ſtudy, and the reader who peruſes the following addreſs to her, whatever he may think concerning the tender bigotry of the Poet, will hardly ſuſpect that his piety was not perfectly ſincere.

O thou undaunted daughter of deſires,
By all thy dower of lights and fires;
By all the eagle in thee, all the dove,
By all thy lives and deaths of love;
By thy large draughts of intellectual day,
And by thy thirſts of love more large than they;

By

generous admirer, in 1646. He was recommended by that Poet to the patronage of the exiled Queen, Henrietta Maria. This Princeſs, who wanted rather power than inclination to reward Engliſh Catholics, ſupplied Craſhaw with Letters of Recommendation to Italy. He became Secretary to a Cardinal at Rome; and obtained the office of a Canon in the Church of Loretto, where he died of a fever ſoon after his election; and to uſe Wood's expreſſion, about 1650—Had the intereſting letters of Cowley been given to the world by his friend and biographer Dr. Sprat, they would probably have ſupplied us with many particulars relating to a literary exile, ſo warmly beloved by a Poet remarkable for the fervency and ſteadineſs of his friendſhip. But although ſuch particulars might have gratified our curioſity, they could hardly have added to the honour which the talents and virtues of Craſhaw have received, from the Poem of Cowley on his Death [C]. Our author appears to have been perſonally regarded by another very eminent literary character of his time [D]. Whatever eſteem his genius and his probity might obtain from

By all thy brim-fill'd bowls of fierce deſire,
By thy laſt morning's draught of liquid fire;
By the full kingdom of that final kiſs,
That ſeal'd thy parting ſoul and made thee his;
By all the heavens, thou haſt in him
Fair ſiſter of the ſeraphim;
By all of him we have in thee,
Leave nothing of myſelf in me;
Let me ſo read thy life, that I
Unto all life of mine may die (2).

(2) Craſhaw's Poems, p. 197.

[C] On his death.] "Cowley ſeems to have had," ſays Dr. Johnſon, "what Milton is believed to have "wanted, the ſkill to rate his own performances by "their juſt value; and has therefore cloſed his Miſ-"cellanies with the Verſes upon Craſhaw, which "apparently excell all that have gone before them; "and in which there are beauties which common "authors may juſtly think not only above their at-"tainment, but above their ambition (3)."

(3) Life of Cowley.

The Poem, which our celebrated Critic has thus commended, with a quaint obſcurity, rarely found in his forcible language, is indeed ſo beautiful, and ſo highly honourable, both to Craſhaw and Cowley, that long as it is, the poetical reader may wiſh to find it inſerted here at full length.

On the DEATH of Mr. CRASHAW.

Poet and Saint! to thee alone are given
The two moſt ſacred names of earth and heaven;
The hard and rareſt union which can be,
Next that of Godhead and humanity.
Long did the Muſes baniſh'd ſlaves abide,
And built vain pyramids to mortal pride:
Like Moſes thou (tho' ſpells and charms withſtand)
Haſt brought them nobly home, back to their holy land.

Ah, wretched we, Poets of earth! but thou
Wert living the ſame Poet which thou'rt now;
Whilſt angels ſing to thee their ayres divine,
And joy in an applauſe ſo great as thine.
Equal ſociety with them to hold,
Thou need'ſt not make new ſongs, but ſay the old;
And they (kind ſpirits!) ſhall all rejoice to ſee,
How little leſs than they, exalted man may be.

Still the old heathen gods in numbers dwell,
The heavenlieſt thing on earth ſtill keeps up hell:
Nor have we yet quite purg'd the Chriſtian land;
Still idols here, like calves at Bethel ſtand.
And tho' Pan's death long ſince all or'cles broke,
Yet ſtill in rhyme the fiend Apollo ſpoke;
Nay, with the worſt of heathen dotage, we (Vain men!) the monſter woman deifie;
Find ſtars, and tie our fates there in a face,
And Paradiſe in them, by whom we loſt it, place.
What diff'rent faults corrupt our muſes thus?
Wanton as girls, as old wives fabulous.

Thy ſpotleſs muſe, like Mary, did contain
The boundleſs Godhead; ſhe did well diſdain
That her eternal verſe employed ſhould be
On a leſs ſubject than eternity;
And for a ſacred miſtreſs ſcorn'd to take
But her whom God himſelf ſcorn'd not his ſpouſe to make:
It (in a kind) her miracle did do,
A fruitful mother was, and virgin too.

How well (bleſt Swan) did fate contrive thy death,
And made thee render up thy tuneful breath
In thy great miſtreſs' arms? Thou moſt divine,
And richeſt offering of Loretto's ſhrine!
Where, like ſome holy ſacrifice t' expire,
A fever burns thee and love lights the fire.
Angels (they ſay) brought the fam'd chapel there,
And bore the ſacred load in triumph thro' the air:
'Tis ſurer much they brought thee there; and they,
And thou, their charge, went ſinging all the way.

Pardon, my mother Church, if I conſent
That angels led him, when from thee he went;
For ev'n in error, ſure no danger is,
When join'd with ſo much piety as his.
Ah! mighty God, with ſhame I ſpeak't, and grief;
Ah! that our greateſt faults were in belief!
And our weak reaſon were ev'n weaker yet,
Rather than thus, our will's too ſtrong for it!
His faith, perhaps, in ſome nice tenets might
Be wrong; his life, I'm ſure, was in the right:
And I, myſelf, a Catholick will be;
So far at leaſt, great Saint! to pray to thee.

Hail, Bard triumphant! and ſome care beſtow
On us, the Poets militant below:
Oppos'd by our old enemy, adverſe Chance,
Attack'd by Envy and by Ignorance;
Enchain'd by Beauty, tortured by deſires,
Expos'd by Tyrant-love, to ſavage beaſts and fires.
Thou from low earth in nobler flames didſt riſe,
And like Elijah mount alive the ſkies.
Eliſha like (but with a wiſh much leſs,
More fit thy greatneſs and my littleneſs;)
Lo here I beg (I whom thou once didſt prove
So humble to eſteem, ſo good to love)
Not that thy ſpirit might on me doubled be,
I aſk but half thy mighty ſpirit for me:
And when my muſe ſoars with ſo ſtrong a wing,
'Twill learn of things divine, and firſt of thee to ſing.

In theſe verſes, fine as they are, Cowley has ſometimes fallen into the principal defect of the Poet whom he is praiſing. He now and then ſpeaks of ſacred things with a vulgar and ludicrous familiarity of language, "by which (to uſe a happy expreſſion of "Dr. Johnſon's) Readers, far ſhort of ſanctity, may "be offended in the preſent age, when devotion, "perhaps not more fervent, is more delicate."—Let us add, that if the poetical talents of Craſhaw ſeem not to anſwer this glowing panygerick; yet in his higher character of Saint, he appears to have had the pureſt title to this affectionate Eulogy.

[D] Another very eminent literary character of his time.] The learned Selden, who in his Table Talk has the following paſſage under the article Poetry.

"I never converted but two, the one was Mr. "Craſhaw from writing againſt plays, by telling him "a way how to underſtand that place (of putting on "women's apparel) which has nothing to do in the "buſineſs; as neither has it that the fathers ſpeak "againſt plays in their time with reaſon enough; for "they had real idolatries mixed with their plays, "having three altars perpetually upon the ſtage."

his

his contemporaries, his poetry was ſinking into utter oblivion, when the merits of this neglected Bard were aſſerted by an Editor who favoured the public with a judicious ſelection from his works (b). But his zeal in vindicating the memory of Craſhaw, has led him to make ſome ſevere, and, we apprehend, unjuſt remarks on ſeveral Engliſh Poets; particularly on Pope, who ſeems to be wrongfully accuſed of an invidious deſire to ſink the reputation of his poetical and Catholic brother: A point, that for the credit of Parnaſſus, we ſhall diſcuſs in a note of conſiderable length [E]. One of the moſt ſtriking perform-

(b) See Poetry, by R. Craſhaw, publiſhed by Peregrine Philips, 1785.

[E] A note of conſiderable length.] We ſhall begin with quoting the paſſages from Pope's Letters, in which he ſpeaks of our author.

" This Poem (the celebrated Latin production of Strada, on the Nightingale) was many years ſince imitated by Craſhaw, out of whoſe verſes the following are very remarkable.

From this to that, from that to this he flies,
Feels Muſic's pulſe in all its arteries;
Caught in a net, which there Apollo ſpreads,
His fingers ſtruggle with the vocal threads"(4).

(4) Pope's Letters to H. Cromwell, Lett. xxii. Nov. 11, 1710.

LETTER XXVI.

Dec. 17, 1710.

" It ſeems that my late mention of Craſhaw, and my quotation from him, has moved your curioſity. I therefore ſend you the whole author, who has held a place among my other books of this nature for ſome years; in which time, having read him twice or thrice, I find him one of thoſe whoſe works may juſt deſerve reading. I take this Poet to have writ like a Gentleman; that is, at leiſure hours, and more to keep out of idleneſs than to eſtabliſh a reputation; ſo that nothing regular or juſt can be expected from him. All that regards deſign, form, fable, (which is the ſoul of poetry); all that concerns exactneſs or conſent of parts (which is the body) will probably be wanting; only pretty conceptions, fine metaphors, glittering expreſſions, and ſomething of a neat caſt of verſe (which are properly the dreſs, gems, or looſe ornaments of poetry) may be found in theſe verſes. This is indeed the caſe of moſt other poetical Writers of Miſcellanies; nor can it well be otherwiſe, ſince no man can be a true Poet who writes for diverſion only. Theſe authors ſhould be conſidered as verſifiers and witty men, rather than as Poets; and under this head will only fall the thoughts, the expreſſions, and the numbers. Theſe are only the pleaſing part of poetry, which may be judged of at a view, and comprehended all at once. And (to expreſs myſelf like a painter) their colouring entertains the ſight, but the lines and life of the picture are not to be inſpected too narrowly.

This author formed himſelf upon Petrarch, or rather upon Marino. His thoughts, one may obſerve, in the main, are pretty; but oftentimes farfetched, and too often ſtrained and ſtiffened to make them appear the greater. For men are never ſo apt to think a thing great, as when it is odd or wonderful; and inconſiderate authors would rather be admired than underſtood. This ambition of ſurprizing a reader, is the true natural cauſe of all fuſtian or bombaſt in poetry. To confirm what I have ſaid, you need but look into his firſt Poem of the Weeper, where the 2d, 4th, 6th, 14th, 21ſt ſtanzas are as ſublimely dull, as the 7th, 8th, 9th, 16th, 17th, 20th, and 23d ſtanzas of the ſame copy are ſoft and pleaſing; and if theſe laſt want any thing, it is an eaſier and more unaffected expreſſion. The remaining thoughts in that poem might have been ſpared, being either but repetitions, or very trivial and mean: and by this example in the firſt, one may gueſs all the reſt to be like this, a mixture of tender gentle thoughts, and ſuitable expreſſions, of forced and inextricable conceits, and of needleſs fillers-up to the reſt. From all which it is plain, this author writ faſt, and ſet down what came uppermoſt. A reader may ſkim off the froth, and uſe the clear underneath; but if he goes too deep, he will meet with a mouthful of dregs: either the top or bottom of him are good for little; but what he did in his own natural middle way is beſt.

To ſpeak of his numbers is a little difficult, they are ſo various and irregular, and moſtly Pindaric. 'Tis evident his heroic verſe (the beſt example of which is his Muſic's Duel) is careleſsly made up: but one may imagine from what it now is, that had he taken more care, it had " been muſical and pleaſing " enough; not extremely majeſtic, but ſweet: and " the time conſidered of his writing, he was (even " as uncorrect as he is) none of the worſt verſifi- " cators.

" I will juſt obſerve, that the beſt pieces of this " author are a Paraphraſe on Pſalm xxiii,—On " Leſſius,—Epitaph on Mr. Aſhton,—Wiſhes to his " ſuppoſed Miſtreſs, and the Dies Iræ."

" The Reader muſt determine (ſays the Editor of " Craſhaw) whether Mr. Pope has mentioned the " beſt pieces: on the contrary, whether many much " ſuperior are not to be met with in the little work " before us; and if ſo, what fair reaſon could there " be for ſuch a partial ſelection (4)."

(5) Philip's Craſhaw, p. 22.

In anſwer to this queſtion, it may be ſufficient to obſerve, that Pope, when he drew this character of Craſhaw, was writing, at the age of twenty-two, a private letter to a friend, and of courſe delivered his genuine ſentiments of the author in queſtion, without a chance of his being influenced by any invidious deſign. Whoever takes the trouble of comparing the opinion of Pope with the paſſages of Craſhaw, to which he has referred in his letter, will find no reaſon to queſtion the integrity of his judgement. His not commending the tranſlation from Marino, might proceed from his contempt of the original author, who was then conſidered as the prime corrupter of Italian poetry. The Editor of Craſhaw, in ſpeaking of paſſages borrowed from his works, ſuppoſes that Pope's " faint praiſe might be the moſt " probable means of ſecreting his obligations to one " whom he affects rather to contemn." But Pope was ſo far from wiſhing to ſecrete his obligations to Craſhaw, that he has profeſſedly borrowed a line from this Poet in his Eloiſa, and ſurely no compliment could be more flattering. If Pope has taken other paſſages without acknowledgment, it is but juſt to imagine that he thought the obligation too trifling to be noticed; or what is equally probable, that he was not aware of it. Many inſtances may be found in the records of Poetry, where an author has written the verſe of another with a full perſwaſion that it belonged ſolely to himſelf. Gray, who ſeems to have been moſt ſcrupulous in noting his ſlighteſt imitations, has failed to remark that his line,

The Curfew tolls the knell of parting day, is cloſely copied, in point of expreſſion, from the following paſſage in Dryden's Prologue to his Troilus and Creſſida;

For love they rhyme diſpenſe,
That tolls the knell of their departed ſenſe:

and if our memory does not deceive us, the following very beautiful verſe in the Elegy juſt cited,

The paths of Glory lead but to the grave, is literally tranſlated from the Latin proſe of Bartholine, in his Eſſay on Daniſh Antiquities. It is highly unjuſt to accuſe an author of intentional and invidious ſecrecy, who does not always ſpecify his obligations of this kind, becauſe it is hardly poſſible, from the nature of the human faculties, that he ſhould be able, at all times, to diſtinguiſh the genuine on-performances of Craſhaw is, a Tranſlation from a poſthumous and ſcarce work of Marino, a Poet, to whom ſevere critics might apply, what Boileau ſaid of Le Moine,

Il s'eſt trop elevé pour en dire du mal;
Il s'eſt trop egaré pour en dire du bien.

that he is too ſublime to be cenſured, and too fantaſtic to be praiſed. He had certainly a ſtrong, though not a refined imagination; and as the verſion of Craſhaw is executed with ſpirit, we ſhall ſelect from it a few paſſages, with the correſponding ſtanzas of the Italian [F]. As the original verſes of Craſhaw are chiefly devoted to pious ſubjects, we ought ſpring of his own imagination, from the adopted children of memory. As it is fair, however, that all ſuch literary property ſhould be marked with the name of the original proprietor, we ſhall, in juſtice to our author, tranſcribe the paſſages of Pope, with thoſe from which they ſeem to be borrowed.

Oh! Death, all-eloquent, you only prove
What duſt we doat on, when 'tis man we love (6).

(6) Pope's Eloiſe.

All-daring duſt and aſhes, only you
Of all interpreters read nature true (7).

(7) Craſhaw's Death's Lecture.

This modeſt ſtone, what few vain marbles can,
May truly ſay, here lies an honeſt man (8).

(8) Pope's Epitaph on Fenton.

The modeſt front of this ſmall floor,
Believe me, Reader, can ſay more
Than many a braver marble can,
Here lies a truly honeſt man (9).

(9) Craſhaw's Epitaph on Mr. Aſhton.

Is it in heaven a crime to love too well (10)?

(10) Pope's Elegy to the Memory of an unfortunate Lady.

And I, what is my crime? I cannot tell,
Unleſs it be a crime to have lov'd too well (11).

(11) Craſhaw's 3d Elegy on St. Alexis.

We ſhall hazard a conjecture, that theſe Elegies of Craſhaw, ſuggeſted to Pope the idea of his Eloiſe. They are written as the complaint of a tender female deſerted on her wedding night by her bridegroom, from motives of religion. But if Pope borrowed any thing from Craſhaw in this article, it was only as the ſun borrows from the earth; when drawing from thence a mere vapor, he makes it the delight of every eye, by giving it all the tender and gorgeous colouring of heaven.

[F] Of the Italian.] The Poem of Marino was publiſhed at Venice 1633, eight years after the death of its author. It is entitled Strage de gli Innocenti; The Slaughter of the Innocents; and conſiſts of four books with the following titles, 1. Soſpetto d'Herode, Suſpicion of Herod. 2. Conſiglio de Satrapi, Council of Nobles. 3. Eſſecutione della Strage, Execution of the Slaughter. 4. Il Limbo—Limbo.—The complete Poem was publiſhed in Engliſh verſe, by an anonymous Tranſlator, 1675 (12): but in Craſhaw we find only the firſt book, which opens thus,

(12) Maty's Review, April 1785.

I.

Muſe, now the ſervant of ſoft loves no more,
Hate is thy theme; and Herod, whoſe unbleſt
Hand—what dares not jealous greatneſs?—tore
A thouſand ſweet babes from their mother's breaſt,
The blooms of martyrdom! O be a door
Of language to my infant lips, ye beſt
Of confeſſors! whoſe throats anſwering his ſwords,
Gave forth your blood for breath!—ſpoke ſouls for words.

I.

Muſa, non piú d'amor cautiam lo ſdegno!
Del crudo Ré che mille infanti afflitti
(Ahi! che non pote aviditá di regno?)
Fé dal materno ſen cader trafitti.
E voi reggete voi l'infermo ingegno
Nantii di Chriſto, e teſtimoni invitti
Che deſte fuor de le ſquarciate gole
Sangue in vece di voce, e di parole.

After an invocation to the Viceroy of Naples, the native city of Marino, the Poem exhibits this ſtriking portrait of Lucifer.

V.

Below the bottom of the great abyſs,
There, where one center reconciles all things,
The world's profound heart pants: there placed is Miſchief's old maſter; cloſe about him clings
A curl'd knot of embracing ſnakes that kiſs
His correſpondent cheeks: theſe loathſome ſtrings
Hold the perverſe Prince in eternal ties
Faſt bound, ſince firſt he forfeited the ſkies.

VI.

The Judge of Torments and the King of Tears,
He fills a burniſh'd throne of quenchleſs fire;
And for his old fair robes of light he wears
A gloomy mantle of dark flames: the tire
That crowns his hated head on high appears,
Where ſeven tall horns, his Empire's pride, aſpire;
And, to make up hell's majeſty, each horn
Seven creſted Hydras horribly adorn.

VII.

His eyes, the ſullen dens of death and night,
Startle the dull air with a diſmal red;
Such his fell glances as the fatal light,
Of ſtaring comets that look kingdoms dead!
From his black noſtrils and blue lips, in ſpite
Of hell's own ſtink, a worſer ſtench is ſpread:
His breath hell's light'ning is; and each deep groan
Diſdains to think that heaven thunders alone.

VIII.

His flaming eyes, dire exhalation!
Unto a flaming pile gives fiery breath,
Whoſe unconſum'd conſumption preys upon
The never-dying life of a long death.
In this ſad houſe of ſlow deſtruction
(His ſhop of flames) he fries himſelf beneath
A maſs of woes; his teeth for torment gnaſh,
While his ſteel ſides ſound with his tail's ſtrong laſh.

IX.

Three rigorous Virgins waiting ſtill behind,
Aſſiſt the throne of th' iron-ſcepter'd King
With whips of thorns and knotty vipers twin'd,
They rouſe him when his rank thoughts need a ſting:
Their locks are beds of uncomb'd ſnakes, that wind
About their ſhady brows in wanton rings.
Thus reigns the wrathful King; and while he reigns
His ſcepter and himſelf both he diſdains.

V.

Sotto gli abiſſi, in mezzo al cor del Mondo
Nel punto univerſal de l'univerſo,
Dentro la bolgia del più cupo fondo
Staſi l'antico ſpirito peruerſo,
Conmordaci ritorte un groppo immondo
Lo ſtringe di cento aſpidi à traverſo.
Di tai legami in ſempiturno il cinſe
Il gran Campion, che'n Paradiſo il vinſe.

VI.

Giudice di tormento, e Re di pianto,
D'ineſtinguible foco ha' trona, e veſta;
Veſta, gia ricco, e luminoſo manto,
Hor difiamme, e di tenebre conteſta ought to obſerve, for the honour both of Poetry and Religion, that the works of our Poet have been neglected not merely becauſe they are devotional, but becauſe their author has frequently fallen into the worſt defects of ſtyle, in his mode of treating ſubjects that peculiarly require a chaſte dignity of expreſſion [G]. He ſeems to have choſen the pious George Herbert for his model; and the anonymous poems ſubjoined to the works of that very religious and once popular Bard, are ſaid, by Mr. Granger (c), to have been written by Craſhaw. The publication which bears his name [H], firſt appeared during the exile of (c) Biographical Hiſtory. Article (HERBERT).

Porta

Porta (e ſol queſto è del ſuo regno il vanto)
Di ſette corna alta corona in teſta.
Fan d'ogi' intorno al ſuo diadema regio,
Hidre verdi, e Ceraſte horribil fregio.

VII.

Ne gli occhi, oue meſtitia alberga, e morte,
Luce fiameggia torbida, e vermiglia
Gli ſquardi obliqui, e le pupille torte
Sembran Comete, è lampadi le ciglia.
E da lenari, e da le labra ſmorte
Caligine, e fetor vomita, e figlia,
Iracondi, ſuperbi, e diſperati,
Tuoni i gemiti ſon, folgori i fiati.

VIII.

Che la viſta peſtifera, e ſanguigna
Con l'alito crudel, ch áuampa, e fuma,
La pira accende horribile, e maligna,
Che'n conſumabilmente altrui conſuma.
Con amaro ſtridor batte, e digrigna
I denti aſpri di augine, e di ſchiuma;
E de membri d'acciaio entro le fiamme
F'a con E'eſtremo ſuo ſonar le ſquamme.

IX.

Tre rigoroſe Virgini vicine
Sonno aſſiſtenti, a l'infernal Tiranno,
E con sferze di vipere, e di ſpine
Intente ſempre à ſtimular lo ſtanno
Creſpi han di ſerpi innanellato il crine,
Ch' horrida intorno al Volto, ombra lor fanno
Scettro ei ſoſtien di ferro, e mentre regna
Il ſuo regno, e ſe ſteſſo abhorre, e ſdegna.

We ſhall add a ſpeech of Alecto to the infernal King, obſerving that Milton has been thought indebted to the Verſion of Craſhaw.

34.

What thy Alecto, what theſe hands can do,
Thou mad'ſt bold proof upon the brow of heaven;
Nor ſhould'ſt thou bate in pride, becauſe that now
To theſe thy ſooty kingdoms thou art driven.
Let heavens, Lord, chide above, louder than thou,
In language of his thunder; thou art even
With him below. Here thou art, Lord, alone,
Boundleſs and abſolute: hell is thine own.

35.

If uſual riot and ſtrength will do no good,
Vertues of ſtones, nor herbs; uſe ſtronger charms,
Anger and love, beſt hooks of humane blood;
If all fail, we'll put on our proudeſt arms,
And pouring on heaven's face the ſeas huge flood,
Quench his curl'd fires; we'll wake with our alarms
Ruine, wher'ere ſhe ſleeps at nature's feet,
And cruſh the world till his wide corners meet.

34.

Provaſti in Ciel la magnanim' opra
Ciò che sà far con le compagne Aletto.
Nè perc' hoggi quaggiu t'accoglia, e copra
Ombroſo albergo, e ferrugineo tetto,
Mem ſuperbir dei tù; che ſe la ſopra
Al Monarca tonante eri ſoggetto,
Qui fiedi Ré, che libero, et intero
Hai de la Terra, é l'Abiſſo impero.

35.

Se vater potrà nulla induſtria, ò ſenno,
Virtu d'herbe, e di pietre, ò ſuon di carmi
Inganna, Ira, et Amor, che ſpeſſo fenno
Correr gli huomini al ſangue, e trallar l'armi
Tu ci vedrai (ſol che ti piaccia) à un cenno
Trar le ſtelle dal Ciel, l'ombre da i marmi
Por ſoſſoura la terra, e'l mar profondo,
Crollar, ſpiantar da le radici il Mondo.

It is very remarkable that Milton has taken no notice of this Poem in his Latin Epiſtle to his elegant Italian friend, Manſo, where he alludes to the other work of Marino, whoſe life is ſuppoſed to have been written by that accompliſhed Nobleman, the Biographer of Taſſo. It is the more remarkable, as Milton viſited Italy about four years after the publication of this ſingular performance, which it ſeems he has now and then condeſcended to imitate in his infinitely nobler poem the Paradiſe Loſt, if indeed the ſimilar paſſages may be juſtly called imitations, a point that we ſhall leave the Editors of our divine Bard to ſettle.

[G] Require a chaſte dignity of expreſſion.] We ſhall inſert a very ſtriking example of the deplorable conceits by which pious poetry was ſometimes debaſed in the pages of Craſhaw upon the infant Martyrs.

To ſee both blended in one flood,
The mother's milk, the children's blood,
Makes me doubt if heaven will rather Roſes hence, or lilies gather.

Let us add, in juſtice to our unequal author, that he has paſſages as tender and as beautiful as the preceding lines are abſurd and diſguſting. The following verſes from an Epitaph, on a faithful couple buried together, have a certain pathetic ſweetneſs (bordering on affectation) highly characteriſtic of this ſingular Poet.

Peace, good Reader, do not weep!
Peace, the lovers are aſleep!
They (ſweet turtles) folded lye,
In the laſt knot love could tye.

[H] The publication which bears his name.] This volume is divided into three parts, 1. Steps to the Temple; 2. The Delight of the Muſes; 3. Sacred Poems preſented to the Counteſs of Denbigh, by her moſt devoted Servant, Richard Craſhaw, in hearty acknowledgment of his immortal obligation to her Goodneſs and Charity. Perhaps the laſt diviſion to which Car's Poem is prefixed, was the only one publiſhed in 1646. The ſecond edition appeared in 1649, and afterwards with the falſe date of 1670. Since the preceding pages were prepared for the preſs, the liberality of Dr. Farmer has indulged us with the ſight of a literary curioſity, a Collection of Sacred Epigrams in Latin, printed at Cambridge, 1634, and dedicated to Benjamin Lany, Maſter of Pembroke-hall, with the ſignature of R. C. Theſe are unqueſtionably the production of our Author, and the fruits (as he tells us in the Dedication) of a tender age. Indeed, tenderneſs and piety were the characteriſtics of Craſhaw at every period of his life; many of the Epigrams contain preciſely the turn which we find in his Engliſh compoſitions. For example, On the Infant Martyrs mentioned in a preceding note.

Sic pueros quiſquis vidit, dubitavit an illos
Lilia cælorum diceret anne Roſas.

We ſhall inſert one Epigram becauſe it contains a well-known verſe, which has been frequently celebrated without being appropriated to its real author.

Joan.

of the author, 1646. He entrusted his muse to a very affectionate Guardian, who, under the signature of Thomas Car, informs us in a few introductory verses,

Sweet Crashaw was his friend, he Crashaw's brother,
So Car hath title then: 'twas his intent
That what his riches penn'd, poor Car should print;
Nor fears he check, praising that happy one
Who was beloved by all, disprais'd by none.

Car's panegyrick does not appear extravagant; and we trust this article will not be thought too long, when it is remembered that Crashaw, however neglected in later days, was the companion of Selden, and the idol of Cowley.]

Joan. 2.
Aquæ in vinum versæ.

Unde rubor vestris, et non sua purpura lymphis;
Quæ rosa mirantes tam nova mutat aquas.
Numen (Convivæ) præsens agnoscite numen
Nympha pudica deum vidit et erubuit.

We are indebted for an English Version of it to a little circle of poetical friends, who having translated the Epigram various ways, selected the four following lines—

Whence does the chrystal redden to the eye,
And lucid water take a roseate dye?
Here own him present who gives nature law!
This element saw God; and blush'd with awe.

CREECH (THOMAS), famous for his Translations of Lucretius [A], Horace [B], and from other antient authors, both in prose and verse [C], was son of Thomas

[A] His Translation of Lucretius.] It is intitled; T. Lucretius Carus, Of the Nature of Things. Translated into English verse by Thomas Creech, A. M. and fellow of Wadham College in Oxford. It was printed at Oxford in 1682, in 8*vo.* and recommended by a Latin Distich of Dr. Edward Barnard, Savilian Professor of Astronomy in that University, and by a copy of English verses of Mr. Thomas Brown of Christ-Church. It was re-printed in the year following, with Commendatory verses by several eminent hands (1): among which, those, which pass under the names of Mr. Dryden and Mr. Waller, we are assured from undoubted authority, were not theirs. However, Mr. Dryden, who himself translated some parts of Lucretius, has given the highest character of Mr. Creech's performance, in the following words. 'This puts me in 'mind of what I owe to the ingenious and learned 'translator of Lucretius. I have not here designed to 'rob him of any part of that commendation, which he 'has so justly acquired by the whole author, whose 'fragments only fall to my portion. The ways of our 'translations are very different: he follows him more 'closely than I have done; which became an interpreter of the whole Poem. I take more liberty, because it best suited with my design, which was to 'make him as pleasing as I could. He had been too 'voluminous, had he used my method in so long a 'work, and I had certainly taken his, had I made it 'my business to translate the whole. The preference 'then is justly his, and I join with Mr. Evelyn (*) in 'the confession of it, with this additional advantage to 'him; that his reputation is already established in this 'poet, mine is to make its fortune in the world. If 'I have been any where obscure, in following our 'common author, or if Lucretius himself is to be condemned, I refer myself to his excellent Annotations, 'which I have often read, and always with some new 'pleasure (2).' Mr. Creech published an Edition of Lucretius in Latin, intitled; Titi Lucretii Cari de Rerum Natura libri sex, quibus Interpretationem et Notas addidit Thomas Creech. Oxon. 1695, 8*vo.* The Annotations on this Latin Edition were afterwards printed at the end of the English Translation, and all together by themselves. In the Edition of Mr. Creech's Lucretius, London 1714, in Two Volumes Octavo, all the verses of the Text, which Mr. Creech had left untranslated, are supplied. Those particularly that were omitted towards the end of the 4th book, where the poet treats of the nature of love, are taken from Mr. Dryden's translation of that part of the author. The Translator's Notes are disposed in the body of the Book, under the several places to which they properly belong; intermixed with several Annotations by another hand; and all together forming a compleat System of the Epicurean Philosophy (3). And here impartiality obliges us not to suppress the severe censure passed on Mr. Creech by a certain writer, who, having observed, that the only book now in being, which from one end to the other is an open defence of Atheism, is that of Lucretius, tells us (4), that 'this most impious book in Charles IId's reign 'was with infinite pains turned into English verse, 'that the smoothness and sweetness of the metre 'might supply what was wanting in the argument; 'that the elegance of the expression, the melodious 'harmony of numbers, and all those other bewitching beauties, which attend good poetry, might insensibly instil the poison into the minds of unthinking people, especially of the youth, whose imagination is generally too strong for their reason, and 'their fancy too powerful for their judgment. And 'this celebrated Translation was not only made by an 'Oxford Scholar (who was thereupon preferred) but 'it was licensed by the University of Oxford, where 'he was looked on as a raw lad, that had not read 'the Lucretius of Creech, who died, as he lived, like 'a true Atheist; but being a High-Church Priest, his 'murdering himself was not made to pass for a judgment.' This calumny is sufficiently answered in the Preface to the two volumes.

[B] His Translation of Horace.] It is entitled; The Odes, Satyrs, and Epistles of Horace. Done into English by Mr. Creech. It is dedicated To the very much esteemed John Dryden, Esq; In the Preface, having observed, that Quintilian was of opinion, that all Horace's Odes ought not to be interpreted, he adds: 'what he means by Interpretation is evident to every 'one that understands the extent of the word, and the 'Ancients method of instructing: and why this 'caution is restrained to the Odes, and not applied to 'the Satires as well, since the reason upon which he 'fixes it seems common to both, must be taken from 'the design and subject-matter of the Poems. To 'describe and reform a vicious man necessarily requires some expressions, which an Ode can never want. 'The paint, which an Artist uses, must be agreeable 'to the piece which he designs. Satire is to instruct, 'and that supposeth a knowledge and discovery of 'the Crime; while Odes are made only to delight and 'please, and therefore every thing in them that justly 'offends is unpardonable.' These principles, he says, made him cautious of some Odes, though he omitted to translate three more upon a different Account. The Odes, not translated by Mr. Creech, are; the 6th, 9th, 21st, 25th, and 27th of the Third Book; the 4th of the Fourth Book; and the 12th Epode. As to the Satires of Horace, he was advised, he tells us, to turn them to our own time, since Rome was now rivaled in her

(1) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 1104, 1105.

(*) Mr. Evelyn translated the first Book of Lucretius.

(2) Preface to the First Part of Miscellany Poems, &c. edit. 1727, p. 21.

(3) See the Preface to Creech's Lucretius, Lond. 1714.

(4) The nation vindicated from the aspersions cast on it in a late Pamphlet, intituled, A Representation of the present State of Religion, &c. P. ii. p. 38. Lond. 1712, 8*vo.*

Thomas Creech, Gent. and born, in 1659, at Blandford in Dorſetſhire. He was educated in Grammar learning under Mr. Thomas Curganven, Maſter of the Free-ſchool at Sherburne; and admitted a Commoner of Wadham College in Oxford [D], in Lent-Term 1675, under the tuition of Mr. Robert Pit, and afterwards of Mr. Robert Balch, Fellows of that College. The 28th of September the year following, he was admitted a Scholar of that Houſe, and acquired the reputation of a good Philoſopher, Poet, and a ſevere Student (a). October the 27th, 1680, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (b). In 1680, he was appointed by his Tutor Mr. Balch, then one of the Proctors of the Univerſity, his Quodrageſimal Collector of the Bachelors that were to determine the latter end of that year (c). June the 13th, 1683, he took the degree of Maſter of Arts (d); and about the beginning of November following, was elected a Probationer-Fellow of All-Souls College, having given ſingular proofs of his Claſſical learning and Philoſophy before his Examiners (e). In 1701, having taken Holy Orders, he was preſented by his College to the Living of Wellwyn in Hertfordſhire: but, before he had taken poſſeſſion of it, he unfortunately put an end to his own life [E], at Oxford (f). He has the character of (a) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 1104.

(b) Id. Faſti Oxon. vol. ii. col. 212.

(c) Id. Ath. ib.

(d) Id. Faſti, ib. col. 221.

(e) Id. Ath. ib.

(f) Jacob's Poetical Regiſter, &c. vol. i. p. 39.

her vices; and parallels for Hypocriſy, Profaneneſs, Avarice, and the like, were eaſy to be found. But thoſe crimes, he declares, 'were much out of his acquaint-'ance, and ſince the character is the ſame whoever 'the perſon is, he was not ſo fond of being hated, as 'to make any diſobliging application.' Such pains, ſays he, would look like an impertinent labour to find a dunghill, only that I might ſatisfy an unaccountable humour of dirtying one man's face, and beſpattering another. He concludes his Preface with acknowledging himſelf indebted to other writers, particularly Lord Roſcommon, to whoſe admirable verſion he owed the ſenſe, and the beſt lines in the Art of Poetry.

[C] His tranſlations from other antient authors, both in proſe and verſe.] They are: I. A Tranſlation of the Idylliums of Theocritus, with Rapin's Diſcourſe of Paſtorals, Oxford, 1684, 8*vo*; dedicated to Mr. Arthur Charlett of Trinity College in Oxford. II. The 2d Elegy of Ovid's Firſt Book of Elegies: and the 6th, 7th, 8th, and 12th of Ovid's Second Book of Elegies: and the Story of Lucretia, out of Ovid de Faſtis. III. The 2d and 3d of Virgil's Eclogues; and part of Virgil's Fourth Georgic. IV. The Thirteenth Satire of Juvenal, with Notes. V. A Tranſlation into Engliſh of the verſes prefixed to Mr. Quintinie's Compleat Gardiner. VI. The Lives of Solon, Pelopidas, and Cleomenes, from Plutarch. VII. The Life of Pelopidas from Cornelius Nepos. VIII. Laconic Apophthegms, or remarkable Sayings of the Spartans, from Plutarch. IX. A Diſcourſe concerning Socrates his Dæmon, and The two firſt Books of the Sympoſiacs, from Plutarch. X. A Tranſlation of Manilius's Aſtronomicon.

[D] Admitted a Commoner of Wadham College in Oxford.] The Author of the Poetical Regiſter (5) tells us, that his parents circumſtances not being ſufficient to ſupport him in a liberal Education, his diſpoſition and capacity for learning raiſed him a Patron in Colonel Strangeways, whoſe generoſity ſupplied that defect; and that this gentleman ſent him to Wadham-College, where he was admitted a ſcholar on the foundation.

(5) Vol. i. p. 39.

[E] He put an end to his own life.] Neither the motives to, nor the circumſtances of, this affair are certainly known. The author of the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (6), informs us, that, in the year 1700, Mr. Creech fell in love with a woman, who treated him with great neglect, though ſhe was complaiſant enough to ſeveral others. This affront he could not bear, and reſolved not to ſurvive it. Whereupon he ſhut himſelf up in his ſtudy, where he hanged himſelf about the end of June 1700, and was found in that circumſtance three days after. The Poetical Regiſter ſays nothing of the particular manner of his death, but only that he unfortunately made away with himſelf in the year 1701; and aſcribes (7) this fatal cataſtrophe of Mr. Creech's life to the moroſeneſs of his temper, which made him leſs eſteemed than his great merit deſerved, and engaged him in frequent animoſities and diſputes upon that account. B.

(6) For Sept. 1701.

(7) Ubi ſupra.

Our predeceſſor is miſtaken, both with regard to the time in which Mr. Creech became poſſeſſed of the Rectory of Welwyn, and the time of his deceaſe. In a bond for the payment of the firſt fruits of that Rectory into the Exchequer, (in the poſſeſſion of the late John Baynes, Eſq.) dated June the 9th, 1699, and in which Dr. Lloyd of Doctor's Commons, and Jacob Tonſon the Bookſeller, are bound along with him, he is called Thomas Creech de Welwin in Com. Herts. It is evident, therefore, that he had been preſented to that living in the year 1699. It is equally evident, from the Letters of Adminiſtration granted to the Executrix of his will, and from a clauſe added to the will, that he died in 1700, and that his death muſt have taken place between the 18th and the 28th of June in that year.

The account given in note [E], that our author deſtroyed himſelf becauſe he was treated with great neglect by a woman whom he loved, appears to be groundleſs. From an original letter of Arthur Charlett, preſerved in the Bodleian Library, it has lately been diſcovered, that this unhappy event was owing to a very different cauſe. There was a fellow Collegian of whom Creech frequently borrowed money; but repeating his applications too often, he met one day with ſuch a cold reception, that he retired in a fit of gloomy diſguſt, and in three days was found hanging in his ſtudy (9).

(9) Warton's Life of Ralph Bathurſt, p. 198. note.

From Creech's will, an authentic copy of which was, likewiſe, in Mr. Baynes's poſſeſſion, and of which he favoured me with a tranſcript, ſeveral particulars may be collected concerning our Poet that have not hitherto been known. In this will he orders, that his body be buried in the Church-yard of the pariſh where he dies, that no ſtone or inſcription be put upon the grave, and that nothing be given or diſtributed at his funeral beſides one pair of white gloves to each of his bearers. He adds, that he would particularly remember his College, and his good friends Colonel Codrington, Dr. Charlett, Dr. Sykes, Dr. Bathurſt, Dr. Eaton, Rivers, Hinton, Colins, Kenton, &c. but that he is not in a condition to give legacies, and he hopes none will think this omiſſion to be diſreſpect. He then directs, that all the goods he leaves behind him be ſold, and the money ariſing by the ſale, together with the ready caſh he leaves, and what debts are owing him, after his debts are paid, be divided into two equal portions, one of which he gives and bequeaths to his dear ſiſter Bridget Baſtard of Blandford in the county of Dorſet, to be employed to the beſt advantage for the uſe of his father Thomas Creech, during his natural life, and after his deceaſe to his ſaid ſiſter for ever. The other portion he gives and bequeaths to Mrs. Philadelphia Playdell of St. Giles's pariſh in Oxford, Spinſter, for ever. He likewiſe conſtitutes and appoints the ſaid Philadelphia Playdell the ſole Executrix of this his laſt Will and Teſtament. The will bears date, Jan. 18, 1699; and on the 18th of June, 1700, a direction is added, that all his written papers of all ſorts, excepting thoſe in his cheſt of drawers and his almanack, be burnt without reading. It was on the 28th of the ſame month that Letters of Adminiſtration were granted to his Executrix.

 [Beſides being Maſter of Arts, Mr. Creech took the degree of Bachelor of Divinity, on the 18th of March, 1696 (8); and he gives himſelf this title in his laſt will.

(8) Catalogue of Oxford Graduates.

of having been a man of excellent parts and found judgment; a perfect maſter of the Greek and Latin Languages; but naturally of a moroſe temper, and too apt to deſpiſe the underſtandings and performances of others (g).

(g) Jacob's Poetical Regiſter, &c. vol. i. p. 39.

Mrs. Philadelphia Playdell was a Lady in Oxford whom Mr. Creech wiſhed to have married, but he could not obtain the conſent of her friends. There is reaſon to believe that their affection was mutual; for, in a will of her's, dated April 24, 1703, ſhe makes the following bequeſt: "Item, I give and "bequeath to Mr. Thomas Creech of Blanford in "the county of Dorſett the intereſt and produce of "one hundred and fifty pounds for and during the "term of his natural life." It is moſt probable, not to ſay certain, that it muſt have been the father of the Poet whom ſhe thus remembers. This will, however, had no force, as ſhe was married, in 1704, to Mr. Ralph Hobſon, Butler of Chriſt-Church. That ſhe did not long live with her huſband, is evident from the following inſcription, which was over her tomb at Oxford, on a braſs plate, now ſuppoſed to be deſtroyed.

In Memory of Philadelphia,
Wife of
Ralph Hobſon, and Daughter of,
Richard Playdell, Gent.
She deceaſed Feb. 22th.
Ann. Dom. 1705.
Aged 34 (10).

(10) From Mr. Baynes's Communications.

As to Creech's poetry, it will ſcarcely at preſent be deemed an object which calls for much criticiſm. He has of late years been regarded rather as a good ſcholar than a good Poet. Dr. Joſeph Warton, however, who will be allowed to be an admirable judge, has ſpoken of him in terms of applauſe. "Creech," ſays the Doctor, "in truth, is a much "better Tranſlator than he is uſually ſuppoſed and "allowed to be. He is a nervous and vigorous "writer: and many parts, not only of his Lucre-"tius, but of his Theocritus and Horace (though "now decried) have not been excelled by other "Tranſlators. One of his pieces may be pronounc-"ed excellent; his Tranſlation of the thirteenth "Satire of Juvenal; equal to any that Dryden has "given us of that author (11)."

(11) Eſſay on the Writings and Genius of Pope. vol. ii. p. 400, 401.

It has hitherto been almoſt univerſally underſtood, that Mr. Creech's Tranſlation of Lucretius is his capital production. In Horace it is generally allowed that he failed; and this was early the ſentiment of the public. Dr. William Coward, in his "Licen-"tia Poetica diſcuſſed," has the following lines.

"Wherefore be wiſe, if once you've rais'd your "fame,
"And by juſt merit gain'd a popular name.
"After Lucretius was tranſlated well,
"Weak was th' attempt in Horace to excel (12)."

(12) From the Copy in the British Muſeum.

I have mentioned that for the hiſtorical part of this addition, I am indebted to the materials communicated by the late John Baynes, Eſq. It was the ſame Gentleman who enabled me to write the curious note concerning Anne, Counteſs of Dorſet, Pembroke, and Montgomery, which is ſubjoined to the article of her father, George Clifford, third Earl of Cumberland. Many other obligations would have been conferred upon the Biographia Britannica by Mr. Baynes, if he had not been cut off by a putrid fever, this month of Auguſt, 1787, in the 30th year of his age, to the great concern of his friends, and, it may be added, to the great loſs of the public; for, if his life had been continued, there is no doubt but that he would have ariſen to diſtinguiſhed eminence, both as a Lawyer and a Scholar. It is propoſed to pay a tribute of reſpect to his abilities and character, under the article of Dr. John Jebb, with whom he was cloſely connected in friendſhip, and with whom he concurred in an ardent zeal for liberty, civil and religious, though without adopting every particular idea which was entertained by that excellent man.]

K.

CRESSEY or CRESSY (HUGH-PAULIN, or SERENUS) a celebrated writer, in behalf of the Papiſts, and one of their Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtorians, who flouriſhed in the ſeventeenth Century. He derived his deſcent from an ancient and honourable family, ſeated formerly in Nottinghamſhire; but before his time it had removed into Yorkſhire, of which county he was himſelf a native, being born at Wakefield in the year 1605 (a). His father was Hugh Creſſey, Eſq; Barriſter of Lincoln's-Inn; his mother's name was Margery the daughter of Dr. Thomas Doylie, an eminent Phyſician in London (b). He was educated at a Grammar-ſchool in the place of his nativity, till ſuch time as he had attained the age of fourteen or thereabout, and then in Lent-term 1619, he was removed to Oxford where he ſtudied with great vigour and diligence, and in the year 1626 was admitted Fellow of Merton-college in that Univerſity (c). After taking the degrees of Bachelor and Maſter of Arts he entered into Holy Orders, and became Chaplain to Thomas Lord Wentworth, then Lord Preſident of the North, with whom he had the honour to live ſome years (d). About the year 1638 he went over to Ireland with that wiſe and worthy Nobleman Lucius Carey, Lord Viſcount Falkland, to whom he was likewiſe Chaplain, and by him much countenanced and eſteemed (e). By the favour of this noble perſon, when Secretary of State, he was in the year 1642, promoted to a Canonry in the Collegiate Church of Windſor, and to the dignity of Dean of Laughlin in the kingdom of Ireland, but through the diſturbances of the times he never attained the poſſeſſion of either of theſe preferments (f). After the unfortunate death of his patron, who was killed in the battle of Newbury, he found himſelf in a manner deſtitute of ſubſiſtence, and therefore readily accepted a propoſal that was made him of travelling with Charles Bertie, Eſq (g); afterwards created Earl of Falmouth, a great favourite of King Charles II. unhappily ſlain in a battle at ſea in the firſt Dutch war after the Reſtoration (h). He quitted England in the year 1644, and making the tour of Italy with his pupil, moved by the declining ſtate of the Church of England, he began to liſten to the perſuaſion of the Romiſh Divines, and in the year 1646 made a public profeſſion at Rome of his being reconciled to that Church (i). He went from thence to Paris, where he thought fit to publiſh what he was pleaſed to ſtile the motives of his converſion, which work of his, as might reaſonably be expected, was highly applauded by the Romaniſts, and is ſtill conſidered by them as a very

(a) Thoreſby's Topography of Leeds, p. 184.
(b) Wood's Ath. Oxon. vol. i. col. 320. Strype's Memorials of Archbiſhop Cranmer, p. 394.
(c) Wood's Ath. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 528.
(d) Sir James Ware's Works, vol. iii. p. 356.
(e) Epiſtle apologetical to a perſon of Honour, ſect. vii.
(f) Faſti, Oxon. vol. i. col. 230. Sir James Ware's Works, vol. iii. p. 356.
(g) Wood's Ath. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 528.
(h) Hiſtorian's Guide, p. 52.
(i) See the Preface to his Exomologeſis. Wood's Athen. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 529.

very extraordinary performance [A]. After taking this ſtep he was much inclined to become a Monk of the Carthuſian Order, and had thoughts of entering into the Monaſtery of Engliſh Carthuſians at Newport in Flanders, but from this he was diſſuaded by ſome of his zealous countrymen, who were deſirous that he ſhould continue to employ his pen in defence of their religion, for which the ſevere diſcipline of that Order would have allowed him but little time; and therefore by their advice he laid aſide that deſign, and being recommended to Henrietta-Maria, Queen Dowager of England, he was taken under her protection, and being invited by the Benedictine College of Engliſh Monks at Douay in Flanders, he at length reſolved to retire thither, and for the expence of his journey received one hundred Crowns as a bounty from that Princeſs, who could but ill ſpare even ſo ſmall a ſum at that time. Sometime after his arrival at Douay he entered into the Benedictine Order, and upon that occaſion changed the name he received at his baptiſm of Hugh-Paulin, for that of Serenus de Creſſey, by which he was afterwards known to the learned world (k). He remained about ſeven years or more in that College, and during his reſidence there publiſhed a large work, of which the reader will find ſome notice taken at the bottom of the page [B]. After the Reſtoration and the marriage of King Charles II. Queen Catharine appointed our author, who was then become one of the Miſſion in England, her Chaplain, and thence forward he reſided in Somerſet-houſe in the Strand (l). The great regularity of his life, his ſincere and unaffected piety, his modeſt and mild behaviour, his reſpectful deportment to perſons of diſtinction, with whom he was formerly acquainted when a Proteſtant, and the care he took to avoid all concern in political affairs or intrigues of State, preſerved him in quiet and ſafety, even in the moſt troubleſome times. He was, however, a very zealous champion in the cauſe of the Church of Rome, and was continually writing in defence of her doctrines, or in anſwer to the books of controverſy, written by Proteſtants of diſtinguiſhed learning or figure, and as this engaged him in a variety of diſputes, he quickly gained a great reputation with both parties, the Papiſts looking upon him to be one of their ableſt advocates, and the Proteſtants allowing that he was a grave, a ſenſible, and a candid writer (m) [C]. But that which of all his performances contributed to make him moſt known, was his large and copious Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, which was indeed a work of great pains and labour, and executed with much accuracy and diligence. He had obſerved that nothing made a greater impreſſion upon the people in general of his communion, than the reputation of the great antiquity of their Church, and the fame of the old ſaints of both ſexes, that had flouriſhed in this iſland; and therefore he judged that nothing could be more ſerviceable, to that which he ſtiled the Catholick Intereſt, than compoſing ſuch a Hiſtory as might ſet theſe points in the faireſt and fulleſt light poſſible. He had before him the example of a famous Jeſuit, Michael Alford, alias Griffith, who had adjuſted the ſame Hiſtory under the years in which the principal events happened, in four large volumes, collected from our ancient Hiſtorians: but as this was written in Latin, he judged that it was leſs ſuited to the deſign which he had in view, of bringing it into the hands of common readers; and therefore he ſet himſelf this painful taſk of putting it into Engliſh, with ſuch helps and improvements

(k) Sir James Ware's Works, vol. iii. p. 356.

(l) Wood's Ath. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 530.

(m) See Dr. Whitby's Preface to his Reply to S. C's. Anſwer to Dr. Pierce's Court-Sermon. The Chriſtian Moderator, Lon. 1652, p. 97.

[A] As a very extraordinary performance.] The author was pleaſed to entitle this work, EXOMOLOGESIS: or a faithful narration of the occaſions and motives of his Converſion to Catholic Unity. Paris 1647 and 1653, in 8*vo*. To the laſt edition is an appendix, In which are cleared certain miſconſtructions of his Exomologeſis, publiſhed by J. P. author of the Preface to the Lord Falkland's diſcourſe of Infallibility. As ſoon as this was finiſhed, he ſent it over to his dear friend Dr. Henry Hammond, as to one whoſe ſincerity he had experienced, and for whoſe judgment he had a high eſteem. That learned perſon wrote him a very kind letter in anſwer; in which he thanked him for his book, but at the ſame time, told him there was a vein of fallacy ran through the whole contexture of it; adding, we are friends, and I do not propoſe to be your antagoniſt. At the cloſe of this epiſtle, he invited him into England, aſſuring him that he ſhould be provided with a convenient place to dwell in, and a ſufficient ſubſiſtence to live comfortably, without being moleſted by any, about his religion and conſcience. This offer, though our author did not accept, yet he returned, as became him, an anſwer full of reſpect and gratitude to the kind friend who had made it (1). Few books are more admired than this by the Papiſts, who flatter themſelves, that he has fully anſwered the judicious Mr. Chillingworth, and his own kind patron the learned Lord Falkland; but we know that they are ſo apt to magnify the performances of all their converts, that there is no laying any great ſtreſs upon ſuch commendations (2).

(1) This circumſtance is taken from his Apologetical Epiſtle to a perſon of Honour, p. 47.

(2) The Chriſtian Moderator, by John Auſtin, to which an Anſwer was written under the title of Legenda Lignea, in the 36th chapter of which our author is very harſhly treated.

[B] At the bottom of the page.] This was a treatiſe of the myſtical theology, entituled, SANCTA SOPHIA; or, Directions for the prayers of contemplation, &c. extracted out of more than XL treatiſes, written by the late Reverend Father Aug. Baker, a Monk of the Engliſh congregation of the holy order of St. Benedict. Douay, 1657, in 2 vol. in a large 8*vo*. To which are added, Certain patterns of devout exerciſes of immediate acts and affections of the will. Of this Father Auguſtine Baker, whoſe true name was David Baker, who had ſtudied the Law in the Middle Temple, and who from being little better than an Atheiſt, became a convert to Popery, and a very zealous devotioniſt, the Oxford Hiſtorian has given us a very large account (3). He had once it ſeems ſome intention of writing the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of England, for which he had made very copious collections, that were of great ſervice to our author, when he entered upon the execution of the ſame project.

(3) Wood's Ath. Oxon. vol. i. col. 8.

[C] That he was a grave, a ſenſible, and a candid writer.] The firſt work that he publiſhed after his return to England, bore this title A non eſt inventus returned to Mr. Edward Baghaw's enquiry and vainly boaſted diſcovery of weakneſs in the Grounds of the Church's infallibility. 1662. 8*vo*.

He wrote next, A letter to an Engliſh gentleman dated July 6th, 1662, wherein Biſhop Morley is concerned, and therefore we find it printed amongſt ſome of the treatiſes of that Reverend Prelate.

He publiſhed after this, Roman Catholic Doctrines no Novelties; or, an anſwer to Dr. Pierce's Court-Sermon, miſcalled, The primitive rule of Reformation. 1663, 8*vo*; anſwered by Dr. Daniel Whitby.

as

as he thought neceſſary (n). His Hiſtory was very much approved by the moſt learned of his countrymen, of the ſame religion, as appears by the teſtimonies prefixed to it. To ſpeak impartially, the order, regularity, and coherence of the facts contained therein, deſerve to be commended, and the gravity, or rather ſolemnity of the language is very agreeable to the author's aim and intention, as are likewiſe the care and punctuality ſhewn in citing his authorities (o). But, on the other hand, he is juſtly, though modeſtly, cenſured by a learned prelate, for giving in to the ſuperſtitious notions of many of our old writers, and tranſcribing from them ſuch fabulous paſſages as have been long ago exploded by the inquiſitive and impartial criticks of his own faith (p). Anthony Wood thinks this however excuſable, becauſe he tells us whence he had them; and perhaps we may render this excuſe rather better, by obſerving that he meant to excite his readers to a zealous imitation of their pious anceſtors, rather than afford them hiſtorical inſtruction, from a nice and critical examination of what the authors, from whom he collected his materials, had delivered. The book however ſtill maintains its credit amongſt the Romaniſts, is reputed a moſt authentic eccleſiaſtical chronicle, and is frequently cited by their moſt conſiderable authors, as a performance of eſtabliſhed reputation (q) [D]. He propoſed to have publiſhed another volume of this Hiſtory, which was to have carried it as low as the diſſolution of monaſteries by King Henry VIII. but before he had proceeded full three hundred years lower than the Norman conqueſt, his life and labours were together ſuſpended (r). We are not however to ſuppoſe from hence, that his whole time was devoted to this large work. On the contrary, we find him very warmly engaged in all the controverſies of the times, and yet that he had ſome leiſure to beſtow upon works of another nature [E]. His laſt diſpute was in reference to a book written by the learned Dr. Stillingfleet, (n) This account of his undertaking is collected out of his copious Preface to his Ch. Hiſt. of Brittany.

(o) Wood's Ath. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 530.

(p) Nicholſon's Engliſh Library, p. 1. 11.

(q) Wood's Ath. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 531.

(r) Sir James Ware's Works, vol. iii. p. 356.

[D] As a performance of eſtabliſhed reputation.] The reader will form a very juſt and clear notion of the author's real intentions in compoſing this work, by peruſing the title of it, which, for this reaſon, I ſhall inſert at large. The Church Hiſtory of Brittany, from the beginning of Chriſtianity to the Norman Conqueſt; under Roman Governors, Britiſh Kings, the Engliſh Saxon Heptarchy, the Engliſh Saxon and Daniſh Monarchy. Containing, I. The Lives of all our Saints, aſſigned to the proper ages wherein they lived. II. The erections of Epiſcopal Sees, and Succeſſion of Biſhops. III. The celebration of Synods, National, Provincial, and Dioceſan. IV. The foundations of Monaſteries, Nunneries, and Churches. V. And a ſufficient account of the Succeſſions of our Kings, and of the civil affairs of this Kingdom; from all which is evidently demonſtrated, that the preſent Roman Catholic Religion hath from the beginning, without interruption, or change, been profeſſed in this our holy Iſland, &c. By the Reverend Father Serenus Creſſey, of the Holy Order of St. Benedict, 1668, fol (4). He very fairly acknowledges that the bulk and ſubſtance of his work is taken from the three firſt volumes of the Eccleſiaſtical Annals, written in Latin by Father Griffith, and that for the additions and improvements he has made, he ſtands chiefly indebted to the Monaſticon Anglicanum, publiſhed by Sir William Dugdale, the Decem Scriptores, the Flores Hiſtoriæ Eccleſiaſticæ, by Dr. Smith, whom the Papiſts ſtiled Biſhop of Chalcedon, and the large collection of manuſcripts chiefly made by Father Auguſtine Baker, of whom ſome account has been given in the former note. He offers ſome apologies, for the fabulous relations inſerted in his Hiſtory; which however amounts to no more than this; that he did not think himſelf obliged to believe all that he had taken the pains to collect, and conſequently he leaves the ſame liberty to his reader, who without doubt is not at all bound to have a larger meaſure of faith than the author. There is one thing very ſingular in his preface. His education at Oxford had taught him civility, his living at Court had improved it, and the obligations he lay under to ſeveral eminent and worthy perſons of our religion, compelled him to ſhew it in the manner of his treating ſuch prelates of our Church, as he had occaſion to mention, in reference to the matters recorded in his Hiſtory. But for this however, he thought himſelf obliged to make an apology to thoſe of his own communion, which is ſo very remarkable as to deſerve the reader's particular notice.

(4) There is no name of the place in the title page of moſt of the copies, but it was actually printed at Roan.

'But for my excuſe, or defence, I muſt take leave to 'ſay, I. That herein I follow not only the example 'of the ancient beſt Fathers in their diſputes, even a-'gainſt Arians, Photinians, Novatians, &c. but of the 'moſt learned author of the Proteſtant's Apology. 'II. I am aſſured, that if my accuſers were per-'ſonally to converſe with theſe Proteſtant prelates, 'they would not after ſuch a manner change their 'titles. Now I ſee no reaſon, why an obligation 'ſhould be impoſed on any, to be uncivil with his 'pen, and not with his tongue. I do not find, that 'ever any Proteſtants eſteemed ſuch civility an ad-'vantage to them in the debate concerning their 'ordinations; for to inſtance in a caſe in juſt reaſon, 'far leſs diſputable than that, yet not long ago ac-'tually and terribly diſputed: If during the late re-'bellion, a faithful ſubject of the King ſhould have 'petitioned for a paſs to go through the rebels quar-'ters, no man would have ſuſpected him of diſ-'loyalty, becauſe in his petition to Fairfax, Crom-'well, or Waller, he ſtiled them Lords Generals. 'Has not the King himſelf, in addreſſes to the un-'lawful Parliament, done the like? yet all this ſurely 'without engagement to acknowledge their autho-'rity to be legitimate: particularly as touching the 'forementioned writers, it cannot be denyed but that 'we are much obliged to their diligence in the ſearch 'of public records, and their ſincerity in delivering 'what they found. True it is, that B. Parker, ac-'cording to the impulſe of a Calviniſtical ſpirit, often 'inſerts malicious invectives againſt the Catholic 'Church as being indeed the patriarch of Calviniſtical 'prelacy. B. Godwin is leſs cholerick, and may be 'excuſed, if now and then he ſeeks ſome advantage, 'particularly upon the account of married prelates. 'But as for B. Uſher, his admirable abilities in Chro-'nological and Hiſtorical Erudition, as alſo his faith-'fulneſs and ingenuous ſincerity in delivering without 'any provoking reflections, what with great labour 'he has obſerved, ought certainly at leaſt to exempt 'him from being treated by any one rudely and con-'temptuouſly, eſpecially by me, who am moreover 'always obliged to preſerve a juſt reſentment of very 'many kind effects of friendſhip, which I received 'from him.'

[E] Some leiſure to beſtow upon works of another nature.] We have already taken notice of his inclination to the Myſtic Divinity, which led him to take ſo much pains about the works of Father Baker, and from the ſame diſpoſition he alſo publiſhed Sixteen revelations of divine love, ſhewed to a devout ſervant of our Lord, called Mother Juliana, an Anchorete of Norwich, who lived in the days of King Edward III. printed 1670, 8*vo.* and dedicated to the Lady Blount, of Sodingdon, widow of Sir George Blount; and likewiſe changed from old into Modern Engliſh more compendiouſly. A book written before the change of Religion, entitled, An abridgment of the book called The cloud of unknowing, and of the counſel referring to lingfleet, afterwards Biſhop of Worceſter, to which, though ſeveral anſwers were given by the ableſt of the Popiſh writers, there was none that ſeemed to merit reply, excepting that penned by Father Creſſey; and this procured him the honour of a very illuſtrious antagoniſt, his old friend and acquaintance at Oxford, Edward Earl of Clarendon (s), who, notwithſtanding, treated him upon this occaſion ſomewhat ſeverely, which induced our author to pen and publiſh that letter which is mentioned in the notes. Being now grown far in years and having no very promiſing ſcene before his eyes, from the warm ſpirit that appeared againſt Popery amongſt all ranks of people, and the many excellent books written to confute it by the moſt learned of the Clergy, he was the more willing to ſeek for peace in the ſilence of a country retirement; and accordingly withdrew for ſome time to the houſe of Richard Caryll, Eſq; a gentleman of an ancient family and affluent fortune, at Eaſt Grinſtead in the county of Suſſex, and dying upon the 10th of Auguſt 1674, being then near the ſeventieth year of his age, was buried in the pariſh church there (t). His loſs was much regretted by thoſe of his communion, as being one of their ableſt champions, ready to draw his pen in their defence on every occaſion, and ſure of having his pieces read with ſingular favour and attention (u). His memory alſo was revered by the Proteſtants, as well on account of the purity of his manners, and his mild and humble deportment, as for the plainneſs, candour, and decency, with which he had managed all the controverſies that he had been engaged in, and which had procured him in return, much more of kindneſs and reſpect, than almoſt any other of his party had met with, or indeed deſerved (w).

(s) His Work was called Animadverſions on a book intituled, Fanaticiſm fanatically imputed, &c.

(t) Wood's Ath. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 531.

(u) See the Character of our author by Edward Sheldon, Eſq.

(w) See Dr. Daniel Whitby's Preface to his Reply to our author's Anſwer to Dr. Pierce's Court-Sermon.

to the ſame. This is not printed, but in MS. and was ſhewn to Anthony Wood, by Father W. R. a Benedictine Monk (5).

(5) Wood's Ath. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 531.

The next performance of his was upon occaſion of a famous treatiſe, written by Dr. Stillingfleet, againſt the Church of Rome, which made a very great noiſe in thoſe days, and put for ſome time a ſtop to the encroachments their Miſſionaries were daily making, which highly provoked thoſe of the Roman communion. This was entitled,

Anſwer to part of Dr. Stillingfleet's Book, entituled Idolatry practiſed in the Church of Rome, 1672. 8*vo.* He publiſhed alſo, Fanaticiſm fanatically imputed to the Catholic Church by Dr. Stillingfleet, and the imputation refuted and retorted, &c. 1672. 8*vo.*

Queſtion, Why are you a Catholic? Queſtion, Why are you a Proteſtant? 1673. 8*vo.*

In ſupport of Dr. Stillingfleet, the Earl of Clarendon wrote Animadverſions upon our author's anſwer; in which he very plainly tells him and the world, that it was not devotion, but neceſſity and want of a ſubſiſtence, which drove him firſt out of the Church of England, and then into a Monaſtery. As this noble peer knew him well at Oxford, it may be very eaſily imagined that what he ſaid made a very ſtrong impreſſion, and it was to efface this, that our author thought fit to ſend abroad an anſwer under the title of Epiſtle apologetical to a Perſon of Honour, touching his vindication of Dr. Stillingfleet, 1674. 8*vo.* In this work he gives a large relation of the ſtate and condition of his affairs, at the time of what he ſtiles his converſion, in order to remove the imputation of quitting his faith to obtain bread. The laſt work that he publiſhed was entitled,

Remarks upon the Oath of Supremacy. C.

CREW (NATHANAEL), Biſhop of Durham in the end of the ſeventeenth, and beginning of the eighteenth, century, was the fifth ſon of John Lord Crew of Stene in the county of Northampton [A], by Jemima, daughter and coheir of Edward Walgrave of Lawford in Eſſex, Eſq (a). He was born at Stene, the 31ſt of January 1633 (b): and in 1652 admitted Commoner of Lincoln-college in Oxford (c), where he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts the 1ſt of February 1655-6 (d); ſoon after which he was choſen Fellow of that College (e). The 29th of June 1658, he took the degree of Maſter of Arts (f). At the Reſtoration, he declared heartily in favour of the Crown and Hierarchy (g); and in 1663 was one of the Proctors of the Univerſity (h). The year following, on the 2d of July, he took the degree of Doctor of Law (i): and ſoon after went into Holy Orders. Auguſt the 12th, 1668, he was elected Rector of Lincoln-college, upon the deceaſe of Dr. Paul Hood. On the 29th of April 1669, he was inſtalled Dean of Chicheſter, and held with that dignity the Præcentorſhip, in which he had been inſtalled the day before. He was alſo appointed Clerk of the Cloſet to King Charles II (k). In 1671, upon the tranſlation of Dr. Blandford to the See of Worceſter, he was elected Biſhop of Oxford in his room on the 16th of June, confirmed June the 18th, conſecrated July the 2d, and enthronized the 5th of the ſame month; being allowed to hold with it in commendam the Living of Whitney, and the Rectorſhip of Lincoln-college (l). But this laſt he reſigned the 18th of October 1672 (m). In 1673 he performed the ceremony of the marriage of (a) Dugd. Baron. vol. ii. p. 482.

(b) From his epitaph.

(c) Wood, Ath. edit. 1721, vol. ii. col. 1177.

(d) Ibid. Faſti, col. 108.

(e) Athen. ubi ſupra.

(f) Faſti, col. 122.

(g) Wood tells us, that he turned about. But there is no evidence of his having been otherwiſe.

(h) Athen. ubi ſupra; & Faſti, col. 150.

(i) Faſti, col. 159; and Catalogue of Graduates.

(k) Wood, Ath. ubi ſupra; and J. Le Neve's Faſt. edit. 1716, p. 491. 61, 62.

(l) Wood, Ath. ibid. and Survey of the Cathedrals, &c. by Br. Willis, Eſq; vol. ii. p. 434.

(m) J. Le Neve, as above, p. 491.

[A] Was the fifth ſon of John Lord Crew of Stene, &c.] This John Lord Crew was ſon and heir to Sir Thomas Crew, Kt. one of the Serjeants at Law to King Charles I. Speaker of the Houſe of Commons 21 Jacob. & 1 Caro. and deſcended from the ancient family of Crew in the County Palatine of Cheſter. Having been inſtrumental in the Reſtoration of K. Charles II. he was advanced by that King, in the 13th year of his reign, April 20, 1661, to the dignity of a Baron of this realm, by the title of Lord Crew of Stene, and to the heirs male of his body (1). ——The elder brother of Sir Thomas Crew above-mentioned, was Sir Randolph Crew, Kt. who on the 1ſt of July 1614, was made Serjeant at Law; and the 26th of January 162⅘ conſtituted Chief Juſtice of the King's Bench, but deprived of the ſame again on the 9th of November 1626, for openly manifeſting his diſlike at King Charles the Iſt's. raiſing money by way of Loan. On his being diſplaced, we are informed, he diſcovered no more diſcontent, than the weary traveller is offended, when told that he is arrived at his journey's end. He is ſaid, to have firſt brought the model of excellent building into Cheſhire (2).

(1) Dugdale, ubi ſupra.

(2) Fuller's Worthies, in Cheſhire, p. 178; and Dugdale's Origines Juridiciales, in the Liſt.

James Duke of York with Maria of Eſte (n). Through that Prince's intereſt, with whoſe meaſures he ſeems to have been very compliant, he was tranſlated, the 22d of October 1674, to the rich Biſhoprick of Durham; which had been kept vacant ever ſince the death of Biſhop Coſin, January 15, 1671-2 (o). In the beginning of the year 1675, he baptized Katharina-Laura, the new born daughter of James Duke of York (p). The 26th of April 1676, he was ſworn of the Privy Council to King Charles II (q). Upon the acceſſion of King James II. to the Crown, he was in great favour with that Prince, who thought him moſt obſequious to his will. Accordingly, on the 29th of December 1685, he was made Dean of his Majeſty's Royal Chapel in the room of Henry Biſhop of London who had been removed; and within a few days after, namely January 8, was admitted into the Privy Council (r). In 1686 he was appointed one of the Commiſſioners in the new Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſion erected by King James (s), and ſeemed to be proud of that honour [B]. By virtue of that Commiſſion, he appeared, on the 9th of Auguſt, at the Proceedings againſt Henry Biſhop of London, and was for ſuſpending him during the King's pleaſure; though the Earl, and Biſhop, of Rocheſter, and Chief Juſtice Herbert, were againſt it (t). Immediately after that Biſhop's ſuſpenſion, Commiſſioners were appointed to exerciſe all manner of Eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction within the Dioceſe of London, of which Biſhop Crew was one (u). The 20th of November following, he was preſent at, and conſenting to, the degradation of Mr. Samuel Johnſon (w); previouſly to the moſt ſevere puniſhment that was inflicted on that eminent Divine. In the fore-mentioned quality of an Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſioner, he countenanced with his preſence a proſecution carried on, in May 1687, againſt Dr. Peachy, Vice-Chancellor of Cambridge, for refuſing to admit one Alban Francis, a Benedictine Monk, to the degree of Maſter of Arts in that Univerſity, without taking the oaths (x). And, in July the ſame year, he offered to attend the Pope's Nuncio at his public Entry into London; but his coachman refuſed to drive him that way (y). His name was put again in a new Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſion iſſued out this year, in October (z); in which he acted, during the ſevere proceedings againſt Magdalen-college in Oxford, for refuſing to elect one Anthony Farmer their Preſident, purſuant to the King's mandate (a). The Biſhop continued acting as an Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſioner till October 1688; when that Commiſſion was aboliſhed. Towards the end of the year 1687, he was employed, with the Biſhops of Rocheſter and Peterborough (b), to draw up a Form of Thankſgiving for the Queen's being with child (c). Thus he complied with the King's deſigns, till he found that the Prince of Orange's party was likely to prevail. But, then, he abſented himſelf from the Council board, and told the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, that he was ſorry for having ſo long concurred with the Court; and deſired now to be reconciled to his Grace, and the other Biſhops (d). Moreover, in the Convention that met January the 22d, 1688-9, to conſider of filling the Throne, he was one of thoſe who voted, on the 6th of February, that King James II. had abdicated the Kingdom (e). Notwithſtanding all this, his thorough compliance with the late Court's arbitrary deſigns, had rendered him ſo obnoxious to the Nation, that he was excepted by name out of the Pardon granted by King William and Queen Mary, May the 23d, 1690 (f), which ſo terrified him, that he abſconded for a time, and was ready to go, or actually went, beyond Sea [C]: and offered to compound, by reſigning his Biſhoprick (g). However he found means afterwards to make his peace, and to preſerve his Biſhoprick. But, in order to ſecure to himſelf the poſſeſſion of that dignity, he was forced to permit the Crown to diſpoſe of, or at leaſt to nominate to, his Prebends of Durham, as they ſhould become vacant (h). By the death of his two elder brothers, he became in 1691, Baron Crew of Stene; and, about the 21ſt of December the ſame year, he married, but left no iſſue (i). During the reſt of King William's reign, he remained quiet and unmoleſted, though not much conſidered. In the year 1710, he was one of the Lords that oppoſed the proſecution then carried on againſt Dr. Sacheverell, and declared him Not Guilty; and likewiſe proteſted againſt ſeveral ſteps taken in that affair (k). He applied himſelf chiefly, in the latter part of his life, to works of Munificence and Charity. Particularly, he was a very great benefactor to Lincoln-college, of which he (n) See Appendix to the Life of King James II. 8vo. edit. 1703. p. 41.

(o) Willis, ibid. p. 251.
(p) Life of King James II. p. 19.
(q) Wood, Ath. as above, col. 1177.
(r) Compl. Hiſt. of England, by Biſhop Kennet, edit. 1719, vol. iii. p. 442. Wood, ubi ſupra, col. 1178.
(s) See that Commiſſion, publiſhed in 1688, 4to. It is alſo inſerted in the Comp. Hiſt. as above, p. 452, &c. and in The Life of King James II. p. 146, &c. It bore date Aug. 3.
(t) Burnet's Hiſt. of his own Time, vol. i. edit. 1724, p. 677.
(u) Compl. Hiſt. as above, p. 483.
(w) Ibid. p. 450.
(x) Ibid. p. 501, 502.
(y) Compl. Hiſt. as above, p. 494; and N. Salmon's Lives of the Engliſh Biſhops, &c. edit. 1731. p. 397.
(z) See Hiſt. of the Eccleſ. Commiſſion, edit. 1711. 8vo. p. 27.
(a) See a full account of that whole affair, in Complete Hiſt. as above, p. 502, &c.
(b) Tho. Sprat, and Tho. White.
(c) Compl. Hiſt. as above, p. 496.
(d) Ibid. p. 527.
(e) Wood, Ath. ubi ſupra.
(f) See Statut. 2 Will. & Mary, Seſſ. 1. c. 10.
(g) Compl. Hiſt. as above, p. 597, note (a); and Burnet, ubi ſupr. p. 822.
(h) From private information.
(i) Wood, ubi ſupra, col. 1178; and Willis, as above, p. 252.
(k) See Annals of Queen Anne, ann. 1710; and Hiſtory of Queen Anne, by A. Boyer, edit. folio, 1735, p. 428. 429. 444, 445.

[B] And ſeemed to be proud of that honour.] Biſhop Burnet tells us (3), 'that he was lifted up with it, 'and ſaid, now his name would be recorded in hiſtory: 'And when ſome of his friends repreſented to him, the 'danger of acting in a Court ſo illegally conſtituted, 'he ſaid, he could not live, if he ſhould loſe the 'King's gracious ſmiles: ſo low and ſo fawning (adds 'the Biſhop) was he.'

[C] And was ready to go, or actually went, beyond Sea.] This particular is variouſly related by two of our Hiſtorians. One of them (4) writes thus; 'The Biſhop of Durham had paid ſo much court to 'the King, and to the very Nuncio of the Pope, that 'he deſpaired of any favour at the Revolution; and 'he was once got beyond Sea in a fright: but being 'brought back by the importunity of a domeſtick ſervant, he made a new intereſt in the new Court and 'Parliament, and bought off the complaints of Mr. 'Samuel Johnſon, and others, who had ſuffered by 'him.' The other Hiſtorian's words are as follows (5), 'The poor Biſhop of Durham, who had ab-'ſconded for ſome time, and was waiting for a Ship 'to get beyond Sea, fearing public affronts, and had 'offered to compound by reſigning his biſhoprick, was 'now prevailed on to come, and by voting the new 'ſettlement to merit at leaſt a pardon for all that he 'had done: which, all things conſidered, was thought 'very indecent in him, yet not unbecoming the reſt 'of his life and character.' He did not attempt to go beyond ſea till after he was excepted out of the Act of Indemnity; ſo that the laſt writer is miſtaken in that particular.

(3) Hiſt. of his own Time, vol. i. edit. 1724, p. 676.
(4) Kennet, in Compl. Hiſt. as above, p. 597, note (b).
(5) Burnet's Hiſt. of his own Time, vol. i. edit. 1724, p. 822.

had

had been Fellow, and Rector [D]; and laid out large ſums in beautifying the Biſhop's Palace at Durham (l); beſides many other inſtances of generoſity and munificence of a more private nature. At length, his Lordſhip departed this life on Monday September 18, 1721, aged eighty eight; and was buried in his Chapel at Stene, the 30th of the ſame month (m), with an inſcription on his monument [E]. He held the See of Durham forty-ſeven

(l) Mag. Britan. &c. edit. 1718, fol. vol. ii. p. 639.

(m) Willis, as above, p. 251.

[D] He was a very great Benefactor to Lincoln-College, of which he had been Fellow, and Rector.] He added Twenty pounds per annum, to the Headſhip, or Rectory; and Ten pounds per annum to each of the twelve Fellowſhips, for ever. He made up the Bible Clerk's place, and eight Scholarſhips belonging to that College, Ten pounds a year each, for ever, which before were very mean. He made an augmentation of Ten pounds per annum a-piece for ever, to the Curates of four Churches belonging to the ſaid College, viz. All-Saints and St. Michael in Oxford, Twyford in Buckinghamſhire, and Comb in Oxfordſhire. All theſe were to take place from Michaelmas 1717. He likewiſe ſettled Twenty pounds a year a-piece on twelve Exhibitioners, which took place at Lady-day 1718. His Lordſhip intended alſo to have rebuilt that College, or at leaſt the beſt part of it; but the Fellows having diſobliged him, in refuſing to chuſe for their Rector, a Gentleman whom he recommended to them, upon the death of Dr. Fitzherbert Adams; his Lordſhip thought fit to alter his deſign.

[E] With an inſcription on his monument.] Which is as follows.

Near this Place lyeth the Body
Of the Right Reverend and Right Honourable
NATHANIEL Lord CREW
Lord Biſhop of Durham, and Baron of Stene,
Fifth Son of John Lord CREW.
He was born Jan. 31, 1633.
Was conſecrated Biſhop of OXFORD 1671.
Tranſlated to Durham in 1674.
Was Clerk of the Cloſet and Privy Counſellor
In the Reigns of King Charles II. and King JAMES II.
And died Sept. 18, 1721.
Aged 88. M.

 [There was but little in the character and conduct of this prelate which could entitle him to a place in the Biographia. He was diſtinguiſhed, indeed, by paſſing through a variety of eccleſiaſtical preferments, by being the Rector of a College, and by ſuſtaining, for an uncommon length of time, a very high rank in the Church; but he was not celebrated either for his learning or for other eminent qualities. We do not read of any thing that was publiſhed by him; and his benefactions to Lincoln College did not take place till he was between eighty and ninety years of age. As a Peer of the Realm, he makes no figure in the annals of his country, unleſs his having joined in ſome Tory proteſts is to be conſidered in that light (6). The chief hiſtorical event of his life reflects nothing but diſhonour upon him; we mean his being one of King James the ſecond's eccleſiaſtical Commiſſioners, together with his behaviour in that character, which was marked with ſervility. Indeed, this ſervile ſpirit had been diſplayed by him many years before, on his promotion to the Biſhopric of Durham. After he had obtained the promiſe of that Biſhopric, it was long before he could get into the poſſeſſion of it, though he ſolicited the matter with great diligence. Still there was ſomething that hindered his ſucceſs, and which he could not find out till he applied to Lord Lumley. That Nobleman diſcovered that the King had promiſed a ſum of money to Mrs. Eleanor Gwyn, which was to be paid out of the Biſhopric, and that without an agreement with her nothing could be done. Upon this our Prelate applied to her, by his agent, and agreed to pay her five or ſix thouſand pounds. One Arden was bound with the Biſhop for the money, and upon this he was put into poſſeſſion of the See. The money, in the proper courſe of time, was duly paid, and the Biſhop appointed Arden to be his Steward (7). Dr. Walter Pope, in his Life of Dr. Seth Ward, Biſhop of Saliſbury, relates the following circumſtance concerning that Prelate. "I well "remember the time, when he told me, he had the "proffer of the Biſhopric of Durham, after Biſhop "Coſin's death. Pray my Lord, ſaid I, accept it: "we ſhall have brave horſes there, and the long "journey betwixt Biſhop's-Auclands and London "will conduce much to the melioration of your "health. He replied, I juſt now entered it in my "blue book, that this day I refuſed it. I replied, "and pray, my Lord, why did you ſo? Becauſe, ſaid "he, I did not like the conditions. But what they "were, it would have been unmannerly for me to "inquire, and he did not think it convenient to tell "me (8)." The conditions intended to be impoſed on Dr. Ward will probably be thought to receive ſome illuſtration from the preceding anecdote concerning Biſhop Crew.

So ſubſervient was this Prelate to the deſigns of James the ſecond, that he ſeverely checked Dr. Patrick, who had preached ſtrongly againſt popery, and refuſed to introduce that eminent Divine to the King, when his Majeſty had ſent for him (9). However, notwithſtanding all the Biſhop of Durham's compliances, he ſhrunk in the time of danger, and interpoſed his counſel for the retraction of the meaſures in which he had himſelf ſo zealouſly concurred. The following is the letter which he wrote to his Majeſty on the occaſion.

"To the King's moſt excellent;

"The moſt humble and faithful advice of your "Majeſty's ever dutiful ſubject and ſervant the Bi-"ſhop of Durham.

"That your Majeſty would be pleaſed to withdraw "your protection of thoſe Romiſh Chapels, which are "daily made the occaſion of ſo much diſturbance "and miſchief here, and, if continued any longer, "I fear, will unavoidably endanger the peace and "ſafety of this your great city, and conſequently of "your whole kingdom.

"That the Archbiſhopric of York, which your "Majeſty hath been pleaſed to offer me, may be fil-"led with ſome other more deſerving perſon: and "that your Majeſty would be pleaſed to make ano-"ther Dean of Chriſt Church in Oxford, inſtead of "Mr. Maſſey, who is utterly uncapable thereof by "law: that the Fellows of Sidney-College in Cam-"bridge, for whom I have ſo often moved your "Majeſty, may have leave to elect a new Maſter, in "the place of Mr. Baſſett (he being alſo unqualified "on the ſame account,) and to proceed on all other "affairs relating to that ſociety, according to their "original ſtatutes and conſtitution.

"That your Majeſty would be pleaſed to call a "free Parliament ſo ſoon as may be, this being the "only probable means for preſerving your ſacred "perſon, for preventing the effuſion of Chriſtian "blood, and for eſtabliſhing your Throne and Go-"vernment, both in Church and State, upon ſure "and laſting foundations."

N. Durham (10).

With regard to the Biſhop's attempt to make his eſcape from this country, the tradition about Durham, ſome years ago, was, that he actually hired a Sunderland Collier, and went over to Holland; but that the Maſter of the veſſel remonſtrated with him, and prevailed upon him to return back, inſtead of going beyond ſea (11). It was Dr. Burnet to whom he offered to reſign his Biſhopric, on the conſideration of his receiving a thouſand pounds a year during his life; and it was the interceſſion of Dr. Tillotſon to which he was principally indebted for being admitted to favour by the Government (12).

Vanity was among the other qualities which detracted from the character of Biſhop Crew. "The "organ

(6) Collection of Lords Proteſts, vol. i. p. 186. 207. 222. 232. 244. 246.

(7) Hutchinſon's Hiſtory and Antiquities of the County Palatine of Durham, vol. i. p. 555.

(8) Life of Seth, Biſhop of Saliſbury, p. 90.

(9) Great General Dictionary, vol. viii. p. 196. It was Biſhop Sprat who introduced Dr. Patrick to the King.

(10) Gentleman's Magazine for 1784, p. 673.

(11) From private information.

(12) Birch's Life of Tillotſon, p. 137, 138.

ſeven years, as he had done that of Oxford three, continuing a Biſhop fifty years, three months, and two days; which was a longer time than any Engliſhman ever enjoyed that honour,

" organ and ornaments about it at Durham Minſter," ſays a valuable correſpondent, " will be a laſting " monument of the vain munificence of this man. " His Baron's Coronet and Epiſcopal Mitre ſtuck " up together, may afford ſome matter of exultation " to thoſe who conſider the ornamenting of Churches " as proceeding ſometimes from motives foreign to " Chriſtian piety." A moſt ſtriking inſtance of his vanity was his giving Dr. Mangey a Prebend of Durham, for a flattering Dedication prefixed to a Sermon, which Sermon he never read. He was fully ſatisfied with the Dedication (13).

(13) Granger's Biographical Hiſtory, vol. iv. p. 285.

The conduct of our Prelate to Mr. Henry Wharton involves him in a more ſerious charge. When he was one of the Commiſſioners for exerciſing the Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction of the Dioceſe of London, he was preſent at the examination of that learned young man for Orders, and ſo much admired the readineſs of his anſwers, that he promiſed to make him his Chaplain, which promiſe he violated. On this account, Mr. Wharton, in his manuſcript Diary of his Life, ſpeaks of the Biſhop with great contempt, as a man of no veracity. His language is, Levis iſte ac verſipellis epiſcopus.——Summam leviſſimi viri perfidium deteſtatus (14).

(14) Birch, ubi ſupra.

Lord Crew was very zealous in maintaining the Palatinate rights of his Dioceſe, and made ſtrict enquiry into the ancient Records, which he cauſed to be thoroughly ſearched, and ſtated by his Secretary. In one inſtance he endeavoured to carry his authority to a moſt unjuſtifiable exceſs. During the latter end of his time, on the death of Serjeant Stroud, he made an entry upon an eſtate at Hullam and Sheraton, claiming the ſame as an eſcheat for want of an heir; and getting the tenants to attorn, he kept poſſeſſion till the Heir at Law, Mr. Evans, brought his ejectment. All this was illegally done by the Biſhop, without an office found; in conſequence of which he was told by Mr. William Lee, the Heir at Law's Solicitor, that his predeceſſor, Anthony Beke, had been impeached in Parliament for the like offence. A letter of Mr. Lee's to our Prelate on the occaſion, is ſo admirably written, and contains ſuch a fund of conſtitutional and legal reaſoning, that it deſerves to be inſerted, in honour to the memory of the writer. The letter was as follows:

" My Lord,

" The rights and privileges of your Lordſhip's county palatine having been often examined in Parliament, upon ſeveral petitions and informations, which have been exhibited both by and againſt your Lordſhip's predeceſſors, Mr. Evans is adviſed by his Counſel, to exhibit his information in Parliament againſt your Lordſhip; for that your Lordſhip and agents have entered upon and detain his inheritance, (under pretence for being an eſcheat) without having either your Lordſhip's title firſt found upon record, or ſuing out of legal proceſs, to warrant the entry of your Lordſhip's officers.

" This proceeding, my Lord, he is adviſed, is a manifeſt violation of the rights and privileges of the gentlemen and freeholders of the county of Durham, eſtabliſhed to them by the public ſubmiſſions of your Lordſhip's predeceſſors; confirmed and ratified by the Crown.

" That it is directly contrary to the known uſage and conſtitution of the county palatine; that it tends to veſt a higher prerogative in your Lordſhip, than is claimed and enjoyed by the Crown itſelf, who cannot, in this caſe, enter upon the eſtate of any ſubject, without an inquiſition firſt taken to find the title of the Crown:

" That it tends to ſubvert and evade the ſeveral laws made for reſtraining of the prerogative, and for ſecuring the rights and properties of the ſubject; particularly by the ſtatute of Magna Charta, chap. 29, which provides, that no freemen be diſſeized of his freehold, without lawful judgment of his Peers. Stat. 28. Edw. III. chap. 3. which further provides, that no man ſhall be diſinherited without due proceſs of law; and hath been ſince confirmed by the petition of right, 3 Char. I. chap. 1. and the Stat. 16 Char. I. chap. 14. that it is alſo contrary to the ſtatute of 5 Rich. II. chap. 7. which provides, that none ſhall make entry into any lands, but where the entry is given by law: As alſo the ſtatute 8 Hen. VI. chap. 9. made againſt forcible detainer of poſſeſſion; and ſeveral other ſtatutes and public laws, too tedious to be recited:

" That if ſuch proceeding as this ſhould be brought into practice, it would abſolutely deſtroy the ancient privilege, which all the freeholders in this county have hitherto enjoyed, in having an opportunity given them to defend their rights both upon taking the inquiſition, or finding the title of the Biſhop, and traverſing the inquiſition after it is taken.

" And if this proceeding againſt Mr. Evans can be juſtified, it is conceived, the Biſhop of Durham may, under colour of the ſame right, enter and ſeize upon all men's inheritances within the county, and put all to make out their title, before the Biſhop makes out any.

" Your Lordſhip has certainly been very ill-adviſed in this affair, and if the opinion of any eminent Counſel has been taken, I doubt they have either been miſinformed, or not very well inſtructed in the conſtitution, rights and uſages of the county palatine.

" I dare, my Lord, undertake to produce five thouſand precedents of inquiſitions taken, for finding the Biſhop's title upon record, before an entry was ever made; and it does appear, that the Biſhop's officers uſed always to enter, in caſes of this nature, by virtue of a ſpecial writ for that purpoſe, ſetting forth the title as it was found; and (indeed my Lord) I have reaſon to believe that ſuch a ſeizure as this was never attempted by any of your Lordſhip's predeceſſors, ſince the time of Anthony Beke.

" That Biſhop (whoſe character your Lordſhip cannot be unacquainted with) did take upon him to ſeize on ſeveral eſtates within the county, without ſuing out any writ or commiſſion for having his title firſt found, and without awarding of any proceſs, to warrant that entry: But how ſenſible the gentlemen of the county then were of the tendency it had to bring them under ſlavery and arbitrary government, what diſturbance it bred within the county, and what were the conſequences that attended that caſe, will beſt appear from the records of thoſe times.

" I ſhall only beg leave to put your Lordſhip in mind, that one of the articles then agreed to between that Biſhop and the gentlemen and freeholders of the county, upon the mediation of King Edward I. was, That neither the Biſhop, nor any of his ſucceſſors, ſhould ever afterwards ſeize any man's eſtate without firſt ſuing a writ or commiſſion out of the Biſhop's Court of Chancery.

" I doubt (my Lord) your Lordſhip's agents do not diſtinguiſh very well betwixt the caſe of the Biſhop of Durham, and of an ordinary Lord of any manor, where no perſon is in poſſeſſion of the eſtate, againſt whom he may bring his eſcheat, for otherwiſe, the Lord of the manor would be without remedy.

" But the Biſhop of Durham will appear, I believe, to ſtand upon a different foot; he has rather remedy for eſcheat, and ought to be conſidered as a public perſon, (quaſi rex) and under a capacity much different from a private Lord of a petty manor; ſuch a right in a private Lord, and in a particular caſe only, cannot be hurtful to the public; but ſuch a power in the Crown, or in the Biſhop of Durham, who has jura regalia, within his county palatine, may admit of a different conſideration.

" It muſt be agreed, my Lord, that the Biſhops of Durham have been always eſteemed to be perſons inveſted with royal dignity, or as it is expreſſed in the ancient record, juriſdictionem temporalem in omnes ſubditos ſuos libertatis Dunelmenſis et authoritatem regium tanquam perſonæ privilegiis regalibus, inſignite per miniſtros, exercuerunt, or as another record expreſſes it, tanquam honour, excepting Thomas Bourchier, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who held the Sees of Worceſter, Ely, and Canterbury, fifty-one years and twenty-one days. His Lordſhip dying without iſſue, the title of Baron Crew of Stene became extinct with him.

tanquam reges et principes mitram geſſerit loco coronæ in ſignum ſuæ regalitatis; yet it muſt be allowed at the ſame time, that all the liberties of the Biſhop have been adjudged to be derived, and ſtill dependent upon the Crown, to be circumſcribed by the ſame laws, to be all forfeited upon the miſuſer or abuſe of them, during the Biſhop's time who commits the abuſe; and that they have been accordingly ſeized, both upon judgment in Parliament, and other Courts; and that the reaſon given in ſome of theſe judgments, why the Biſhop's liberty ought to be forfeit, for any miſuſer or abuſe of it, is quia juſtum eſt quod in eo quo peccat, in eo puniatur; or as we find it expreſſed in another of them, in eo quo inſignius delinquit, ſit de jure puniendus.

" In ſhort (my Lord) Mr. Evans is adviſed, this proceeding is a very great miſuſer of the liberty, and he having received your Lordſhip's anſwer, that he is not to expect any favour, or any reſtitution of his eſtate, until he does by law recover it; your Lordſhip having likewiſe thought fit to deprive him of all the beſt Counſel of the Circuit, he is partly neceſſitated, and does reſolve to exhibit informations, both in Parliament and the Court of Queen's Bench, in order to have the illegality of theſe proceedings examined into.

" I was indeed deſired by him to exhibit his information in Parliament, the firſt day that the Parliament ſat, but I was unwilling, in a caſe of this nature, to take any advantage of your Lordſhip's abſence, or to proceed any farther upon it, until I had given your Lordſhip fair notice of the meaſures intended to be taken; ſo that your Lordſhip might have an opportunity of adviſing further upon the caſe, and of being ſatisfied, in theſe matters, from your Lordſhip's own Counſel.

" Mr. Evans, my Lord, knows nothing as yet, of my writing any thing to your Lordſhip; but I muſt do juſtice to my client, and intend to let him know by next poſt, what I have done, for he is very preſſing to have his proſecution carried on with all vigour and expedition; and it cannot, I think, reaſonably be expected, that an eſtate of three or four hundred pounds per annum ſhould be loſt without ſome ſtruggle; or that the title of Mr. Evans, which has been long ſince proved, allowed and decreed by the Court of Chancery, is to be eaſily overthrown by an imaginary title, that has not yet, in fifty years time, been ſo much as found by a common inqueſt.

" It is true, my Lord, Mr. Evans, at preſent, is ſomewhat a ſtranger to moſt of the Gentlemen of the country, and his intereſt in Parliament is not, perhaps, very conſiderable; however, he does not doubt, but that juſtice will prevail in that honourable Houſe, and that ſome will be found to ſtand up in the defence of the liberties of the country.

" I am afraid, my Lord, I have treſpaſſed too much upon your Lordſhip, but your Lordſhip may be aſſured, if it were not from a reſpect I have for your Lordſhip's honour, as well as intereſt, I ſhould hardly have taken ſo much pains to convince your Lordſhip, and to deprive myſelf, at the ſame time, of thoſe advantages, which I had reaſon to expect from ſuch a proſecution as this might be.

" I ſhall ſubmit the whole to your Lordſhip's cenſure and conſideration, hoping your Lordſhip will believe me to be, with the utmoſt reſpect, my Lord, your Lordſhip's moſt obedient ſervant,

" WILLIAM LEE."

It is to the credit of Lord Crew that he gave a due attention to this remonſtrance. He ſurrendered the poſſeſſion of the eſtate, and paid coſts; beſide which, he was ſo well ſatisfied with the Solicitor's plain dealing, or rather with his knowledge of the Palatine rights, that he granted to him and his ſon a Patent for life of the office of Regiſter of the Court of Chancery at Durham (15).

With all the faults of this Biſhop, he was poſſeſſed of ſome amiable qualities. He was hoſpitable, generous, and charitable; though it is ſaid that his charity was ſometimes obſerved to be exerted with too much oſtentation (16). Beſides the benefactions mentioned in note [D], he made large bequeſts, by his laſt will, to the purpoſes of Religion, education, and charity, an account of which may be ſeen in Mr. Hutchinſon's Hiſtory and Antiquities of the county palatine of Durham. " Many men, ſays " that Gentleman, have been canonized for much " inferior works of beneficence than thoſe of this " Prelate. His miſtaken principles in the affairs of " Government, though they ſtain his memory, under " the pens of political writers, are all obliterated " from the benevolent mind by his charity and ex- " tenſive acts of munificence (17)." This encomium would have been more juſt if the Biſhop's generoſity had not been diſplayed ſo late in life; and, indeed, if it had not been for the moſt part poſthumous. His benefactions, during the ſpace of forty-ſeven years, were not to be compared with thoſe which in eleven years had flowed from his predeceſſor in the See of Durham, Dr. Coſin.

In the former edition of the Biographia, Biſhop Crew is repreſented as having died on the 18th of September, 1722. Dr. Richardſon and Mr. Hutchinſon have both fallen into the ſame error with regard to the year of our Prelate's deceaſe (18). It is the more remarkable that theſe two Gentlemen ſhould have been guilty of ſuch a miſtake; as they immediately proceed to relate that it was in 1721 that Dr. William Talbot was tranſlated from the Biſhopric of Saliſbury to that of Durham.] K.

(15) Hutchinſon, ubi ſupra, p. 562—564.

(16) Granger, ubi ſupra.

(17) Hutchinſon, ubi ſupra.

(18) Richardſon's Godwin de Præſulibus Angliæ. p. 760.

 [CRICHTON (JAMES), was a Scots Gentleman, who lived in the ſixteenth century, and of whom very extraordinary things are related, with regard to his endowments, both of body and mind. Theſe were eſteemed ſo great, that he obtained the appellation of " The Admirable Crichton," and by that title he has continued to be diſtinguiſhed, down to the preſent day. The accounts given of his abilities and attainments are indeed ſo wonderful, that they ſeem ſcarcely to be credible; and many perſons have been diſpoſed to conſider them as almoſt entirely fabulous, though they have been delivered with the utmoſt confidence, and without any degree of heſitation, by various writers. It is, therefore, with diffidence, and even with anxiety, that I have entered upon this article; being deſirous, on the one hand, not to detract from Crichton's real merit, and, on the other, to form a juſt eſtimate of the truth of the facts which are recorded concerning him. Upon mature deliberation, I have determined to relate, firſt, from his ſeveral Biographers, the repreſentations they have made of his talents and exploits, and then to ſubjoin ſuch obſervations, as may enable the reader to judge how far their ſtories are to be credited. In drawing up this life I am not only aſſiſted by the printed accounts of Crichton, but by a manuſcript memoir, compoſed by the Earl of Buchan for the Society of Antiquaries at Edinburgh; of which memoir his Lordſhip has obligingly permitted me to be favoured with a copy.

The time of Crichton's birth is ſaid, by the generality of writers, to have been in 1551 (a); but, according to Lord Buchan, it appears, from ſeveral circumſtances, that he was born in the month of Auguſt, 1560. What the circumſtances were which determined his Lordſhip to fix upon the latter date, are not related; though it cannot be doubted but that it was in conſequence of a more particular and accurate enquiry, that he was induced to differ in this reſpect from preceding authors. There is a difference, likewiſe, between the Earl of Buchan and other Biographers, with regard to the family of Crichton, and the rank and ſituation of his father. The common accounts aſſert that James Crichton's father was Robert Crichton of Clunie, in the county of Perth; and that this Robert Crichton commanded Queen Mary's army at the battle of Langſide, in the year 1568 (b). But from the Earl of Buchan we learn, that this Gentleman was of Elliock in the ſame county [A], and that he was Lord Advocate of Scotland in Queen Mary's Reign, from 1561 to 1573; part of which time he held that office in conjunction with Spens of Condie. The mother of James Crichton was Elizabeth Stuart, the only daughter of Sir James Stuart of Beath, who was a deſcendant of Robert Duke of Albany, the third ſon of King Robert the ſecond, by Elizabeth Muir or More, as ſhe is commonly called (c). It is hence evident that when the admirable Crichton boaſted (as he did abroad) that he was ſprung from Scottiſh Kings, he ſaid nothing but what was agreeable to truth. Nevertheleſs Thomas Dempſter, who ſufficiently amplifies his praiſes in other reſpects, paſſes a ſevere cenſure upon him on this account; which is the more remarkable, as Dempſter lived ſo near the time, and was well acquainted with the genealogies of the great families of Scotland (d) [B].

James Crichton is ſaid to have received his grammatical education at Perth, and to have ſtudied philoſophy in the Univerſity of St. Andrew. His Tutor in that Univerſity was Mr. John Rutherford, a Profeſſor at that time famous for his learning, and who diſtinguiſhed himſelf by writing four books on Ariſtotle's Logic, and a commentary on his Poetics. But nothing, according to Mackenzie, can give us a higher idea of Rutherford's worth and merit, than his being Maſter of that wonder and prodigy of his age, the great and admirable Crichton (e). However, it is not to this Profeſſor alone that the honour is aſcribed of having formed ſo extraordinary a character. There are others who may

(a) Mackenzie's Writers of the Scot's Nation, vol. iii. p. 198. Pennant's Tour in Scotland, vol. i. p. 313. Edinburgh Mag. vol. ii. p. 464.

(b) Ibid.

(c) Lord Buchan's Memoir.

(d) Ibid.

(e) Mackenzie, ubi ſupra, p. 137, 138.

[A] This Gentleman was of Elliock in the ſame county.] Mr. Pennant's account ſays, that Robert Crichton was of Clunie and Elliock. But it is erroneous, according to Lord Buchan, to ſtyle him of Clunie. It may here be obſerved, that the life of the admirable Crichton, given in Mr. Pennant's tour, was not drawn up by that Gentleman, but is a narrative which was printed ſome years ago at Aberdeen. "I have had opportunity, ſays Mr. Pennant, of "comparing it with moſt of the authorities quoted "in ſupport of the hiſtory of ſo extraordinary a per"ſon, and find them uſed with judgment and fide"lity. Excepting a few notes, I preſent it to the "readers in the ſtate I found it (1)." The real character and authority of this compilation will hereafter appear.

(1) Pennant's Firſt Tour in Scotland, p. 313.

[B] Was well acquainted with the genealogies of the great families of Scotland.] Thomas Dempſter, after ſpeaking of the endowments of Crichton's mind, has theſe words: Hunc ſane ingenii oſtentationem lubentius ferrem et fidentius prædicarem, quam poſſem pati jactabunde ad Scotiæ Reges genus ipſius referendum; nam inane eſt ea ſe gentis aut ſanguinis gloria perperam arrogata venditare, cum tanta claritudo in tenui fortuna ridicula videatur; quare ut verum ſit, familiam Clunium nobilem eſſe, ita illud mendaciſſimum, Reges Scotiæ Jacobi Crichtoni majores ullos extitiſſe (2). In anſwer to this cenſure, Lord Buchan has traced the deſcent of Crichton from Robert the firſt and Murdoch the ſecond Duke of Albany, through Sir James Stuart, the fourth lawful ſon of the laſt named Duke, to Elizabeth Stuart, who married Robert Crichton, as above-mentioned. The only difficulty that occurs, is with regard to the legitimacy of the deſcendants of Sir James Stuart. This Gentleman retired to Ireland, where, by a Lady of the family of the Mac Donalds, he had ſeven ſons, three of whom were legitimated by King James the third, and were the anceſtors of ſeveral conſiderable families, particularly thoſe of Evandale and Ochiltree (3). Though, according to Lord Buchan, Sir James Stuart was really married to the Iriſh Lady, the marriage, nevertheleſs, having been contracted out of the kingdom, was, by the law of Scotland, at that time conſidered as illegitimate. "It is ſomewhat ſingular, ſays his Lord"ſhip, that although the marriage of Sir James Stu"art, fourth ſon of Murdoch Duke of Albany, with "his Iriſh Lady, ſeems to have been allowed, and "that, by the law of Scotland, the ante-nuptial "children were legitimated to all intents and pur"poſes by the ſubſequent marriage; yet, weak as "was the male ſtock of the Houſe of Stuart at that "time, the iſſue of this marriage was ſet aſide from "the Succeſſion to the Crown, and Letters of Legi"timation were paſſed in favour of Andrew Lord "Evandale, Arthur and Walter Stuart his brothers, "April 17th, Anno 1479. Thus injuſtice has been "ſanctified by the prejudices of a barbarous age, and "a long lapſe of time has now almoſt effaced the "remembrance of it, even from the tables of our "Genealogiſts (4)." Perhaps ſome of our readers may think that a cloud ſtill reſts upon the ſubject of Crichton's deſcent from Scottiſh kings; not with regard to the reality of it, but its ſtrict legitimacy, according to the legal ideas which then prevailed in Scotland. This, however, is not a matter of great importance, ſince his celebrity has ariſen from very different cauſes.

(2) Dempſter's Hiſtoria Eccleſiaſtica, p. 189.

(3) Douglas's Peerage of Scotland, p. 17.

(4) Lord Buchan's Memoir.

On the father's ſide, the family of the Admirable Crichton was undoubtedly noble; and this is acknowledged by Dempſter. Three branches of that family have been raiſed to the Peerage of Scotland. Theſe were James Crichton Earl of Caithneſs, in whom the title began and ended; the Crichtons, Lord Crichtons, and afterwards Viſcounts Frendraught; and the Crichtons, Lord Crichtons of Sanquhar, afterwards Earls of Dumfries; which Earldom, by female deſcent, now belongs to the Earl of Stair. The title of Viſcount Frendraught was loſt by the attainder of Lewis the fifth Viſcount. James Crichton of Auchingowl, Eſq; is the preſent repreſentative of the family (5). The great offices held by ſome of the Crichtons, and the high alliances formed by them, might be enlarged upon, were it neceſſary. William, the firſt Lord Crichton, was Chancellor of Scotland. James, the ſecond Lord, was Great Chamberlain of that kingdom. His Lady was the daughter and co-heireſs of James Dunbar, Earl of Murray, and was deſcended from the illuſtrious Thomas Randolph, the firſt Earl of that county. William, the third Lord Crichton, married Lady Margaret Stuart, daughter of King James the ſecond (6).

(5) Douglas, ubi ſupra, p. 112. 164—167. 198—201.

(6) Douglas, ubi ſupra. Lord Buchan's Manuſcript.

put

put in their claim to a ſhare in the ſame glory; for Aldus Manutius, who calls Crichton firſt Couſin to the King, ſays that he was educated, along with his Majeſty, under Buchanan, Hepburn, and Robertſon, as well as Rutherford (f). Indeed, whatever might be the natural force of his genius, many Maſters muſt have been neceſſary, in order to his acquiring ſuch a variety of attainments as he is repreſented to have poſſeſſed. For it is related that he had ſcarcely arrived to the twentieth year of his age, when he had run through the whole circle of the Sciences, and could ſpeak and write to perfection in ten different languages. Nor was this all; for he had likewiſe improved himſelf to the higheſt degree in riding, dancing, and ſinging, and in playing upon all ſorts of inſtruments (g).

(f) Pennant, ubi ſupra, p. 314. note. Ald. Manut. Paradox. Cic. Dedic.

(g) Mackenzie, ubi ſupra, p. 198. Pennant, ubi ſupra.

Crichton, being thus accompliſhed, went abroad upon his travels, and is ſaid to have gone to Paris, of his tranſactions at which place the following account is given. He cauſed ſix placards to be fixed on all the gates of the Schools, Halls, and Colleges belonging to the Univerſity, and on all the pillars and poſts before the houſes of the moſt renowned men for literature in the city, inviting all thoſe who were well verſed in any art or ſcience, to diſpute with him in the College of Navarre, that day ſix weeks, by nine of the clock in the morning, where he would attend them, and be ready to anſwer to whatever ſhould be propoſed to him in any Art or Science, and in any of theſe twelve languages, Hebrew, Syriac, Arabic, Greek, Latin, Spaniſh, French, Italian, Engliſh, Dutch, Flemiſh, and Sclavonian; and this either in verſe or proſe, at the diſcretion of the diſputant. During this whole time, inſtead of cloſely applying to his ſtudies, he regarded nothing but hunting, hawking, tilting, vaulting, riding of a well-managed horſe, toſſing the pike, handling the muſket, and other military feats; or elſe he employed himſelf in domeſtic games, ſuch as balls, concerts of muſic vocal and inſtrumental; cards, dice, tennis, and the like diverſions of youth. This conduct ſo provoked the Students of the Univerſity, that, beneath the placard which was fixed on the Navarre gate, they cauſed the following words to be written: "If you would meet with this Monſter of Perfection, to make ſearch for him "either in the tavern or bawdy-houſe, is the readieſt way to find him." Nevertheleſs, when the day appointed arrived, Crichton appeared in the College of Navarre, and acquitted himſelf beyond expreſſion in the diſputation, which laſted from nine o'clock in the morning till ſix at night. At length, the Preſident, after extolling him highly, for the many rare and excellent endowments which God and Nature had beſtowed upon him, roſe from his chair, and, accompanied by four of the moſt eminent Profeſſors of the Univerſity, gave him a diamond ring, and a purſe full of gold, as a teſtimony of their love and favour. The whole ended with the repeated acclamations and huzzas of the ſpectators; and henceforward our young diſputant was called "The Admirable Crichton." It is added, that he was ſo little fatigued with the diſpute, that he went on the very next day to the "Louvre," where he had a match of tilting, (an exerciſe then in much requeſt,) and in the preſence of ſome Princes of the Court of France, and a great many Ladies, carried away the ring fifteen times ſucceſſively, and broke as many lances on the Saracen (h) [C] (*).

(h) Mackenzie, ubi ſupra, p. 199, 200. Pennant, ubi ſupra, p. 315, 316. Sir Thomas Urquhart's Tracts, p. 65—70.

(*) What is meant by the Saracen no one has condeſcended to explain.

The

[C] And broke as many lances on the Saracen.] The account given above, and which is taken from Mackenzie and Pennant, reſts entirely on the authority of Sir Thomas Urquhart, the language of whoſe narration has directly not been adopted, ſince it would only ſerve to caſt an air of ridicule on the whole ſtory. Mackenzie, however, and the writer in Pennant, have endeavoured ſtill farther to confirm the truth of the extraordinary exploits performed by Crichton at Paris, by the teſtimony of an author whom they conſider as an eye-witneſs. The paſſage which is produced for this purpoſe, is as follows: In Navarræ Collegium venit adoleſcens quidam natus Annos XX, qui bonas Artes apprime callebat, ut peritiſſimi quique Academiæ magiſtri teſtabuntur. Præclare fidibus canebat: Numeris, voce, modis, ſymphonia cunctos vincebat, pingebat, et imaginibus, colores inducebat optime omnium. In militia experimentiſſimus eſt: Gladium ambabus manibus diſtringebat tam bene et fortiter ut cum eo certare nullus auderet: ſtatim atque videbit hoſtem ſuum, ſaltu ſe in eum projiciebat, remotus ſpatio Pedum XX aut XXIV. Erat magiſter in Artibus, in medicina, in utroque jure, in theologia. Nobiſcum in Navarræ ſchola diſputando congreſſus eſt, tametſi magiſtrorum quinquaginta perfectiſſimorum numerum excederemus. Mitto alios ter mille, et eo amplius, qui concertationi interfuerunt. Tam argute et cumulate reſpondit quæſtionibus quæ propoſitæ ſunt omnibus, ut niſi præſentium, certe abſentium fidem ſuperet. Latine, Græce, Hebraice, Aribice, et linguis aliis pluribus loquitur, ut qui politiſſime; equitabat quoque ut qui optime. Quin etiam ſi quis homo annos centum viveret, et ſine cibo et potu, dies noctesque inſomnes traduceret, quas ille animo complexus eſt ſcientias aſſequeretur nunquam, et revera metum ingentem nobis incuſſit, nam plura novit quam natura humana ferre poſſit. Doctores eccleſiæ quatuor redarguit; ſapientia comparandus nemini videbatur; pro antichriſto habitus eſt (7). For this paſſage Mackenzie refers to Steph. Paſch. Diſquiſ. Lib. 5. Cap. 23. We ſhall inſert the tranſlation of it given in Pennant. "There came to the College of Navarre, a young "man of twenty years of age, who was perfectly "well ſeen in all the Sciences, as the moſt learned "Maſters of the Univerſity acknowledged. In "vocal and inſtrumental muſic none could excel "him; in painting and drawing in colours none "could equal him. In all military feats he was "moſt expert, and could play with the ſword ſo "dexterouſly with both his hands, that no man could "fight him. When he ſaw his enemy or antagoniſt, "he would throw himſelf upon him at one jump of "twenty or twenty-four feet diſtance. He was a "Maſter of Arts, and diſputed with us in the "Schools of the College in medicine, the civil and "canon Law, and Theology: and although we "were above fifty in number, beſides above three "thouſand that were preſent, ſo pointedly and "learnedly he anſwered to all the queſtions which "were propoſed to him, that none but they who "were preſent can believe it. He ſpake Latin, Greek, "Hebrew, and other languages moſt politely. He "was likewiſe a moſt excellent horſeman; and truly "if a man ſhould live a hundred years without "eating, drinking, or ſleeping, he could not attain "to this man's knowledge, which ſtruck us with a "panic fear; for he knew more than human nature "can

(7) Mackenzie's Scottiſh Writers, vol. iii. p. 199.

The next account we have of Crichton is, that he went to Rome, where he affixed a placard upon all the eminent places of the city, in the following terms: Nos Jacobus Crichtonus Scotus, cuicunque Rei propositæ ex improviso respondebimus. In a city which abounded in wit, this bold challenge, to answer to any question that could be proposed to him without his being previously advertised of it, could not escape the ridicule of a pasquinade. It is said, however, that being no wise discouraged, he appeared at the time and place appointed; and that, in the presence of the Pope, many Cardinals, Bishops, Doctors of Divinity, and Professors in all the Sciences, he displayed such wonderful proofs of his universal knowledge, that he excited no less surprize than he had done at Paris (i). Boccalini, who was then at Rome, gives something of a different relation of the matter. According to this author, the pasquinade against Crichton, which was to the following effect, "And he that will see it let him go to the sign of the Falcon and it shall be shewn," made such an impression upon him, that he left a place where he had been so grossly affronted as to be put upon a level with jugglers and mountebanks (k).

(i) Mackenzie, ubi supra. Pennant, ubi supra, p. 317, 318.

(k) Pennant, p. 317, note.

From Rome he went to Venice, at his approach to which city he appears to have been in considerable distress, of mind at least, if not with regard to external circumstances. This is evident from the following lines of his poem, In suum ad urbem Venetam appulsum.

Sæpè meos animo casus meditabar iniquos,
Sæpè humectabam guttis stillantibus ora.

The chief design of Crichton, in his poem, was to obtain a favourable reception at Venice, and particularly from Aldus Manutius, whose praises he celebrates in very high strains (l). When he presented his verses to Manutius, that Critic was struck with a very agreeable surprize, and judged, from the performance, that the author of it must be a person of an extraordinary genius. Upon discoursing with the stranger, he was filled with admiration; and finding him to be skilled in every subject, he introduced him to the acquaintance of the men of principal learning and note in Venice. Here he contracted an intimate friendship not only with Aldus Manutius, but with Laurentius Massa, Speron Speronius, Johannes Donatus, and various other learned persons, to whom he presented several poems in commendation of the City and University. Three of Crichton's Odes, one addressed to Aldus Manutius, another to Laurentius Massa, and a third to Johannes Donatus, are still preserved. At length, he was introduced to the Doge and Senate, in whose presence he made a speech, which was accompanied with such beauty of eloquence, and such grace of person and manner, that he received the thanks of that illustrious body, and nothing was talked of through the whole city but this rara in Terris Avis, this Prodigy of Nature (m). He held, likewise, disputations, on the subjects of theology, philosophy, and mathematics, before the most eminent Professors, and large multitudes of people. His reputation was so great, that the desire of seeing and hearing him brought together a vast concourse of persons, from different quarters, to Venice (n). It may be collected from Manutius, that the time in which Crichton exhibited these demonstrations of his abilities, was in the year 1580 [D].

(l) Delitiæ Poetarum Scotorum, p. 268—272.

(m) Joannis Imperialis Museum Historium, p. 140—143. Aldi Manutii Dedicatio ad Ciceronis Paradoxa. Mackenzie and Pennant, ubi supra.

(n) Ald. Manut. ubi supra. Lord Buchan's Memoir.

During his residence at Venice, he fell into a bad state of health, which continued for the space of four months. However, before he was perfectly recovered, he went, by the advice of his friends, to Padua, the University of which city was at that time in great reputation. The next day after his arrival, there was a meeting of all the learned men of the place, at the house of Jacobus Aloysius Cornelius; when Crichton opened the assembly with an extemporary Poem in praise of the city, the University, and the company who had honoured him with their presence. After this, he disputed for six hours with the most celebrated Professors, on various subjects of learning; and he exposed, in particular, the errors of Aristotle and his commentators, with so much solidity and acuteness, and, at the same time, with so much modesty, that he excited universal admiration. In conclusion, he delivered, extempore, an Oration in Praise of Ignorance, which was conducted with such ingenuity and elegance, that his hearers were astonished. This exhibition of Crichton's talents was on the fourteenth of March, 1581. Soon after, he appointed a day for another disputation, to be held at the Palace of the Bishop of Padua; not for the purpose of affording higher proofs of his abilities, for that could not possibly be done, but in compliance with the earnest solicitations of some persons, who were not present at the former assembly. However, several circumstances occurred, which prevented this meeting from taking place (o). Such is the account of Manutius; but Imperialis relates, that he was informed by his father, who was present upon the occasion, that Crichton was opposed by Archangelus Mercenarius, a famous philosopher, and that he acquitted himself so well

(o) Ald. Manut. ubi supra.

(8) Pennant's First Tour in Scotland, p. 314, 315.

" can well bear. He overcame four of the Doctors " of the Church; for in learning none could contest " with him, and he was thought to be Antichrist (8)." It will be seen in the sequel, how far this story relates to Crichton.

[D] Was in the year 1580.] As Aldus Manutius writes, in 1581, that he received the Ode addressed to himself in the former year, it is hence apparent that Crichton came to Venice in that year (9).

(9) Lord Buchan's Memoir.

as

as to obtain the approbation of a very honourable company, and even of his antagoniſt himſelf (p) [E].

(p) Joan. Imperial. Muſe. Hiſt. ubi ſupra.

Amidſt the diſcourſes which were occaſioned by our young Scotſman's exploits, and the high applauſes that were beſtowed on his genius and attainments, ſome perſons there were who endeavoured to detract from his merit. For ever, therefore, to confound theſe invidious impugners of his talents, he cauſed a paper to be fixed on the gates of St. John and St. Paul's Church, wherein he offered to prove before the Univerſity, that the errours of Ariſtotle, and of all his followers, were almoſt innumerable, and that the latter had failed, both in explaining their maſter's meaning, and in treating on theological ſubjects. He promiſed, likewiſe, to refute the dreams of certain Mathematical Profeſſors; to diſpute in all the Sciences; and to anſwer to whatever ſhould be propoſed to him, or objected againſt him. All this he engaged to do, either in the common logical way, or by numbers and mathematical figures, or in a hundred ſorts of verſes, at the pleaſure of his opponents (q) [F]. According to Manutius, Crichton ſuſtained this conteſt without fatigue, for three days; during which time he ſupported his credit, and maintained his propoſitions, with ſuch ſpirit and energy, that, from an unuſual concourſe of people, he obtained acclamations and praiſes, than which none more magnificent were ever heard by men (r).

(q) Ald. Manut. Mackenzie and Pennant, ubi ſupra.

(r) Ald. Manut. ubi ſupra.

The next account we have of Crichton, and which appears to have been tranſmitted, through Sir Thomas Urquhart, to later Biographers, is of an extraordinary inſtance of bodily courage and ſkill. It is ſaid, that at Mantua there was at this time a Gladiator, who had foiled, in his travels, the moſt famous fencers in Europe, and had lately killed three perſons who had entered the liſts with him. The Duke of Mantua was much grieved at having granted this man his protection, as he found it to be attended with ſuch fatal conſequences. Crichton, being informed of his Highneſs's concern, offered his ſervice, not only to drive the murtherer from Mantua, but from Italy, and to fight him for fifteen hundred piſtoles. Though the Duke was unwilling to expoſe ſuch an accompliſhed Gentleman to ſo great a hazard, yet, relying upon the report he had heard of his warlike atchievements, he agreed to the propoſal; and the time and place being appointed, the whole Court attended to behold the performance. At the beginning of the combat, Crichton ſtood only upon his defence; while the Italian made his attack with ſuch eagerneſs and fury, that, having overacted himſelf, he began to grow weary. Our young Scotſman now ſeized the opportunity of attacking his antagoniſt in return; which he did with ſo much dexterity and vigour, that he ran him through the body in three different places, of which wounds he immediately died. The acclamations of the ſpectators were loud and extraordinary upon this occaſion; and it was acknowledged by all of them, that they had never ſeen Art grace Nature, or Nature ſecond the precepts of Art, in ſo lively a manner as they had beheld theſe two things accompliſhed on that day. To crown the glory of the action, Crichton beſtowed the prize of his victory upon the widows of the three perſons who had loſt their lives in fighting with the Gladiator (s).

(s) Pennant, ubi ſupra, p. 320, 321. Mackenzie, ubi ſupra, p. Sir Thomas Urquhart's Tracts, p. 59—64.

It is aſſerted that, in conſequence of this and his other wonderful performances, the Duke of Mantua made choice of him for Preceptor to his ſon Vincentio di Gonzaga, who is repreſented as being of a riotous temper and a diſſolute life. The appointment was highly pleaſing to the Court. Crichton, to teſtify his gratitude to his friends and benefactors, and to contribute to their diverſion, framed, we are told, a Comedy, wherein he expoſed and ridiculed all the weakneſſes and failures of the ſeveral employments in which men are engaged. This compoſition was regarded as one of the moſt ingenious ſatires that ever was made upon mankind. But the moſt aſtoniſhing part of the ſtory is, that Crichton ſuſtained fifteen characters in the repreſentation of his own play. Among the reſt, he acted the divine, the philoſopher, the lawyer, the mathematician, the phyſician, and the ſoldier, with ſuch inimitable grace, that every time he appeared upon the Theatre, he ſeemed to be a different perſon (t) [G].

(t) Pennant and Mackenzie, ubi ſupra. Urquhart, ubi ſupra, p. 71—76.

From

[E] And even of his antagoniſt himſelf.] Theſe are the words of Imperialis. Mihi quidem ex patris mei, qui ipſum audiit, ſermonibus agnitum, ex Doctoribus unum, interriti ſpiritus acie, Arcangelum Mercenarium inſignem philoſophum, cum Critonio de Rebus Phyſicis copioſe, graviterque, diſſeruiſſe, impugnando, reſolvendo, interpretando ſubtiliter, ac promptè ſingula; qui propterea perhonorificum lectiſſimæ Coronæ, ac vel ipſius diſceptatoris indicium eſt emeritus.

[F] At the pleaſure of his opponents.] The following is the copy of this challenge, or of theſe two Theorems, as they are called by Manutius. Ut iis qui (virtute veraque animi nobilitate aliis-prælucentes) bene de virtutis amatoribus ſentire conſueverunt gratias agat immortales Jacobus Critonius Scotus, profligatiſque et perditis hominibus omnem in poſterum jactandi occaſionem auferat, errores Ariſtotelis pene innumerabiles et omnium Latinorum Philoſophorum, ſive cum de ipſius mente diſputant, ſive cum Res Theologicas atingunt; et nonnullorum quoque Matheſeos Profeſſorum Somnia refutabit, et ad objecta reſpondebit. Liberam ad hæc in omnibus diſciplinis, ſive illæ publice doceri ſoleant, ſive ſapientiſſimis tantum hominibus perviæ ſint, arguendi occaſionem dat reſponſurus, ſive logicis et conſuetis reſponſionibus, ſive per ſecretam numerorum rationem aut figuras mathematicas, ſive per aliquot ex centum carminum generibus, ex proponentium arbitrio. In D. D. Johannis et Pauli Æde ſacra, ipſo ſanctiſſimo Pentecoſtes Die, poſt meridiem,

EXORDIUM SUMET.

[G] He ſeemed to be a different perſon.] As a ſpecimen of Sir Thomas Urquhart's manner of writing, we ſhall inſert part of his account of this tranſaction.

'It happened on a Shrove-Tueſday at night, that 'this ever-renowned Crichtoun, (who, in the after-'noon of that day, at the deſire of my Lord Duke '(the whole Court ſtriving which ſhould exceed the 'other

From being the principal Actor in a Comedy, Crichton ſoon became the ſubject of a dreadful Tragedy. One night, during the time of Carnival, as he was walking along the ſtreets

'other in foolery, and deviſing of the beſt ſports to 'excite laughter; neither my Lord, Ducheſs, nor 'Prince, being exempted from acting their parts, as 'well as they could) upon a Theatre ſet up for the 'purpoſe, begun to prank it (à la Venetiana) with 'ſuch a flouriſh of mimick, and ethopoetick geſtures, 'that all the Courtiers of both ſexes, even thoſe that 'a little before that, were fondeſt of their own con-'ceits, at the ſight of his ſo inimitable a garb, from 'raviſhing actors, that they were before, turned then 'raviſhed ſpectators. O! with how great livelineſs 'did he repreſent the conditions of all manner of 'men! how naturally did he ſet before the eyes of 'the beholders the rogueries of all profeſſions, from 'the overweening monarch to the peeviſh ſwaine, 'through all intermediate degrees of the ſuperficial 'courtier or proud warrior, diſſembled churchman, 'doting old man, cozening lawyer, lying traveler, 'covetous merchant, rude ſeaman, pedantick ſcholar, 'the amorous ſhepheard, envious artiſan, vainglorious 'maſter, and tricky ſervant; he did with ſuch variety 'diſplay the ſeveral humours of all theſe ſorts of 'people, and with a ſo-bewitching energy, that he 'ſeemed to be the original, they the counterfeit; and 'they the reſemblance whereof he was the prototype: 'he had all the jeers, ſquibs, flouts, buls, quips, 'taunts, whims, jeſts, clinches, gybes, mokes, jerks, 'with all the ſeveral kinds of equivocations, and 'other ſophiſtical captions, that could properly be 'adapted to the perſon by whoſe repreſentation he 'intended to inveagle the company into a fit of mirth, 'and would keep in that miſcellany diſcourſe of his '(which was all for the ſplene, and nothing for the 'gall) ſuch a climacterical and mercurially digeſted 'method, that when the fancy of the hearers was 'tickled with any conceit, and that the jovial blood 'was moved, he held it going, with another new 'device upon the back of the firſt, and another, yet 'another, and another againe, ſucceeding one an-'other, for the promoval of what is a ſtirring into a 'higher agitation; till in the cloſure of the luxuriant 'period, the decumanal wave of the oddeſt whimſy of 'al, enforced the charmed ſpirits of the auditory, '(for affording room to its apprehenſion) ſuddenly 'to burſt forth into a laughter; which commonly 'laſted juſt ſo long as he had leiſure to withdraw 'behind the ſkreen, ſhift off with the help of a page, 'the ſuite he had on, apparel himſelf with another, 'and return to the ſtage to act afreſh; for by that 'time their tranſported, diſparpled, and ſublimated 'fancies, by the wonderfully operating engines of 'his ſolacious inventions, had from the hight to 'which the inward ſcrues, wheeles, and pullies of 'his wit had elevated them, deſcended by degrees 'into their wonted ſtations, he was ready for the 'perſonating of another carriage; whereof, to the 'number of fourteen ſeveral kinds, (during the five 'hours ſpace, that at the Dukes deſire, the ſollicita-'tion of the Court, and his own recreation, he was 'pleaſed to hiſtrionize it) he ſhewed himſelf ſo natural 'a repreſentative, that any would have thought he 'had been ſo many ſeveral actors, differing in all 'things elſe, ſave only the ſtature of the body; with 'this advantage above the moſt of other actors, whoſe 'tongue, with its oral implements, is the onely in-'ſtrument of their minds diſcloſing, that, beſides 'his mouth with its appurtenances, he lodged almoſt 'a ſeveral oratour in every member of his body; his 'head, his eyes, his ſhoulders, armes, hands, fingers, 'thighs, legs, feet, and breaſt, being able to decipher 'any paſſion, whoſe character he purpoſed to give.

'Firſt, he did preſent himſelf with a crown on his 'head, a ſcepter in his hand, being clothed in a pur-'ple robe furred with ermyne; after that, with a 'mitre on his head, a croſier in his hand, and ac-'courtred with a paire of lawn ſleeves: and there-'after, with a helmet on his head, the viſiere up, a 'commanding-ſtick in his hand, and arrayed in a 'buff-ſuit, with a ſcarf about his middle: then, in a 'rich apparel, after the neweſt faſhion, did he ſhew 'himſelf, (like another Sejanus) with a periwig 'daubed with Cypres powder: in ſequel of that, he 'came out with a three cornered cap on his head, 'ſome parchments in his hand, and writings hang-'ing at his girdle like Chancery bills; and next to 'that, with a furred gown about him, an ingot of 'gold in his hand, and a bag full of money by his 'ſide; after all this, he appears againe clad in a 'country-jacket, with a prong in his hand, and a 'Monmouth-like-cap on his head: then very ſhortly 'after, with a palmer's coat upon him, a bourdon 'in his hand, and ſome few cockle-ſhels ſtuck to his 'hat, he look't as if he had come in pilgrimage from 'Saint Michael; immediately after that, he domi-'neers it in a bare unlined gowne, with a pair of 'whips in the one hand, and Corderius in the other: 'and in ſuite thereof, he honderſpondered it with a pair 'of pannier-like breeches, a Mountera-cap on his 'head, and a knife in a wooden ſheath, daggerways, 'by his ſide; about the latter end he comes forth 'again with a ſquare in one hand, a rule in the 'other, and a leather apron before him: then very 'quickly after, with a ſcrip by his ſide, a ſheep hook 'in his hand, and a baſket full of flowers to make 'noſegays for his miſtris: now drawing to a cloſure, 'he rants it firſt in cuerpo, and vapouring it with 'gingling ſpurrs, and his armes a kenbol like a Don 'Diego he ſtrouts it, and by the loftineſs of his gate 'plaies the Capitan Spavento: then in the very 'twinkling of an eye, you would have ſeen him 'againe iſſue forth with a cloak upon his arm, in a 'livery garment, thereby repreſenting the ſerving-'man; and laſtly, at one time amongſt thoſe other, 'he came out with a long gray beard, and bucked 'ruff, crouching on a ſtaff tip't with the head of a 'Barber's Cithern, and his gloves hanging by a 'button at his girdle.

'Thoſe fifteen ſeveral perſonages he did repreſent 'with ſuch excellency of garb, and exquiſiteneſs of 'language, that condignely to perpend the ſubtlety 'of the invention, the method of the diſpoſition, the 'neatneſs of the elocution, the gracefulneſs of the 'action, and wonderful variety in the ſo dextrous 'performance of all, you would have taken it for 'a comedy of five acts, conſiſting of three ſcenes, 'each compoſed by the beſt poet in the world, and 'acted by fifteen of the beſt players that ever lived, 'as was moſt evidently made apparent to all the 'ſpectators, in the fifth and laſt hour of his action, '(which, according to our Weſtern account, was 'about ſix aclock at night, and, by the calculation 'of that country, half an hour paſt three and twenty, 'at that time of the yeer) for, purpoſing to leave of 'with the ſetting of the ſun, with an endeavour 'nevertheleſs to make his concluſion the maſter-piece 'of the work, he, to that effect, ſummoning all his 'ſpirits together, which never failed to be ready at 'the cal of ſo worthy a Commander, did, by their 'aſſiſtance, ſo conglomerate, ſhuffle, mix, and inter-'lace the geſtures, inclinations, actions, and very 'tones of the ſpeech of thoſe fifteen ſeveral ſorts of 'men whoſe carriages he did perſonate, into an ine-'ſtimable Ollapodrida of immaterial morſels of divers 'kinds, ſutable to the very Ambroſian reliſh of the 'Heliconian Nymphs, that in the Peripetia of this 'Drammatical exercitation, by the inchanted tranſ-'portation of the eyes and eares of its ſpectabundal 'auditorie, one would have ſworne that they all had 'looked with multiplying glaſſes, and that (like that 'Angel in the Scripture, whoſe voice was ſaid to be 'like the voice of a multitude) they heard in him 'alone the promiſcuous ſpeech of fifteen ſeveral ac-'tors; by the various raviſhments of the excellencies 'whereof, in the frolickneſs of a jocund ſtraine be-'yond expectation, the logofacinated ſpirits of the 'beholding hearers and auricularie ſpectators, were 'ſo on a ſudden ſeazed upon in their riſible faculties 'of the ſoul, and all their vital motions ſo univerſally 'affected in this extremitie of agitation, that to avoid 'the inevitable charmes of his intoxicating ejacula-'tions, and the accumulative influences of ſo power-'full a tranſportation, one of my Lady Dutcheſs chief

'Maids

(y) Confultò, an Caſu incertum.

(b) Imperialis, ubi ſupra. Lord Buchan's Me-moir.

(z) Pennant and Mackenzie, ubi ſupra. Urquhart, ubi ſupra, p. 78.

ſtreets of Mantua, and playing upon his guittar, he was attacked by half a dozen people in maſks. The aſſailants found that they had no ordinary perſon to deal with, for they were not able to maintain their ground againſt him. In the iſſue, the leader of the company, being diſarmed, pulled off his maſk, and begged his life, telling him, that he was the Prince his pupil. Crichton immediately fell upon his knees, and expreſſed his concern for his miſtake; alledging, that what he had done was only in his own defence, and that if Gonzaga had any deſign upon his life, he might always be maſter of it. Then, taking his own ſword by the point, he preſented it to the Prince, who immediately received it, and was ſo irritated by the affront which he thought he had ſuſtained, in being foiled with all his attendants, that he inſtantly ran Crichton through the heart (u).

(u) Mackenzie, Pennant, Edinburgh Magazine, Adventurer, No. 81.

Various have been the conjectures concerning the motives which could induce Vincentio di Gonzaga to be guilty of ſo ungenerous and brutal an action. Some have aſcribed it to jealouſy, aſſerting that he ſuſpected Crichton to be more in favour than himſelf with a Lady whom he paſſionately loved; and Sir Thomas Urquhart has told a ſtory upon this head which is extravagant and ridiculous in the higheſt degree (w). Others, with greater probability, repreſent the whole tranſaction as the reſult of a drunken frolic; and it is uncertain, according to Imperialis, whether the meeting of the Prince and Crichton was by accident or deſign (x). However, it is agreed on all hands, that Crichton loſt his life in this renconter. The time of his deceaſe is ſaid, by the generality of his Biographers, to have been in the beginning of July, 1583; but Lord Buchan (we doubt not in conſequence of a more accurate enquiry) fixes it to the ſame month in the preceding year. There is a difference, likewiſe, with regard to the period of life at which Crichton died. The common accounts declare that he was killed in the thirty-ſecond year of his age; but Imperialis aſſerts that he was only in his twenty-ſecond, when that calamitous event took place, and this fact is confirmed by Lord Buchan (y).

(w) Urquhart, ubi ſupra, p. 79—96.

(x) Conſultò, an Caſu incertum.

(y) Imperialis, ubi ſupra. Lord Buchan's Memoir.

Crichton's tragical end excited a very great and general lamentation. If Sir Thomas Urquhart is to be credited, the whole Court of Mantua went, three quarters of a year, into mourning for him; the epitaphs and elegies that were compoſed upon his death, and ſtuck upon his hearſe, would exceed, if collected, the bulk of Homer's works; and, for a long time afterwards, his picture was to be ſeen in moſt of the bed-chambers and galleries of the Italian Nobility, repreſenting him on horſeback, with a lance in the one hand, and a book in the other. The ſame Author tells us, that Crichton gained the eſteem of Kings and Princes, by his magnanimity and knowledge; of Noblemen and Gentlemen, by his courtlineſs and breeding; of Knights, by his honourable deportment and pregnancy of wit; of the rich, by his affability and good fellowſhip; of the poor, by his munificence and liberality; of the old, by his conſtancy and wiſdom; of the young, by his mirth and gallantry; of the learned, by his univerſal knowledge; of the ſoldiers, by his undaunted valour and courage; of the merchants and artificers, by his upright dealing and honeſty; and of the fair ſex, by his beauty and handſomeneſs; in which reſpect, he was a maſterpiece of nature (z).

(z) Pennant and Mackenzie, ubi ſupra. Urquhart, ubi ſupra, p. 78.

Extravagant as this account muſt appear, ſomething as extravagant hath been advanced by earlier writers. Joannes Imperialis, an Italian Biographer, to whom we have already referred, ſays, in his life of Crichton, that he was the Wonder of the laſt Age; the prodigious production of Nature; the glory and ornament of Parnaſſus, in a ſtupendous and unuſual manner; and that, in the judgment of the learned world, he was the phœnix of literature, and rather a ſhining particle of the divine Mind and Majeſty, than a model of what could be attained by human induſtry. The ſame Author, after highly celebrating the beauty of his perſon, aſſerts that his extraordinary eloquence, and his admirable knowledge of things, teſtified that he poſſeſſed a ſtrength of genius wholly Divine. "What, adds this writer, can more exceed our comprehenſion, than that Crichton, in the "twenty-firſt year of his age, ſhould be maſter of ten different languages, and perfectly "well verſed in philoſophy, mathematics, theology, polite literature, and all other Sciences? "Beſides, was it ever heard, in the whole compaſs of the globe, that, to theſe extraordi-"nary endowments of the mind, ſhould be added a ſingular ſkill in fencing, dancing, ſing-"ing, riding, and in every exerciſe of the gymnaſtic Art?" Nay, Imperialis, in his account of Crichton's death, declares that the report of ſo ſad a cataſtrophe was ſpread to the remoteſt parts of the earth; that it diſturbed univerſal Nature; and that in her grief

'Maids of Honour, by the vehemencie of the ſhock 'of thoſe incomprehenſible raptures, burſt forth into 'a laughter, to the rupture of a veine in her body; 'and another young Lady, by the irreſiſtible violence 'of the pleaſure unawares infuſed, where the tender 'receptibilitie of her too too tickled fancie was leaſt 'able to hold out, ſo unprovidedly was ſurpriſed, that 'with no leſs impetuoſitie of ridibundal paſſion then '(as hath been told) occaſioned a fracture in the 'other young Ladie's modeſtie, ſhe, not able longer to 'ſupport the well-beloved burthen of ſo exceſſive 'delight, and intranſing joys of ſuch Mercurial 'exhilarations, through the ineffable extaſie of 'an overmaſtered apprehenſion, fell back in a 'ſwown, without the appearance of any other life 'into her, then what by the moſt refined wits of 'theological ſpeculators is conceived to be exerced 'by the pureſt parts of the ſeparated entelechies of 'bleſſed ſaints in their ſublimeſt converſations with 'the celeſtial hierarchies: this accident procured the 'incoming of an Apothecarie with reſtoratives, as 'the other did that of a Surgeon, with conſolidative 'medicaments (10).'

(10) Sir John Hawkins's Life of Dr. Johnſon, p. 300—307. Urquhart's Tracts, p. 71—76.

for the loſs of the Wonder ſhe had produced, ſhe threatened never more to confer ſuch honour upon mankind [H]. Compared with theſe extravagancies, the aſſertion of Bayle, that Crichton was one of the greateſt prodigies of wit that ever lived, and the teſtimony of Fœlix Aſtolfus concerning his wonderful memory, may be conſidered as modeſt encomiums (a).

(a) Mackenzie and Pennant, ubi ſupra. Aſtolfi Officina Iſtorica, p. 102.

From the portraits which remain of Crichton, it appears that in his face and form he was beautiful and elegant, and that his body and limbs, though not muſcular or athletic, were well proportioned, and fitted for feats of agility. Aldus Manutius deſcribes him as diſtinguiſhed by a mark of a red roſe about his right eye. No ſuch mark, however, is to be traced in any of the pictures or prints of him which have come down to our times. There are two portraits of him in Scotland, one of which is in the poſſeſſion of Mr. Graham of Airth. From a copy of this picture, belonging to Lord Eliock, a Lord of Seſſions, the print is taken which is given by Mr. Pennant. A friend of the writer of this article is of opinion, that in Mr. Graham's Original, Crichton does not appear to be ſo handſome as he is repreſented in Mr. Pennant's print. The other portrait of Crichton is the property of Mr. Moriſon, of Bògnie and Frendraught in Aberdeenſhire. This Gentleman's father became poſſeſſed of the eſtate of Frendraught by purchaſe; at which time he found, in the principal Manſion, the picture of which we are ſpeaking. It is ſaid to be a very fine one, and is underſtood to have been ſent over from Italy to Lord Frendraught by Crichton himſelf, and to have been painted in the year of his death (b). There is a print of him in Imperialis, which, though poorly executed, is probably authentic (c).

(b) Lord Buchan's Memoir, Pennant, p. 326, note.

(c) Imperialis, ubi ſupra. Granger's Biographical Hiſtory, vol. i. p. 262, 2d edit.

Several of the Biographers of Crichton have given a formal Catalogue of his works, though it does not appear that any productions of his have ever been committed to the preſs, excepting four Latin Poems. What his Encomiaſts have been pleaſed to call his works are, for the moſt part, nothing more than the heads of the topics upon which he declaimed or diſputed, at the public exhibitions of his talents. That we may not, however, detract, in any degree, from his juſt praiſes, we ſhall inſert the Catalogue below [I]. Of the poetic encomiums that have been written upon him, three only have been preſerved, and theſe are not diſtinguiſhed by their merit. What they are, will be ſeen in the note ſubjoined [K].

[H] She threatened never more to confer ſuch honour upon mankind.] As Imperialis's Muſeum Hiſtoricum is not in every hand, we ſhall inſert the original paſſages. Tranſacti dudum ſæculi monſtrum, prodigioſo Naturæ opificis conatu editum, quò parnaſſi ſpacia ſtupendo, et inuſitato ſpectaculo illuſtrarentur. Hic eſt totius adhuc orbis Judicio phœnix habitus ingeniorum, divinæ mentis igniculis ſummi potiùs datoris referens majeſtatem, quàm mortalem ad æmulandum laceſſens induſtriam.——Prælta facundia, rerumque notitia præclariſſimarum, dæmonicum prorſus ei ſubeſſe animi teſtabantur vigorem. Quid aut magnificentius, aut admirabilius, quàm in ipſis ephebis, belli detentum ſtudiis ingenium, tantam in doctrinarum arvis meſſem cogere potuiſſe? Quid humanum magis exſuperans captum, quàm vigeſimo Ætatis Anno, decem linguarum peritia; necnon philoſophiæ, mathematicæ, theologiæ, mitiorum artium, cæterarumque omnium diſciplinarum apicibus præſtitiſſe? Porrò quid magis in toto terrarum ambitu inauditum, quàm digladiandi, ſaltandi, ſonandi, equitandi, totius gymnaſticæ præſtantiam ſingularem, tot arcanis elatæ mentis junxiſſe prærogativis? ——Miſerabilis herculè fati rumor in ultimas uſque terras expanſus nedum tetricis viventes inſtitutis homines perculit, ſed naturam probe turbavit univerſam, quæ pompam excidiſſe ſuam ingemens, haud amplius tantis ſe mortales cumulaturam honoribus minatus eſt (11).

(11) Joan. Imperial. Muſeum Hiſtoricum & Phyſicum, p. 140—143.

[I] We ſhall inſert the Catalogue below.] It is as follows: I. Odæ ad Laurentium Maſſam plures. II. Laudes Patavinæ, Carmen extempore effuſum, cum in Jacobi Moyſii Cornelii Domo experimentum Ingenii coram tota Academiæ Frequentia non ſine Multorum Stupore faceret. III. Ignorationis Laudatio, extemporale Thema ibidem redditum, poſt ſex Horarum diſputationes, ut Præſentes Somnia potius fovere quam Rem ſe veram videre affirmarint, ait Manutius. IV. De Appulſu ſuo Venetias. V. Odæ ad Aldum Manutium. VI. Epiſtolæ ad Diverſos. VII. Prefationes ſolemnes in omnes Scientias ſacras et profanas. VIII. Judicium de Philoſophis. IX. Errores Ariſtotelis. X. Armis an Literæ præſtant, Controverſia oratoria. XI. Refutatio Mathematicorum. XII. A Comedy in the Italian Language (12).

(12) Dempſter, ubi ſupra, p. 189. Mackenzie, ubi ſupra, p. 307. Pennant, ubi ſupra, p. 328.

[K] Will be ſeen in the note ſubjoined.] The firſt is by Dr. John Johnſton, in his Hiſtorical Inſcriptions upon the Scottiſh Kings and Heroes. It is obſervable, that this writer places the death of Crichton in the year 1581.

Jacobus Crittonius Clunius,

Muſarum pariter ac martis alumnus, omnibis in ſtudiis admirabilis, Mantua a Ducis Mantuani filio cæſus, 1581.

Et genus et cenſum dat Scotia: Gallia pectus
Excolit. admirans Itala terra virum
Ambit, et eſſe ſuum vellet. Gens æmula vitam
Abſtulit. An ſatis hoc, dicat ut illa ſuum?
Mantua habet cineres, ſcelus exſecrata nefandum,
At tumuli tanti gaudet honore tamen (13).

(13) De Illuſtribus Poetarum, p. 696.

The inſcription prefixed, by Dr. Johnſton, to theſe verſes, is very inaccurately given in Mackenzie and Pennant.

The ſecond encomium is by Georgius Rotinus, an Italian.

Ignoto latuit Phœnix, Critonius ævo,
Funereis poſtquam Mantua merſit aquis.
Scilicet ut ſurgat redivivus in æthera Phœnix,
Auxilium poſſet qui dare nullus erat.
Famigeras iterum Critonius exit in auras,
Et volat ingenio docta per ora virum.
Addit imperio manſuras dædalus alas,
Et penna has pennas imperialis habet.

The laſt is by Julius Ranconius, another Italian.

Fert præjudicium ſapiens Critonius annis,
Dum vincit roſeis tempora cana comis.
Hinc parat inſidias quibus illa recedat
Invida quæ tantum nollet habere virum.
Aſt iterum ſuperat languens fera ſecula, namque
Quæ ſupereſt, famam non gelida urna capit.
Ingenio Phœnix, Phœnicis ſorte novare
Debuit occiduum non moritura Dies (14).

(14) Imperialis, ubi ſupra, p. 143. Mackenzie, ubi ſupra, p. 206.

Who Rotinus and Ranconius were, it is not in my power to aſcertain; nor is it a matter of any importance. From a peruſal of their verſes, it appears highly probable that they were written for the purpoſe of being annexed to Imperialis's Life of Crichton, and conſequently long after Crichton's death.

Such

Such are the accounts which, by a ſucceſſion of writers, and particularly ſince the time of Mackenzie, have been given of the Admirable Crichton, with little variation, and ſcarcely with any degree of heſitation or reflection. It is, therefore, an object of importance, to examine, ſomewhat more accurately and extenſively than hath hitherto been done, what meaſure of faith is to be allotted to the different parts of the preceding narrative. And here it muſt be obſerved, that no credit can be granted to any facts which depend upon the ſole authority of Sir Thomas Urquhart. Sir John Hawkins, indeed, ſeems to think that the ſtories told of Crichton by this writer may be conſidered as ſufficiently authenticated to all the purpoſes of hiſtorical information (d). Mr. Pennant, likewiſe, ſpeaks of him with approbation; and Dr. Samuel Johnſon laid a ſtreſs on his veracity, in the account of Crichton which he dictated to Dr. Hawkſworth, and is inſerted in the eighty-firſt number of the Adventurer; of which account it may be obſerved, that it is only an elegant ſummary of the life written by Mackenzie. But with all deference to theſe reſpectable names, I muſt declare my full perſuaſion that Sir Thomas Urquhart is an author whoſe teſtimony to facts is totally unworthy of regard; and it is ſurprizing that a peruſal of his works does not ſtrike every mind with this conviction. His productions are ſo inexpreſſibly abſurd and extravagant, that the only rational judgment which can be pronounced concerning him is, that he was little, if at all, better than a madman. To the character of his having been a madman muſt be added that of his being a liar. Severe as this term may be thought, I apprehend that a diligent examination of the treatiſe which contains the memorials concerning Crichton would ſhew that it is ſtrictly true. But of his total diſregad to truth there is inconteſtible evidence in another work of his, entitled, "The true Pedigree, "and Lineal Deſcent, of the moſt ancient and honourable Family of the URQUHARTS in "the Houſe of CROMARTY, from the Creation of the World until the Year of God, "1652." In this work it is almoſt incredible what a number of falſities he has invented, both with reſpect to names and facts. Perhaps a more flagrant inſtance of impoſture and fiction was never exhibited; and the abſurdity of the whole pedigree is beyond the power of words to expreſs. It can only be felt by thoſe who have peruſed the Tract itſelf [K].

(d) Life of Dr. Samuel Johnſon, p. 299.

Such

[K] It can only be felt by thoſe who have peruſed the Tract itſelf.] Though a few ſpecimens cannot ſufficiently expoſe the abſurdity and falſhood of the whole performance, it may not be diſagreeable to our readers to be preſented with ſome examples of our author's fictions. In enumerating the Patriarchs before the Deluge, he regularly mentions the names of their wives, as he does thoſe of the wives of other perſons, through the whole ſucceeding ſeries. Seth, he aſſerts, married Shifkah; Enos, Mahla; Cainan, Bilhah; Mahalaleel, Timnah; Jared, Aholimah; Enoch, Zilpah; Methuſalah, Noema; Lamech, Ada; and Noah, Titea; who was the daughter of Tubal-Cain, the ſon of Jubal. Among his anceſtors poſterior to the Flood, he reckons ESORMON, in the eighteen hundredth and tenth year of the world, who was Sovereign Prince of Achaia. "For his fortune, ſays "Sir Thomas, in the wars, and his affability in "converſation, his ſubjects and familiars ſurnamed "him ευχαρτος, that is to ſay, fortunate and well-beloved. After which time, his poſterity ever ſince "has acknowledged him the father of all that carry the "name of URQUHART. He had for his arms three "banners, three ſhips, and three ladies, in a field "Or; with the picture of a young Lady above the "waiſt, holding in her right hand a brandiſhed "ſword, and a branch of myrtle in the left, for his "creſt: and for ſupporters two Javanites, after the "ſoldier habit of Achaia, with this motto in the "ſcroll of his coat-armour, Ταυτα ἡ τρια αξιοθεάτα: "that is, theſe three are worthy to behold. Upon his "wife Narfeſia, who was Sovereign of the Amazons, "he begat CRATYNTER. He was likewiſe ſurnamed ευχαετος, as ever ſince have been all the "male-race of Eſormon."——Of another of Sir Thomas Urquhart's anceſtors, whom he calls Phrenedon, he ſays, "This Phrenedon was in the houſe "of the Patriarch Abraham at the time of the Deſtruction of Sodom and Gomorrah."——Of Molin, who is placed in the Year of the World 2415, our author relates as follows: "This is he that came with "Gathelus from Egypt into Portugal, and of whom "are deſcended the Clanmoline-ſpick in Ireland. "His wife Panthea was the daughter of Deucalion "and Pirra, of whom Ovid maketh mention in the "firſt of his Metamorphoſis. In that part of Afric, "which, after his name, is till this hour called Molinea, by cunning and valour together, he killed, "in one morning, three lions, the heads whereof, "in a baſket, preſented to his Lady Panthea, ſo terrified her, that (being quick with child) for putting her right hand to her left ſide, with this ſudden exclamation, [O Hercules, What is this?] the "impreſſion of three lions heads was found upon the "left ſide of the child as ſoon as he was born. How "Portugal was ſo called, after Gathelus; the Scots "after Scota; and that the Scotobrigantes were the "race of Molin in Spain, is clearly ſet down in the "ample Hiſtory of the Houſe."——Of Pamproſodos, previous to Molin, we are told that he married Termuth, who was that daughter of Pharaoh Amenophis, which found Moſes amongſt the bulruſhes, and brought him up as if he had been her own child.—— Concerning Propetes, who is placed fourth in ſucceſſion from Molin, it is ſaid, that he married Hypermneſtra, the choiceſt of Danaus's fifty daughters.—— A few generations after, we meet with Cainotomos, who took to wife Thymelica the daughter of Bacchus, in recompence of his having accompanied him in the conqueſt of the Indies. "Cainotomos, adds our "author, in his return from thence into Greece, paſſed through the territories of Iſrael, where being "acquainted with Deborah the Judge and Propheteſs, "he received from her a very rich jewel, which afterwards, by one of his ſucceſſors, was preſented "to Pentaſilea, that Queen of the Amazons that aſſiſted the Trojans againſt Agamemnon."——We muſt not omit Melleſſen, and his wife Nicolia. "This "Nicolia, ſays Sir Thomas, before ſhe married to "him, travelled from the remote Eaſtern countries, "to have experience of the Wiſdom of Solomon; "and by many is ſuppoſed to have been the Queen "of Sheba. Melleſſen, nevertheleſs, ſent ſome of "his children to Ireland and Britain, to be brought "up with the beſt of his own father and mother's "kindred."——One ſpecimen more ſhall be tranſcribed of Sir Thomas Urquhart's power of invention. In the Year of the World 3560, and before Chriſt 389, "NOMOSTOR married DIOSA. This Dioſa "was the daughter of Alcibiades, and Hipparete. "Nomoſtor, after the lamentable deceaſe of his father-in-law, whom his native country had ſo ungratefully uſed, took his farewell of Greece; and "after many dangerous voyages, both by ſea and "land, arrived at laſt at the harbour of Ochondar, "now called Cromarty, or Portus Salutis, firſt found "out

Such a man, therefore, can juſtly be entitled to no degree of credit, eſpecially when he has a purpoſe to ſerve, as was the caſe with Sir Thomas Urquhart. His deſign was to exalt his own family and his own nation at any rate. With reſpect to his own nation, there was no occaſion for having recourſe to fiction, in order to diſplay the luſtre of Scotland, in the eminent men whom it has produced in Arms and Literature. The Pencil of Truth alone would have been amply ſufficient for that purpoſe.

So far, therefore, as Sir Thomas Urquhart's authority is concerned, the wonderful exhibitions of Crichton at Paris, his triumph at Rome, his combat with the Gladiator, his writing an Italian Comedy, his ſuſtaining fifteen characters in the repreſentation of that Comedy, the extraordinary ſtory of the Amour which is deſcribed as the cauſe of his death, the nine months mourning for him at Mantua, and the Poems hung round his hearſe to the quantity of Homer's works, muſt be regarded as in the higheſt degree doubtful, or rather as abſolutely falſe. I cannot forbear mentioning two circumſtances, which ſhew how much Sir Thomas Urquhart was deſtitute of prudence, as well as of ſcrupuloſity in his violations of truth. He ſays that the Duke of Mantua was pleaſed to confer upon the young Lady that was Crichton's miſtreſs, and future wife, a penſion of five hundred ducats a year; and that the Prince alſo beſtowed as much upon her, during all the days of his life, "which was, adds Sir Thomas, but ſhort; for he did not long enjoy himſelf after the "croſs fate of ſo miſerable an accident (e)." Now it is well known that Vincenzo di Gonzaga ſucceeded his father in the Dukedom of Mantua, in 1587, and that he did not die till the year 1612; which was almoſt, if not entirely, thirty years after Crichton's deceaſe (f). The other inſtance of the imprudence of Sir Thomas Urquhart in the contrivance of his fictions, occurs at the concluſion of his narrative, where he aſſerts that the verity of the ſtory which he hath related concerning the incomparable Crichton, "may "be certified by two thouſand men yet living, who have known him." Two thouſand men yet living! that is, in 1652, ſixty-nine, or ſeventy years after Crichton's death, for ſuch was the time of Sir Thomas's publication (g). Our author would have been ſadly puzzled to collect together theſe two thouſand living witneſſes, who could certify the verity of his ſtory.

(e) Urquhart, ubi ſupra. p. 95, 96.

(f) Tractatus de Territoriis, &c. Principum, Rerum Publicarum, et eorum qui hodie in Italia Rerum Potiuntur, p. 224.

(g) Urquhart, ubi ſupra.

With regard, however, to the account which is given of the prodigious exertions of Crichton, both corporal and mental, at Paris, Mackenzie imagines that he has found a full confirmation of them in a paſſage produced by him from the Diſquiſitiones of Stephen Paſquier, and which he conſiders as the teſtimony of an eye-witneſs. The paſſage is inſerted in note [C]. But the whole of what has been built upon it, by Mackenzie, and ſucceeding Biographers, is founded on a miſtake. In the quotation from the Diſquiſitiones, the name of Crichton is not mentioned, and the author doth not appear to have been perſonally preſent at the exhibitions of the extraordinary youth there deſcribed. The expreſſions which are ſuppoſed to carry that meaning may well be referred not to the writer himſelf, but to his countrymen the French, before whom the young man is ſaid to have diſplayed his ſurprizing talents. But the diſcuſſion of this point is totally needleſs, becauſe the paſſage in queſtion is not an original Authority. The book entitled, Stephani Paſchieri Diſquiſitiones, is only an Abridgment, in Latin, of Paſquier's "Des Recherches de la "France." Now in this laſt work there is, indeed, an account of a wonderful youth, ſuch as is related in Mackenzie's quotation, and from which that paſſage was formed. But this wonderful Youth, whoever he might be, was not the Admirable Crichton; for Paſquier, who does not tell his name, expreſsly ſays, that he appeared in the year 1445 (h) [L]. The evidence, therefore, produced by Mackenzie falls entirely to the ground.

(h) Recherches de la France, liv. 6. chapitre xxxix. p. 579.

Indeed,

(m) Collier's Hiſtorical Dictionary, vol. i. New Univerſal Biographical Dictionary, vol. vii. p. 399.

"out by his predeceſſors Alypos and Beltiſtos, ag-
"named Chonchar, inhabited by many of his kind-
"red at the time of his landing there; and there-
"after, all the days of his life, honoured with his
"preſence, as Prince of the race (15)."

(15) True Pedigree, p. 2, 3, 4, 5, 6. 9, 10, 11, 12. 14. 10.

Theſe fictions ſpeak for themſelves. It muſt, however, be acknowledged, that though Sir Thomas Urquhart had no regard to truth, he exerciſed an uncommon degree of ingenuity, as well as labour, in framing his pedigree (*).

(*) It is from a copy of Sir Thomas's Tracts obligingly lent me by Sir John Hawkins, that I have been enabled to make theſe extracts and remarks.

[L] Says that he appeared in the year 1445.] This matter has lately been ſet in a clear light, by a learned and judicious writer, in the Edinburgh Magazine, for May, 1787, whoſe letter we ſhall tranſcribe.

"SIR,

"WE are informed by Sir John Hawkins, that Dr. Johnſon dictated, from memory, that account of the perſon vulgarly named the Admirable Crichton, which is to be found in one of the papers of the Adventurer.

"That account is plainly an abridgement of the Life of Crichton, by Dr. George M'Kenzie (16).

(16) Scots Writers, vol. iii. p. 196—207.

"Dr. M'Kenzie ſuppoſes that Paſquier, the French Lawyer and Antiquary, was an eye-witneſs of the feats performed, in arts as well as in arms, by Crichton.

"This is one of the groſſeſt errors in Biography which has occurred to me in the courſe of my reading; and it is an error which, I perceive, is gaining ground daily, and bids fair, in a ſhort time, to be received as an indiſputable truth.

"The error ſeems to have ariſen from the following circumſtance: Dr. M'Kenzie had never read the original work of Paſquier, entitled, Recherches de la France; what he quotes concerning the wonderful young man, is taken from a Latin abridgement of that work; he refers to Steph. Paſch. Diſquiſ. lib. v. cap. 23. and he gives his quotation in Latin; indeed it does not appear that Dr. M'Kenzie had ever heard of the original work.

"Now Paſquier, inſtead of ſaying that he was an eye-witneſs of the wonders exhibited by Crichton, ſays, in the moſt unequivocal terms, that what he relates was taken "from a manuſcript which was oc-
"caſionally uſed by him," (d'un livre ecrit à la main dont je m'aide ſelon les occurrences.) And he adds, "I will repreſent the ſtory in its own ſimple garb,

Indeed, if the ſtory of Crichton's exploits at Paris had been true, no man was more likely to be acquainted with them than Stephen Paſquier, who lived at the time, and who would be fond enough of recording tranſactions ſo extraordinary. It may farther be obſerved, that Thuanus, who was likewiſe a contemporary, and who, in his own life, is very particular in what relates to learned men, makes no mention of Crichton. The only authority for his having ever reſided in France at all (Sir Thomas Urquhart excepted) is that of Dr. John Johnſton, who ſays, "Gallia Pectus excolit." But this amounts to no proof of the truth of the tranſactions related by Urquhart. The whole which can be deduced from it is, that Crichton, in the courſe of his travels, might make ſome ſtay in France, for the purpoſe of improvement. Even this, however, doth not agree with the narration of Imperialis, who informs us, that when troubles aroſe in Scotland on account of Religion, and Queen Mary fell into ſo many calamities, Crichton was ſent by his father directly from that country to Venice, as a place of ſecurity (i).

(i) Muſeum Hiſtoricum, ubi ſupra.

It is acknowledged by Sir John Hawkins, that Sir Thomas Urquhart has produced no authorities in ſupport of his ſurprizing narrations. But this defect Sir John thinks is ſupplied in the Life of Crichton which is given in Mr. Pennant's Tour (k). I am under the neceſſity of ſaying, that this is by no means the caſe. The article in Pennant, was not drawn up by that ingenious and learned Gentleman, but is the tranſcript of a pamphlet that was printed ſome years ago at Aberdeen; and which pamphlet is nothing more than a re-publication, with a few verbal alterations, of the Life of Crichton written by Mackenzie. It doth not, therefore, furniſh a ſingle additional teſtimony in confirmation of Sir Thomas Urquhart's ſtories, excepting in the miſtaken inſtance from Paſquier. In other reſpects, it only borrows facts from Sir Thomas Urquhart, without eſtabliſhing them upon freſh proofs. It is obſervable, that the earlier Biographers of Crichton had no knowledge of moſt of the tranſactions enlarged upon by this extravagant writer; for, if they had known them, they would have been eagerly diſpoſed to relate them, and to do it with every circumſtance of exaggeration. How much this was the character of Thomas Dempſter, with regard to his own countrymen, is ſufficiently underſtood, and hath frequently been remarked; and yet his account of Crichton is uncommonly modeſt, compared with thoſe of ſucceeding Authors. The extravagance of Imperialis in reſpect to Crichton has already appeared. There ſeems, indeed, to have been an univerſal tendency in the writers of this young Scotſman's life to produce wonder and aſtoniſhment. Mackenzie remarks, that Imperialis could not but know the truth of all, or at leaſt of moſt of the things he has related concerning Crichton, ſince he lived upon the places in which they were tranſacted, and had them from an eye and ear witneſs, even his own father (l). It is, however, to be remembered, that Imperialis's Muſeum Hiſtoricum was not publiſhed till 1640, nearly ſixty years after the events recorded by him happened; to which may be added, that the information he derived from his father was probably very imperfect. Imperialis the elder was not born till 1568, and conſequently was only thirteen years old when Crichton diſplayed his talents at Padua (m). What real dependence, therefore, could there be on the accuracy of the account given by a youth of that age? He could only relate, and perhaps from inadequate intelligence, the things which were talked of when he was a boy. Beſides, his authority is appealed to for no more than a ſingle fact, and that a doubtful one, ſince it does not accord with Manutius's Narrative: and who ever heard of the famous Philoſopher Arcangelus Mercenarius?

(k) Life of Dr. Johnſon, p. 308.

(l) Mackenzie, ubi ſupra, p. 203.

(m) Collier's Hiſtorical Dictionary, vol. i. New Univerſal Biographical Dictionary, vol. vii. p. 399.

The truth of the matter is, that, ſome ſlight circumſtances excepted, neither Dempſter [M] nor Imperialis have produced any evidences of Crichton's extraordinary abilities

" without any artificial colouring, ſo that my readers " may be the more inclined to give credit to it," (vous repreſentant cette Hiſtoire en ſa ſimplicite ſans y apporter aucun fard pour ce que vous y adjouſterez plus de foy.) He then tranſcribes the narrative from the MS. which places the appearance of this phenomenon in the year one thouſand four hundred and forty-five, a full century before the birth of our Crichton. See Recherches de la France, lib. vi. c. 38, 39.

" Dr. M'Kenzie, although he had not read the original of Paſquier, appears to have read an author who quotes the ſame ſtory: " The learned M. du Launoy, " ſays he, in his Hiſtory of the College of Navarre, " finding the hiſtory of this diſpute recorded in a " MS. Hiſtory of the College of Navarre, and the " like account of a Spaniard in Trithemius, con- " founds the two together, and robs our author of the " glory of this action, and places it in the year 1445; " whereas it ſhould be in the year 1571." This charge of robbery is ſingular enough!

" Let me only add, that Paſquier tranſcribes ſome verſes written by George Chaſtelain, a French Poet, in the reign of Charles VII. King of France, which allude to the ſame ſtory; and that Paſquier himſelf was born at Paris in 1528, paſſed his life in that city, and was an eminent Lawyer and Pleader in 1571; ſo that it is impoſſible the feats of Crichton, had they been really performed at Paris, could have been unknown to him, and moſt improbable that, knowing them, he would have omitted to mention them; for, in the ſame, lib. vi. c. 39. he is at pains to produce examples of great proficiency, diſplayed by men in a much humbler rank of life than that of philoſophers and public diſputants.

" I am, &c."

[M] Some ſlight circumſtances excepted, neither Dempſter.] It is related by Dempſter, that Crichton was for ſome time at Genoa, and that he was offered a conſiderable ſalary, if he would remain in that city.

I ſhall take this opportunity of remarking, that there is no mention of an Italian Comedy in Dempſter's Catalogue of Crichton's works. That article, therefore, was added to the Catalogue by Mackenzie, on the ſole authority of Sir Thomas Urquhart.

abilities beſides thoſe which are recorded by the younger Aldus Manutius. He, therefore, is to be regarded as the only living authority upon the ſubject. Manutius was contemporary with Crichton; he was cloſely connected with him in friendſhip; and he relates ſeveral things on his own perſonal knowledge. He is a poſitive and undoubted witneſs with reſpect to our young Scotſman's intellectual and literary exertions at Venice and at Padua; and from him it is that our account of them is given above. Nevertheleſs, even Aldus Manutius is to be read with ſome degree of caution. Dedications are apt to aſſume the ſtile of exaggeration, and this is the caſe with Manutius's Dedication of the Paradoxa Ciceronis to Crichton. In addition to the general language of ſuch addreſſes, he might be carried too far by his affection for his friend, which appears to have been very great: nor was the younger Aldus eminent for ſteadineſs and conſiſtency of character. It is even ſaid that, by his imprudencies, he fell into contempt and miſery (n). But independently of any conſiderations of this kind, it may be obſerved, that Manutius's narrative, previouſly to Crichton's arrival at Venice, could not be derived from perſonal knowledge. For that part of it (which is ſufficiently erroneous) he was probably endebted to Crichton himſelf. Neither does he appear to have been an eye-witneſs of the whole of the diſputations which were held at Padua; for ſpeaking of his young friend's paiſe of ignorance, he relates that thoſe who were preſent told him afterwards how much they were ſtruck with that Oration. However, at the other Diſputation, which laſted three days, Manutius ſeems certainly to have attended; for he concludes his accounts of it with ſaying, that he was not only the adviſer but the ſpectator of Crichton's wonderful conteſts. It is evident, however, from the Dedication, that his extraordinary abilities were not univerſally acknowledged and admired. Some there were who detracted from them, and were diſpleaſed with Manutius for ſo warmly ſupporting his reputation. As this Dedication is not eaſy to be met with, and is in fact the chief foundation upon which all the Biographies of Crichton have been built, it ſhall be inſerted below [N].

(n) New Biographical Dictionary, vol. ix. p. 53, 54.

As

[N]. It ſhall be inſerted below.]

Nobiliſſimo juveni JACOBO CRITONIO Scoto.

CUM nihil in te ſit ſummiſſum, et populare, (mi Jacobe Critoni) quin omnia tam ampla, excelſa, atque admiranda, ut elapſi temporis viris illuſtribus, ac ſapientiſſimis gloriam, futuris vero etiam ſpem tua amplitudo auferat, noſtro autem ſæculo ſingulare afferat ornamentum: cumq. non minus opiniones tibi, quam vita ſint admirabiles: ſententias illas, quæ Paradoxa vocantur, quæ non ſane probantur in vulgus philoſophorum, in Stoicorum ſcholis natas, nudas admodum, et ſqualidas, nunc vero M. Tullii Ciceronis eloquentia exornatas, et auctoritate, meis Commentariis illuſtratas nomini tuo dicare volui: cui iſta maxime conveniunt. non tantum, ut amoris erga te mei indicium præbeam, qui niſi jam antea tibi extantis conſtitit argumentis, nunquam ex ullo patebit officio, quam ut animi grati pro Carminibus, quæ in tuo ad urbem Venetam appulſu mihi dediſti. Nunc vero etiam lætor, toti Italiæ, et orbi fortaſſe univerſo perſpectum eſſe judicium de te meum, et ea, quæ, cum huc veniſſes, ſcriptis commendavi. quæ tibi ipſi, ac nonnullis acerrimis cenſoribus, aſpera atque injucunda videbantur. Nam, licet tuum amorem malui oſtendere, quam prudentiam, nunc ambo cum amicis tuis, tum inimicis, ſi qui amplius tam feri, atque inhumani reperiuntur, manifeſta ſunt, poſtquam tua virtus tam clarum ſui ſplendorem diffudit. Ego enim junctam invidiæ, ac multorum inimicitiis eximiam quandam, atque immortalem gloriam ſum conſecutus. Nam, quid illuſtrius, quid honeſtius, quid vero etiam glorioſius ad nomen meum accedere potuit, quam ut a me prolata παραδοξότατα primum, tum εγκωμιαστικὰ viderentur, nunc vero ἱστορικώτατα ab omnibus habeantur. Cum multi homines ſui judicii lævitatem, infirmitatemque, cum eſſent ſtultitia obcæcati, mei vero conſtantiam, veritatemque perſpiciant. Poteram enim ()(ἰσπεῖλαι νου μοι μῦσαι) Illuſtriſſ. Critonium, et ſereniſſimam Stuardam, quibus oriundus es, familias extollere. Sed, quid Reges tui majores (licet ea laus Scotorum Regibus merito tribui poſſit, quod inter omnes Europæ Reges vetuſtiſſimi Chriſtiani ſint) quos nunquam Romani imperio ſuo ſubegere; cum Cæſar, propter tumultus excitatos, et res Gallia fluctuantes, exercitum a regni expugnatione revocaret: quid, inquam, iſti, tuis virtutibus, animiquæ dotibus amplius ſolidæ laudis afferunt? Quid Critonii, qui cum Scotorum militiæ Imperatores ſummi plerumque eſſent, Anglos e Galliæ regno, et Scotiæ finibus toties, ac tanta virtute ejecerunt? Quid Robertus Critonius, pater tuus, Fifenſis in Scotia, et Stormondienſis, Elioki, et Clunæi, tot oppidorum, tot præſidiorum dominus, qui longo tempore inter omnes Regni proceres ærumnoſiſſimæ ſimul, et beatiſſimæ Reginæ, quæ apud Anglos (pro dolor) jam captiva eſt, et Chriſtianæ religionis acerrimus exſtitit propugnator, præſertim qui copias ad proelium, quod Langſydium vocant, duxiſſet; quid ille tibi ſplendoris veri affert? Non tantum illi fortaſſe debes, quod te genuerit, quod maximos hujus tempeſtatis viros, Buchananum, Heppurnium, Robertonium, et Rhetorfortem præceptores tibi dederit, quod tam amplas pecunias fortunaſque in te erudiendo inſumpſerit, et omnes vires animi, atque ingenii in educando profuderit, quantum quod ob inteſtinas ſeditiones, et proelia domeſtica, contra te ſuſcitata, quæ cum patre geſſiſti, Regno diſcedere, et Regem relinquere, coegit. Sed laudem, quæ a majoribus ad nos derivatur, ne laudem quidem eſſe, ſapientiſſimus ille vir Ulixes exiſtimavit. Neque te vero multum commendo, quod ſpecie, et corporis viribus polleas. Fateor tamen aliquid eſſe in his, quod non tam a fortuna, quantum ab animo pendet, immortalitatis memoria proſequendum. Quod ſcilicet Regno, patria, domoque ob Catholicæ fidei ardorem tam longe abes, nec ullum ex his aerumnis dolorem, ſed incredibilem animo ſentias voluptatem: neque Regis in conſobrinum tuum Jacobum Stuardum clementia, cui cum Moraviæ principatu ſuam conſobrinam uxorem dedit: neque communis cum Rege educatio permovent, immo ne movent quidem. Putas enim, majores quaſdam opes, et firmiora, quam quæ amiſiſti, præſidia eſſe quærenda. In corporis vero bonis id habes, quod effigies oris, atque ſermonis animi nobiliſſimi filia ſit. Sed belli ſtudia in ipſis ephebis inire, eadem animo, atque amore proſequi, et cum literis, et Philoſophia, tanquam alter Brutus, conjungere, nemini unquam ab initio humani generis obtigit. Magna ſunt iſta profecto, et inaudita: mediocria tamen, ſi cetera ſpectemus. Quod ſcilicet decem linguarum, multorum idiomatum, omnium diſciplinarum cognitionem ante vigeſimum primum ætatis annum ſis adeptus. et digladiandi, ſaltandi, omnium gymnaſticarum exercitationum, et equitandi ſtudia tanta cum alacritate ingenii. animique humanitate, manſuetudine, et facilitate conjunxeris, ut nihil te admirabilius, nihil etiam amabilius reperiri poſſit. Sed non innumerabiles vitæ tuæ tranſactæ laudes; non mirificam illam coram Sereniſſimo Principe, ac Illuſtriſſimis () Sic. Orig.

(*) Sic in orig.

Venetæ

As to the real cauſe and manner of our young Scotſman's death, both of them ſtill remain in ſome degree of obſcurity. That he was killed in a renconter at the Carnival at Mantua, is teſtified by too many authors to be reaſonably doubted. But whether there was that particular malignity on the part of Vincenzo di Gonzaga, which is commonly aſcribed to him, may be conſidered as uncertain.

One important method yet remains, by which we may be enabled to form a judgment of Crichton's genius, and that is, from a peruſal of the four Poems of his which are ſtill preſerved. It is, however, to be feared, that theſe will not exhibit him in a very high point of view. Some Fancy, perhaps, may be thought to be diſplayed in the longeſt of his Poems, which was written on occaſion of his approach to the city of Venice. He there repreſents a Naiad as riſing up before him, and, by the order of the Muſes and of Minerva, directing him how to proceed. But this is a ſentiment which ſo eaſily preſents itſelf to a claſſical Reader, that it can ſcarcely be conſidered as deſerving the name of a Poetical Invention. The three other Poems of Crichton have ſtill leſs to recommend them. Indeed, his Verſes will not ſtand the teſt of a rigid examination even with regard to quantity. That our readers may be able to judge for themſelves upon the ſubject, the four Poems ſhall be given in a note [P]; and this will probably be the more acceptable, not

Venetæ Reip. proceribus actionem; non ſubtiliſſimas tuas de Theologia, Philoſophia, et rebus Mathematicis diſputationes in pleriſque maximorum hominum conſeſſibus recenſebo; non tantorum hominum ad te videndum concurſum, ut olim Platoni a Sicilia revertenti, relicto Olympico ſpectaculo, tota Athenienſium celebritas occurriſſe fertur; cum te omnes rubeæ Roſæ, quod tibi natura circa dextrum lumen impreſſit, tanquam unicam, et raram in terris avem homines cognoſcerent. Quæ enim gentes tam feræ ſunt, quæ, te cum adſpexerint, non maximum cepiſſe fructum putent? Sed, his prætermiſſis, nunc propria narrabo: quæ ſcilicet in Patavina Academia feciſti, tum quæ in hac urbe, totius orbis nobiliſſima, cujus amplitudinem, et auguſtiſſimam majeſtatem inter omnes alias civitates te accipere, fovere, atque amplecti decuit; te vero etiam humani generis miraculum, admirandam urbem incolere, amare, et omnibus aliis anteponere. Nam, poſtquam adverſa valetudine jam quatuor menſes laboraſſes, priuſquam in integrum priſcæ ſanitatis ſtatum redires, amicorum conſilio ad Patavinam Academiam, tanquam ad Sapientiæ officinam, profectus es, ubi Idibus Martii in diem ſequentem, ſuſcepto conſilio omnes omnium diſciplinarum profeſſores in ædibus Clariſſimi viri Jacobi Aloiſii Cornelii, ejus auctoritate, et precibus, ut convocarentur, petiiſti. Cum autem maximus doctiſſimorum hominum coetus, et omnes ex inſperato pœne ſtudioſi, et nobiles Gymnaſii juvenes una conveniſſent, ſtatim in primi ingreſſus veſtibulo elegantiſſimo carmine Patavinas laudes, (nam ea tibi propoſita erat ad dicendum materia) ex tempore decantaſti: deinde cum celeberimis illis doctoribus multa ex variis diſciplinis tam acute exagitaſti, tam docte pertractaſti, erroreſque Ariſtotelis, ac interpretum tam ſolide refutaſti, tanta denique cum maxime viris modeſtia egiſti, ut omnes in virtutis admirationem et morum ſuavitatis amorem ſimul allexeris. Neque id ſilentio prætereundum eſt, quod ex tempore etiam, poſt ſex horarum de re literaria colloquia, et diſputationes, cum oblata tibi eſſet ignorationem laudandi occaſio, tam ornate de ea re dixiſti, ut illi ipſi, qui intererant, potius ſomnia fovere, quam rem veram, et præſentem videre ſe putaſſe mihi poſtea affirmarint. Alium poſtea diem indixiſti in ædibus Illuſtriſſimi Patavini Epiſcopi, non ut altius ingenii tui ſpecimen præberes, quod profecto fruſtra feciſſes, ſed ut eorum, qui primis diſputationibus non interfuerant, obnixit (*) precibus ſatisfaceres. Variæ res huic propoſito obſtaculo fuere. Ad ſecundum certamen ventum non eſt. Sed plerique cum primis Europæ viris ſermones habiti ſunt. Nonnunquam hominum exſpectationes, licet propter facta tam illuſtria de te maximas, plrunque etiam et te ipſum ſupe[illegible]us es. Ex quibus actis cum illico ſurrexiſſet [illegible]ma, obtrectatores aliqui, quibus ex aliorum be[illegible]s et rebus ſecundis invidentia eſſe ſolet, homuli, [illegible]o quid dicam, tuæ virtuti aliquid derogare fruſtra tentaverunt. Oſtendentes in obſcuro odio apertas inimicitias, et, in quo nihil nocere poterant, ſummam voluntatem nocendi. Tum tu, ut iſtas obtrectationes malevolentiſſimas puſillorum malevolorumque proſterneres, atque obtereres, duo hæc Theoremata in hac urbe edidiſti: [theſe Theorems are given in note [F].] et per triduum indefeſſus ſuſtinuiſti; et, quamdiu tua auctoritas tibi defendenda fuit, ſic acriter et vehementer præliatus es, ut clamor concurſuſque inſolitus ad ſtudia tua lenienda tanta cum laude fieret, ut nihil unquam magnificentius ab hominibus auditum ſit. Tu vero me non ſolum auctorem conſiliorum, ſed ſpectatorem pugnarum mirificarum habuiſti. Nunc, quoniam laudis ſemper avidiſſimus fui, et præter ceteros φιλοχρίλόνιος ab omnibus habeor, multorumque odia, pro tua cauſa ſuſcepi, cura obſecro, et effice, ut facis, ut, quia veram virtutem cognovi, ab omnibus amer, amari, et laudari poſſim, et ut major in ea mihi indies ſpes reſideat. Mea igitur in Ciceronis Paradoxa lucubrationes, hoc ipſo quia in Paradoxa ſunt, ſub tuo nomine prodire volui, quod veteribus gratiam, novis favorem conciliare ſolet. Tu autem has noſtras vigilias, et Stoicorum opiniones ſimul (quoad veritas patitur) tuebere. Id enim tibi admodum erit facile. Jam enim pæne omnes homines aut gratiam, aut eloquentiam, aut tantarum rerum, ne dicam omnium, ſcientiam ſuſpiciunt. Vive noſtri memor et vale.

(*) Sic in orig.

Venetiis. XIV. Kal. Jun. CC. D. XXCI. [1581.]

[P] The four Poems ſhall be given in a note.]

JACOBUS CRITTONIUS.

IN SUUM AD URBEM VENETAM APPULSUM.

DUM procul à patria, Hadriaci prope littora Ponti—
Conſedi, mediis celſam miratus in undis
Stare urbem, ſævi obtingunt cui jura tridentis,
Et pelagi imperium conſtans, æternaque ſceptra:
Sæpè meos animo caſus meditabar iniquos,
Sæpè humectabam guttis ſtillantibus ora:
Cum mihi ſeſe offert diva veneranda figura
Naias, Eridani quondam propè cognita ripas,
Naias, una quidem doctis gratiſſima Muſis.
Principio rebar ſimulacrum, aut vana videre
Somnia (nulla fides oculis) cum protinus illa
His me ultro aggreditur dictis: Non te tua fallunt
Lumina; nec noſtri vana eſt, quam cernis, imago.
Nam mandata fero Muſarum, et juſſa faceſſo
Palladis armiſonæ, quibus una eſt cura ſalutis
Certa tuæ: nec te per tanta pericula vectum
Urbem in præclaram tumido ſub pectore curas
Fas premere eſt: meliora jubent ſperare, monentque.
Non hæc iſta tibi tantum infortunia nota
Contingunt: nec cede malis, neu te ſine vinci.
Cernis enim, ut late terras Saturnus in omnes
Acer agit peſtem, quæ fibris cæca ſub ipſis
Conditur, atque alias magno jam turbine clades:
Haud ſecus, ac Phæbi juratos Aulide Graios:
Quando Agamemnonio tetigit pro crimine dextra.
Hic natos vitæ exſortes, aſt ille parentem
Grandævum deflet, vel matris triſte feretrum,
Proque viro conjux, aut vir pro conjuge luget.
Aſt alios volucris fortunæ incommoda tangunt.
Reges, indomitas gentes, populoſque rebelles,
Aut urbes domini terrarum, atque oppida cernunt not only as they conſtitute the whole remains of Crichton's productions, but as copies of them, and eſpecially of the two latter Odes, are extremely difficult to be obtained.

What, then, is the opinion, which, on the whole, we are to form of the Admirable Crichton? It is evident that he was a youth of ſuch lively parts as excited great preſent admiration,

Erepta, hic auri fulvum ſibi pondus ademptum,
Morborumque cohors alios immiſſa fatigat.
Namque in hyperboreis tabes quæ cœperat oris,
Materiem inveniens primùm, dehinc viribus ille
Senſim fota ſuis, Europam irrepſit in omnem.
Non ſecus ac lentus flatu ſuccenditur ignis,
Paullatimque alimenta trahit, mox flamma per auras
Illa crepat, ſeſeque involvit lumine fulvo
Fumida, Vulcanum latè per inania jactans.
Primum exorta quidem flavos infauſta Britannos,
Germanos tum cæruleos, Galloſque feroces,
Hinc etiam atra lues calidos infecit Iberos.
Fertilis Italiæ dehinc altas fuſa per urbes
Invaluit. Senſere omnes (miſerabile dictu)
Aut pauci evaſere mali exitiale venenum.
Torquet adhuc primo pueros in limine vitæ,
Invalidoſque ſenes extremo in limite vitæ,
Et juvenes rapido firmiſſima pectora bello
Disjicit: infractæ languent at prœlia vires.
Una etiam matres petit, intonſaſque puellas,
Parcere nec formæ, nec parcere ſueta juventæ.
Nec non armenta in campis errantia cernas,
Quæ vix ægra caput feſſa cervice retentant,
Horribileſque feras, picturataſque volucres
Languere, ut laſſo demiſſa papavera collo.
Nam circumfuſus cunctis animantibus æther
Concepit nocuos gremio denſoſque vapores.
Utque aliquas leges, æternaque fœdera rebus
Impoſuit natura parens, ſine nomine multa
Sic in principiis latitant diſcrimina rerum, et Mille movent. Nam ni Veneris placidiſſimus ignis
Sedaret varios infauſti luminis ignes,
Diſcuteretque potens radiis contraria Phœbus,
Mille malis rueret ſævis obnoxius orbis.
Namque intemperiem oſtendit modò marcidus aër,
Sæpèque mutatus, præſens occaſio morbi eſt.
O genus humanum, quantas te audacia fecit
Japeti proles; ſpecies perferre malorum,
Cum nova ſupplicia, et pœnas immiſit acerbas
Jupiter omnipotens, ſubductum infenſus ob ignem
Curribus ætheriis, perfectaque corpora limo?
Quiſque Deos, et fata vocat crudelia: culpæ
Nemo ſuæ juſtum capit imo in corde dolorem.
At placanda foret Divûm inclementia ture,
Et precibus, ſic mortales, ſic vivere dignum eſt.
Dixerat, et preſſis tacuit formoſa labellis.
Tum me luminibus tacitis intenta pererrat,
Ut reſponſa petens. Trepidanti ego pectore tandem
Verba coacta dedi: Fateor me, candida Nais,
Promeritum quæcunque fero: nec turpis egeſtas;
Infandumve ſcelus ſervi mea pectora vexat.
At me quis miſerum magna cognoſcit in urbe,
Aut quis at æquoreas flentem ſolatur arenas?
Cumque ſinum irroro lacrymis, verba irrita ventis
Trado, nec quiſquam eſt gemitus qui ſentiat imos.
Colludunt vitreo auricomæ ſub gurgite Nymphæ,
Aſſiduoque novos Glaucus meditatur amores,
Alma latet Doris, latet et Panopeia virgo,
Quas Siren blando mulcet ſub gurgite cantu.
Nec me Carpathiis vates in fluctibus audit
Cærulus, et variis aſſuetus ludere formis,
Ac ſeſe in rerum miracula vertere cuncta.
Sed nec equos bipedes tangunt tam parva furentes,
Quæ ficcis occulis turpes in gurgite Phocas
Depaſci humanos pavitantes dentibus artus,
Cernunt Scylla vorax, aut navifragum Scylacæum,
Cum rapiunt fractas ſinuoſa ſub æquora puppes,
Numina nil noſtros miſerantur torva labores.
Ergo preces ſcopulis, monſtriſque natantibus ultro
Fundimus. Heu nimium ſurdent immania ſaxa.
At vos aſſuetæ noſtras audire quærelas,
O Nymphæ, ad ſacros latices quæ dulcia rura
Incolitis, gelidumque nemus, placidoſque receſſus,
Cur me numinibus disjungunt æquora veſtris?
Cur non virgineas patiuntur cernere Muſas?

Pœnarum exhauſtum ſatis eſt, heu parcite fata,
Tuque graves, ô Diva, meos miſerere labores.
Illa autem roſeo rurſus ſic ore locuta eſt:
Ipſa tibi expediam caſus, ſi ſcire cupido eſt,
Auxiliumque feram certum modo rebus egenis.
Num te divini, diviſque parentibus orti,
Aldi fama latet, totum diffuſa per orbem?
Hunc Aſiæ gentes norunt, et Cantaber atrox,
Decolor atque Indus, vel qui colit incola terras
Extremas penitus, ſive auro inſignis Orion,
Sive Hyades pluviæ, ſeu ſeptem adverſa Trioni
Sidera clara caput ſemper ſublime coronant.
Huic (pharetra tantum inſignis) crinitus Apollo
Se Tritoniaca confeſſus arundine victum,
Atque lyra cedit: nec ſe negat eſſe ſecundum,
Formoſæ natus Maiæ: neque docta Minerva
Dedignata parem eſt: tantum nitet aurea virtus.
Hunc pete, namque regens filo veſtigia cæca
Diriget ille tuos optato in tramite greſſus.
Inde via pandet, ſequere hunc quæcunque jubentem:
Sic te Diva monet ſævum quæ Gorgona geſtat.
Quæ plerumque tuis præſens erit optima votis,
Namque hic contemptis tandem dominatur Athenis.
Nec te tam longè disjungunt æquora Muſis,
Imo hæc indigenæ veniunt at litora Muſæ,
Necnon et Drymo, Lygeaque, Cymodoceque,
Nymphaque Junonis pulcherrima Deiopeja,
Quæque illas ſuperant, atque Oceanitdes ambas,
Hæc eadem Hadriacæ fulgent ad litora Nymphæ,
Doctæ Palladias Veneri conjungere curas.
Ipſa etiam, ſpretis Cnidoque, Paphoque, Cytheraque,
Aurea collucens Venetas Venus incolit arces.
Præterea ſummo coram te Principe ducet,
Quem tibi Diva dedit comitem, ſacrumque Senatum
Adſpicies, divoſque omnes longo ordine Patres.
Non ita Tantalides, Regum cingente corona
Argolica, ſolio enituit ſublimis ab alto,
Atque orbis dominos inter, patreſque Latinos,
Auguſtus Cæſar, qualem fulgere videbis
Grandævum, atque annis, et majeſtate verendum,
Eximios inter proceres, gentemque togatam,
Patrem Urbis Venetæ: divumque ut Jupiter ipſe
Conſilio, in magno tectum omnipatentis Olympi
Concutit, ac terras humiles, Erebumque ſonantem
Apparens cœlo ac terris, Ereboque tremendus:
Dique etiam fulgent reliqui ſplendore perenni:
Sic patri ætherio modo Principis æmula virtus
Semideumque, deis prædatur ſidera et altum
Religione polum, hinc terras ditione, opibuſque
Et bello quatit, ac ſævum pietate Acheronta.

Donec nocturnis Dictynna invecta quadrigis
Cum Phœbo alterno luſtrabit lumine terras,
Pulchraque per tacitum labentur ſidera mundum,
Stabunt res Venetæ, et præclaræ gloria gentis
Æternum poſitis tutiſſima fundamentis.

Dixerat, et levibus vix æquora tingere plantis
Viſa petit binis proprius de cornibus unum,
Quo pater Eridanus violentibus influit undis
In mare purpureum, et vitreo caput abdidit amne.

* * * * * * *

Ad Aldum Manutium.

Intermissa diu Chelys:
Nec Lydiis cecini carmina tibiis,
Nec molles cytharæ modos,
Carmen perpetuo flebile perſonans.
Sed nunc mente feror nova,
Per ſacrumque trahit Melpomene nemus.
Cinctum Pierius me rapit, et chorus
Phœbo, quâ tumidus ſequor,

Te

(r) Delitiæ Poetarum Scotorum, p. 268— From a copy of the Deliciæ, obligingly lent me by Mr. Pinkerton.

(s) F. Apollinis.

admiration, and high expectations with regard to his future attainments. He appears to have had a fine perſon, to have been adroit in his bodily exerciſes, to have poſſeſſed a peculiar facility in learning languages, to have enjoyed a remarkably quick and reten-

Te clarum recinens, Alde, in Apollinis
Arte, et conſpicuum, tuæ
Laudes lætitiam, dulceque gaudium,
Solamenque dabunt mihi,
Et mentem eripient, triſtibus è malis.
Syren carminibus truces
Ceu mulcet pelagi præcipitis minas
Cantu vel fide Leſbia,
Dum lenit virides Nereidum Choros,
Et Thetis cupidè ſonos
Dulces ſub vitreo gurgite concipit:
Sic laudes quoties tuas
Pulſis experior corde moleſtiis,
Non ſuſpiria ab intimo
Ducam corde, dolens, ut ſoleo nimis:
Sed Phœbus facilis, meæ
Erranti injiciens fræna licentiæ,
Permittet pede candido
Errare, et gelidos viſere liberum
Nympharum latices ſinet.
Tunc ipſe ex adytis ritè Heliconiis
Metrum grandius eloquar,
Candoremque canam ſemper amabilem (17).

(17) Deliciæ Poetarum Scotorum, p. 268—From a Ms. of the Deliciæ, obligingly lent me by Mr. Pinkerton.

Prefixed to the CATO MAJOR of CICERO in the Edition of ALDUS MANUCIUS, 1583.

JACOBI CRITONII, SCOTI,

AD CLARISSIMUM VIRUM, PATRITIUM VENETUM JOHANNEM DONATUM.

ODE.

DUM cupidus, tumiduſque Deo tua dicere facta,
Donate, quæro, maxime;
Mens deſideriis ardet; ſed lenta fatiſcit
Sub corde virtus anxio:
Non tenui tentanda videns freta turbida velo,
Tardoque Pontum remige,
Compreſſo fervore ſemel ſub pectore anhelo
Labore deſiſto gravi.
Sed nihil intonſus fruſtra mihi Cinthius unquam
Suaſit, vel alta numina.
Ergo Deum, et doctas ſæpe in mea vota camænas
Rurſus invoco furens.
Tum mente evehitur multa ſeu candidus aura
Olor levatus evolat,
Præpetibuſque petit volitans ſublimia pennis,
Magnumque inane dividit.
Victorem armatæ flammis ſi Muſa Chimeræ
Canora vatis extulit,
Sive trucidantes immania monſtra, vel ipſum
Vatum marinæ Tethyos,
Aut Anchiſiaden Priameiumque Hectora grande
Carmen poetarum beat,
Si vivunt Theronque Hieronque, atque Ithæus ille,
Ob vana Clari ludicra,
Quos nunquam obſcura ſub nube ſilentia condent
Oblivioſa Tartari,
Hoc opus o veſtrum, Muſæ eſt; mihi cingite frontem
Tempuſque lauro Apollinari (*).
Nec deerit divos inter regeſque, Deorum
Genus, Donato gloria.

(*) F. Apollinis.

Prefixed to the LÆLIUS of CICERO,

A. MANUCIUS in his Dedication LAURENTIO MASSÆ, REIP. VENETÆ SECRETARIO.

"Me ſtudiorum paritas, virtutis amor, communiſque
"animorum ardor, quo Critonium noſtrum, divinum
"plane juvenem, proſequimur, ſubigit, ut te æque
"ac ipſum amem, et, quæ ipſe de te cecinit, in pri-
"miſque ea, quæ hic ſubſcripſi, dulcis utriuſque
"veſtrum memoria ergo ſæpe, ac libenter uſur-
"pem.

"Vale, Venetius, Id. ib. Jun. CIↃ.IↃXXCI."

JACOBI CRITONI, SCOTI,

AD LAURENTIUM MASSAM.

ODE.

ERRANTEM ab oris me Caledoniis
Poſtquam triremis per Freta Nerei
Vexit, volentem, mox remotos
Conſpicere, et populos, et urbes,
Muſæ per undas præcipites piæ
Vagum ſecutæ, numine candido
Sævis obarmatum procellis
Incolumem ſine labe ſervant.
Nati labores ſeu (†) dea Cypria
Secuta, longas per pelagi vias
Hoſtile per ferrum, per ignes
Perque minas comes ibat omnes.
Si forte Gades impiger ultimos,
Syrteſve aut Indos viſere barbaros
Vellem, nec Indos, interve Syrtes
Deſtituent ope contumaces.
En obſtrepentis qui Oceani freta
Mutavi amicæ fluctibus Hadriæ,
Latinus hoſpes, jam relictis
Diis patriis gelidoque cælo
At non egenum cœtus Aonius
Abjecit, adſunt mi faciles deæ,
Præſtantque dulces una amicos
Quos eadem pia cura jungit.
Te, Maſſa, clari gloria ſanguinis,
Pars una ſummi et maxima conſili,
Ardenſque virtus te nitentem,
Te decorant et opes beatum.
Muſis amicus cum vigeas tamen,
Muſis amico Critonio fove;
O digne Divarum favore,
Quique Deum faveas amicis.

(†) Probably for ſic.

The following remarks on the two laſt Odes have been communicated to us by a learned friend.

There are few ſuch glaring errors in proſody as thoſe to be found in the two Odes of Crichton; a man who allowed himſelf ſuch licences might well engage to diſpute in verſe.

In the Ode to Maſſa Aut. is made ſhort; in the very next line there is a ſyllable too much at the word inter've; preſently after, we have two falſe quantities in one word, "Catus Aonius inſtead of Aonius."

"Sævis obarmatum periclis" means, in Latin, "armed with dangers."—in the laſt ſtanza but one te is repeated to fill up the verſe.—In the laſt ſtanza fove is placed by a Typographical error for fave; if not, it is falſe Latin: and, ſuppoſing fave to be the word, fave, favore, faveas, all in a breath, is very inelegant. Of the laſt line I can make nothing.—

In the Ode to Donatus, there is a line out of all ſhape.

"rurſus invoco furens."

And afterwards one more irregular, if poſſible,

"Tempuſque lauro Apollinari," poſſible Apollinis, ſo, a typographical error.

He alſo uſes

"Ithæus" for "Ithacus."

He ſays,

"Labore deſiſto gravi;"

in proſe there ſhould be "a labore." Quere, may a be omitted in verſe?

In this Ode the epithets are merely expletives, and are juſt ſuch as an idle boy would take from the Gradus ad Parnaſſum.

tive

tive memory, and to have excelled in a power of declamation, a fluency of ſpeech, and a readineſs of reply. His knowledge, likewiſe, was probably very uncommon for his years; and this, in conjunction with his other qualities, enabled him to ſhine in public diſputation. But whether his knowledge and learning were accurate or profound may juſtly be queſtioned; and it may equally be doubted whether he would have ariſen to any extraordinary degree of eminence in the literary world. It will always be reflected upon with regret, that his early and untimely death prevented this matter from being brought to the teſt of experiment.

It is natural, on the preſent occaſion, to recollect the caſe of John Picus of Mirandula. He is celebrated for having been ſuch a prodigy of parts and literature as ſcarcely ever exiſted; and yet his works are not underſtood by any means to correſpond with his once ſplendid reputation.

A circumſtance has been pointed out to us concerning Crichton, which muſt not be omitted. He was very much diſſatisfied (as appears from an incidental paſſage of Manutius) [Q], with Socrates's manner of diſputing againſt the Sophiſts. Manutius expreſſes great ſurprize at this ſentiment of his friend, but ſurely without reaſon; for Crichton was himſelf too like the ancient Sophiſts not to be fond of their character.

I am under no apprehenſion that any ſingle Gentleman of Scotland will be diſpleaſed with the preſent article. That country, as hath already been noticed, ſtands not in need of falſhood to ſupport its reputation. It produced many eminent ſcholars at the time in which Crichton lived; and hath continued to produce writers of the firſt Order. The names that adorn the preſent age it is needleſs to mention. Lord Buchan, in his Memoir, lays no ſtreſs upon any account of Crichton's literary exhibitions, excepting that which is given by Manutius; and even Manutius is blamed by his Lordſhip, for having had a great ſhare, by his own extravagance of language, in occaſioning the bombaſtic and intemperate praiſes which afterwards appeared of his young friend. It is to a reſpectable and learned Gentleman of North Britain, who doth not permit me the honour of mentioning his name, that I am indebted for ſeveral hints and communications, by which I have been greatly aſſiſted in my endeavours to furniſh a more complete and authentic Narrative of the Life of the Admirable Crichton than has hitherto been written by any of his Biographers.] K.

[Q] From an incidental paſſage of Manutius.] Sed quid eſt, per Deum, mi Jacobe Critoni, quod Socratis diſputandi Modum in Sophiſtas laceſſis, aut ſi non laceſſis, ſanè non ſatis approbare videris? Sanè me fateor non hoc abs te planè intellexiſſe (18).

(18) Comment. in Paradox. p. 234. Pointed out to me by a friend.

CRISPE (Sir NICHOLAS), an eminent and loyal citizen in the reigns of King Charles the Firſt and King Charles the Second, was the ſon of a very eminent merchant, and grandſon of an Alderman of London (a). He was born in the year 1598, and bred according to the cuſtom of thoſe times, in a thorough knowledge of buſineſs, though heir to a great eſtate (b). He made a conſiderable addition to this by marriage; and being a man of an enterprizing genius, ever active and ſollicitous about new inventions and diſcoveries, and, which very rarely happens, wonderfully induſtrious and diligent about things he had brought to bear, he was ſoon taken notice of at Court, was knighted, and became one of the Farmers of the King's Cuſtoms (c). When the trade to Guinea was under great difficulties and diſcouragements, he framed a project for retrieving it, which required a very large ſum of money to bring it about; but his reputation was ſo great, that many rich Merchants willingly engaged with him in the proſecution of the deſign (d): and to give a good example, as well as to ſhew that he meant to adhere to the work that he had once taken in hand, he cauſed the Caſtle of Cormantyn upon the Gold Coaſt, to be erected at his own expence (e). By this judicious precaution, and by his wiſe and wary management afterwards, himſelf and his aſſociates carried their trade to ſuch a height, as to divide amongſt them fifty thouſand pounds a year (f). When the times grew dark and cloudy, and the King's affairs were in ſuch diſtreſs he knew not how to turn himſelf for want of money, Sir Nicholas Criſpe, and his partners in the Farming of the Cuſtoms, upon very ſhort warning, and when their refuſing it would have been eſteemed a merit with the Parliament, raiſed him ſo large a ſum as one hundred thouſand pounds at once (g); and that with ſuch circumſtances of chearfulneſs as might be truly ſaid to double the value of this ſervice [A]. After the war broke out, and in the midſt of all the diſtractions with which

(a) Stow's Survey of London, publiſhed by Strype, vol. i. c. iii. p. 203.
(b) Characters of eminent Citizens of London, p. 97. Monumental inſcription in the Chapel at Hammerſmith.
(c) Lloyd's Loyal Sufferers, p. 627.
(d) Hiſtorical Account of the Engliſh Trade to Guinea, p. 31.
(e) See the monumental inſcription in Hammerſmith Chapel.
(f) Lloyd's Loyal Sufferer, p. 627. Hiſt. of the Engliſh Trade to Guinea, p. 103.
(g) Lloyd's Loyal Sufferers, p. 627.

[A] As might be truly ſaid to double the value of this ſervice.] It was but a ſhort time before the King was obliged to leave London, that he found himſelf under the neceſſity of applying to thoſe four eminent citizens, who were then farmers of the cuſtoms, for no leſs a ſum than one hundred thouſand pounds, and that to be advanced immediately (1). Theſe farmers of the cuſtoms, were Sir Nicholas Criſpe, Sir Abraham Dawes, Sir John Jacob, and Sir John Wolſtenholme. When the matter was propoſed to Sir Nicholas, he ſaid, 'it was a large ſum and ſhort warning, but that providence had made him able, and his duty made him willing to lay down his proportion, whenever his Majeſty called for it.' Sir Abraham Dawes had ſome relations, whoſe affections leaned the other way, and who beſides had great expectations from him: they magnified the ſum that was deſired, the uncertainty of its been repaid, and the danger that it would be taken ill by Parliament, who might inſiſt upon the like ſum. "Well, ſaid Sir Abraham, this then is the worſt

(1) Lloyd's Loyal Sufferers, p. 627.

which it was attended, he continued to carry on a trade to Holland, France, Spain, Italy, Norway, Moſcovy, and Turkey, which produced to the King nearly one hundred thouſand pounds a year, beſides keeping moſt of the Ports open and ſhips in them conſtantly ready for his ſervice. All the correſpondence and ſupplies of arms which were procured by the Queen in Holland, and by the King's agents in Denmark, were conſigned to his care, and by his prudence and vigilance ſafely landed in the North, and put into the hands of thoſe for whom they were intended (b). In the management of ſo many nice and difficult affairs, he was obliged to keep up a very extenſive correſpondence, in doing of which he diſcovered a moſt ſurprizing dexterity, for he hardly ever made uſe of cypher, but penned his letters in ſuch a peculiar ſtile, as removed entirely his intentions from the apprehenſion of his enemies, and yet left them very intelligible unto thoſe with whom he tranſacted (i). He had alſo an incomparable addreſs in bringing any thing to bear that he had once contrived, to which it contributed not a little, that in matters of ſecrecy and danger he ſeldom truſted to any hands but his own, and to facilitate this, he made uſe of all kinds of diſguiſes. Sometimes when he was believed to be in one place he was actually at another; letters of conſequence he carried in the diſguiſe of a porter; when he wanted intelligence he would be at the water ſide with a baſket of flounders upon his head, and often paſſed between London and Oxford in the dreſs of a butter-woman on horſeback between a pair of panniers (k). He was the principal author of that well-laid deſign for publiſhing the King's Commiſſion of Array at London, which was defeated by another deſign that Mr. Waller through fear betrayed, for which Tomkins and Chaloner ſuffered (l), and of which we have but a very obſcure account in a very celebrated hiſtory (m) [B]. It is however very (b) Characters of eminent Citizens in London, p. 97.

(i) Lloyd's Loyal Sufferers, p. 628.

(k) Characters of eminent Citizens in London, p. 97. Lloyd's Loyal Sufferers, p. 627.

(l) Vicar's Parliamentary Chronicle, p. 359.

(m) Clarendon's Hiſt. of the Rebellion, p. 317, 318, 319.

'worſt that can happen, and I bleſs God, who has 'made me able to pay my allegiance, and to pay for 'it (2).' Something of the ſame kind was inſinuated to Sir John Jacob, who was not only very ſincerely loyal, but a man of a warm temper and a tender heart. 'What, ſaid he in reply, ſhall I keep my 'eſtate, and ſee the King want wherewithal, to pro-'tect me in it? If it pleaſe God to bleſs the King, 'though I give him all I have, I ſhall be no loſer; if 'not though I keep all I have, I ſhall be no ſaver '(3).' Sir John Wolſtenholme, a ſtout and plain man, advanced his proportion, as he afterwards did larger ſums, without any ſpeeches (4). He and Sir Nicholas Criſpe lived to ſee the Reſtoration, and to be Farmers of the Cuſtoms again under King Charles the ſecond, after they and the reſt had paid deeply for this proof of their loyalty.

(2) From a MS. formerly belonging to Peter Le Neve, Eſq;

(3) Engliſh Baronetage, vol. iv. p. 450.

(4) From the information of the family.

[B] And of which we have but a very obſcure account, in a very celebrated Hiſtory.] We have in the Earl of Clarendon's Work, a very large account of Mr. Waller's deſign, and the methods employed by him to bring it to bear, and of the manner in which it was diſcovered. His Lordſhip then takes occaſion to tell us, that the Parliament, to magnify their danger, blended this with another deſign that was formed in the King's quarters; and as this relates expreſsly to the perſon of whom we are ſpeaking, it is neceſſary the reader ſhould ſee it (5). From the King's coming to Oxford, many citizens of good quality, who were proſecuted or jealouſly looked upon, in London, had reſorted to the King, and hoping if the winter produced not a peace, that the ſummer would carry the King before that city with an army, they had entertained ſome diſcourſe of raiſing upon their own ſtocks of money and credit, ſome Regiments of Foot and Horſe, and joining with ſome Gentlemen of Kent, who were likewiſe inclined to ſuch an undertaking. Among theſe was Sir Nicholas Criſpe, a citizen of good wealth, great trade, and an active ſpirited man; who had been lately proſecuted with great ſeverity by the Houſe of Commons, and had thereupon fled from London for appearing too great a ſtickler in a petition for peace in the city. This Gentleman induſtriouſly preſerved a correſpondence ſtill therein, by which he gave the King often very uſeful intelligence, and aſſured him of a very conſiderable party which would appear there for him, whenever his own power ſhould be ſo near as to give them any countenance. In the end, whether invited by his correſpondents there, or truſting his own ſprightly inclinations and reſolutions too much, and concluding that all who were equally honeſt, would be equally bold, he deſired his Majeſty 'to grant a com-'miſſion to ſuch perſons whom he would nominate 'of the city of London, under the Great Seal of 'England, in the nature of a Commiſſion of Array, 'by virtue whereof, when the ſeaſon ſhould come, 'his party there would appear in diſcipline and order, 'and that this was deſired by thoſe who beſt knew 'what countenance and authority was requiſite, and 'being truſted to them, would not be executed at all, 'or elſe at ſuch a time, as his Majeſty ſhould receive 'ample fruits by it, provided it were done with ſe-'crecy equal to the hazard they ſhould run, who were 'employed in it.' The King had this exception to it: 'The improbability that it could do good, and that the failing might do hurt to the undertakers.' But the promoter was a very popular man in the city, where he had been a Commander of the Trained-bands, till the Ordinance of the Militia removed him, which rather improved than leſſened his credit, and he was very confident it would produce a notable advantage to the King. However they deſired it, who were there, and would not appear without it, and therefore the King conſented to it, referring the nomination of all perſons in the commiſſion to him, who he verily believed had proceeded by the inſtruction and advice of thoſe that were neareſt the concernment; and for the ſecrecy of it, the King referred the preparing and diſpatch of the commiſſion to Sir Nicholas Criſpe himſelf, who ſhould acquaint no more with it than he found requiſite. So without the privity or advice, of any Counſellor, or Miniſter of State, then moſt truſted by his Majeſty, he procured ſuch a Commiſſion as he deſired, (being no other than the Commiſſion of Array in Engliſh,) to be ſigned by the King, and ſealed with the Great Seal. This being done and remaining ſtill in his cuſtody, the Lady Aubigney, by a paſs, and with the conſent of the Houſes, came to Oxford to tranſact the affairs of her own fortune with the King, upon the death of her huſband, who was killed at Edghill; and ſhe having in a few days diſpatched her buſineſs there, and being ready to return, Sir Nicholas Criſpe came to the King, and beſought him 'to deſire that Lady, who 'had a paſs, and ſo could promiſe herſelf ſafety in 'her journey, to carry a ſmall box (in which that 'Commiſſion ſhould be) with her, and to keep it in 'her own cuſtody, until a Gentleman ſhould call to 'her Ladyſhip for it, by ſuch a token.' That token he ſaid, 'he could ſend to one of the perſons truſted 'who ſhould keep it by him, till the opportunity came 'in which it might be executed.' The King accordingly wiſhed the Lady Aubigney to carry it with great care and ſecrecy, telling her 'it much con-'cerned his own ſervice,' and to deliver it in ſuch manner, and upon ſuch aſſurance, as is before-mentioned, which ſhe did; and within few days after her return to London, delivered it to a perſon who was appointed to call for it. How this Commiſſion was very certain that there was nothing dishonourable in the design itself, so far as Sir Nicholas Crispe was concerned, or any just grounds of throwing reproach, or so much as suspicion upon him, for the discovery of it. But it seems the noble author was not entirely possessed of the facts relating to it, and either willingly or inadvertently confounds Sir Nicholas Crispe's design of executing the King's Commission of Array in London (n), which might have been done as legally as any where else, with another design, superinduced by Mr. Waller, of surprizing the Parliament, in bringing which to bear he proceeded very vigorously at first, till finding that he had engaged in a matter too big for his management, he suddenly lost his spirits, and some of the chief men in the House of Commons gaining intelligence that something was in agitation to their prejudice, May 31st, 1643 (o), they presently seized Mr. Waller and drew from him a compleat discovery, which, from the account they published, plainly distinguished these two projects [C]. By the discovery of this discovered, I could never learn, for though Mr. Waller had the honour to be admitted often to that Lady, and was believed by her to be a Gentleman of most entire affections to the King's service, and consequently might be fitly trusted with what she knew, yet her Ladyship herself not knowing what it was she carried, could not inform any body else. It is very evident from this account, that the noble Historian was not much in the secret himself; and this perhaps might incline him not to entertain a better opinion of it: for it is very apparent, that he looked upon Sir Nicholas Crispe's zeal as pushing him a little too far in this business; that he very much doubted whether that Commission, however managed, could turn to the King's advantage, because of the want of spirit in those concerned; and that after all, he could never find out how the original Commission came into the Parliament's hands; because the Lady Aubigney delivered it, as she was directed, so that it was out of her hands before it was discovered; and while it was in her hands, she could say nothing about it to Mr. Waller, because she herself did not know what it was.

(5) Clarendon's Hiſtory of the Rebellion, p. 318.

(n) May's Hist. of the Parliament of England, l. iii. p. 45.

(o) Rushworth's Collections, p. iii. vol. ii. p. 324.

[C] Which from the account they published, plainly distinguished these two projects.] We have, at the close of the last note, pointed out the difficulties under which, from his own account, it is very plain that the noble Historian laboured. It is true, that he remarks it as a point of insincerity in the Parliament, that they kneaded these two projects together, which remark of his is very well founded; but then it is very evident, that he does not himself distinguish them sufficiently, but imputes the failing of Sir Nicholas Crispe's design, to the want of spirit in those who were to manage it. To say the truth, there is no one point of so great importance, in the History of those times, that is so darkly, so imperfectly, and so confusedly related by all our general historians. Mr. Archdeacon Echard (6) takes all that he says about it, from the Earl of Clarendon, and blames the Parliament for blending these two designs, at the same time that he justifies them, by not shewing how they ought to be distinguished. This afforded occasion to another writer (7) to attack the sincerity, or at least the consistency, both of the noble Peer and of the reverend writer; and he thinks that he has fully proved his point, and justified the Parliament, by producing some passages from the dying speeches of Mr. Tomkins and Mr. Challoner. A little attention to facts and dates will clear up this whole affair, and enable us to set it in its proper light, which is certainly one of the most useful purposes to which this kind of writing can be applied. Sir Nicholas Crispe remained at London, as long as he could remain there with safety, or had any hopes of doing his Majesty service; but being removed from his command in the Trained-Bands, censured for promoting a petition for peace, and seeing Sir Richard Gurney then Lord Mayor of London, imprisoned, deposed, and punished for doing what he took to be his duty, in publishing the King's Proclamation, which tended to the execution of the Commission of Array, he retired to Oxford (8). As he had the King's ear, it is no wonder that he informed his Majesty, that there was a strong party for him in the city of London; who were desirous of acting for his service, and of levying regiments of horse and foot, at their own expences, which they were the rather induced to do, because while they remained under the power of the Parliament, they were obliged to contribute both arms and money, against the dictates of their consciences, and to act in some measure against the side to which they wished well. But to enable them to carry their intentions into execution, and to have what they took to be a legal authority to warrant their proceedings, it was necessary they should have the King's Commission, impowering them to do what they inclined to do, as well as to appoint a General, and to grant Commissions, which was the purport of the Commission under the King's Broad Seal, dated at Oxford, March 16th, in the eighteenth year of his Majesty's reign (9). The person, they had in view, to command the men they were to raise, was Sir Hugh Pollard, a Member of Parliament, but at that time a prisoner in the Compter; and a body of the King's Forces were to advance within fifteen miles of London, to countenance their proceedings, to support them, if that was found practicable, or to join them in case they were forced to retreat (10). This Commission was directed to Sir Nicholas Crispe, Sir George Stroud, Knights; to Sir Thomas Gardiner, Knight, Recorder of London; Sir George Binion, Knight, Richard Edes, and Marmaduke Royden, Esquires; Thomas Brown, Peter Passon, Charles Gennings, Edward Charleton, Roger Abbot, Andrew King, William White, Stephen Bolton, Robert Alden, Edmund Foster, Thomas Blinkhorne, of London, Gentlemen, and to all such other persons, as according to the true intent and purport of that Commission should be nominated and appointed to be Generals, Colonels, Lieutenant-Colonels, Serjeant-Majors, or other officers of that Council of War. It is hence very evident, that this Commission was not at all intended to countenance a secret conspiracy, or to cover a dark and private plot against the Parliament, but to enable those who, in this dispute between the King and Parliament, were for the former, to declare themselves. This business was carried with so much secrecy, that it was entirely ripe for execution, and the day fixed for the rising was the last of May (11). But amongst the persons trusted in this affair was one Mr. Tomkins, an old and faithful servant of the King's, who was brother-in-law to Mr. Waller, and to him that Gentleman communicated his designs, which were of another nature, and by his assistance Mr. Waller had likewise a considerable party in the city, whom he encouraged by assuring them that most of the Lords, and many Members of the House of Commons, wished well to, and would at a proper season join with, them. Tomkins depending upon this, got his other friends to postpone their insurrection, and that very day on which it was to have been made, Mr. Waller's schemes were discovered (12). How that happened, is not material to be discussed here, but it was this that gave occasion to the seizing Mr. Tomkins, Mr. Challoner, Mr. Blinkhorne, and several others. As to the finding the Commission, though the noble Historian was ignorant of it, it was nevertheless a thing very publicly known; for Mr. Tomkins was the person who was sent for it to the Lady Aubigney, and for his own security he buried it in his cellar, as he confessed upon his examination; upon which it was immediately dug up, and thus it came into the Parliament's hands (13). Yet it does not appear that any great discoveries were made of the persons originally embarked in that design, though it was, as has been already observed, ripe for execution,

(6) Hist. of England, p. 570.

(7) Oldm'xon's History of the Stuarts, vol. i. p. 222.

(8) Echard's Hist. of England, p. 570.

(9) Rushworth's Historical Collections, P. iii. vol. ii. p. 324—327.

(10) Vicar's Parliamentary Chronicle, p. 359.

(11) See the Original Commission in Rushworth.

(12) May's Hist. of the Parliament, l. iii. p. 43—45.

(13) Rushworth's Collections, P. iii. vol. ii. p. 324—327.

this buſineſs, Sir Nicholas Criſpe found himſelf obliged to declare openly and plainly the courſe he meant to take; and having at his own expence raiſed a regiment of Horſe for the King's ſervice, he put himſelf at the head of it, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf as remarkably in his military as he had ever done in his civil capacity. When the ſiege of Glouceſter was reſolved on, Sir Nicholas Criſpe was charged with his Regiment of Horſe to eſcort the King's Train of Artillery from Oxford, which important ſervice he very gallantly performed (p). In the month of September following a very unlucky accident befel him, in which he was no way to blame; and though the circumſtances attending it clearly juſtified his conduct to the world, yet the concern it gave him was ſuch as he could not ſhake off ſo long as he lived. He happened to be quartered at Rouſlidge in Glouceſterſhire, where one Sir James Ennyon, Baronet, of Northamptonſhire, and ſome friends of his took up a great part of the houſe, though none of them had any commands in the army, which however Sir Nicholas bore with the utmoſt patience, notwithſtanding he was much incommoded by it. It fell out ſome time after, that certain horſes belonging to thoſe gentlemen were miſſing, upon which Sir James Ennyon, though he had loſt none himſelf, came to Sir Nicholas Criſpe on their behalf, inſinuating that ſome of his troopers muſt have taken them, and after a long expoſtulation conceived in pretty rough terms, inſiſted that he ſhould immediately draw out his regiment, that ſearch might be made for them. Sir Nicholas anſwered him with all the mildneſs imaginable, offered him as full ſatisfaction as it was in his power to give, but excuſed himſelf from drawing out his regiment, as a thing improper and inconvenient at that juncture, for reaſons which he aſſigned him (q). This however was ſo far from contenting Sir James, that he left him abruptly, and preſently after ſent him a challenge, accompanied with a meſſage to this effect, that if he did not comply with it he would piſtol him againſt the wall. Upon this Sir Nicholas Criſpe taking a friend of his with him, went to the place appointed, where he found Sir James Ennyon and the perſon who brought him the challenge. Upon their meeting, Sir Nicholas began to uſe his utmoſt endeavours to pacify him, but to no purpoſe: he was determined to receive no ſatisfaction but by the ſword (r), and they accordingly engaged, and in this duel Sir James having received a wound in the rim of the belly, languiſhed for near two days and then expired; but firſt of all ſent for Sir Nicholas Criſpe, and in a manner becoming a Gentleman and a Chriſtian, was ſincerely reconciled to him (s). Upon the 2d of October following Sir Nicholas was brought to a Court Martial for this unfortunate affair, and upon a full examination of every thing relating to it, was moſt honourably acquitted [D]. He continued to ſerve with the ſame zeal and fidelity during the year 1644, and in the ſpring following. When a Treaty was ſet on foot at Uxbridge, the Parliament thought fit to mark him, as they afterwards did in the Iſle of Wight Treaty, by inſiſting that he ſhould be removed from his Majeſty's preſence (t). A few months after, they proceeded to an act of greater ſeverity; for April 16th, 1645, they ordered his large houſe in Bread-ſtreet to be ſold (u), which had been for many years belonging to his family. Neither was this ſtroke of their

(p) Lloyd's Loyal Sufferers, p. 627. Heath's Chron. p. 52.

(q) Whitlock's Memorials, p. 75. Lloyd's Loyal Sufferers, p. 627. Heath's Chron. p. 52.

(r) The Civil Wars of Great Britain and Ireland, p. 96.

(s) Heath's Chronicle, p. 52. The Civil Wars of Great Britain and Ireland, p. 96.

(t) Thurloe's State Papers, vol. i. p. 81.

(u) Whitlock's Memorials, p. 142.

tion, when Mr. Waller's plot was but in embryo. On the 30th of June, a Council of War ſat at Guildhall, of which the Earl of Mancheſter was Preſident, before whom Mr. Tomkins, Mr. Challoner, Mr. Blinkhorne, Mr. Abbot, and Mr. White, were tried; of whom the four firſt received ſentence of death. Mr. Tomkins was executed over againſt his own houſe, and at his death he called the matter for which he ſuffered a fooliſh buſineſs, and ſaid he was drawn into it by affection for his brother-in-law; which plainly ſhews, that by fooliſh buſineſs, he meant Mr. Waller's ſcheme. As to Mr. Challoner, he was aſſiſted by Mr. Peters, and appears to have been a zealot in the Puritan way. He does indeed ſay, that he died juſtly, but then he was acquainted only with Mr. Waller's deſign. He was executed the ſame day, before the Royal Exchange. In his dying ſpeech he obſerves, that he had been wrongfully charged. With reſpect to the Commiſſion; he ſaid, he knew nothing of the procuring it, nor of the Commiſſion itſelf, till the Friday before the diſcovery (14). The day before theſe men ſuffered, Mr. Waller received ſentence of death, at the Court-martial, though a Member of the Houſe of Commons; was reprieved by the Earl of Eſſex, as General; and afterwards pardoned for his diſcoveries (15). Upon the whole it appears, that Sir Nicholas's deſign was open and honourable, and was conducted with great ſecrecy and ſucceſs, and that it was diſappointed by the breaking out of a thing quite different from it in its nature, of which Sir Nicholas Criſpe had no knowledge, and in the credit or event of which therefore he could have no concern.

(14) See theſe Dying Speeches at large in Ruthworth.

(15) May's Hiſt. of the Parliament, l. iii. p. 46.

[D] Was moſt honourably acquitted.] The beſt juſtification of what has been ſaid in the text, is to give the reader the ſentence of the Court-martial, by which he was tried, and which was conceived in the following terms (16). 'In the cauſe depending againſt Sir 'Nicholas Criſpe, Knight, concerning the death of 'Sir James Enyon, Knight, ſlain by him in a Duel, 'in September laſt; the Court being informed that 'an affixer was duly ſet up upon the Court-houſe 'door, according to their Order, of the 28th of Sep'tember laſt, and the affixer afterwards taken down, 'and brought into the Court, and Proclamation be'ing made, and no man appearing againſt him, yet 'upon examination of all the matter, and difference 'between them, and that the friends of the ſlain 'taking notice thereof, the Court proceeds to ſen'tence. That although the Court doth condemn all 'manner of Duels, and utterly diſallow them; yet in 'this particular caſe of Sir Nicholas Criſpe, in con'ſideration of the great injury he received, in his own 'quarters, and how much he was provoked, and 'challenged, the Court have thought fit to acquit him 'of any puniſhment in this Court, and doth leave, 'and recommend him to his Majeſty's mercy, for his 'gracious pardon; the 2d of October, 1643.'

(16) The Civil Wars of Great Britain and Ireland, p. 97.

Signed Forth Lord Lieutenant-General and Preſident. Dorſet, Briſtol, Northampton, Andover, Dunſmore, Jacob Aſtley, Arthur Aſhton, William Brumchard, and John Byron.

By whom the whole matter was reported to the King, and Sir Nicholas brought to kiſs his hand, from whom he received a gracious pardon, under the Great Seal of England, and was afterwards intruſted in high commands for his Majeſty, both by land and ſea.

vengeance judged a ſufficient puniſhment for his offences, ſince having reſolved to grant the Elector Palatine a penſion of eight thouſand pounds a year, they directed that two thouſand ſhould be applied out of the King's revenue, and the remainder made up out of the eſtates of Lord Culpeper and Sir Nicholas Criſpe (w), which ſhews how conſiderable a fortune he had left at their mercy. The King's affairs were now grown deſperate, when Sir Nicholas finding himſelf no longer in a capacity to render him any ſervice, thought it expedient to preſerve himſelf, with which view, in the beginning of the month of April, 1646, he embarked with Lord Culpeper and Colonel Monk, and a few days after was ſafely landed in France (x). As he had many rich relations who had a great intereſt with thoſe in power, they interpoſed in his favour; and as Sir Nicholas knew very well that he could be of no ſervice to the Royal Cauſe abroad, he did not look upon it as any deviation from his duty to return and live quietly at home (y). Accordingly, having ſubmitted to a compoſition, he came back to London and took all the pains he could to retrieve his ſhattered fortunes. He was indeed a perſon of ſo clear a head, had ſuch thorough and extenſive notions of trade, and was withal of ſo quick an invention, that he very ſoon engaged again in buſineſs, with the ſame ſpirit and ſucceſs as before (z). In this ſeaſon of proſperity he was not unmindful of the wants of his Royal Maſter then in exile, but contributed chearfully to his relief, when his affairs ſeemed to be in the moſt deſperate condition (a). Upon the great change that happened after the death of Oliver Cromwell, he was inſtrumental in reconciling many to their duty, and ſo well were his principles known, and ſo much his influence apprehended, that when it was propoſed that the Royaliſts in and about London ſhould ſign an inſtrument ſignifying their inclination to preſerve the public tranquillity, he was called upon and very readily ſubſcribed it (b). He was alſo principally concerned in bringing the city of London, in her corporate capacity, to give the encouragement that was requiſite to leave General Monk without any difficulties or ſuſpicion (c), as to the ſincerity and unanimity of their inclinations. It was therefore very natural, after reading the King's Letter and Declaration in Common-Council, May 3d, 1660, to think of ſending ſome Members of their own Body to preſent their duty to his Majeſty. Accordingly, having appointed nine loyal Aldermen and their Recorder, the next perſon they thought of was Sir Nicholas Criſpe (d), whom, with ſeveral other worthy perſons, they added to that Committee, from an aſſurance that the King would receive a double ſatisfaction from the nature of their meſſage, and from its being brought by ſeveral of thoſe who had ſuffered deeply in his own and in his father's cauſe. His Majeſty received theſe Gentlemen very graciouſly in their public capacities, and afterwards teſtified to them ſeparately the ſenſe he had of their paſt ſervices. Upon the King's return, Sir Nicholas Criſpe and Sir John Wolſtenholme, though the latter was then near fourſcore, were reinſtated as Farmers of the Cuſtoms, which they put into very good order (e). As Sir Nicholas was now in years and ſomewhat infirm, he ſpent a great part of his time at his noble country ſeat near Hammerſmith, where he was in ſome meaſure the Founder of the Chapel (f). He had now an opportunity of returning the obligation he had received from ſome of his relations, nor did he neglect it, but procured for them that indemnity from the King gratis, for which he had ſo dearly paid during the late confuſion (g). The laſt teſtimony he received of his royal Maſter's favour, was his being created a Baronet, April 16th, 1665 (h), nor did he long ſurvive it; dying February 26th the ſame year (i), in the ſixty-ſeventh year of his age (k), leaving a very large eſtate to his grandſon Sir Nicholas Criſpe. His corps was interred with his anceſtors in the pariſh Church of St. Mildred in Bread-ſtreet, and his funeral ſermon was preached by his reverend and learned kinſman Mr. Criſpe of Chriſt-church, Oxford (l). But his heart was ſent to the Chapel at Hammerſmith, where there is a ſhort and plain inſcription upon a cenotaph erected to his memory (m); or rather upon that monument which himſelf erected in grateful commemoration of King Charles I. as the inſcription placed there in Sir Nicholas's life-time tells us, under which, after his deceaſe, was placed a ſmall white marble urn, upon a black pedeſtal, containing his heart. As to the character of this active, generous, and loyal perſon, who lived univerſally admired, and died generally lamented, it has been already repreſented from his actions, and if any thing be ſtill wanting, it will be found in the Eulogy of this loyal ſubject which is inſerted in the notes [E].

(w) See Votes and Ordinances of Parliament. Whitlock's Memorials, p. 145.

(x) Hiſt. of the Civil War, p. 395. Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 200.

(y) Lloyd's Loyal Sufferers, p. 628. Wood's Athen. Oxon. vol. II. col. 26.

(z) Characters of eminent Citizens of London, p. 97.

(a) Lloyd's Loyal Sufferers, p. 628.

(b) Kennet's Chr. p. 221.

(c) Skinner's Hiſtory of the Reſtauration, p. 44, 45.

(d) Kennet's Hiſtorical Regiſter, p. 133.

(e) Camd. Brit. Lond. 1594, 4to. p. 477. Pedigree of the Croft family.

(e) Engliſh Baronetage, vol. II. p. 446.

(f) Antiquities of Middleſex, P. ii. p. 2.

(g) Lloyd's Loyal Sufferers, p. 628.

(h) Engliſh Baronetage, vol. v. p. 279.

(i) As appears from the inſcription mentioned in the text.

(k) Characters of eminent Citizens, p. 99.

(l) Lloyd's Loyal Sufferers, p. 628.

(m) Antiquities of Middleſex, P. ii. p. 42.

(l) Fuller's Worthies, in Herefordſhire.

(l) See that L... as publiſhed ... Fuller.

(k) Camd. Annal. Eliz. ... 567.

[E] Inſerted in the notes.] We have taken all poſſible care, to prevent his character from appearing a repetition of what is ſaid, either in the text or notes, by avoiding, as much as we could, the mention of moſt of the particulars that are contained therein (17).

(17) Characters of eminent Citizens, p. 98, 99.

'Amongſt the worthy citizens of thoſe times, who, 'in the midſt of moſt epidemic corruption, eſcaped 'the ſmalleſt ſtain of infection, was Sir Nicholas 'Criſpe; a Gentleman deſcended both by father and 'mother, from the richeſt families in the city, in 'which they had borne the higheſt offices, to which, 'however, Sir Nicholas did not aſpire. He came 'very young into buſineſs, and with a fortune larger 'than moſt men carry out of it. He had excellent 'notions of Commerce, and he knew how to reduce 'them to practice, and to bring whatever he engaged 'in up to them. He was the moſt general trader of 'his time, but was principally concerned in the commerce to Guinea, which was immenſely profitable 'to him and his aſſociates. He was very remarkable 'for intereſting himſelf in all domeſtic Arts and Manufactures, for any improvements, in which he gave 'extraordinary gratuities. All new inventions he 'alſo encouraged, and the art of brick-making, as 'ſince practiſed, was his own, conducted with incredible patience, through innumerable trials, and 'perfected at a very large expence. His principles 'were equally ſound, in religion and politics, and as 'he

'he derived theſe from a good education, ſo their 'effects not only appeared early, but were conſpi-'cuous through the courſe of his whole life. In '1630, he gave in money and materials, towards 'building the new Chapel at Hammerſmith, ſeven 'hundred pounds; beſides being at the expence of 'adorning the roof, with the arms of the crown, and 'ſprinkling it with roſes, thiſtles, and flower de luces, 'all effaced in the troubleſome times that enſued. 'Himſelf with his partners in the cuſtoms, having 'advanced one hundred thouſand pounds to the King, 'were fined one hundred and fifty thouſand to the 'Parliament, which was levied to the laſt farthing 'upon their eſtates. He loved exerciſe, and was re-'markable for the pains he took to render his com-'pany in the London trained-bands, as well diſci-'plined as any troops could be; and this natural in-'clination to military affairs, proved very ſerviceable 'to him, when he became a Commander of Horſe in 'the Royal Army. He was baſely betrayed at Ci-'renceſter, to the Earl of Eſſex, who ſurprized him 'with the ſmall force he commanded, and gained 'thereby an advantage fatal to the King's deſign upon 'Glouceſter, and which, to ſay the truth, had a very 'unhappy influence on the general ſtate of his affairs. 'When Sir Nicholas was obliged to quit the king-'dom, and fly into parts beyond the ſeas, he made 'his private misfortunes turn public benefits; by 'making ſuch nice inquiries into agriculture, manu-'factures, and mechanic arts, as enabled him, upon 'his return, to make vaſt improvements in England 'of every kind. By his inſtructions, and through his 'encouragement, the farmers and gardeners in Mid-'dleſex changed their old ſyſtem for a better. At 'his expence, the banks of the river were ſecured, 'and the channel cleanſed; by his communication, 'new inventions, as to water-mills, paper-mills, and 'powder-mills, came into uſe. After the Reſtaura-'tian, he cauſed to be erected at his own expence, in 'the ſouth-eaſt corner of the Chapel at Hammer-'ſmith, near the pulpit, a very neat and beautiful 'monument of black and white marble, eight feet in 'length, and near two in breadth, upon which he 'placed a braſs buſto of his beloved maſter, with this 'ſhort and plain inſcription underneath. This Effigie 'was erected by the eſpecial appointment of Sir Nicholas 'Criſpe, Knight and Baronet, as a grateful Commemo-'ration of that glorious Martyr King Charles I. of bleſ-'ſed Memory. He alſo directed that after his deceaſe, 'his own heart, in token of undying affection to his 'Royal Maſter, ſhould be here in a white urn en-'tombed. He ſpent twenty-five thouſand pounds, in 'building his noble ſeat, which attracts all eyes from 'the river. This houſe was purchaſed by Prince 'Rupert, for Mrs. Margaret Hughs, and was not 'long ſince ſold to Mr. Lannoy, a ſcarlet dyer. It 'was there he ſpent the calm evening of his day, in 'honour and repoſe, loved by the great, prayed for 'by the poor, univerſally eſteemed by all ranks of 'people; and being full of years and glory, with much 'patience and piety, reſigned his ſoul to the mercy of 'his Creator, in the ſixty-ſeventh year of his life.'

C.

CROFT (HERBERT), an eminent and worthy Divine, as well as venerable prelate of the Church of England, in the ſeventeenth century, was deſcended, though not from a noble, yet of an ancient and honourable family, which had flouriſhed in great wealth and credit in the county of Hereford (a) from before the Norman Conqueſt; and amongſt his anceſtors there were many highly diſtinguiſhed by their perſonal reputation and merit, as well in reſpect to arms as arts, whoſe names we find recorded with honour, by authors of unqueſtionable veracity [A]. He was the third ſon of Sir Herbert Croft, of Croft-Caſtle, by Mary, daughter and coheireſs of Anthony Browne, of Holt-Caſtle in Worceſterſhire (b), and was born October 18th, 1603, at Great Milton near Thame in Oxfordſhire, in the houſe of Sir William Green, his mother being then on a journey to London (c). He was very carefully educated in his junior years in Herefordſhire, and having pregnant parts, joined to great ſteadineſs of mind and unwearied application, he very early qualified himſelf for academical ſtudies; and in order to his improvement in theſe, he was in the year 1616 ſent to Oxford, and entered as is ſuppoſed of Chriſt-church College (d). But he had not been long there before his father unhappily joined himſelf with the Church of Rome, and became a Lay Brother in the Benedictine Monaſtery at Douay, and a moſt zealous advocate for the Romiſh religion (e) [B]. Upon his father's command he went over to him,

(a) Camd. Brit. Lond. 1594, 4to. p. 477. Pedigree of the Croft family.

(b) Wood's Ath. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 864.

(c) Engliſh Baronettage, vol. iv. p. 537.

(d) Engliſh Spaniſh Pilgrim, by James Wadſworth, Lond. 1630, 4to. c. 111.

(e) Wood's Ath. Oxon. vol. i. col. 469.

[A] By authors of unqueſtionable veracity.] We have no diſtinct account of the original of this family; only the tradition of the country refers the building of Croft-Caſtle, which has always been the ſeat of it, to the Saxon times, which is the more probable, ſince, from the earlieſt accounts we have, at leaſt with any tolerable degree of certainty, this appears to have been a family of eminence in Herefordſhire, and to have been even then, reputed of great antiquity (1). Thus it occurs in the famous inquiſition taken in the reign of King Henry VI (2). In the reign of his ſucceſſor Edward IV. Sir Richard Croft, of Croft-Caſtle, was High Sheriff of the county; and at the battle of Tewkſbury, took Prince Edward, eldeſt ſon to Henry VI. priſoner; whom, upon proclamation, and promiſe of ſafety for his perſon, he produced, but had no hand whatever in the barbarous murder of that young Prince, which was committed by the King's two brothers, the Dukes of Clarence and Glouceſter (3). From this Sir Richard Croft, in a direct line, deſcended Sir James Croft, Knight, who ſuffered ſeverly in the reign of Queen Mary, upon a ſuſpicion of his having ſome intercourſe with Sir Thomas Wiatt, for which however he had ample amends made him by by Queen Elizabeth, to whom he was Comptroller of the Houſhold, and a Member of the Privy-Council (4). This Sir James Croft married Alice, daughter of Richard Warwick, Eſq; by whom he had iſſue Edward Croft, Eſq; who eſpouſed Mrs. Anne Brown, and dying in the life-time of his father, left behind him a ſon Herbert (5), afterwards Sir Herbert Croft, Knight, who was the father of our prelate.

(1) Fuller's Worthies, in Herefordſhire.

(2) See that Liſt as publiſhed in Fuller.

(3) Engliſh Baronettage, vol. iv. p. 535.

(4) Camd. Annal. Eliz. p. 567.

(5) Athen. Oxon. vol. i. col. 469.

[B] And a moſt zealous advocate for the Romiſh religion.] This gentleman, Sir Herbert Croft, received the honour of Knighthood from King James I. at Theobalds, in the year 1603 (6). And about fourteen years afterwards, turned Papiſt, and went over to Douay, where he died (7). He had four ſons, and two daughters. His eldeſt ſon William, was knighted by King Charles I. in the beginning of his reign, and adhering firmly to the intereſts of that Prince, became a Colonel in his ſervice, and was killed gallantly fighting againſt the Parliamentary forces at Stone-Caſtle, near Ludlow in Shropſhire, June the 9th 1645 (8). His loyalty was the more extraordinary, ſince he had been very ill treated by the Court, on account of his oppoſition to the great favourite Buckingham; and therefore the King took particular notice of his fidelity, when he ſaw him putting himſelf at the head of his regiment at the battle of Edge-hill (9). James, the ſecond ſon, was alſo a Knight, and a Colonel in the King's ſervice, and died, as Wood aſſures us, in the year 1659, after ſuffering deeply for his loyalty (10). Robert, the fourth ſon, was a Colonel likewiſe (11), but of him we have no farther account. Elizabeth, one of the daughters of Sir

(6) Liſt of Kts. made by King James.

(7) Antiq. Oxon. l. ii. p. 269.

(8) Athen. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 868.

(9) Lloyd's Loyal Sufferers, p. 673.

(10) Ath. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 868.

(11) Id. ibid.

him, and after ſome ſhort ſtay at Douay was ſent to the Engliſh College of Jeſuits at St. Omer's, where by the perſwaſion of Father Lloyd he was reconciled to the Church of Rome, and by the inſinuations of the ſame perſon and ſome others, contrary to his father's advice in that particular, was wrought upon to enter into the order (f). Some time before his father's death, which happened about five years after his going abroad, he was by him ſent back again to England, in order to manage ſome family affairs, and becoming happily acquainted with Dr. Thomas Morton, Biſhop of Durham, he was by his arguments brought back to the Church of England, and ſoon after, at the deſire of Dr. William Laud, he went a ſecond time to Oxford, and was admitted a Student of Chriſt-church (g). Having ſupplicated the Univerſity November 21ſt, 1635, that the time he had ſpent in his ſtudies in foreign nations might be reckoned as if he had continued there, and that on performing the exerciſe requiſite by ſtatutes for the degree of Bachelor of Divinity, he might have his Grace propoſed in Congregation, this was granted; and having performed his exerciſe with applauſe, he was admitted to the ſaid degree, and entering into Holy Orders became Miniſter of a Church in Glouceſterſhire, and Rector of Harding in Oxfordſhire (h). In the ſpring of the year 1639, he attended the Earl of Northumberland, as his Chaplain, in his expedition into Scotland (i); and on the 1ſt of Auguſt following was collated to a Prebend in the Cathedral Church of Saliſbury, vacant by the reſignation of Mr. William Townſon (k). In the year 1640, being then the King's Chaplain in Ordinary, he was admitted to his degree of Doctor of Divinity (l). He was employed by his Majeſty upon various occaſions, in thoſe dangerous and difficult times, and always diſcharged his duty with fidelity and credit, though ſometimes at the hazard of his life. The ſame year he became a Prebendary of the Cathedral Church of Worceſter, on the death of Dr. Charlet (m). July 10th, 1641, he was inſtalled Canon of Windſor in the place of Dr. John Pocklington, who was deprived of all his eccleſiaſtical preferments by Parliament (n). In the year 1644, upon the death of Dr. Jonathan Brown, he was nominated Dean of Hereford, where he married Mrs. Ann Brown, the daughter of his predeceſſor. He reſided chiefly in this city, and diſcharged his duty with great punctuality and freedom, even in the worſt of times, at the conſtant peril of his then ſmall fortune, and ſometimes to the imminent endangering of his life (o) [C]. His circumſtances were but very narrow for ſome years, notwithſtanding he had ſo good preferments, for the diſſolution of Cathedrals following ſo cloſe upon his coming to have any relation to them, he had very little if any benefit from his ſeveral promotions; but at length, in the year 1659, by the ſucceſſive deaths of his elder brothers, Sir William and Sir James Croft, he became poſſeſſed of the eſtate of the family. The provocation he had given to the perſons who were then veſted with power was ſo great, that he did not conceive it ſafe, even after he was poſſeſſed of the eſtate, to live in his own county; and therefore choſe for the place of his retreat the houſe of his good friend Sir Rowland Berkeley, at Cotheridge in Worceſterſhire, where he patiently expected the reſtoration of Church and State, by the reſtitution of his Royal Maſter, which happening in May, 1660, Dr. Croft, as well as other loyal ſubjects, came again into poſſeſſion of his livings and ſpiritual preferments (p). Upon the death of Dr. Nicholas Monk, Lord Biſhop of Hereford, he was promoted to that See December 27th, 1661, and conſecrated on the 9th of February following at the Archbiſhop's Chapel in his Palace at Lambeth, Dr. Jaſper Maine preaching the Conſecration Sermon (q). He officiated likewiſe in his ſpiritual function frequently in the King's Chapel, and being very remarkable for his plain and practical preaching, and for the correſponding ſanctity of his manners and purity of his life, King Charles II. offered him more than once a better See, that which he then poſſeſſed being ſcarcely of the value of eight hundred pounds a year, but he very conſcientiouſly refuſed it. He became afterwards, about the year 1667, Dean of the Chapel Royal, which he held to 1669 (r), and then reſigned it, being weary of a Court life, and finding but little good effects from his pious endeavours. He then retired to his Biſhopric, where he was exceedingly beloved for his conſtant preaching, edifying converſation, hoſpitable manner of living, and moſt extenſive charity. He gave weekly alms to ſixty poor people at his Palace-gate in Hereford, whether reſident there or not; and beſides this he augmented ſeveral ſmall livings, ſupported many decayed families, and did various other Chriſtian acts

(f) Engliſh Baronettage, vol. iv. p. 538.

(g) Ath. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 864.

(h) Engliſh Baronettage, vol. iv. p. 539.

(i) Ath. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 865.

(k) Willis's Survey of Cathedrals, vol. ii. p. 529.

(l) Faſti Oxon. vol. i. col. 284.

(m) Willis's Survey of Cathedrals, vol. ii. p. 6-6.

(n) Antiquities of Berkſhire, vol. iii. p. 275.

(o) Walker's Sufferings of the Clergy, P. ii. p. 34.

(p) Ath. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 865.

(q) Godwin. de Præſul. Lond. fol. 1743, p. 457. Regiſt. Juxon. f. 283.

(r) Ath. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 865.

Herbert Croft, married Sir Thomas Cave, of Stamford in the county of Northampton (12). But whether Mary, the other daughter, was married or not, does no where appear: only this we know of her, that ſhe was a zealous Proteſtant, and wrote an anſwer to her father's letter, perſwading her to change her religion, to which Sir Herbert Croft made a warm reply (13).

(12) Engliſh Baronettage, vol. iv. p. 537.

(13) Ath. Oxon. vol. i. col. 469.

[C] And ſometimes to the imminent endangering his life.] He ſhewed upon all occaſions, as far as fell within the compaſs of his power, or the ſphere of his employment, not only the ſame loyalty, but the ſame courageous ſpirit that animated the reſt of his brethren. After Hereford fell into the hands of the Parliamentary forces, he not only continued to preach, but to preach that kind of doctrine, which how much ſoever they needed to learn, was nevertheleſs what they could hardly bear to hear. Once particularly in the Cathedral, he undertook to ſhew them the wickedneſs and impiety of ſacrilege, which he painted in ſuch lively colours, as provoked them to return the argument in their own way; for they primed and preſented their pieces, and aſked their Governor, Colonel Birch, whether they ſhould fire upon him in the pulpit; but being reſtrained by him they forbore (14); and Dr. Croft ſoon after very wiſely quitted a place, where he was every moment in danger of ſuffering evil, and was thoroughly ſatisfied it was no longer in his power to do any good.

(14) Walker's Sufferings of the Clergy, P. ii. p. 34.

of the ſame nature, with ſuch privacy that they were never known till after his deceaſe. His country houſe being conveniently ſituated in the very centre of his Dioceſe, he ſpent a conſiderable part of his time there, where he was no leſs charitable in relieving the poor and viſiting the ſick in all the neighbouring pariſhes. He was very ſtrict in his manner of admitting perſons to Holy Orders, and more eſpecially to that of the prieſthood, which gained him ſome ill will, yet but little in compariſon of what aroſe from another method in which however he was inflexible, and that was his refuſing to admit any Prebendaries into his Cathedral Church, excepting ſuch as lived within his Dioceſe, that the duty of the Church might not be neglected, and that the addition of a Prebend might be a comfortable augmentation to a ſmall living (s). He expreſſed a great deſire to be able to accompliſh this deſign of his, ſo as to ſee all the dignities of his Church beſtowed in this manner, and God was pleaſed to grant him his deſire, which he hoped might prove a precedent to his ſucceſſors. He was very modeſt and charitable in his opinions, and though a true ſon and a worthy father of the Church of England, yet he had a great abhorrence of whatever carried the aſpect of perſecution, deſiring that his zeal ſhould appear in the ſoundneſs of his doctrines and the holineſs of his life, as the ſureſt and moſt effectual means of ſupporting his authority, and drawing reverence to the Epiſcopal character, in which no man was more ſucceſsful (t). His Sermons preached at Court, had given the world a ſpecimen of the fervency of his ſpirit, and at the ſame time of his charity and forbearance; but when the controverſy with the Nonconformiſts came to its greateſt height, and the quarrel was ſo artificially widened that the Papiſts entertained hopes of entering through the breach, our wiſe and tender conſcienced Prelate thought it his duty to interpoſe, and to offer his aſſiſtance for healing theſe wounds in the Proteſtant Church. Accordingly, in the year 1675, he publiſhed his truly famous work, which though no more than a ſmall pamphlet of four or five ſheets, made a prodigious noiſe in the world, and was read and ſtudied by all people of ſenſe and learning in the kingdom (u). It is indeed a moſt extraordinary performance as it was then thought, and has kept its character to this day; for though it has often been re-printed it has never been common; and not withſtanding the numberleſs volumes written on the ſame ſubject ſince, it is yet looked upon as inimitable in its kind, and worthy of all the praiſes that have been beſtowed upon it. As to the title and the circumſtances attending this piece, the reader will find them at the bottom of the page, where we mention his Lordſhip's works [D]. We there likewiſe mention the anſwers that were given to it, and the (s) Willis's Survey, vol. ii. p. 529. Athen Oxon. vol. ii. col. 865, 866.

(t) Engliſh Baronettage, vol. iv. p. 541.

(u) Atl. Oxon. vol. i. col. 866.

[D] Where we mention his Lordſhip's works.] While his Lordſhip continued about the Court, and was generally applauded for his pathetic manner in the pulpit, he was prevailed upon to print two of his ſermons.

I. Sermon on Iſaiah Chap. XXVII. the laſt verſe, preached before the Lords aſſembled in Parliament upon the Faſt-day, February 4th, 1673. London 1674, 4*to*.

II. Sermon preached before the King at Whitehall, April 12, 1674. on Philippians I. and the 21ſt verſe. London 1675. 4*to*.

III. The naked truth; or, the true ſtate of the Primitive Church. London 1675. 4*to*; again in 1680. fol. and many times ſince. This is that extraordinary work mentioned in the text, and the preſs being at that time under a licence, he found himſelf under the neceſſity of cauſing it to be printed privately, though he intended it for the moſt public uſe; and for that reaſon, addreſſed it to the Lords and Commons aſſembled in Parliament. After having obſerved, that notwithſtanding all the laws made for eſtabliſhing Uniformity in religion, Proteſtants remain ſtill more divided than ever, to the great ſcandal as well as danger of the Church, he proceeds thus. 'Many, who were 'formerly very zealous for our Church, ſeeing theſe 'our ſad diviſions, and not ſeeing thoſe of the Roman 'Church, nor their groſs ſuperſtitions, which their 'prieſts conceal till they have got men faſt, are eaſily 'ſeduced by their pretended Unity, and daily fall 'from us. This makes my heart to bleed, and my 'ſoul with anguiſh ready to expire, rather than live 'to ſee that diſmal day of relapſe into their manifold 'idolatries. Wherefore I humbled my ſoul before 'God, in faſting and prayer, begging daily the aſſiſtance of his Holy Spirit, to direct me to ſome healing ſalve for theſe our bleeding wounds; and therefore I have ſome reaſon to believe that what is contained in theſe following papers, comes from the 'great goodneſs, who never fails thoſe who ſeek him 'in humility and ſincerity, both which I am confident 'I have done; and this I am ſure of, that no worldly 'deſigns have have moved me to this, but have often 'tempted me to give it over. I am alſo ſure that 'there is nothing contained therein, which is con'trary to the laws of the land: in this only I confeſs 'I have tranſgreſſed, in putting it forth without a 'licence; and for this I beg of God, and you, as 'Naaman did of Eliſha, In this thing the Lord and 'you pardon your Servant; and I hope you will ſay 'unto me, as Eliſha did unto Naaman, Go in peace. 'And I farther hope, this ſhall not caſt ſuch a preju'dice upon it, as to make you caſt it by, or read it 'with diſguſt.' In this work he begins with articles of faith, and having ſhewn the danger of impoſing more than are neceſſary, more eſpecially as terms of communion, he proceeds next through all the great points, in diſpute between the Church of England, and thoſe that diſſent from her; labouring throughout to prove, that Proteſtants differ about nothing, that can be truly ſtiled eſſential to religion, and that for the ſake of Union compliances would be more becoming, as well as more effectual, than enforcing Uniformity by penalties and perſecution. The whole is written with great plainneſs and piety, as well as with much force of argument and learning. If we conſider however the temper of thoſe times, and the warm diſpoſition of moſt of the Divines in the eſtabliſhed Church, we need not at all wonder at the fate this piece met with, which was immediately written againſt with much heat and zeal, not to uſe the harſher terms of fury and reſentment. It was firſt attacked by Dr. Francis Turner, Maſter of St. John's College in Cambridge, in a piece intituled,

Animadverſions on a Pamphlet, called the Naked Truth, &c. Lond. 1676. 4*to*. printed twice the ſame year. This was penned, like all the reſt of the writings of the ſame author, in a very elegant and flowing ſtile, which however could hardly atone for the ſeverity and bitterneſs expreſſed in it. But even this fell very far ſhort of the vivacity with which it was replied to, by the famous Andrew Marvel, who entituled his piece, Mr. Smirke, or the Divine in mode, and in which he ridicules the Animadverter with all that life and ſpirit, of which he was ſo much maſter. In this the long and warm controverſy which it occaſioned; though it was certain that our Prelate meant nothing leſs than not to enter into a debate, and therefore very prudently declined making any reply to his opponents. What he wrote was with a view to promote charity and peace, and when he ſaw this was not to be done by any kind of writing whatever, he took care to add no new fewel to the fire by labouring to ſupport principles which he had ſtated in ſuch a manner as he thought muſt have rendered them ſelf-evident (w). We have another pregnant inſtance of his ſincerity and diſintereſtedneſs, in the reſolution he took of reſigning his Biſhopric, the motives to which he expreſſed in a long letter to the learned Dr. Stillingfleet (x), and they are ſuch as ſhew him to have been a truly primitive and pious Prelate. He thought the receiving the income of his See, as it roſe in a great meaſure out of impropriate tythes which were withheld from parochial Miniſters, was hardly juſtifiable. He was troubled at the power of Lay Chancellors, who under pretence of the Biſhop's authority did wrong things, and likewiſe often hindered Biſhops from redreſſing many diſorders. It grieved him to ordain men poorly qualified, though it was but to poor livings, which men of better capacities would hardly accept. The law-ſuits to which (w) See the Account of this matter at large in the notes.

(x) Miſcellaneous Diſcourſes by Stillingfleet, Biſhop of Worceſtr. Lond. 1735, 8*vo*. p. 1—36.

this reply he gives the following character of the original work. 'It is a treatiſe, which if not for its 'oppoſer, needs no commendation, being writ with 'that evidence and demonſtration of truth; that all 'ſober men cannot but give their aſſent and conſent 'to it unaſked. It is a book of that kind, that no 'Chriſtian ſcarce can peruſe it, without wiſhing him-'ſelf to have been the author, and almoſt imagining 'that he is ſo: the conceptions therein being of ſo 'eternal idea, that every man finds it to be but a copy 'of the original of his own mind.' Another anſwer came out with this title:

Lex Talionis; or, the author of the Naked Truth ſtripped naked, Lond. 1676. 4*to*. This was at firſt aſcribed to Dr. Peter Gunning, Biſhop of Chicheſter, afterwards of Ely; who, upon the firſt coming out of the Naked Truth, had preached a warm Sermon at Court againſt it. It was afterwards attributed to Dr. William Lloyd, Dean of Bangor, a very learned and pious Divine. But upon better grounds it was aſcribed to the Reverend Mr. Philip Fell, one of the Fellows of Eton College. There was yet a third anſwer publiſhed to this work of our author's, which was entitled,

A modeſt ſurvey of the moſt conſiderable things in a diſcourſe lately publiſhed, entitled the Naked Truth, Lond. 1676. 4*to*. This Anthony Wood affirms (15) was written by Dr. Gilbert Burnet afterwards Biſhop of Saliſbury, upon the credit, as he ſays, of a Bookſeller's Catalogue, at the end of another book, in which this treatiſe is aſcribed to that Prelate.

(15) Ath. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 866.

It was indeed afterwards owned by his Lordſhip, and that upon the following occaſion. The famous Dr. Hickes, in a bitter invective he wrote againſt Biſhop Burnet (16), charged him with ſtealing the materials of this anſwer from Biſhop Gunning, who intended to anſwer it, as has been before obſerved, and who upon his communicating the method he intended to purſue in his anſwer, was ſupplanted by the appearance of this of which we are ſpeaking. In his Defence Biſhop Burnet declares that the fact was abſolutely falſe (17). That Biſhop Gunning had indeed great learning, and true piety, but his ideas were ſo confuſed, and ſo over ſubtle, that he could never learn any thing from him, in all the time that he converſed with him. Thus much may ſerve for the anſwers written to this work. We will next ſay ſomewhat of the imitations and copies that it produced, and theſe were what follow, viz.

(16) Some Diſcourſes upon Dr. Burnet and Dr. Tillotſon, occaſioned by the Funeral Sermon of the former upon the latter, p. 23.

(17) Reflections upon a pamphlet intituled, Some Diſcourſes, &c. p. 93.

There was a ſecond part of Naked Truth publiſhed in 1681, in fol. which was written by Edmund Hickeringhill, Rector of All-Saints in Colcheſter, who likewiſe wrote a Vindication of it. There alſo appeared the ſame year a treatiſe called the third part of Naked Truth, which was ſaid to be a poſthumous work, written by one Dr. Benjamin Worſley. The year following appeared the fourth part of Naked Truth; or the complaint of the Church to ſome of her ſons for breach of their Articles, &c. The reader may hence ſee the credit of this work of Biſhop Croft, when ſo many different authors placed the hopes of procuring a reading for their performances, by giving them a likeneſs in their titles to his. This was ſtill farther purſued by perſons of quite different principles, as appears from the following book.

The Catholick Naked Truth; or, the Puritans Convert to Chriſtianity. 1676. 4*to*. The author ſets the initial letters of his name to his work, viz. W. H. which ſtand for William Hubert, alias Berry, who being a Miniſter of the Church of England, went over to the Papiſts, and wrote this and ſeveral other treatiſes for the ſupport of that cauſe. To this we may add, Naked Truth, or Truth manifeſting itſelf in ſeveral particulars, &c. by way of queſtion and anſwer, 1677. 8*vo*. This piece was written in ſupport of the Quakers, for which reaſon Mr. Wood gave it the title of the Quakers Naked Truth.

As for our author, Biſhop Croft, we have obſerved, in the text, that he wrote no reply to any of his adverſaries, or vindication of his own performance, the deſign of which was to try, whether the legiſlature could be prevailed upon to take any meaſures for reconciling the differences ſubſiſting among Proteſtants for the common benefit of all, and for ſecuring and ſtrengthning the Church againſt the endeavours of the Papiſts, whether by force or fraud, to ſubvert or undermine it. His view was unqueſtionably truly pious, though perhaps his ſcheme might not be very practicable, of which he left the determination to the proper judges, fully ſatisfied in his own mind, with having diſcharged what he took to be his duty, and not in the leaſt affected with the warm things that were ſaid by his adverſaries, who treated his performance as if it had been intended to overturn what he ſeemed to maintain, by giving up the cauſe of the Church to thoſe who differed from her, without reaſon. There were however no grounds at all for theſe ſuſpicions, ſince our Right Reverend Author had, upon all occaſions ſhewn an exact and punctual conformity to her Canons, and even in this work, profeſſes himſelf fully ſatisfied with her doctrine and diſcipline, though he could not prevail upon himſelf, to be abſolutely unconcerned for thoſe who did not ſee the reaſons for being ſatisfied ſo clearly as he did. Therefore it is exceedingly unjuſt, to caſt any aſperſions upon this Prelate, for publiſhing in the ſincerity of his heart, what his real ſentiments were, about things indifferent, more eſpecially as it never was pretended, that he had any other view, than that of promoting a real Union, and unfeigned harmony amongſt Proteſtants, and this at a time, when he apprehended no other method could be effectually taken for their preſervation; ſince the meaſure of tolerating, which has been ſince found very practicable, was held to be not ſo at that time. Thus much ſeemed to be neceſſary in reſpect to a work, which however ſmall in its bulk was then, and will be ever, eſteemed of very great importance, in regard to its matter, and which, conſidering the ſtation and and circumſtances of its author, was by judicious perſons in thoſe times allowed to be the higheſt mark of candour and unaffected piety that could be given, as well as of the moſt diſintereſted temper and unfeigned humility, virtues highly capable of adorning the epiſcopal character, and of recommending it to the veneration of all, who have a real attachment to the Doctrines of the Reformation, as they are profeſſed and taught by the Church of England, as it is by law eſtabliſhed.

(y) Legacy to his Diocefs, London 1679, 4*to*.

Biſhops became liable, for the ſake of defending the right of their Sees, was very troubleſome to him, and he was very much diſſatisfied with being obliged to attend the ſervice of Parliament, when ſcarcely any thing fit for a Biſhop to meddle with was treated there. His ſcruples taking air, as well as his ſettled reſolution of reſigning, the Papiſts and Nonconformiſts made advantage of it to ſerve their reſpective purpoſes, and this gave him infinite diſquiet; more eſpecially when he found that ſome churchmen alſo reflected deeply upon him for inclining to retire from his Biſhopric in ſo dangerous a ſeaſon, and when his zeal and labours might be as uſeful, as ſuch a deſerting of his charge might give ſcandal to its Members, and advantage to its enemies. The anſwer given by Dr. Stillingfleet ſatisfied his conſcience, and diſpoſed him to continue his labours with the ſame earneſtneſs and vigour. He ſaw that various attempts were making to the prejudice of the Church from different quarters, which ſerved only to inſpire him with ſtronger ſentiments of the neceſſity there was, that ſuch as had her cauſe at heart, and were more immediately called upon to eſpouſe it, ſhould do it with chearfulneſs and diligence, and ſhew at once their courage and conſtancy by defending it in their words and writings, and adorning it by their lives. Full of theſe laudable and generous notions he reſumed his former ſpirit, and let no opportunity ſlip of ſignalizing his attention to and affection for the Proteſtant cauſe. He contented himſelf, therefore, with doing all the good that was in his power, within that ſphere of action which providence had allotted to him, and was more eſpecially attentive to the preſervation of his Dioceſe from the attempts of Popiſh Miſſionaries, in order to which he was very aſſiduous in the pulpit, where with great clearneſs he diſcovered, and with much ſolidity refuted, the errors of that religion; but as he grew in years, and yet had no proſpect of leſs danger from that quarter in ſucceeding times, he thought fit to leave theſe diſcourſes which had been delivered to a numerous audience, and received with very uncommon marks of ſatisfaction and attention, under a very endearing title to thoſe for whoſe uſe they had been compoſed (y) [E]. He continued the ſame pious care upon particular occaſions, and never failed to ſupply proper antidotes to every kind of ſpiritual poiſons that were ſpread by the different enemies of the Proteſtant Religion. In the reign of King James, when the famous Declaration that was ordered to be read in Churches was tranſmitted to him, he thought fit to digeſt in writing his thoughts upon that ſubject, in which as he clearly expreſſed his willingneſs to give a ſanction to whatever might tend to the indulgence of tender conſciences; ſo he ſhewed with equal plainneſs the danger the Church of England would be in, in caſe of the repeal which was then endeavoured of the penal laws and of the teſt. This, which was the laſt employment of his pen, was ſhewn by a certain courtier to King James, who directed that ſo much of the diſcourſe as concerned the reading of the Declaration ſhould be publiſhed to the world, but ordered the reſt to be ſuppreſſed, as being directly contrary to the views with which that Declaration had been ſet forth (z). At length, full of years and in the higheſt reputation, this venerable Prelate ended his days in his Palace at Hereford, on the 18th of May, 1691 (a), and as he lived ſo he died, a true member and a zealous defender of the Proteſtant Church, as appears from a very remarkable clauſe in the preamble to his will (b) [F]. He had for ſome years before his death paid

(y) Legacy to his Dioceſe, London, 1679, 4*to*.

(z) Athen. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 868.

(a) Godwin, de Præſul. p. 497.

(b) See that clauſe in the note.

[E] For whoſe uſe they had been compoſed. We ſhall here give the reader the title of the ſecond edition of this work, that we may ſpeak of it, and of the Supplement his Lordſhip thought fit to make at once. It runs thus:

IV. The Legacy of the Right Reverend Father in God, Herbert, Lord Biſhop of Hereford, to his Dioceſe; or a ſhort determination of all controverſies we have with the Papiſts by GOD's holy word. The ſecond impreſſion corrected, with additions, by the Author. Lond. 1679. 4*to*. This piece contains an epiſtle to all the people within his Dioceſe, eſpecially thoſe of the city of Hereford; then comes the Preface, afterwards, three Sermons upon this text, JOHN V. 39, Seek ye the Scriptures, for in them ye think ye have eternal life. Laſtly, a ſupplement to the preceding ſermons, together with a tract concerning the holy Sacrament of the Lord's-Supper promiſed in the Preface. If we take the whole together, we may certainly pronounce it as plain, as clear, and as convincing a defence of the Proteſtant religion, as is to be met with in our own, or any other language. There is one paſſage in the Preface, that is very remarkable; which for that reaſon we will inſert, as it tends to ſhew how difficult a thing it is to decide, who was the author of a certain excellent treatiſe, or of the other treatiſes that were ſaid to be written by the ſame author. The paſſage referred to is as follows: 'I have this one thing more only to 'trouble the reader with. The firſt of my three ſermons on that text, Search the ſcriptures, was 'preached in September 1677, and in June 1678 'comes out a little Book to the ſame intent with that 'ſermon, and expreſſing ſeveral things in it, and in 'the very ſame manner, by what means I know not; 'but this I and many others know, that my ſermon 'was preached almoſt a year before that book came 'forth, and therefore I could not have them from that 'author, called the ſame author that wrote The whole 'Duty of Man, who it ſeems muſt countenance books 'to the world's end. However I thought it fit to 'print that ſermon with the other two, firſt becauſe 'it contains ſeveral things not in that book; and 'ſecondly, the other two would be very defective 'without it.'

V. A ſecond call to a farther humiliation, being a Sermon preached at the Cathedral Church in Hereford, the 24th of November. Lond. 1678. 4*to*.

VI. A Letter written to a friend concerning Popiſh Idolatry, Lond. 1679. 4*to*.

VII. Some Animadverſions on a book entitled, the Theory of the Earth, Lond. 1685. 8*vo*.

VIII. A ſhort diſcourſe concerning the reading his Majeſty's late Declaration in Churches. Lond. 1688. 4*to*.

[F] As appears from a very remarkable clauſe, in the preamble to his Will.] The paſſage referred to in the text, is conceived in the following terms (18). 'I do 'in all humble manner moſt heartily thank God, that 'he hath been moſt graciouſly pleaſed, by the light of 'his moſt holy Goſpel, to recall me from the darkneſs 'of Popiſh Errors and groſs ſuperſtitions, into which 'I was ſeduced in my younger days, and to ſettle me 'again in the true antient Catholic and Apoſtolic 'Faith profeſſed by our Church of England, in which 'I was paid the ſum of fourteen pounds a year by way of augmentation to the ſmall living of Yarpoll, and the ſum of twelve pounds by way of addition to the living of his own pariſh Church at Croft, both which charities were ſettled and ſecured by his will, and lands aſſigned for the payment of them (c). He likewiſe gave the remainder of the produce of twelve hundred pounds, after theſe augmentations were deducted, to the relief of indigent perſons, and other ſuch purpoſes (d). He was buried in his Cathedral Church, where there remains a ſhort and modeſt memorial of him (e) [G]. He ſat almoſt thirty years in the Biſhopric of Hereford, and in that ſpace of time eſtabliſhed thoroughly the regulations that he had very wiſely contrived, as well for the particular benefit of the Chapter, as the general advantage of his Dioceſe; the people of which regarded him with the utmoſt veneration, and the Clergy, as they had a particular relation to him, ſo in the latter part of his time more eſpecially, they loved and reſpected him for that diligence and care with which he promoted their welfare, by preſerving all the dignities of his Church to the Clergy beneficed in his Dioceſe, the conſequences of which at firſt ſome of them did not ſo fully comprehend (f). He married the daughter of his predeceſſor in the Deanery, Dr. Jonathan Brown, as we before obſerved, and by her had his only ſon Herbert, who was educated as a Commoner in Magdalen-college in Oxford, and becoming a perſon of great worth and honour, a true patriot, and a warm friend of the Proteſtant Religion, he was by his Majeſty King Charles the IId. created a Baronet November 18th, 1671, and was twice Knight of the Shire in the reign of King William (g). He married Elizabeth, daughter of Thomas Archer of Umberſlade in the county of Warwick, Eſq; (h) by whom he had Sir Archer Croft, the ſecond Baronet, and ſeveral other children.

(18) Ath. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 868.

(c) Athen. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 868.

(d) Willis's Survey of Cathedrals. vol. ii. p. 529.

(e) See this inſcription in the note.

(f) Willis's Survey of Cathedr. vol. ii. p. 529. Engliſh Baronetage, vol. iv. p. 541.

(g) Dugdale's Liſt of Baronets, p. 113. Parliamentary Regiſt. p. 1. 11.

(h) Engliſh Baronetage, vol. iv. p. 542.

'I was born and baptized, and in which I joyfully die, 'with full aſſurance, by the merits of my moſt bleſſed 'Saviour Jeſus, to enjoy eternal happineſs.'

[G] Where there remains a ſhort and modeſt memorial of him.] The inſcription upon his grave-ſtone, which is within the Communion rails, runs thus (19). Depoſitum Herberti Croft de Croft Epiſcopi Herefordenſis obiit 18 die Maii A. D. 1691 ætatis ſuæ 88, in vita conjuncti; that is, Here are depoſited the remains of Herbert Croft, of Croft, Biſhop of Hereford, who died May 18th, 1691, in the 88th year of his age, in life united. The laſt words allude to his lying next Dean Benſon, at the bottom of whoſe grave-ſtone is this, In morte non diviſi, i. e. in death not divided: The two grave-ſtones having hands engraven on them, conjoined, reaching from one to the other, to ſignify the laſting and uninterrupted friendſhip, which had ſubſiſted between thoſe truly pious and venerable perſons in their life-times. Dr. Croft was ſucceeded in his Biſhopric by Dr. Gilbert Ironſide. C.

(19) Willis's Survey of Cathedr. vol. ii. p. 529.

 [There ſeems to have been ſome ſlight tincture of Enthuſiaſm in what Biſhop Croft ſays, in note [D], concerning the influence of his prayers in obtaining extraordinary aid from the Divine goodneſs, with regard to what he wrote in his "Naked Truth." It was, however, an enthuſiaſm of the moſt generous and gentle kind, ſince it only led him to plead the cauſe of Chriſtian Union, Forbearance, and Humanity. Our author hath added to the inſtances of thoſe who have obtained great celebrity by a ſingle compoſition; for his other writings, whatever may be their value, have been very little noticed by the world. Few productions were more read, or excited more attention for a time than the "Naked Truth." Our ingenious Predeceſſor, Dr. Campbell, repreſents it as ſtill being eſteemed a work of very great importance; but this is no longer the caſe. It is now, I believe, known only to the few perſons who love to ſearch after curious Tracts. Notwithſtanding the merit of the performance, ſuch is the change in the circumſtances, manners, and controverſies of the times, that the peruſal of it is not at preſent deemed a matter of peculiar moment. It ought to be remembered, with reſpect to our worthy Prelate, that it was not from any predilection for the principles or perſons of the Nonconformiſts, that he ſo zealouſly pleaded their cauſe. It is related in Woddrow's Hiſtory, that Dr. Croft, in a Sermon before the King, which was preached in 1660, inveighed warmly againſt the Preſbyterians, and repreſented God as having defeated his Majeſty at Worceſter, and purſued him with a nine years exile, on account of his having taken them into his Counſels (20). If this be a fact, it is evident that age and reflection added greatly to the improvement of the Biſhop's Chriſtian temper.

(20) From the information of a Correſpondent.

It is rather ſurprizing that Dr. Gilbert Burnet ſhould be one of the writers againſt the "Naked Truth." Perhaps that eminent Divine was not then ſo enlarged in his ſentiments as he afterwards became.

The Rev. Herbert Croft, Author of the Life of Dr. Young, in Johnſon's Lives of the Poets, and who is engaged in the arduous deſign of forming the moſt extenſive and important Dictionary of the Engliſh language which hath ever yet been attempted, is a deſcendant of our Prelate.] K.

CROMWELL, or CRUMWELL (THOMAS), an eminent Stateſman in the ſixteenth century, and created by King Henry VIII. Earl of Eſſex, was the ſon of —— Cromwell, a black-ſmith, at Putney near London, and in his latter days a brewer; after whoſe deceaſe, his mother was married to a Sheerman in London (a). His honeſt parents gave him a good and ſtrong conſtitution; which, accompanied with excellent endowments of mind, and an uncommon induſtry, raiſed him to that high pitch of honour to which he afterwards arrived. What education he had, was in a private School (b): and all the learning he attained to, was, (according to the ſtandard of thoſe times,) only reading, and writing, and a little Latin. When he grew up, having a very great inclination for travelling, he went into foreign countries; though at whoſe expence is not known; and, by that means, he had an opportunity of ſeeing the world, of gaining experience, and of learning ſeveral languages, which proved of great ſervice to him afterwards. Coming to Antwerp, where was then a very conſiderable Engliſh Factory, he was by them retained to be their Clerk, or Secretary. But that office being too great a confinement to his roving and aſpiring mind, he embraced an opportunity, that offered, in 1510 (c), of taking a journey to Rome [A]. Whilſt he remained in Italy, he ſerved for ſome time as a Soldier under the Duke of Bourbon, and was at the ſacking of Rome: and at Bologna, he aſſiſted John Ruſſel, Eſq; afterwards Earl of Bedford, in making his eſcape, when he had like to be betrayed into the hands of the French; being ſecretly in thoſe parts about our King's affairs (d). An inſtance we have, moreover, at this time, of Cromwell's great induſtry, and of his improving every moment; namely, that, in his journey to and from Rome, he learned by heart the New Teſtament, of Eraſmus's tranſlation (e). After his return from his travels, he was taken into the family and ſervice of the famous Cardinal Wolſey; who obſerving his great parts and diligence, made him his Solicitor, and often employed him in buſineſs of great importance (f). Among other things, he had the chief hand, in the foundation of the two Colleges begun at Oxford and Ipſwich by that magnificent Prelate, and in ſuppreſſing, in 1525, ſmall Monaſteries for the endowment of them (g). Upon his maſter, the Cardinal's diſgrace, in 1529, he uſed his utmoſt endeavours and intereſt to have him reſtored to the King's favour (h): And when Articles of High-treaſon againſt him were ſent down to the Houſe of Commons, of which Cromwell was then a Member, he defended his maſter with ſo much wit and eloquence, that no treaſon could be laid to his charge: which honeſt beginning procured Cromwell great reputation, and made his parts and abilities to be much taken notice of (i). After the Cardinal's houſhold came to be diſſolved, Cromwell was taken into the King's ſervice, upon the recommendation of Sir Chriſtopher Hales, afterwards Maſter of the Rolls, and Sir John Ruſſel, Knt. abovementioned; as the fitteſt perſon to manage the diſputes the King then had with the Pope: though ſome endeavoured to hinder his promotion, and to prejudice his Majeſty againſt him, on account of his rude behaviour in defacing the ſmall Monaſteries that were diſſolved for endowing Wolſey's Colleges. But he diſcovering to the King ſome particulars that were very acceptable to him [B], he took him into the higheſt degree of favour (k). Soon after, he was ſent to the Convocation, then ſitting, to acquaint the Clergy, that they were all fallen into a præmunire (l) [C]. In 1531 he was knighted; made Maſter of the King's Jewel-houſe, with a ſalary of fifty pounds per annum; and conſtituted a Privy-Counſellor (m). The next year, he was made Clerk of the Hanaper, an office of good profit and repute in Chancery; and, before the end of the ſame year, Chancellor of the Exchequer (n). As alſo, in 1534, Principal Secretary of State; and Maſter of the Rolls (o). About the ſame time, he was choſen Chancellor of the Univerſity of Cambridge; ſoon after which followed a general viſitation of that Univerſity; whereupon the ſeveral Colleges delivered up their Charters, and other inſtruments, to Sir Thomas Cromwell (p). The year before, he aſſeſſed the fines laid upon thoſe, who having forty pounds per ann. eſtate, refuſed to take the Order of Knighthood (q). In 1535 he was appointed Viſitor-general of the Monaſteries throughout England, in order for their ſuppreſſion (r): and in that office, is accuſed of having (d) Fox, ubi ſupra, p. 1179.

(a) J. Fox's Acts and Monuments, &c. edit. 1583, p. 1177; and Stow's Annales, edit. 1631, p. 580.

(b) D. Lloyd's State Worthies, edit. 1668, p. 58.

(c) Fox, ubi ſupra, p. 1178.

(e) Ibid. p. 1178, 1179.

(f) Ibid. p. 1179; and Stow's Annales, ubi ſupra.

(g) Dugdale's Baronage, vol. ii. p. 370; and Fox, as above, p. 1179; and alſo Stow, p. 553. After the Cardinal's fall, he had the care of the New College, now Chriſt-Ch. Oxon. Stow, ibid. Strype's Eccleſ. Memor. vol. i. p. 117.

(h) Life and Reign of King Henry VIII. by Edw. Lord Herbert, in Compl. Hiſt. of England, edit. 1706, vol. ii. p. 125.

(i) Herbert, as above, p. 129; and Fuller's Hiſt. edit. 1655, B. v. p. (177).

(k) Fox, as above, p. 1179.

(l) Ibid. See alſo Dr. Burnet's Hiſt. of the Reformation, 2d edit. P. i. p. 106—112.

(m) Pat. 23 Hen. VIII. p. 2. See Dugdale, vol. ii. p. 370.

(n) Pat. 24 Hen. VIII. p. 1, 2.

(o) Pat. 26 Hen. VIII. p. 2.

(p) Fuller's Hiſt. of the Univ. of Cambr. edit. 1655, p. 108, &c.

(q) Holinſhed's Chron. edit. 1587, vol. ii. p. 929.

(r) Herbert, as above, p. 180.

[A] He embraced an opportunity that offered —— of taking a journey to Rome.] That opportunity was as follows. There being at that time a famous Gild of our Lady in the Church of St. Botulph's at Boſton in Lincolnſhire, to which ſeveral Popes had granted very large Indulgences, or Pardons, which were then highly valued, and held in the utmoſt veneration, and very much reſorted to; the brethren and ſiſters of that Gild were very deſirous of having thoſe Indulgences renewed, and confirmed, by the then Pope Julius II. They diſpatched therefore two perſons to Rome with a conſiderable ſum of money, to obtain the deſired confirmation: which perſons taking Antwerp in their way, became acquainted there with Thomas Cromwell: and obſerving that he was as perfectly qualified for procuring eaſily what they wanted from the Court of Rome, as they were themſelves unqualified for it, they perſuaded him to go along with them. Accordingly he was of very great ſervice to them. For, being informed, that Pope Julius was a great lover of delicacies, and dainty diſhes, he preſented him with fine diſhes of Jelly, made after the Engliſh faſhion, then unknown at Rome; wherewith the Pope was ſo delighted, that he very readily granted Cromwell and his companions what they came about. See this whole matter related at full length, in J. Fox's Acts and Monuments (1).

(1) Edit. 1583, p. 1178.

[B] But he diſcovering to the King ſome particulars that were very acceptable to him.] He acquainted the King, that his princely authority was abuſed within his own realm, by the Pope and his Clergy, who being ſworn to him, were afterwards diſpenſed from the ſame, and ſworn a-new unto the Pope, ſo that he was but a half-King, and they but half his ſubjects in his own land; which, ſaid he, was derogatory to his crown, and utterly prejudicial to the common Laws of his Realm: Declaring thereupon, how his Majeſty might accumulate to himſelf great riches, nay as much as all the Clergy in his Realm were worth, if he pleaſed to take the occaſion now offered. The King giving ear to this, and liking right-well his advice, aſked, if he could avouch that which he ſpake. All this he could (he ſaid) avouch to be certain: And thereupon ſhewed the King the Oath which the Biſhops took to the Pope at their conſecration; wherein they ſwore 'To help, retain, and defend againſt all 'men, the Popedom of Rome, the rules of the holy 'Fathers, and the regalities of St. Peter, &c (2).'

(2) J. Fox, Acts and Monuments, edit. 1583, p. 1179, 1053.

[C] He was ſent to the Convocation then ſitting, to acquaint the Clergy, that they were all fallen into a præmunire.] When he diſcovered to the King what is mentioned in the laſt note, his Majeſty taking his ring, or ſignet, off his finger, ſent Cromwell with it to the Convocation: who placing himſelf among the Biſhops, began to declare to them the authority of a King, and the office of ſubjects, and eſpecially the obedience of Biſhops and Churchmen under public Laws; which Laws notwithſtanding they had all tranſgreſſed and highly offended in derogation of the King's royal eſtate, falling in the Law of Præmunire: in that, they had not only conſented to the power Legatine of Cardinal Wolſey, but alſo becauſe they had all ſworn to the Pope, contrary to the fealty of their ſovereign Lord the King, and therefore had forfeited to the King all their goods, chattles, lands, poſſeſſions, and whatever livings they had. The Biſhops hearing this, were not a little amazed, and firſt began to excuſe and deny the fact. But after Cromwell had ſhewed them the very copy of the Oath they took to the Pope at their conſecration, the matter was ſo plain, they could not deny it. And to be quit of that Præmunire by Act of Parliament, the two Provinces of Canterbury and York were forced to make the King a preſent of 118,840 pounds (3).

(3) Ib. p. 1179.

ing

ing committed ſome illegal acts of violence [D]. However, having behaved in that affair, generally to the ſatisfaction of the King and his Courtiers, he was, on the 2d of July 1536, conſtituted Lord Keeper of the Privy-Seal, when he reſigned his Maſterſhip of the Rolls (s). On the 9th of the ſame month he was advanced to the dignity of a Baron of this Realm, by the title of Lord Cromwell of Okeham in Rutlandſhire; and, ſix days after, took his place in the Houſe of Lords (t). The Pope's Supremacy being now aboliſhed in England, the Lord Cromwell was made, on the 18th of July, Vicar-general, and Vicegerent, over all the Spirituality, under the King [E], who was declared ſupreme Head of the Church (u). In that quality, his Lordſhip ſat in the Convocation holden this year, above the Archbiſhops, as the King's repreſentative (w). Being inveſted with ſuch extenſive Power, he made uſe of it for deſtroying Popery as far as he poſſibly could, and for promoting a Reformation in this Kingdom. For that purpoſe, he cauſed certain Articles to be ſet forth and enjoyned by the King's Authority (x), differing in many eſſential points from the eſtabliſhed ſyſtem of the Roman-Catholic Religion [F]. Next, in September this ſame year, he put out ſome Injunctions to all Deans, Parſons, Vicars, and Curates, wherein they were ordered, to preach up the King's Supremacy; not to lay out their rhetoric in extolling Images, Relicks, Miracles, or Pilgrimages, but rather to exhort their people to ſerve God, and make proviſion for their families: to put parents and other directors of youth in mind, to teach their children the Lord's-prayer, the Creed, and the Ten Commandments in their mother-tongue: to provide a Bible in Latin and Engliſh, to be laid in the Churches, for every one to read at their pleaſure; and the like (y). He likewiſe encouraged the tranſlation of the Bible into Engliſh [G]; and, when it was finiſhed, injoined, that

(s) Pat. 28 Hen. VIII. p. 1. Stow's Annales, p. 573.

(t) Ibid. and Dugdale's Baron. vol. ii. p. 371.

(u) Stow, ubi ſupra. The Lord Cromwell had a particular ſeal for this his new office. N. Sanders de Schiſmate Anglicano, edit. Colon. Agrippin. 1610, 8*vo*. p. 151.

(w) See Burnet's Hiſtory of the Reformat. P. i. 2d edit. p. 213; and Collier's Eccleſiaſt. Hiſtory, vol. ii. edit. 1714, p. 104.

(x) Idem, p. 122, &c. and Fuller's Church Hiſtory, Book v. p. 213, &c.

(y) Fox, p. 1094. Collier, as above, p. 129, 130; and Lord Herbert, as above, p. 204.

[D] Is accuſed of having committed ſome illegal acts of violence.] For, he and his under-agents are charged with having forced ſeveral Abbies by threats and other inſtances of violence into a ſurrender: ſome indeed they allured thereunto, by promiſes, and large penſions: but moſt they frightened into a compliance, by encouraging the Monks, not only to accuſe their Governors of the moſt horrid and unnatural crimes, but alſo to inform againſt each other. In particular, we are told, that the Commiſſioners threatened the Canons of Leiceſter, 'That they would charge them with adultery 'and buggery, unleſs they would ſubmit.' And Dr. London, one of the viſitors, told the Nuns of Godſtow, 'That becauſe he found them obſtinate, he would 'diſſolve the Houſe by virtue of the King's Com-'miſſion, in ſpite of their teeth.' The Monks of the Charter-houſe near London, being refractory, were committed to Newgate, where, with hard and barbarous uſage, five of them died, and five more lay at the point of death, as the Commiſſioners ſignified (4). ——— We are farther informed, that there were ſome agents employed to practiſe on the chaſtity of the Nuns, and afterwards to accuſe them for being guilty of incontinence (5). Several Monaſteries granted Thomas Cromwell large Penſions to ſave them from ruin; but all in vain (6).

(4) Sir W. Dugdale's Antiquit. of Warwickſhire, vol. ii. edit. 1730, p. 1112, &c.

(5) Fuller's Ch. Hiſt. B. vi. p. 318, edit. 1655.

(6) See Collier's Eccl. Hiſt. vol. ii. p. 155, 157, &c.

[E] The Lord Cromwell was made——Vicar-general, and Vicegerent over all the Spirituality under the King.] What the deſign and extent of this Commiſſion was, we beſt learn from the following Clauſe of the Act for regulating Precedency—— namely, That 'for the good exerciſe of the ſaid moſt Royal Dignity 'and Office (the Supremacy) his Highneſs hath made 'Thomas Lord Cromwell and Lord Privy-Seal, his 'Vicegerent for a good and due miniſtration of Juſtice, 'to be had in all Cauſes and Caſes touching the 'Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction, and for the godly re-'formation and redreſs of all Hereſies and abuſes in the 'ſaid Church (7).'———Or, as it it elſewhere expreſſed to the ſame purpoſe ——— ad exercendum, expediendum, & exerendum omnem & omnimodam Juriſdictionem, Auctoritatem, ſive Poteſtatem Eccleſiaſticam, quæ nobis tanquam Supremo Capiti Eccleſiæ Anglicanæ competit (8).

(7) Statut. 31 Hen. VIII. c. 10.

(8) King Henry VIIIth's Commiſſion in allowance of the Deputation made by Cromwell. Collier's Eccleſ. Hiſt. vol. ii. Collect. of Records, No. XXX. p. 20.

[F] Differing in many eſſential points from the eſtabliſhed ſyſtem of the Roman-Catholic Religion.] For, inſtead of the ſeven Sacraments commonly received in the Church of Rome, theſe Articles mention only three; namely, the Sacrament of Baptiſm, the Sacrament of Penance, and the Sacrament of the Altar. Then, they enjoin all Biſhops and Preachers, to teach the people committed to their charge, to believe and defend all thoſe things to be true which are comprehended in the whole body and canon of the Bible; and in the three Creeds, that of the Apoſtles, the Nicene, and the Athanaſian; without the leaſt mention of Tradition. And, to prevent ſuperſtition and idolatry, that they ſhould reſtrain the people, from 'cenſing, kneeling to, and worſhipping Images; and teach them to do it only to God, and in his honour, though it be done before Images. Finally, Purgatory is therein declared uncertain by Scripture (9).

(9) See Fuller, Burnet, and Collier, as quoted above.

[G] He likewiſe encouraged the tranſlation of the Bible into Engliſh.] As it will be no ſmall ſatisfaction to the Reader, to know, what tranſlation of the Bible is hereby meant, we ſhall endeavour to give an exact account of it; and likewiſe of ſuch tranſlations as were made about this time. The firſt tranſlation of any part of the Holy Scriptures into Engliſh, that was committed to the preſs, was, The New Teſtament, tranſlated from the Greek, by William Tyndale, with the aſſiſtance of John Fry and William Roye, and printed firſt in 1526, in octavo. Tyndale publiſhed afterwards, in 1530, a tranſlation of the Five Books of Moſes; and of Jonas, in 1531, in octavo—(10). An Engliſh tranſlation of the Pſalter, done from the Latin of Martin Bucer, was alſo publiſhed at Argentine in 1530, by Francis Foye, 8*vo*. And the ſame book, together with Jeremiah, and the Song of Moſes, were likewiſe publiſhed in 1534, 12*mo*, by George Joye, ſometime Fellow of Peterhouſe in Cambridge. But the firſt time the whole Bible appeared in Engliſh, was in the year 1535, fol. The tranſlator and publiſher was Miles Coverdale, afterwards Biſhop of Exeter, who reviſed Tyndale's verſion, compared it with the originals, and ſupplied what had been left untranſlated by Tyndale. It was printed at Zurich, and dedicated by Coverdale to King Henry VIII. And this was the Bible, which, by Cromwell's injunctions of September 1536, was ordered to be laid in Churches. ——— The next year, 1537, whether it was that Archbiſhop Cranmer had a mind to have Tyndale's Prologues and Notes reprinted, which had been left out in Coverdale's edition, or that the Printers thought ſuch an edition would ſell well, the Bible was printed at Paris in folio, with this title, 'The Byble, which is all the Holy 'Scripture, in which are contayned the Olde and 'Newe Teſtament, truelye and purelye tranſlated into 'Engliſh. By Thomas Matthewe.' This name of Matthewe is fictitious, the real author being John Rogers. In this Edition, from Geneſis to the end of the Chronicles is Tyndale's tranſlation: thence to the end of the Apocrypha is Coverdale's; except the book of Jonas, which is Tyndale's: as is alſo the whole New Teſtament. In 1538, a reſolution was taken to reviſe this edition of Matthewe's, and to print it again without the Prologues or Annotations, at which great offence was pretended to be taken, as containing matters heretical, and very ſcandalous and defamatory. For this purpoſe Grafton and Whitchurch

(10) Hall ſays he tranſlated alſo, Joſhua, Judicum, Ruth, the books of Kings, the books of Paralipomenon, and Nehemiah, or the firſt of Eſdras; but, if he tranſlated theſe, it does not appear they were ever printed. Hall's Chronicle, in Henry VIII. fol. 227.

that one, of the largeſt volume, ſhould be provided for every pariſh-church, at the joint charge of the Parſon and Pariſhioners (z). Theſe ſeveral alterations, made by Cromwell's contrivance in the eſtabliſhed Religion of thoſe times; together with the diſſolution of the Monaſteries; and, (notwithſtanding the immenſe riches gotten from thence,) his demanding at the ſame time for the King Subſidies, both from the Clergy and Laity, occaſioned very great murmurs againſt him (a). No wonder, therefore, that the Rebels of Yorkſhire demanded, among other things, that the Lord Crumwell ſhould be brought to 'condigne ponyſment, as one of the ſubverters of the gud lawes of the Realm (b).' However, ſo far was the popular clamour from prejudicing, that it rather ſerved to eſtabliſh him in the King's eſteem. For, in the year 1537, his Majeſty conſtituted him Chief Juſtice itinerant of all the Foreſts beyond Trent (c): and on the 26th of Auguſt, the ſame year, he was elected Knight of the Garter (d); as alſo Dean of the Cathedral Church of Wells (e). The year following, he obtained a grant of the Caſtle and Lordſhip of Okeham in the county of Rutland; and was alſo made Conſtable of Careſbrook-caſtle in the Iſle of Wight (f). In September, he put forth new Injunctions, directed to all Biſhops and Curates (g), wherein he ordered, that a Bible of the largeſt volume in Engliſh, ſhould be ſet up in ſome convenient place in every Church, where the pariſhioners might moſt commodiouſly reſort to read the ſame: That the Clergy ſhould, every Sunday and holiday, openly and plainly recite to their pariſhioners, twice or thrice together, one article of the Lord's Prayer, or Creed, in Engliſh, that they might learn the ſame by heart: That they ſhould make, or cauſe to be made, in their Churches, one Sermon every quarter of a year at leaſt, wherein they ſhould purely and ſincerely declare the very Goſpel of Chriſt, and exhort their hearers to the works of charity, mercy, and faith; not to pilgrimages, kiſſing or licking of Images, &c: That they ſhould forthwith take down all Images, to which pilgrimages or offerings were wont to be made: That in all ſuch Benefices whereupon they were not themſelves reſident, they ſhould appoint able Curates: That they, and every Parſon, Vicar, or Curate, ſhould for every Church keep one book of Regiſter, wherein they ſhould write the day and year of every Wedding, Chriſtening, and Burying, within their Pariſh; and therein ſet every perſon's name that ſhall be ſo wedded, chriſtened, or buried, &c [H]. Having been thus highly inſtrumental in promoting a Reformation, and in pulling down, for the three years paſt, the Monaſteries in this Kingdom; he was amply rewarded by the King, in 1539, with many noble Manors and large Eſtates [I] that had belonged to thoſe diſſolved Houſes (h). On the 17th of April, the ſame year, he was advanced to the dignity of Earl of Eſſex (i); and ſoon after conſtituted Lord

(z) Collier, Hiſt. p. 150.

(a) Lord Herbert, P. 205.

(b) Speed's Chr. edit. 1614, p. 775.

(c) Pat. 29 Hen. VIII. p. 1.

(d) Stow's Annales, p. 575.

(e) Whart. Angl. Sacra, edit. 1691, vol. i. p. 590; and Collier's Eccl. Hiſt. vol. ii. p. 177.

(f) Pat. 30 Hen. VIII. p. 2.

(g) Fox, as above, p. 1096. Collier's Eccleſ. Hiſt. vol. ii. p. 150.

(h) Dugdale, vol. ii. p. 371.

(i) Ibid. p. 372.

church were employed, who, becauſe there were at that time in France better Printers and Paper than could be had here in England, procured the King's Letters to the French King for liberty to print it at Paris. Accordingly they had the Royal Licence for ſo doing, and had almoſt finiſhed their deſign, when by an order of the Inquiſition dated December 17, 1538, the Printers were forbidden under canonical pains to print the ſaid Engliſh Bible, and being carried before the Inquiſition, were charged with hereſy. The Engliſh who were there to correct the preſs, and take care of the impreſſion, were all forced to fly, and the impreſſion, conſiſting of two thouſand five hundred books, was ſeized and confiſcated. But by the encouragement of the Lord Cromwell, ſome of the Engliſh returned to Paris, and got the preſſes, letters, and printing ſervants, and brought them over to London, where they reſumed the work; which was finiſhed and publiſhed in 1539, with this title, 'The 'Byble in Englyſhe, that is to ſay the content of all 'the holy Scripture, bothe of the olde and newe Teſtament, truly tranſlated after the veryte of the 'Hebrue and Greke textes by the dylygent ſtudye of 'dyverſe excellent learned men, expert in the forſayde 'tonges.' Printed by Richard Grafton and Edward Whitchurch. fol.— This was the Bible of the largeſt Volume, which was ordered to be ſet up in every Church. The Pſalms in our Liturgy, are of this tranſlation, with ſome few alterations (11).

(11) This account is taken from Mr. J. Lewis's Hiſt. of the Engliſh tranſlations of the Bible, prefixed to his edit. of J. Wickliff's tranſlation of the New Teſtament, fol. Lond. 1731, p. 15—31.

[H] Every perſon's name that ſhall be ſo wedded, chriſtened, or buried.] There are among them two other Injunctions, that deſerve to be taken notice of. One is, 'Item, yee ſhall diſcourage no man, prively 'nor apertly, from the reading or hearing of the 'Bible, but ſhal expreſly provoke, ſtirre, and exhort 'every perſon to reade the ſame, as that which is the 'very lively word of God, that every Chriſten perſon 'is bounden to embrace, beleeve, and follow, if he 'looke to be ſaved.'—The other is as follows, 'Item, 'foraſmuch as by a lawe eſtabliſhed, every man is 'bound to pay his tithes, no man ſhall, by colour of 'duty omitted by their Curates, deteine their Tithes, 'and ſo redub one wrong with another, or be his owne 'judge, but ſhall truly pay the ſame as hath ben accuſtomed to their parſons and curates, without any 'reſtraint or diminution (12).'

(12) J. Fox, ps 1096, 1097.

[I] He was rewarded by the King, in 1539, with many noble Manors, and large Eſtates.] For, on the 10th of April, he obtained a grant from the King, in fee, of the diſſolved Monaſtery of St. Oſythes in Eſſex, with all the houſes, buildings, Church, and other appurtenances thereunto belonging: as alſo of the manors and Lordſhip of Chich St. Oſythes, Barnton, Coketwyke, Wigburgh, Erles-hall, Weſtwyke, Howyke, Lewyke, Wyerſhall alias Withſton-hall; Cannon, alias Can, hall; Abbots-hall, Coſt, or Coſted, hall; Mileend-hall, Broke-hall, and Birch-hall; with Horſey, and all and ſingular their members, parcel of the poſſeſſions of the ſame monaſtery of St. Oſythes. Likewiſe of the Manor or Lordſhip of Chalwedon in Eſſex, parcel of the poſſeſſions of the hoſpital of our Lady, without Biſhopſgate in London: as alſo of the Manors and Lordſhips of Tolleſbury, High-hall, Abbeſſe-hall, and Hockley, in the ſaid County of Eſſex, parcel of the poſſeſſions of the Monaſterey of Berkyng. And of the Manor of Gorewells in Toleſbury, parcel of the poſſeſſions of the Monaſtery of Bileigh near Maldon in Eſſex. Likewiſe of the Manors of Wileghe, Brykelſey, Picheſaye, Mondone, and Grynſtede in the ſame County, parcel of the poſſeſſions of the Monaſtery of St. John in Colcheſter. Alſo of the Manors of Dedham, and Langham in the ſame county, with the Manor and Lordſhip of Stratford in Suffolk. And alſo of the whole ſcite of the Grey Friers in Yarmouth in Norfolk, with all the houſes and buildings thereunto belonging; together with a multitude of other Lands, and advowſons of Churches, which did belong to ſome one or other of the then ſuppreſſed Religious Houſes (13).

(13) Pat. 31 Hen. VIII. p. 5. See Dugdale's Baron, vol. ii. p. 372.

High Chamberlain of England [K]. The ſame day he was created Earl of Eſſex, he procured Gregory his ſon to be made Baron Cromwell of Okeham (k). On the 12th of March 1540, he was put in commiſſion with others, to ſell the Abbey-Lands, at twenty years purchaſe (l): which was a thing he had adviſed the King to do, in order to ſtop the clamours of the people; to attach them to his intereſt; and to bring them to a liking of the diſſolution of the Monaſteries (m). Hitherto the Lord Cromwell had ſailed with a proſperous gale, and was arrived to a very high degree of Honour. But an unhappy precaution he took, to ſecure (as he imagined) his greatneſs, proved his ruin; and the higher he was raiſed, the more ſudden and dangerous was his fall. Obſerving that ſome of his moſt inveterate enemies, particularly Stephen Gardiner Biſhop of Wincheſter, began to be more in favour at Court than himſelf, he uſed his utmoſt endeavours to procure a marriage between King Henry and Anne of Cleves: for he expected a great ſupport from a Queen of his own making; and as her friends were all Lutherans, it tended very much, as he imagined, to bring down the Popiſh party at Court, and again to recover the ground, he and Cranmer had now loſt (n). But, ſee the ſhortneſs of human policy: this very thing wherein he placed his ſafety, was his certain deſtruction. For the King, who was very nice in love-affairs, not liking the Queen, he took an invincible averſion to Cromwell the great promoter of the marriage; and ſoon found an opportunity to ſacrifice him to his own reſentment, and to the malice and revenge of his enemies. Many circumſtances concurred to his ruin. He was odious to all the Nobility by reaſon of his low birth: hated particularly by Stephen Gardiner, and the Roman Catholicks, for having been ſo buſy in the diſſolution of the Abbies: the Reformers themſelves found he could not protect them from burning: and the nation in general was highly incenſed againſt him, for his having lately demanded and obtained (o) a ſubſidy of four ſhillings in the pound from the Clergy, and one Tenth and one Fifteenth from the Laity; notwithſtanding the immenſe ſums that had lately flowed into the Treaſury out of the Monaſteries. King Henry conſidering this, and having beſides divers Articles brought againſt him, reſolved to give him up, judging him no longer neceſſary. Therefore he gave way to all his enemies accuſations, which could not but be material; it being impoſſible, that any man who meddled ſo much in great and public affairs, ſhould not in ſeveral inſtances ſo miſtake, forget, and err, as to lay himſelf open to the law, when ſevere inquiſition was made againſt him. The King having gotten ſufficient proof againſt Cromwell, cauſed him to be arreſted at the Council table, by the Duke of Norfolk, on the 10th of June, when he leaſt ſuſpected it. However, he obeyed, and was committed to the Tower, though judging his ruin the more certain, becauſe the Duke was uncle to the Lady Catharine Howard, whom the King began now to be in love with (p). During his impriſonment he wrote a Letter to the King [L], to vindicate himſelf of the (k) Fuller's Ch. Hiſt. edit. 1655, B. v. p. 235. But Sir W. Dugdale ſays, he was not created a Baron till Dec. 18, 1540. Baronage, vol. ii. p. 374.

(l) Fœdera, Conventiones, &c. publiſhed by T. Rymer, vol. xiv. p. 653.

(m) See Burnet's Hiſt. of the Reformat. P. i. 2d edit. p. 222.

(n) Burnet, as above, p. 271.

(o) He extorted it from them, extorſit ab ordinibus, ſays Sanders, de Schiſmate Anglicano, as above, p. 183. He ſays in the ſame place, that it was one Tenth and four Fifteenths; but the Rolls of Parliament are more to be credited than ſuch a prejudiced writer.

(p) Lord Herbert, as above, p. 222, 223. Stow's Annales, p. 580. This laſt author ſays, he was arreſted the 9th of July. And Fox places it under the year 1541, p. 1189. But they are both miſtaken.

[K] He was advanced to the dignity of Earl of Eſſex, and ſoon after conſtituted Lord High-Chamberlain of England.] Henry Bourchier, the laſt Earl of Eſſex of that ſurname, broke his neck, March the 12th, 1539, by a fall from a young unruly horſe; leaving only one daughter: And the 19th of the ſame month, died John de Vere Earl of Oxford Lord Chamberlain (14). But Cromwell's aſpiring after, or even accepting of, theſe two great Honours, procured him a great deal of envy and ill-will. For there were ſeveral branches of the noble family of Bourchier then in being, who might think they had a right to the dignity of Earl of Eſſex. And, the office of Lord High-Chamberlain of England had been for many years hereditary in the ancient and honourable Family of the De Veres Earls of Oxford; ſo that the heirs of it could not but be highly incenſed againſt the Lord Cromwell for robbing them of what their Anceſtors had ſo long enjoyed.

(14) Stow's Annal, p. 579.

[L] During his impriſonment he wrote a Letter to the King.] Wherein he ſtrenuouſly vindicates himſelf of the Crimes laid to his charge, in the following words.———— 'Wher I have bene accuſyd to your 'Majeſtye of Treaſon. To that I ſay, I never in alle 'my lyfe thought wyllingly to do that thyng that 'myght or ſholde diſpleaſe your Majeſty; and much 'leſſ to do or ſay that thyng, which of itſelf is ſo 'high and abhominable offence; as God knowyth, 'who I doubt not ſhall reveale the trewthe to your 'Highnes. Myne accuſers your Grace knowyth, 'God forgive them: For, as I ever have had love to 'your honor, perſon, lyfe, proſperitye, helthe, 'welthe, joy, and comfort; and alſo your moſt dere 'and moſt entyerly belovyd ſone, the Prynce his 'Grace, and your proceedyngs; God ſo helpe me in 'this myne adverſitie, and conffound me yf ever I 'thought the contrary. What labours, paynes, and 'travailes I have taken, according to my moſt boun-'den deutye, God alſo knowyth. For, yf it were 'in my power, (as it is Godds) to make your Ma-'geſtye to live ever young, and proſperous, God 'knowyth I woolde. If it hadde bene, or were in 'my power to make yow ſo ryche, as ye myght en-'rych alle men, God helpe me, as I would do hit. 'If it had bene, or were in my power to make your 'Mageſty ſo puyſſant, as alle the world ſholde be com-'pellyd to obey yow, Chriſt he knowyth I wolde; 'for ſo am I of alle othyr moſt bounde: for your Ma-'geſtye hath bene the moſt bountiful Prynce to me, 'that ever was Kyng to his Subject: ye, and more 'like a dere Father (your Majeſtye not offendyed) 'than a Maſter. Such hath bene your moſt grave and 'godly counſayle towards me, at ſundry tymes. In 'that I have offendid I ax yow mercy. Should I 'now, for ſuch exceeding goodneſſ, benygnyte, libe-'ralitie and bounty be your Traytor, nay then the 'greateſt paynes were too little for me. Should any 'faccyon, or any affeccyon to any point make me a 'Traytor to your Mageſtie, then all the Devylls in 'Hell confound me, and the Vengeance of God light 'upon me, yf I ſholde once have thought yt, moſt 'gracious Soverayn Lord.————

———— 'Sir, as to your Common welthe, I 'have after my wytte, power, and knowledge, tra-'vayled therein, having had no reſpect to perſons, '(your Mageſtye only except) and my dewtye to the 'ſame: but that I have don any Injuſtice, or Wrong, 'wylfully, I truſt God ſhall bere my wytnes, and the 'world not able juſtly to accuſe me.————

———— 'Nevertheles, Sir, I have medelyd in ſo 'many matyers, under your Highnes, that I am not 'able to anſwer them all. But one thing I am well 'aſſured of; that willingly and wyttingly I have not 'had wille to offend your Highneſs: but hard it is 'for me, or any other, medelyng, as I have done, to 'live under your Grace, and your Laws, but we muſt

'daylie

the guilt of treaſon, whereof he was accuſed (q); and another to the ſame (r), concerning his marriage with Anne of Cleves [M]. But all his entreaties, and endeavours for pardon, were ineffectual. And, as he had himſelf ſervilely complied with the King's pleaſure, in procuring ſome to be attainted without being admitted to anſwer for themſelves, ſo he now fell under the ſame unjuſtifiable ſeverity. For, whether it was that his enemies knew, if he were brought to the Bar, he would ſo juſtify himſelf, by producing the King's orders and warrants for what he had done (s), that it would be very difficult to condemn him: or that they blindly reſolved to follow that moſt vile precedent (t), of condemning a perſon unheard; the Bill of Attainder was brought into the Houſe of Lords the 17th of June, and read the firſt time, and on the 19th was read the ſecond and third times, and ſent down to the Commons. Here it did not paſs with the ſame rapidity as it had done in the Upper Houſe, but ſtuck ten days. At laſt, a new Bill of Attainder was ſent up to the Lords, framed in the Houſe of Commons: and they ſent back at the ſame time the Bill, the Lords had ſent to them (u). What were the grounds of his condemnation, as expreſſed in the Bill of Attainder, may be ſeen in the Note [N]. Like other falling favourites, he was deſerted by moſt of his friends, except the worthy Archbiſhop Cranmer, who wrote to the King very warmly in his behalf (w) [O]. But the Duke of Norfolk, and the reſt of the Popiſh party, prevailed; and, accordingly, in purſuance of his attainder, the Lord Crom-

(q) The original is in Cotton Lib. Titus B. 1; and thence printed in Dugdale's Baron vol. ii. p. 372, 373.

(r) From the original in Cotton. Lib. Otho C. 10, 'tis printed in Burnet's Hiſt. of the Reformat. P. i. Collect. of Rec. to B. iii. p. 193, 2d edit.

(s) Sanderus de Schiſmate Anglic. as above, p. 187.

(t) A precedent ſet them by Cromwell himſelf, in the attainders of the Marchioneſs of Exeter, the Counteſs of Saliſbury, Eliz. Barton, &c. Burnet, as above, P. i. p. 359, 360.

(u) Burnet, Hiſt. of the Reformat. P. i. p. 277, of the 2d edit.

(w) June 14, Lord Herbert, as above, p. 223.

'daylie offend.'——After which, he proceeds to clear himſelf of ſome particular matters laid to his charge.—And concludes the whole in theſe words.—

'Wryten with the quaking hand, and moſt ſorrowful heart of your moſt ſorrowful ſubject, and moſt humble ſervant and pryſoner, this Saturday at your Tower of London.' (15). The King cauſed this Letter to be thrice read, and ſeemed touched with it. But the charms of Catherine Howard, and the endeavours of the Duke of Norfolk, and of the Biſhop of Wincheſter, prevailed (16).

(15) Cot. Libr. Titus B. 1. See Dugd. Baron. vol. ii. p. 372, 373.

(16) Burnet's Hiſt. of the Ref. P. i. p. 284.

[M] He wrote another Letter to the King, concerning his marriage with Anne of Cleves.] This he wrote by the King's expreſs order, on purpoſe to declare what he knew of that marriage. Among other things, he ſays, That after the King had ſeen her at Rocheſter, he told him [Cromwell] 'That if he had 'known ſo much before as he then knew, ſhe ſhould 'not have come within this realm.' Saying by way 'of lamentation, 'what remedy?' And, the day after the marriage, his Majeſty told him, 'I liked her before 'not well, but now I like her much worſe; for, I 'have felt her belley, and her breaſts, and thereby, 'as I can judge, ſhe ſhould be no maid; which ſtruck 'me ſo to the heart when I felt them, that I had 'neither will nor courage to proceed any farther in 'other matters; ſaying, I have left her as good a 'maid as I found her.' This Letter concludes with theſe words, '——— beſeeching moſt humbly 'your Grace to pardon this my rude writing, and 'to conſider that I a moſt woful priſoner, ready to 'take the death, when it ſhall pleaſe God and your 'Majeſty; and yet the frail fleſh inciteth me conti-'nually to call to your Grace for mercy and grace for 'mine offences; and thus Chriſt ſave, preſerve, and 'keep you.

'Written at the Tower this Wedneſday, the laſt of 'June, with the heavy heart, and trembling hand, 'of your Highneſs's moſt heavy and moſt miſerable 'priſoner, and poor ſlave. T. C. Moſt gracious 'Prince, I cry for mercy, mercy, mercy (17).'

(17) Cot. Libr. Otho C. 10, and Burnet's Collect. of Rec. to Hiſt. of the Ref. P. i. B. iii. No. 17. p. 193. Beſides theſe two letters there are others printed in the ſame Collect. of Records: and in Strype's Eccl. Mem. vol. i.

[N] The grounds of his condemnation are expreſſed in the Bill of Attainder.] And are as follows. 1. That his Majeſty having received Thomas Cromwell, a man of very baſe and low degree, into his ſervice, advanced him to the eſtate of an Earl, and very much enriched him; yet the ſaid T. Cromwell had proved the moſt falſe and corrupt Traitor and Deceiver that had been known in that reign. 2. That he had ſet at liberty, without the King's command or aſſent, ſeveral perſons convicted and attainted of miſpriſion of Treaſon, and others that were impriſoned for ſuſpicion of treaſon. 3. That he had, for money, granted great numbers of Licences or paſſports, for carrying money, corn, horſes, tallow, metals, &c. out of the kingdom, without any ſearch. 4. That he had appointed, and deputed, Commiſſioners, in many great, urgent, and weighty affairs, without the King's knowledge or conſent. 5. That he pretended to have ſo great a ſtroke about the King, as that he did not ſcruple boaſting, 'That he was ſure of him.' 6. That being a deteſtable Heretic, he had ſecretly ſet forth and diſperſed throughout the kingdom, great numbers of falſe erroneous Books, written againſt the Sacrament of the Altar. 7. That being the King's Vicegerent, he had, without his Majeſty's aſſent and knowledge, licenſed under the Seal of his office, ſeveral perſons detected and ſuſpected of hereſies, to preach openly within this realm. 8. That he had cauſed Sheriffs and other perſons, to ſet at large many Hereticks, ſome of whom were indicted, and others apprehended, and in cuſtody: and being a maintainer and ſupporter of Heretics, had divers times terribly rebuked their accuſers, and perſecuted and impriſoned ſome of thoſe accuſers. 9. That he had great numbers of Retainers, which he had infected with Hereſies. 10. That when Robert Barnes, and others of the new Preachers, were proſecuted and impriſoned, he the ſaid Thomas Cromwell, hearing of it, ſaid, on the laſt day of March, 1539, 'If the King would 'turn from it*, yet I would not turn; And if the King 'did turn, and all his people, I would fight in the 'field in mine own perſon, with my ſword in my hand 'againſt him and all others.' And then pulling out his dagger, and holding it up, he added, 'Or elſe 'this Dagger thruſt me to the heart, if I would not 'die in that quarrel againſt them all: and I truſt, if 'I live one year or two, it ſhould not lie in the King's 'power, to reſiſt or let it, if he would.' And then ſwearing a great oath, he ſaid, 'I will do ſo indeed.' 11. That on the laſt day of January, 1539, being put in mind how others guilty of the ſame treaſon as himſelf (†), had been ſerved by the Parliament, he declared, 'That if the Lords would handle him ſo, 'he would give them ſuch a Breakfaſt as never was 'made in England, and That the proudeſt of them 'ſhould know.' 12. Finally, That he had acquired innumerable ſums of Money and Treaſure, by oppreſſion, bribery, and extortion, which made him deſpiſe the reſt of the Nobility (18).

(*) i. e. The new preaching, or the Doctrine of Proteſtants.

(†) Cardinal Wolſey, &c.

(18) Parliament Rolls, 32 Hen. VIII. Act 60. See Burnet's Hiſt. of the Reformat. Collect. of Rec. at the end of P. i. p. 187, 2d edit.

[O] Archbiſhop Cranmer wrote very warmly to the King in his behalf.] In his Letter he hath theſe expreſſions——— 'Who cannot but be ſorrowful and 'amazed that he ſhould be a Traitor againſt your 'Majeſty? He that was ſo advanced by your Majeſty; 'he whoſe ſurety was only by your Majeſty; he who 'loved your Majeſty (as I ever thought) no leſs than 'God; he who ſtudied always to ſet forward whatſoever was your Majeſties will and pleaſure; he that 'cared for no man's diſpleaſure to ſerve your Majeſty; 'he that was ſuch a ſervant, in my judgment, in Wiſdom, Diligence, Faithfulneſs, and Experience, as 'no Prince in this realm ever had; he that was ſo vigilant to preſerve your Majeſty from all Treaſons, 'that few could be ſo ſecretly conceived, but he detected the ſame in the beginning? If the noble 'Princes of happy memory, K. John, Henry II. and 'Richard II. had had ſuch a Counſeller about them, 'I ſuppoſe they ſhould never have been ſo traiterouſly 'abandoned, and overthrown, as thoſe good Princes 'were (19).'

(19) Lord Herbert, as above, p. 223.

well

well was brought to a Scaffold erected on Tower-hill, where, after having made a Speech, [P], and prayed, he was beheaded, July the 28th 1540 (x). Thus fell Thomas Lord Cromwell, under the weight of his fickle and cruel Maſter's diſpleaſure, King Henry VIII. after he had ſerved him, with great faithfulneſs, courage, and reſolution, in the moſt hazardous, difficult, and important Undertakings. But, it was that Prince's method, to take Favourites from the meaneſt of the people, who being leſs ſcrupulous than others, and wholly intent upon their own advancement, obeyed his will without reſerve; and then, to content his ſubjects, he would readily ſacrifice them to their reſentment. As for the Lord Cromwell's character, tis no wonder, that, between Papiſts and Proteſtants, it ſhould be ſo various. The firſt repreſent him as a crafty, cruel, ambitious, and covetous man; and a heretic (y). The latter aſſure us, that he was a perſon of great wit, and excellent parts, joined to extraordinary diligence and induſtry (z): that his apprehenſion was quick and clear; his judgment methodical and ſolid; his memory ſtrong and rational; his tongue fluent and pertinent; his preſence ſtately and obliging; his heart large and noble; his temper patient and cautious; his correſpondence well laid and conſtant; his converſation inſinuating and cloſe: none more dexterous in finding out the deſigns of men and Courts; and none more reſerved in keeping a ſecret (a). Though he was raiſed from the meaneſt condition to a high pitch of honour, he carried his greatneſs with wonderful temper (b); being noted in the exerciſe of his places of judicature, to have uſed much moderation, and in his greateſt pomp to have taken notice of, and been thankful to mean perſons of his old acquaintance (c) [Q]. In his whole behaviour, he was courteous and affable to (x) J. Fox, as above, p. 1190.

(y) Fuit Thomas Cromuelus homo vafer, crudelis, ambitioſus & avarus, hæreſi etiam deditus. Sanders, as above, p. 91.

(z) Stow's Annales, p. 580, 581.

(a) D. Lloyd, &c. as above, p. 59. from the notes of T. Cromwell, Eſq; one of his poſterity.

(b) Burnet, Hiſt. of the Reform. P. i. p. 284.

(c) Lord Herbert, p. 225.

[P] After having made a Speech.] Which was as follows. 'I am come hether to dye, & not to purge 'myſelf, as maie happen ſome thynke that I will, for 'if I ſhould ſo do, I wer a very wretche & miſer: I 'am by the Law condempned to die, & thanke my 'Lord God that hath appoynted me this deathe, for 'myne offence: For ſithence the tyme that I had 'yeres of diſcretion, I have lived a ſinner, and of-'fended my Lord God, for the whiche I aſke hym 'hartely forgevenes. And it is not unknowne to 'many of you, that I have been a greate traveler in 'this worlde, and beyng but of a baſe degree, was 'called to high eſtate, and ſithens the tyme I came 'thereunto, I have offended my prince, for the which 'I aſke hym hartely forgevenes, & beſeche you all to 'praie to God with me, that he will forgeve me. O 'father forgeve me. O ſonne forgeve me. O holy 'ghoſt forgeve me. O thre perſons in one God 'forgeve me. And now I praie you that be here, to 'beare me record, I die in the Catholike faithe, not 'doubtyng in any article of my faith, no nor doubt-'yng in any Sacrament of the Churche. Many hath 'ſlaundered me, & reported, that I have been a 'bearer of ſuch as have mainteigned evill opinions, 'whiche is untrue; but I confeſſe, that like as God 'by his holy ſpirite doth inſtruct us in the truthe, ſo 'the devill is redy to ſeduce us, and I have been 'ſeduced: but beare me witnes that I dye in the Ca-'tholicke faithe of the holy Churche. And I hartely 'deſire you to prai for the Kynges grace, that he maie 'long live with you, in healthe and proſperitie. 'And after him that his ſonne Prince Edward, that 'goodly ympe maie long reigne over you. And once 'again I deſire you to pray for me, that ſo long as 'life remaigneth in this fleſh, I waver nothyng in my 'faithe (20).'

(20) Hall's Chr. edit. 1550, in Hen. VIII. fol. ccxlii. and J. Fox, as above, p. 1190.

[Q] And been thankful to mean perſons of his old acquaintance.] This is repreſented in a very agreeable and advantageous light by Shakeſpeare, under the character of Goodman Seely, and his wife Joan (21): but more truly by J. Fox, in the account he gives of a poor woman that kept a victualling houſe at Hounſlow; to whom Cromwell owing forty ſhillings before he arrived to his greatneſs, he not only repayed her that ſum, but alſo gave a yearly penſion of four pounds, and a livery every year while ſhe lived. He likewiſe takes notice, of his generoſity to the ſon of a poor man, who had given him many a meal's meat in his youth (22). His Gratitude was alſo very remarkable, in the caſe of Francis Freſcobald (or Friſkibal, as Shakeſpeare calls him.) This Freſcobald was an eminent Florentine Merchant, who handſomely relieved Cromwell in Italy, when he was reduced to the utmoſt diſtreſs and poverty, after the defeat of the French Army at Caſtiglione: he not only furniſhed him with clothes, and a horſe, but alſo with ſixteen ducats of gold, to carry him back to England. Freſcobald being afterwards reduced to poverty; Or, as Shakeſpeare expreſſes it (23),——

(21) Life and Death of Tho. Lord Cromwell, by W. Shakſpeare.

(22) Acts and Monuments, ut ſupra, p. 1186, 1187.

(23) Ubi ſupra.

Fortune that turns her too unconſtant wheel,
Having turn'd his wealth and riches in the ſea, he came over to England, where he had had conſiderable dealings, to endeavour to recover fifteen thouſand ducats, that were due to him from ſeveral perſons. The Lord Cromwell finding him out, aſſiſted him in recovering his dues, and not only repaid him the ſixteen ducats above-mentioned, but alſo made him a preſent of ſixteen hundred more (24). However, I cannot conclude the Lord Cromwell's character, without obſerving, That J. Stow the famous hiſtorian complains (25), He took a piece of ground from his father, to enlarge his own garden in Throgmorton-ſtreet, without making him any ſatisfaction. Whereupon he makes this pertinent remark, That the ſudden riſing of ſome men, cauſeth them to forget themſelves. M.

(24) Fox, p. 1186, 1187.

(25) In his Survey of London.

 [Biſhop Burnet hath made the following judicious remarks on the charges which are produced againſt Thomas Cromwell, in the Act of Attainder: "From theſe particulars the Reader will clearly ſee, "why he was not brought to make his anſwer, moſt "of them relating to orders and directions he had "given, for which it is very probable he had the "King's Warrant. And for the matter of Hereſy, "it has appeared how far the King had proceeded "towards a Reformation, ſo that what he did that "way, was moſt likely done by the King's order. "But the King now falling from theſe things, it "was thought they intended to ſtifle him by ſuch an "attainder; that he might not diſcover the ſecret "orders or directions given him for his own juſtifi-"cation. For the particulars of bribery and "extortion, they, being mentioned in general ex-"preſſions, ſeem only caſt into the heap to defame "him. But for thoſe treaſonable words, it was "generally thought that they were a contrivance of "his enemies: ſince it ſeemed a thing very extra-"vagant, for a favourite in the height of his great-"neſs to talk ſo rudely. And if he had been guilty "of it, Bedlam was thought a fitter place for his re-"ſtraint than the Tower. Nor was it judged likely "that he having ſuch great and watchful enemies at "Court, any ſuch diſcourſes could have lain ſo long "ſecret: or if they had come to the King's know-"ledge, he was not a Prince of ſuch a temper as to "have forgiven, much leſs employed and advanced "a man after ſuch diſcourſes. And to think that "during theſe fifteen months, after the words were "ſaid to have been ſpoken, none would have the "zeal for the King, or the malice to Cromwell, as "to repeat them, were things that could not be be-"lieved.

to all; a favourer in particular of the poor in their ſuits; and ready to relieve ſuch as were in danger of being oppreſſed by their mighty adverſaries (d); and ſo very hoſpitable and bountiful, that about two hundred perſons were ſerved, at the gate of his houſe in Throgmorton-ſtreet, London, twice every day, with bread, meat, and drink ſufficient (e). He was one of the chief inſtruments in the Reformation of Religion; and though he could not prevent the promulgation, he ſtopped the execution as far as he could, of the bloody Act of the Six articles (f). But when the King's command preſſed him cloſe, he was not firm enough to hazard his own intereſt, or perſon; as was manifeſt, from his concurring in the condemnation and cruel burning of John Lambert (g), As he was good abroad, ſo was he alſo at home; calling upon his ſervants yearly, to give him an account of what they had got under him, and what they deſired of him; warning them to improve their opportunities; becauſe he ſaid, he was too great to ſtand long; providing for them as carefully, as for his own ſon, by his purſe and credit, that they might live as handſomely when he was dead, as they did when he was alive (h). In a word, we are aſſured, that for piety towards God, fidelity to his King, prudence in the management of affairs, gratitude to his benefactors, dutifulneſs, charity, and benevolence, there was not any one then ſuperior to him in England (i).

(d) Holinſhed. Chron. p. 952.
(e) Stow's Survey of London, with Strype's addit. Lond. 1720, vol i. B.i. p.245, and B. ii. p.117.
(f) Burnet, as above, P.i.p.265, 266.
(g) Collier's Eccl. Hiſt. vol. ii. p. 180; and Fox, as above, p.1123. Strype's Eccl. Memor. vol. i. p. 353.
(h) D. Lloyd, as above, p. 64, 65.
(i) Quo non fuit aut religione erga Deum, aut fidelitate in regem, aut prudentia in Remp. aut in benemeritos gratitudine, aut in omnes pietate, charitate, ac benevolentia major tunc in Anglia quiſquam. De Antiq. Britan. Eccl. Hanoviæ, 1605, p. 334, 335.

" lieved. The formality of drawing his dagger " made it the more ſuſpected; for this was to affix " an Overt Act to theſe words, which, in the opi- " nion of many Lawyers, was neceſſary to make " words treaſonable (26)."

(26) Burnet's Hiſt. of the Reformat. of the Church of England, vol. i. p. 179.

Mr. Hume obſerves, that, though Cromwell was accuſed of Hereſy and Treaſon, the inſtances of his treaſonable practices are utterly improbable, or even abſolutely ridiculous. " The only circumſtance of " his conduct," adds our elegant Hiſtorian, " by " which he merited this fate, was his being the in- " ſtrument of the King's tyranny, in conducting like " iniquitous Bills, in the former Seſſion, againſt the " Counteſs of Saliſbury and others." Cromwell is characterized, by Mr. Hume, as a man of prudence, induſtry, and ability; worthy of a better maſter, and of a better fate (27). Mr. Hume's cenſure of the conduct of the Earl of Eſſex, with regard to the Counteſs of Saliſbury is extremely juſt. According to Rapin, the Act againſt the Counteſs of Saliſbury and the Marchioneſs of Exeter, met with great oppoſition in Parliament; many objecting, that to condemn perſons unheard was a breach of the moſt ſacred and unalterable rules of juſtice. " But Cromwell," continues this Hiſtorian, " having ſent for the Judges to " his houſe, aſked them, whether the Parliament had " power to condemn perſons accuſed without a hear- " ing? The Judges replied, it was a nice and dan- " gerous queſtion; that equity, juſtice, and all ſorts " of laws required that the accuſed ſhould be heard; " that however, the Parliament being the ſupreme " Court of the Realm, from which there could be no " appeal, the validity of their ſentences, of what na- " ture ſoever they were, could not be queſtioned. " This was ſaying in other words, that the Parlia- " ment would therein commit an injuſtice, for which " they could not be called to an account. Crom- " well having reported to Parliament the opinion of " the Judges, the two Ladies of the Blood Royal " were condemned to die, by a ſentence which eſta- " bliſhed a precedent the moſt pernicious that had " ever been ſeen in England, and which proved fatal " to its author (28)."

(27) Hume's Hiſt. of England, vol. iv. p. 226, 227. edit. of 1763.

(28) Rapin's Hiſt. of England. vol. vi. p. 465. fourth edit.

Mr. Gilpin, ſpeaking of the Earl of Eſſex's condemnation, elegantly remarks: " Among all the arts " of expediency laid up in the cabinets of Princes, " the readieſt is to ſacrifice a Miniſter. The death " of Cromwell was repreſented to the King as the " beſt mean of compoſing the people. But though " prudential reaſons may neceſſitate a Prince to diſ- " card a Miniſter, yet guilt only, and that nicely " examined, can authorize an Act of Blood. The " hand of a tyrant, however, generally throws aſide " the balance. It is a nice machine; and requires " pains and temper to adjuſt it. The ſword is an " inſtrument more deciſive; and of eaſier diſpatch. " Henry's was always ſtained with blood—often with " innocent blood—but never with blood more inno- " cent than that of Eſſex (29)."

(29) Gilpin's Life of Cranmer, p. 77.

Mr. Granger has mentioned ſix engraved heads of Thomas Cromwell. The ſame Biographer mentions the inſtance recorded by Stow, of Cromwell's rapine, in ſeizing on another's property. If the ſtory be true, which, however, is contrary to his general character, it ſhews that he indeed forgot himſelf after his elevation (30).

(30) Granger's Biog. Hiſt. vol. i. p. 85, 86.

Gregory Cromwell, the ſon and heir of the Earl of Eſſex, about five months after his father's death, was created a Baron of this Realm, by the title of Lord Cromwell; which title continued in the family, in regular deſcent, for ſeveral generations (31).]

(31) Dugdale's Baronage of England, tom. ii. p. 374, 375.

K.

CROMWELL (OLIVER), who raiſed himſelf to the poſſeſſion of the ſupreme power, under the title of Protector of the Commonwealth of England, was equally remarkable for his great military ſkill, by which he obtained ſo many victories in the field, and by his amazing abilities in the cabinet, which enabled him to overcome all oppoſition at home, and to ſtrike even the moſt powerful nations abroad with terror. He was very honourably deſcended, both by his father and his mother, from families of great antiquity; and which had produced perſons of diſtinguiſhed reputation, both for arms and arts, as may be ſufficiently proved by indiſputable evidence (a) [A]. It is the more neceſſary to deliver

(a) May's Hiſt. of the Parliament of England, B. iii. p. 79. Wood's Faſti Oxon. vol. ii. col. 83.

[A] By indiſputable evidence.] It has been ſo generally ſaid, and authors have ſo frequently tranſcribed it one from another, that, if no check be given to it in time, it will paſs for an unqueſtionable truth with poſterity, not only that the name of this family was originally Williams, but that Sir Richard Cromwell, who may be eſteemed the founder of it, was ſiſter's ſon to Thomas Cromwell, Earl of Eſſex, Prime-Miniſter and favourite to Henry VIII. and that this Knight owed all his fortunes to the intereſt of that potent Nobleman (1). The ſtory commonly told is this, that Morgan Williams, of an ancient family in Wales, married the ſiſter of Thomas Lord Cromwell, by whom he had a ſon, Richard, who took his uncle's name of Cromwell, who was afterwards knighted by King Henry, from whom he received large grants of Abbey-lands in Huntingdonſhire; that this Sir Richard Williams, or Cromwell, married Frances the daughter of Sir Thomas Murfyn, by whom he had a ſon Henry, knighted by Queen Elizabeth, in the ſixth year of her reign; which Sir Henry, marrying Joan, daughter and heireſs of Sir Ralph Warren, became the father of ſix ſons, the ſecond of which was the father of Oliver, of whom we are ſpeaking (2). There is no doubt that this notion prevailed in the life-time of the Protector; for we find it mentioned in that hiſtory of

(1) Carrington's Hiſtory of the Life and Death of Oliver, Lord Protector, Lond. 1659, 12*mo*. p. 3.
(2) See the Life of O. Cromwell, Lord Protector, p. 2, 3.

deliver the leſs known points of his hiſtory copiouſly and clearly, becauſe, through envy on one ſide, flattery on the other, and ſtrong prejudices upon both, it may be truly ſaid, that more of falſehood and fable is to be met with in the accounts given of him in our own (b), as well as foreign languages (c), than of almoſt any other perſon living ſo near our own times [B]. He was the ſon of Mr. Robert Cromwell, who was the ſecond ſon

(b) Hiſtory and Policy reviewed, in the heroick tranſactions of his moſt Serene Highneſs Oliver late Lord Protector, by Mr. Dawbeny.

(c) La vie d'Olivier Cromwell, par l'Abbe Raguenet. Vie d'Olivier Cromwell, par Gregorie Leti.

of him, which was publiſhed but a year after his death. Some points in this genealogy have been filed and brightened up by that eminent Antiquary Sir William Dugdale (3); yet he ſeems to be not at all clear as to the very beginning of the tale: for he takes notice that ſome ſaid, the Lord Cromwell, afterwards Earl of Eſſex, married a Williams, but he rejecting this, without citing authority, ſuppoſes, that one Mr. Williams married Lord Cromwell's ſiſter, and ſo goes on with the ſtory, which has been already told. Dr. Goodman, Biſhop of Glouceſter, who turned Papiſt, and was very deſirous of making his court to the Protector, dedicated a book to him (4); and beſides, preſented him with a printed paper, by which he pretended to ſcrape kindred with him, as being himſelf ſome way allied to Thomas, Earl of Eſſex: but the Protector, with ſome paſſion, told him, that Lord was not related to his family in any degree (5). If therefore he knew any thing of his own family, this ſtory, though ſo very well told, cannot be true. It is much more probable, that the father of Sir Richard Cromwell, ſuppoſed to be the nephew of the Earl of Eſſex, was Thomas Cromwell, Eſq; who was Sheriff of Cambridgeſhire and Huntingdonſhire in the 28th of Hen. VIII (6); and, indeed, four years afterwards we find this Sir Richard, Sheriff of the ſame counties (7), and from him there is no doubt at all that the genealogy runs right. It muſt be confeſſed, that this gentleman had very large grants of Abbey-lands in Huntingdonſhire, to the amount, as they were then rated, of at leaſt three thouſand pounds (8) a year; but it does not thence follow, that he muſt be related to the Lord Cromwell. Some of theſe grants are as early, in point of time, as the high favour of that great Miniſter, but none of them ſo early as the year in which Thomas Cromwell, Eſq; was Sheriff, which makes it probable he was his father, and that, upon his demiſe, Richard came to have an eſtate in the county (9). Another reaſon, which inclines me to think that Sir Richard Cromwell was no near relation or dependant upon the Earl of Eſſex, in King Henry the VIIIth's time, is this, that he received the honour of Knighthood, and ſeveral large grants, preciſely at the time of that famous Miniſter's fall, and others in ſo conſtant and regular a ſucceſſion, that there is no appearance he was ever out of King Henry's favour (10). If it be aſked, how any account can be given of the tradition, that Cromwell was ſome way related to the Earls of Eſſex, by the females, and how his family came by the name of Williams, which is unqueſtionably matter of record; my anſwer is, that a probable account may be given of both; at leaſt, a more probable account than hitherto has been given of either. It is not at all unlikely, that in Cromwell's family, more eſpecially after he became Protector, there might be frequent mention made, of a deſcent from the Earls of Eſſex by the females: but this muſt be underſtood not of himſelf, but of his wife, who was really deſcended from the Bouchiers, Earls of Eſſex (11). In reference to the ſirnames of Williams, it might poſſibly ariſe from the marriage of a Gentleman of that name with the heireſs of Thomas Cromwell of Huntingdonſhire; and Sir William Dugdale renders this more probable than his own ſtory; for, in ſpeaking of John Lord Williams, of Thame in Oxfordſhire, he tells us, that he was of the ſame family with that Sir Richard Williams, who took the ſirname of Cromwell, and both of them the ſons of John Williams, of Burfield in the county of Berks (12): now this has nothing to do with Morgan Williams the Welſhman, whom he ſuppoſes to have married Lord Cromwell's ſiſter, or with the Lady of the ſame country, whom Brooke (13), and other writers, aſſert was married to Cromwell Earl of Eſſex. Neither will it be any anſwer to ſay, that this is only the miſtake of a Berkſhire family for a family of Wales, ſince there is direct evidence to prove, that Cromwell was ſo far from being any way allied to Williams of Berkſhire, that he was an enemy to, and an oppreſſor of, that family (14). Upon the whole, therefore, I ſhould rather incline to think, that this family deſcended by the females from Ralph Lord Cromwell, of Tatterſhall in Lincolnſhire, the laſt heir-male of which was Lord High-Treaſurer in the reign of King Henry the VIth; and one of his coheireſſes married Sir William Williams (15), whoſe deſcendants might afterwards take the ſirname of Cromwell, in hopes of obtaining that title which Humphry Bouchier, a younger ſon of the then Earl of Eſſex, who married the eldeſt of the co-heireſſes, actually had, and was killed at Barnet field, fighting on the ſide of King Edward the IVth (16). However, if we conſider only thoſe anceſtors of Oliver Cromwell, of whom there is no diſpute, we may ſupport all that has been ſaid in the text; for Sir Richard Cromwell was a great favourite with Henry the VIIIth, and an eminent Commander in his wars (17). His ſon Sir Henry was four times Sheriff of his county, and univerſally eſteemed. As for Sir Oliver Cromwell, he gave King James the Firſt the greateſt feaſt that had been given to a King by a ſubject (18), when his Majeſty paſſed by his houſe in his way to London; and, in return, King James made him a Knight of the Bath at his coronation (19). He had a very large eſtate, and was a very loyal worthy Gentleman; lived high, and ſpent a great part of his fortune, dying in the year 1654 (20), without receiving any favours from his nephew.

(3) Dugdale's Baronage, vol. ii. p. 374.

(4) The title of this book is, The two great myſteries of Chriſtian Religion, the ineffable Trinity, and wonderful Incarnation, explicated, Lond. 1653.

(5) Fuller's Worthies in Cambridgeſhire, p. 269.

(6) See the liſt of theſe Sheriffs in Fuller.

(7) See the ſame liſt in Fuller

(8) Tanner's Notitia Monaſtica, p. 190—193.

(9) By comparing the dates in the two authors laſt mentioned, this fact is aſcertained.

(10) Rymer's Fœdera, tom. xv. p. 22.

(11) Dugdale's Baronage, vol. ii. p. 132.

(12) Idem, ibid. p. 393.

(13) Catalogue of the Nobility, by R. B. p. 83.

(14) Dugdale's Baronage, vol. ii. p. 132.

(15) Idem. ibid. vol. ii. p. 46.

(16) Diſcovery of errors in Brooke's Catalogue, by Vincent, p. 184.

(17) Stowe's Survey, p. 494.

(18) Fuller's Worthies in Huntingdonſhire, p. 54.

(19) Stowe's Annals continued, by Edmund Howſe, p. 827.

(20) Fuller's Worthies, Huntingdonſhire, p. 54.

[B] So near our own times.] It is no great wonder, that, in the life-time of the Protector, or immediately after his deceaſe, thoſe, who had ſuffered by his power, ſhould endeavour to avenge themſelves upon his character, and even a little at the expence of truth. In this the Cavaliers, if we abate the ſtory of Colonel Lindſey, who was eye and ear-witneſs to Oliver's contract with the Devil (21), were by far the moſt modeſt; for the republican party, whom he had likewiſe humbled, kept no meaſures, but vented their ſpleen in all the malicious and groundleſs fictions they could invent, On the other hand, the courtiers of thoſe times, as in moſt other times, were egregious flatterers, ready to magnify him to the ſkies, and to ſay whatever they thought might pleaſe, though it lay ever ſo much out of the reach of truth. Amongſt others, one Mr. Dawbeny undertook, in a book (22) which he dedicated to the moſt Serene Highneſs of Richard, by the Grace of God Lord Protector of England, Scotland, and Ireland, to draw a parallel, in thirty different ſteps, between Moſes the Man of God, and Oliver late Protector. This Gentleman, foreſeeing that ſome might object to this the profaneneſs of the deſign, apologizes for it thus, in his preface. 'Certainly, ſays he, this piece is not the firſt that has 'gone that way; we have very ſufficient precedents, 'and authority too, to warrant us. Have we not 'ſeen a compleat parallel between Elias and Dr. 'Luther, even to the chariots of Iſrael and the horſemen thereof? and another betwixt his ſucceſſor 'Eliſha and Mr. Calvin, to the double portion of his 'ſpirit? and many of our modern Doctors put in 'ſcale with ſome of the Apoſtles themſelves. Nor 'has this way of compariſon been taken up only by 'Divines, in honour of their own function, but many 'parallels we find in print, between ſome of our late 'Kings, how well deſerving I ſay not, and ſome of 'thoſe holy Princes and Prophets of God's own people, as David, Solomon, Joſiah, Hezekiah, &c. 'And one very expreſs parallel between Queen Elizabeth, of famous memory, and that great Princeſs 'and Propheteſs Deborah. Then why ſhould not 'our late incomparable Prince and Protector ſtand as 'well placed in line parallel with that glorious Patriarch Moſes?' The firſt ſtep in this parallel, or, as the author calls it, the firſt aſcent, is, as to nobility of birth; and, upon this ſubject, he is very clear as to Moſes, and ſets forth his pedigree at large from the Scrip-

(21) Echard's Hiſtory of England, p. 691.

(22) The title of this book at large runs thus: Hiſtory and Policy reviewed, in the heroic tranſactions of his moſt Serene Highneſs Oliver, late Lord Protector, from his cradle to his tomb, declaring his ſteps to princely perfection, as they are drawn in lively parallels to the aſcents of the great Patriarch Moſes, in thirty degrees of the height of honour, by H. D. Lond. 1659. 12mo.

ſon of Sir Henry Cromwell, of Hinchinbrooke in the county of Huntingdon, Knight, by Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Richard Stuart, of the Iſle of Ely, Knight (d), both of them perſons of great worth, and no way inclined to diſaffection, either in their civil or religious principles; but remarkable for living upon a ſmall fortune, with much decency, and maintaining a large family handſomely by their frugal circumſpection [C]. He was born (d) Wood's Faſti Oxon. vol. ii. col. 88.

Scriptures. One would have imagined hence, that this writer ſhould have taken care to have been perfectly maſter of Cromwell's pedigree: but, to ſhew the reader how little help is to be expected from ſuch writers, we will tranſcribe what he ſays upon this ſubject. 'I cannot ſay his late Highneſs was extracted from ſo 'prieſtly a family, but altogether as princely, being 'lineally deſcended from the loins of our moſt antient 'Britiſh Princes, and tied in near alliances to the blood 'of our later Kings, as by that thrice noble family of 'the Barringtons, and divers others, which, to make 'a pedigree of, would take up more paper than we 'intend for our volume, and make me appear more a 'Herald than an Hiſtorian. Nay, indeed, ſhould I 'but go about to prove his Highneſs's moſt illuſtrious 'houſe noble, I ſhould commit a ſacrilege in the temple of honour, and only violate his moſt glorious family with a more ſolemn infamy.' I will treſpaſs ſo far on the reader's patience, as to give him another inſtance, from an author (23) who attempted to make court to the Protector upon this ſubject, in his lifetime, but in the ſame vague incoherent ſtile, promiſing mighty things, but performing nothing. 'He is well 'born, and of a noble and ancient extract; and hath 'ſo much piety of his own, ſuch virtues and honours 'of his own acquiſition and getting, ſo much ſplendor 'and glory, as might illuſtrate and dignify not only 'his progenitors, had they been never ſo mean and 'inferior, but alſo his poſterity for all ages to come, 'ſhould they be never ſo low and degenerated. He 'hath deſerved highly, and merited for all that can 'lay claim to his blood, or any ways derive from the 'ſtock and lineage of his houſe, and will leave them 'all very great legacies, and patrimonies of glory.' On all other topics theſe authors write juſt at the ſame rate, ſo that it is not eaſy to diſcern their ſenſe, and hardly poſſible to collect any facts from them, that are worth preſerving: yet their conduct, bad as it is, deſerves commendation rather than cenſure, when compared with the books that ſome foreigners have publiſhed. The Abbe Raguenet (24) has written a hiſtory full of faults and miſtakes, in reference to the dates and circumſtances of events, and more erroneous ſtill in the remarks and the reflections, which are very often preciſely the reverſe of what they ought to be, and what it is very apparent they would have been, had the author had a competent knowledge of the ſubject upon which he was writing. This hiſtory, however, is equally authentic and exact, in compariſon of that of Gregorio Leti (25), which is a maſter-piece in its kind; for whereas in other works there is a greater or a leſs mixture of error, there is in this ſcarcely a ſprinkling of truth; and one would really conceive it an impoſſibility for any man, capable of putting a book ſo well together, to contrive that there ſhould be ſo very little in it, I will not ſay of veracity, but of probability. He makes Oliver a prodigy of learning at the Univerſity, exceedingly admired by the Biſhops, a great favourite with King James: he then ſends him over to France upon his travels, gives us a particular account of his galantries, introduces him to an audience of the French King, and an intimacy with Cardinal Richlieu. Upon his return he aſſures us, that Cromwell was highly in the good graces of Dr. Williams, Biſhop of Lincoln, to whom, he ſays, he was nearly related; whereas, in fact, no man ſaw ſo early into Cromwell's bad deſigns as that Prelate, though he had no more than a general acquaintance with him. But, what is ſtill more extraordinary than all this, Mr. Leti lets us into the ſecret, that the Biſhop had an amour with Cromwell's wife; though an author of the higheſt character has aſſured us, that Dr. Williams was altogether incapable of any criminal act of that kind; and in the ſame ſtile, and with the like attention to truth, he perſeveres through the whole work, aſſuring us, that he wrote it during his ſtay in England; and that he took care to be perfectly well informed as to every thing which he relates; nor does he ſcruple to name the Earl of Angleſey, the Earl of Ayleſbury, and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction, for the authors of theſe notorious falſehoods, which no man of common underſtanding would venture to repeat in public company, with any ſhew of giving them credit; yet weak and ſilly as it is, this book is in ſome eſteem abroad; writers very frequently borrow from it; and ſometimes we ſee it cited; which ſhews how neceſſary it is to ſet this article in a proper light, more eſpecially as we have not hitherto had any diſtinct or clear account of Cromwell's government, notwithſtanding there has been ſo much controverſy about it; for as to what we find in ſatires, panegyricks, or declamations, we ſhould be careful of miſtaking that for hiſtory, which ought to be compoſed of unqueſtionable facts, related with ſimplicity rather than ornament.

(23) Unparalleled Monarch, p. 69.

(24) Hiſtoire d'Olivier Cromwell, juſqu-a ſa mort in 1658, avec quelques pieces pour ſervir de preuves. Paris 1691, 4to.

(25) La vie d'Oliver Cromwell, par Gregorio Leti. Amſterdam, 1708. 2 vol. 12mo.

[C] By their frugal circumſpection.] The father of the Protector, Robert Cromwell, Eſq; lived moſtly at Huntingdon; and though a man of very good ſenſe, and of competent learning, yet ſo fond of a private life, that it does not appear he ever ſought or affected, farther than being a Juſtice of Peace, a public ſtation (26). As to the Lady he married, ſhe has been ſaid, and not without ſome degree of truth, to have been deſcended from the royal Houſe of Stuart. Her great uncle, Robert Stuart, the laſt Prior of the Monaſtery, and the firſt Dean of the Cathedral Church of Ely, left behind him a very full account of his family, which is ſtill preſerved (27); and thence it appears, that Sir James Stuart, being one of the retinue of James, Prince of Scotland, was detained with him in the year 1406, and afterwards choſe to ſettle in England; and was preferred and taken into the ſervice of Henry IV. His ſon Sir John Stuart was created a Knight of the Bath at the marriage of Hen. V. His ſon Thomas Stuart addicted himſelf to the ſea, and, by the daughter of Sir John Hamerton, Knight, had Richard Stuart, Eſq; who married the daughter of John Burleigh, Eſq; by whom he had Nicholas Stuart, a very learned Lawyer of the Middle Temple, who was the father of Dr. Robert Stuart before-mentioned, as alſo of Simeon Stuart, Eſq; (28) who married Joan, daughter and heireſs of Edward Beſteney, of Soham in the county of Cambridge, by whom he had eight ſons, and amongſt theſe Thomas, who was the father of Sir Richard Stuart, Knight, whoſe daughter Elizabeth married Robert Cromwell (29), of whom we have been ſpeaking. It was commonly ſaid by the Cavaliers, in the life time of the Protector, that he was a Brewer, or the ſon of a Brewer; nor was this altogether without foundation; for his mother, finding it hard to breed up ſo large a family, out of the narrow income of Mr. Cromwell's ſmall eſtate, and being too well acquainted with his temper, to expect that he ſhould take any meaſures for augmenting it, thought proper to engage in the brewing trade herſelf, which ſhe managed with great ſkill and prudence (30), and without the leaſt aſſiſtance, either from the father or the ſon. Out of the profits of this trade, and her own ſmall jointure of ſixty pounds a year, ſhe provided fortunes for her daughters, ſufficient to marry them into good families. The eldeſt was the wife of Mr. John Deſborough, afterwards one of the Protector's Major-Generals; another married firſt Roger Whetſtone, Eſq; and afterwards Colonel John Jones, who was executed for being one of the King's Judges; the third eſpouſed Colonel Valentine Walton, who died in exile; the fourth, Mrs. Robina Cromwell, married firſt Dr. Peter French, and afterwards Dr. John Wilkins, Biſhop of Cheſter, a famous Preacher, and a celebrated Mathematician. It may not be amiſs to add, that an aunt of Cromwell's married Francis Barrington, Eſq; another aunt John Hampden, Eſq; of Buckinghamſhire, by whom ſhe was mother to the famous

(26) Dugdale's Short view of the late troubles, p. 459. Flagellum, or the life and death of Cromwell, p. 11.

(27) Wharton's Anglia ſacra, vol. i. p. 686.

(28) Fuller's Worthies in Cambridgeſhire, p. 169, 170.

(29) Vincent's Collections, and their continuation, by R. W.

(30) Dugdale's Short view of the late troubles, p. 459. Flagellum, p. 15.

born in the parish of St. John, in the ancient borough of Huntingdon, April 24th (e), or, as most writers say, April 25th, 1599 (f), in the forty-first year of the reign of Queen Elizabeth; so that what a foreign writer says, in reference to his birth upon the same day that Queen Elizabeth died (g), is like many other facts in his book, absolutely false and groundless. He was christened in the parish church, on the 29th of the same month, when his uncle Sir Oliver Cromwell, a very worthy Gentleman, gave him his name (h). It is said, that he received the first tincture of learning from the Rev. Mr. Long (i); but it is very certain, that his father, who was highly attentive to his education, put him, as soon as he was fit to go to school, under the care of Dr. Thomas Beard (k), a very learned and sensible man, who was, at that time, Master of the Free-school at Huntingdon. We have very different accounts of his behaviour, while he remained in the hands of this Gentleman: some say that he shewed very little propensity to learning, and others that he made a great proficiency in it (l). It is highly likely, that both are in the wrong; and that he was not either incorrigibly dull, or wonderfully bright, which might also be owing to the levity or fickleness of his temper; for that he was an unlucky boy, and of an uneasy and turbulent temper, is reported by authors of unsuspected veracity (m). It would be tedious, and beside the design of this work, to mention the several stories that have been told of him, even in this early part of his life, as to the proofs he gave of a very singular and extraordinary disposition; but there are two, of which the reader might justly blame us in case of omission. The first respects a kind of a vision, he saw, or fancied he saw, for which, at the desire of his relations, Dr. Beard corrected him severely (n) [D]. As to the other, it relates to a part he acted in the Comedy of LINGUA, when performed by himself, and the rest of the boys at Huntingdon School (o), which, it is pretended, filled his mind with the desire of obtaining the Crown, and affording him also what he always understood to be an omen of future success [E]. He was thence removed (e) Collection of Nativities, by Sir Richard Napier, M.S.

(f) Carrington's life of Cromwell, p. 3. Wood's Fasti Oxon. vol. ii. col. 88. Dugdale, Fuller, &c.

(g) Vie de Cromwell, par Leti, vol. i. p. 145.

(h) Life of Oliver Cromwell, Lord Protector, Lond. 1741, 8*vo*. p. 3. From the information of the late Mr. Thomas Baker, of St. John's College in Cambridge.

(i) Collections relating to the family of Cromwell, by John Vincent, M. S.

(k) Flagellum, or the life and death, &c. of Cromwell, p. 12.

(l) Dawbeny's life of Cromwell, p. 25. Flagellum, or the life and death of Cromwell, p. 13.

(m) Perfect Politician, or, Full view of the Life of Cromwell, p. 2, 3. Wood's Fasti Oxon. vol. ii. col. 88.

(n) Warwick's Memoirs, p. 249.

(o) Winstanley's Lives of English Poets, p. 115.

mous John Hampden; a third aunt was the wife of Mr. Whaley, and the mother of Colonel Whaley, in whose custody the King was while he remained at Hampton Court. He had two other aunts, but of their marriages we have no account (31).

(31) Wood's Fasti Oxon. vol. i. col. 90.

[D] Dr. Beard corrected him very severely.] There is reason to believe, that Oliver was not a little unlucky in his youth; for one of his panegyrists says, that he had several escapes in his infancy from fire, little less wonderful than the deliverance of Moses out of the water: but of these, as we can say nothing with certainty, we shall be silent (32). In reference to his vision, it happened, while he was a boy, in the day-time, when lying melancholy upon his bed, he thought he saw a spectre, and that it told him, that he should be the greatest man in this kingdom; which having related to his father, he was very angry, and desired his master to correct him severely; which, however, had no great effect; for he was still perswaded of the thing, and would sometimes mention it, notwithstanding his uncle Stuart told him, it was traiterous to repeat it (33). Sir Philip Warwick tells us, that he was well acquainted with one Dr. Simcot, who was Cromwell's Physician, in the earlier part of his life, and who assured him, that he was a very fanciful man; that he had been often called to him at unseasonable hours, when he imagined himself to be dying; and that, in these black fits of the vapours, he had many whimsical notions about the cross that stood in the town of Huntingdon (34). Nor was he altogether free from these fits during the whole course of his life, not even in the highest of his prosperity; of which many instances might be given, if the bounds prescribed to this article would permit.

(32) Dawbeny's life of Cromwell, p. 20.

(33) Flagellum, or the life of Cromwell, p. 13.

(34) Warwick's Memoirs, p. 249.

[E] To be an omen of future success.] We have different reports concerning the author of this play from Winstanley and Langbaine, with which it does not seem requisite to trouble the reader. It is sufficient to observe, that it was originally printed in 1607, and afterwards with this title. LINGUA, or, The combat of the tongue and the five senses for superiority, a pleasant comedy, first acted at Trinity-College in Cambridge, after at the free-school at Huntingdon (35). Winstanley says that it was at Cambridge (36), but it is more likely that it was at Huntingdon, that Cromwell performed the part of Tactus, which affected him strangely. The scheme of the play is, that Lingua gives a crown and a robe to be contested for by the senses: the two following scenes will shew what gave rise to this notion of Cromwell's being so much struck by his playing this part (37).

(35) Lond. 1657. 24*mo*.

(36) Lives of the English Poets, p. 114.

(37) The reader must be content with the citation of the act, and scene, for this comedy is printed without pages.

ACT I. SCENE V.

MENDACIO. TACTUS.

MEND. Now, chaste Diana, grant my nets to hold,
TACT. The blasting childhood of the chearful morn
Is almost grown a youth, and overclimbs
Yonder gilt eastern hills, about which time
Gustus most earnestly importuned me
To meet him hereabouts; what cause I know not.
MEN. You shall do shortly, to your cost, I hope.
TACT. Sure, by the Sun, it should be nine o'clock!
MEN. What a Stargazer, will you ne'er look down?
TACT. Clear is the Sun, and blue the firmament:
Methinks the heavens do smile
—— MEN. At thy mishap,
To look so high, and stumble in a trap.
[TACTUS stumbleth at the Robe and Crown.
TACT. High thoughts have slippery feet, I had well nigh fall'n.
MEN. Well doth he fall, that riseth with a fall.
TACT. What's this?
MEN. O! are you taken? 'tis in vain to strive.
TACT. How now!
MEN. You'll be so entangled straight.
TACT. A Crown!
MEN. That it will be heard.
TACT. And a Robe!
MEN. To lose yourself.
TACT. A Crown and Robe!
MEN. It had been fitter for you to have found a fool's coat, and a bauble, hey, hey.
TACT. Jupiter! Jupiter! how came this here?
MEN. O! Sir, Jupiter is making thunder, he hears you not; here's one knows better.
TACT. 'Tis wond'rous rich: ha! but sure it is not so: ho!
Do I not sleep, and dream of this good luck, ha?
No, I am awake, and feel it now.
Whose should it be? [He takes it up.
MEN. Set up a si quis for it.
TACT. Mercury! all's mine own; here's none to cry half's mine.
MEN. When I am gone.

SCENE VI. A SOLILOQUY.

TACT. Tactus, thy sneezing somewhat did portend,
Was ever man so fortunate as I?
To break his shins at such a stumbling-block.
Roses and bays pack hence: this Crown and Robe removed to Sidney-College in Cambridge, where he was admitted, April 23d, 1616, under the tuition of Mr. Richard Howlett (p), who, by a very ſtrict attention to his pupil's diſpoſition, quickly diſcovered, that he was leſs addicted to ſpeculation than to action. We have very different accounts of the progreſs he made in his ſtudies while a Member of the Univerſity. As for thoſe wild ſtories that a foreign writer tells us, of his amazing proficiency, and which he loads with ſo many falſe authorities (q) and contradictory circumſtances, they are not only unworthy of belief, but of notice; and, on the other hand, it is not eaſy to give credit to what ſome report, of his being ſcarcely maſter of the Latin tongue, becauſe it is certain that he was well read in the Greek and Roman hiſtory (r); but whether he acquired this knowledge at Cambridge, is a point that may be doubted. His father dying he returned home, where his conduct was far enough from being regular, inſomuch that it gave his mother, who was a notable and prudent woman, much uneaſineſs. She was adviſed by ſome near relations to ſend him up to London, and to place him in Lincoln's-Inn (s); which ſhe accordingly did, but without any extraordinary effects, ſince it ſerved only to bring him acquainted with the vices of the town, by way of addition to thoſe to which he had been addicted in the country. It does not at all appear, that he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the Laws, which was what his friend aimed at. On the contrary, he continued to purſue his pleaſures, and gave himſelf up to wine, women, and play, in which laſt, though he was ſometimes fortunate, yet, taking all his expences together, they ſo much exceeded his income, that he quickly diſſipated all that his father left him (t): but, after a few years ſpent in this manner, he ſaw plainly the conſequences of his follies, renounced them ſuddenly, and began to lead a very grave and ſober life (u) [F]. This, however, ought not to be imputed to his falling in with the Puritans, ſince it is very certain, that he remained then, and for ſome time after, a zealous Member of the Church of England, and entered into a cloſe friendſhip with ſeveral eminent Divines, who looked upon his reformation as very extraordinary, and ſpoke of him as a man of ſtrong ſenſe and great abilities (w). As he was nearly related to Mr. Hampden of Buckinghamſhire, to the Barringtons of Eſſex, and other conſiderable families, they intereſted themſelves in his favour, and were very deſirous of ſeeing him ſettled in the world; in order to which a marriage was propoſed, which ſoon after took effect (x). The Lady he married was Elizabeth, daughter of Sir James Bouchier, of Eſſex, Knight, a woman of ſpirit and parts, and who, being deſcended from an ancient family, did not want a conſiderable portion of pride (y). Mr. Cromwell ſoon after (p) Peck's Deſiderata Curioſa, vol. ii. lib. vii. num. 22.

(q) Vie d'Cromwell, par Leti, vol. i. p. 149, 150, 151.

(r) Rapin's Hiſt. of England, 8vo. vol. xiii. p. 147.

(s) Flagellum, or the life and death of O. Cromwell, p. 16.

(t) Dugdale's Short view of the late troubles, p. 459.

(u) Perfect Politician, p. 2, 3.

(w) See the life of Oliver Lord Protector, p. 3.

(x) Flagellum, or the life and death of O. Cromwell, p. 20. Wood's Faſti Oxon. vol. ii. col. 89.

(y) Life of O. Cromwell, Lord Protector, p. 3.

My brows and body circles and inveſts,
How gallantly it fits me; ſure the ſlave
Meaſur'd my head that wrought this Coronet.
They lye that ſay complexions cannot change;
My blood's ennobled, and I am transform'd
Unto the ſacred temper of a KING.
Methinks I hear my noble pariſites
Stiling me Cæſar or great Alexander,
Licking my feet, and wond'ring where I got
This precious ointment; how my pace is mended,
How princely do I ſpeak, how ſharp I threaten:
Peaſants, I'll curb your headſtrong impudence,
And make you tremble when the lion roars:
Yea earth-bred worms: O for a looking-glaſs!
Poets will write whole volumes of this change:
Where's my attendants? Come hither, Sirrah, quickly,
Or by the wings of Hermes ——

[F] And began to lead a very grave and ſober life.] We are informed by ſome writers, that while he was at the Univerſity, he ſpent much of his time at football, cricket, and other robuſt exerciſes, for his ſkill and expertneſs in which he was very famous (38). In all probability, it might be this that led him into ill company, and drew him into extravagancies of another kind; and this will, in ſome meaſure, account for his mother's being ſo deſirous to remove him out of the country, in hopes that, when he was at a diſtance from his old companions, he might loſe the ill habits they had taught him. His ſtay at Lincoln's-Inn could not be long, nor was this ſeaſon of wildneſs and diſſipation of much continuance. It appears, by the entry in the regiſter of Sidney-College, that he came thither when he was but two days ſhort of ſeventeen (39); and it is very certain, that he was married by that time he was one-and-twenty; ſo that if he ſtaid but two years at the Univerſity, and it is very probable that he did not ſtay there longer, there was not above two years more for his going to Lincoln's-Inn, and running through the whole circle of his follies (40). It is very likely that, after he married and ſettled at Huntingdon, he fell into thoſe fits of melancholy in which Dr. Simcot attended him; and this is the more probable, if what many writers tell us be true, that he ſhewed a very deep concern for the idleneſs of his former conduct, and readily offered to make ſatisfaction to every perſon whom he had wronged during the time that he lived ſo freely (41). Theſe circumſtances, and the noiſe made by his converſion, recommended him to the notice of the Nonconformiſts, who, by degrees, drew him over to their intereſt, ſo that he frequently attended Dr. Williams, then Biſhop of Lincoln, afterwards Archbiſhop of York, and was very importunate with him to diſpenſe with the ſeverity of the law, when theſe eccleſiaſtical friends of his came into any trouble for their conduct (42). This gave that Prelate an opportunity of judging of him ſo early; and, as he was a man of very extraordinary ſagacity, and ſingular penetration, ſo, at that time, he ſaw clearly into Mr. Cromwell's ſpirit, which he found to be haſty, and yet obſtinate, very quick in reſenting, but very ſlow in forgiving injuries. It does not appear on what account he differed with his uncle Sir Thomas Stuart, or at what time; but it ſeems he made a complaint againſt him at Court, in which he had not the ſucceſs that he expected; and this gave him the firſt diſtaſte to the King; which, however, upon certain occaſions, he might diſſemble, as upon ſome he certainly did, even before things came to extremities, of which we ſhall have occaſion to take notice; but he never forgot this ſuppoſed injury, notwithſtanding he afterwards, by his mother's intereſt, compromiſed matters with that uncle. We have likewiſe an account of an odd exploit of his at Sir Oliver Cromwell's, which drew upon him very rough uſage, and which, with other things, ſo thoroughly diſobliged that old Knight (43), as to deprive him entirely of his good opinion. Theſe are matters that might perhaps be better cleared up, if any one ſhould take the trouble of writing his hiſtory at large, with that induſtry and care that it deſerves; but, conſidering the nature of our deſign, it may probably be thought, that we have beſtowed too much notice upon particulars of ſo trivial a nature already, and therefore we will forbear them for the future.

(38) Flagellum, or the life of Cromwell, p. 15.

(39) That entry is in theſe words, Oliverus Cromwell, Huntingdonienſis, admiſſus ad commeatum ſociorum Coll. Sidn. Aprilis 23, 1616, Tutore M. Ricardo Howlet.

(40) This appears from the pariſh regiſter of St. John in Huntingdon, in which we find, that his eldeſt ſon Robert who died a child, was born Oct. 13th, 1621.

(41) Perfect Politician, or life of Cromwell, p. 2.

(42) Biſhop Hacket's life of Archbiſhop William's, P. ii. p. 212.

(43) Flagellum, or the life and death of Cromwell, p. 18, 19.

returned to his own country, and ſettled at Huntingdon till the death of his uncle Sir Tho. Stuart, who left him an eſtate of between four and five hundred pounds a year, which induced him to remove into the Iſle of Ely (z). It was about this time that he began to fall off from the Church, to converſe moſtly with thoſe who were then ſtiled Puritans, and by degrees to affect their notions, as indeed he did every thing which he affected at all, with great warmth and vehemence. He was elected a Member of the third Parliament in the reign of Charles I. which met January 20th, 1628 (a), and was of the Committee for religion, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his zeal againſt Popery, and by complaining of Dr. Neile, then Biſhop of Wincheſter's licenſing books which had a very dangerous tendency (b). After the diſſolution of that Parliament, he returned again into the country, where he continued to expreſs much concern for religion, to frequent ſilenced miniſters, and to invite them often to lectures and ſermons at his houſe; by which he again brought his affairs into a very indifferent ſituation (c); ſo that he judged it requiſite to try what induſtry might do towards repairing theſe breaches, which led him to take a farm at St. Ives, and this he kept about five years; though, inſtead of repairing, it helped to run out the reſt of his fortune; and had totally undone him, if he had not thrown it up (d). Some have charged this upon his enthuſiaſm, and being religious over-much, which induced him to have long prayers with his family in a morning, and again in the afternoon, at which his ploughmen, and all his country ſervants, always attended (e). But granting this to be true, it was a proof of his ſincerity, of which indeed he gave many: amongſt others, he gave public notice, that he was ready to make reſtitution to any from whom he had won money at play; and he actually did return thirty pounds to Mr. Calton, from whom he won it ſeveral years before (f). His diſappointments being ſuch as allowed him very little reaſon to hope he ſhould either make any great figure in his country, or ſecure a reaſonable proviſion for his children, great part of his uncle's eſtate being now gone, he revived, in his own mind, a ſcheme, which his bad circumſtances firſt put into his head while at Lincoln's-Inn, of going over to New England (g). This was in 1637, and this deſign, it is thought, he would certainly have executed, if he had not been hindered by the iſſuing out a proclamation for reſtraining ſuch embarkations (h). The next year he had leſs time upon his hands; for the Earl of Bedford, and ſome other perſons of high rank, who had large eſtates in the fen country, were very deſirous of ſeeing it better drained; and though one project of this ſort had failed, they thought it expedient nevertheleſs to ſet on foot another, countenanced by the royal authority, and which, without doubt, was intended for the public benefit; but for all that it was violently oppoſed, under pretence, that it was injurious to private property, though in reality it gave much more to private people than it took away, and made thoſe rents ſafe and ſecure, which before were very precarious (i). At the head of this oppoſition Mr. Oliver Cromwell placed himſelf, and puſhed things with great ſpirit and vigour, as he did every thing in which he once embarked, ſo that he gave the great men concerned in this affair abundance of trouble (k) [G]. It was the vigour and viligence which he ſhewed upon this occaſion, that firſt rendered him conſpicuous and conſiderable, and gave occaſion to his friend and relation Mr. Hampden to recommend him afterwards to his friends in Parliament, as a perſon capable of contriving and conducting great things (l). But for all this, he was not very ſucceſsful in the matter of which we have been ſpeaking; and, as his private affairs were ſtill declining, he was in a very neceſſitous condition at the approach of the Long Parliament (m). In theſe circumſtances one might wonder how he ſhould form a deſign, at a time when elections were conſidered as things of the utmoſt conſequence, of getting himſelf choſen, more eſpecially for the town of Cambridge, where he was ſo far from having any intereſt, that in reality he was not ſo much as known, and if he had been known would never have been elected. The whole of that affair was owing

(z) Flagellum, or the life and death of O. Cromwell, p. 20. May's Hiſtory of the Parliament, B. iii. p. 79.

(a) Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 12.

(b) Life of O. Cromwell, Lord Protector, p. 3.

(c) Dugdale's Short view of the late troubles, p. 460.

(d) Flagellum, or the life and death of O. Cromwell, p. 21.

(e) Hiſtory and Policy reviewed, p. 32, 33. Warwick's Memoirs, p. 249.

(f) Perfect Politician, p. 2, 3.

(g) Life of O. Cromwell, Lord Protector, p. 4. Neal's Hiſtory of New England.

(h) Rymer's Fœdera, vol. xix. p. 646. Ruſhworth, Part ii. p. 298.

(i) Warwick's Memoirs, p. 250.

(k) Echard's Hiſt. of Engl. p. 579.

(l) Flagellum, or the life and death of O. Cromwell, p. 23.

(m) Wood's Faſti Oxon. vol. ii. col. 89. Life of O. Cromwell, Lord Protector, p. 4, 5. Flagellum, &c. p. 22.

[G] So that he gave the great men concerned in this affair abundance of trouble.] The Earl of Bedford living at that time, was one of the wealthieſt, and alſo one of the wiſeſt, men in England: he had a very large eſtate in the fen country (44), and a very great influence over moſt of thoſe who had great eſtates in that neighbourhood: it was no wonder therefore that he patronized a ſcheme for improving the great work of draining, which, in a country where there are millions of acres depending upon it, muſt be always a point of very high importance. He found himſelf however, after great pains taken, and much money laid out, obliged to abandon one very probable and profitable project, for want of the power requiſite to carry it into execution (45). It was this which induced that noble Peer, and thoſe who concurred with him, in ſo great and good a deſign, to apply themſelves to the Crown for that aſſiſtance, which was requiſite to perfect the great ſcheme they had formed, and for the carrying on of which they deſired, that ſuch commiſſions of ſewers might from time to time be iſſued, as might prove neceſſary: they likewiſe, for the honour of the buſineſs, though fit to ſtile it a royal undertaking, and, as was highly reaſonable, ſettled a ſhare of the profits upon the Crown (46). But, as it was impoſſible to manage an affair of this nature, without levying a kind of land-tax upon thoſe who were to have the benefit of it, and providing that no man's private property ſhould impede the carrying on the works that were requiſite, this furniſhed a ſubject for clamour, not only againſt the undertakers, but againſt the King; which, however groundleſs and unreaſonable, was carried to a very great height; and, in a meeting held at Huntingdon in 1638, Mr. Cromwell, who had a conſiderable intereſt in thoſe parts, was very active, and by his vigilance, and plauſible ſpeeches, created a very formidable oppoſition (47); which, though it did not abſolutely ſubvert, it greatly hindered and retarded the progreſs of the works; for which theſe obſtinate people were ſeverely puniſhed in 1657, when, upon the melting of the ſnows, the banks gave way, and a conſiderable quantity of land was, at leaſt for the preſent, loſt, and a large number of cattle deſtroyed (48).

(44) Clarendon's Hiſt. Rebellion, p. 60.

(45) Warwick's Memoirs, p. 250.

(46) Dugdale's Baronage, vol. ii. p. 380.

(47) Coke's Detection, p. 106.

(48) Camden's Britannia, vol. i. p. 479.

to

to an accidental intrigue, in which himſelf had at firſt no hand; but, from the time he meddled with it, he conducted every thing with ſuch ſagacity and dexterity, that, by the help of the party, who firſt thought of him as a proper inſtrument for carrying on the cauſe, he was, to the wonder of others, and perhaps, in ſome meaſure, of his own, choſen by a great majority (n). This, which was the beginning of all his greatneſs, ought to be conſidered as a point of conſequence, and therefore we have taken ſome pains to ſet it in a proper light [H]. When he came into Parliament he ſhewed himſelf very active, was very conſtant in his attendance, and a frequent ſpeaker; though he did not, at that time, diſcover any of the great qualities which afterwards appeared in him, and which ſeemed to be called out as occaſion required; for had he at firſt been eſteemed ſo conſiderable a perſon in point of abilities as he was afterwards found, thoſe of his own party would have probably been jealous of him, and ſought his deſtruction; but he had an art of concealing his faculties, ſo that he ſeemed always fit for the ſtation in which he was, and for that only (o). He affected not only plainneſs but careleſſneſs in dreſs, was very uniform in his conduct, ſpoke warmly and roundly, but without either art or elocution. He was very forward in cenſuring what were called grievances, both in Church and State, though he had not framed to himſelf any plan of reformation. This he frankly acknowledged with reſpect to eccleſiaſtical affairs, when preſſed by Sir Thomas Chicheley and Mr. Warwick to declare his ſentiments upon that ſubject; I can tell, ſaid Mr. Cromwell, what I would not have, though I cannot tell what I would have (p). He was very zealous in promoting the Remonſtrance which was carried on the 14th of November 1641, and which in reality laid the baſis of the civil war. He ſhewed himſelf more ſanguine in his expectations upon that head, than the reſt of his party; for he thought they were ſo ſtrong, ſo ſteady, and ſo well connected; and that thoſe who were for the King were ſome of them ſo timorous, others ſo careleſs, and not a few ſo indolent, that it would have been carried almoſt without a debate; nor had he any regard to the Lord Falkland's opinion, who thought the quite contrary. But when, after a debate which laſted all day and all night, it was at length carried by ſo ſmall a majority as nine, and that rather by diſcipline than argument, (for wearineſs and fatigue were really the parents of that dear bought victory), he could not forbear ſpeaking his mind freely (q). In ſhort, he told Lord Falkland, that he would take his word another time; and, that if the Remonſtrance had not been carried, he was reſolved to have converted the ſmall remains of his eſtate into ready money the next day, and to have taken the firſt occaſion of quitting the kingdom; and this he affirmed was the ſentiment alſo of ſome of the moſt conſiderable men of the party (r). The noble Hiſtorian had reaſon therefore to ſay, upon this occaſion, that this poor nation was very near its deliverance; near it indeed! for if zeal for the Church, or duty to the King, could have kept ten more of thoſe, who made ſuch ſtrong profeſſions of both, from their ſuppers and their beds for a few hours, all the conſequences

(n) Winſtanley's Engliſh Worthies, p. 528. Wood's Faſti Oxon. vol. ii. col. 89. Flagellum, &c. p. 24, to 27. Coke's Detection, p. 160.

(o) Warwick's Memoirs, p. 248. Echard's Hiſt. of England, p. 579.

(p) Life of O. Cromwell, Lord Protector, p. 5.

(q) Echard's Hiſtory of England, p. 514, 515.

(r) Clarendon's Hiſtory of the Rebellion, p. 102, 103.

[H] And therefore we have taken ſome pains to ſet it in a proper light.] One reaſon why Mr. Cromwell quitted Huntingdon was, a diſpute he had with Mr. Bernard, upon his becoming Recorder, about precedency, a point in which he was very nice (49). After he came to Ely, he reſorted entirely to Nonconformiſts meetings, where he quickly diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his gifts, as they ſtiled them in thoſe days, in preaching, praying, and expounding (50). At one of theſe meetings he met with Richard Tims, a tradeſman at Cambridge, who rode every Sunday to Ely for the ſake of pure doctrine, and captivated his heart entirely. This man hearing that a Parliament was to be called, and being himſelf one of the Common council, took it into his head, that there could not be a fitter man to be their Burgeſs than Mr. Cromwell; and, with this notion in his brain, he went to Mr. Wildbore, a Draper in the town, who was Cromwell's relation, who agreed with him exactly as to the fitneſs of the perſon, but told him the thing was impoſſible, as he was not a freeman (51). Tims, not ſatisfied with that, addreſſed himſelf next to Mr. Evett, a Tallow-chandler, who was alſo a Puritan. He too liked the thought, but, as he was not a freeman, pronounced the deſign impracticable: however, Tims was hardly got out of his houſe before he ſent for him back, to give him a whiſper, that the Mayor had a freedom to beſtow; and that one Kitchingman, an Attorney, who had married his wife's ſiſter, and was of their party, had a great influence over him; and therefore he adviſed him to move Mr. Kitchingman in it, who was to uſe his intereſt with the Mayor, under colour that Mr. Cromwell was a Gentleman of fortune, and had a mind to come and live in the town, then but in a poor condition, but with a ſtrict charge to hide the true deſign, Alderman French, who was then Mayor, being a declared royaliſt. When they came to make this application to him, Mr. French ſaid he was ſorry, but that in reality they came too late, for he had promiſed his freedom to the King's Fiſherman. Mr. Kitchingman eaſily removed this objection, by undertaking that the town ſhould confer a freedom upon the perſon he mentioned; and ſo, at the next Court-day, the Mayor declared his intention to beſtow his freedom upon a very worthy Gentleman of the Iſle of Ely, one Mr. Cromwell, who, being apprized of his friend's induſtry, came to town over night, and took up his lodgings at Mr. Almond's, a Grocer (52). Thither the mace was ſent for him, and he came into Court dreſſed in ſcarlet richly laced with gold, and, having provided a pretty parcel of ſtrong claret and ſweetmeats, they were ſo well circulated amongſt the corporation, that they unanimouſly declared, Mr. Mayor's freeman was a very civil worthy Gentleman. When the election came on, the Mayor diſcovered his miſtake, but it was then too late, for the party amongſt the Burgeſſes was ſtrong enough to chuſe him (53), and, at the next election in the enſuing year, he threw out Mr. Meawtis, who had ſerved the Corporation in every Parliament in that reign (54). After the Corporation Act paſſed in King Charles the Second's time, this tranſaction being called to mind, occaſioned the diſplacing Alderman French, who was then Mayor alſo, which affected him ſo ſtrongly, that he was taken ſick upon it, and died in three days through downright grief; and Mr. Richard Tims, who, by this time, was become an Alderman, was degraded, for the pains he took in this tranſaction; which circumſtances occaſioned the preſerving ſo particular an account of it to poſterity (55).

(49) Flagellum, or the life of O. Cromwell, p. 23.

(50) Wood's Faſti Oxon. vol. ii. col. 59.

(51) Flagellum, &c. p. 24, 25.

(52) Coke's Detection, p. 160.

(53) Notitia Parliamentaria, vol. i. p. 164.

(54) Life of O. Cromwell, Lord Protector, p. 4, 5. Notitia Parliamentaria, vol. i. p. 164.

(55) Flagellum, or the life of Cromwell, p. 27. Wood's Faſti Oxon. vol. ii. col. 89.

of that fatal night had been prevented. This ſucceſs in the Senate ſo much ſtrengthened the courage of the victors, gave ſo much reputation to their cauſe, drew over ſo many that were wavering, and diſpirited ſuch as adhered to the King, ſo ſtrangely, that, from this time, all things went to their wiſh in the Houſe of Commons; and Mr. Cromwell's firmneſs recommended him ſo effectually to Mr. Hampden, Mr. Pym, and the reſt of the leading men on that ſide, that they took him into all their councils; which gave him, in a very ſhort ſpace, ſo clear an inſight into things, and ſo perfect a knowledge of men, that he was not only able to manage when they were removed, but even to contrive the removal of ſeveral, who, at this juncture, looked upon themſelves, and that juſtly too, as very much his ſuperiors (s). For to ſay the truth, the circumſtances of his fortune, intereſts, and connections, compared with many who were then members, and of the ſame party, would have made it very improbable, in the ſenſe of the moſt competent judges, that he ſhould ever have opened a paſſage to ſuch greatneſs, as afterwards, in ſpite of theſe very men, he obtained (t). As ſoon as the Parliament formed any ſchemes of raiſing forces for their ſervice, which was in the very beginning of the year 1642, Mr. Cromwell ſhewed his activity, by going immediately to Cambridge, where, in a ſhort ſpace of time, and with very little trouble, he raiſed a very good troop of horſe, which he commanded by virtue of a Commiſſion from the Earl of Eſſex, acting, in other reſpects, under the Lord Grey of Wark, who had the power of a Major-General in the aſſociated counties for ſome time (u). However, Capt. Cromwell, being a Member, and at the head of the Committee, knowing very well the ſenſe of the Houſe, and being thoroughly aſſured, that what he performed for their ſervice would be well accepted, did not wait for orders, but took upon him, when his men were once in readineſs, to act as he thought proper (w). He fixed his head quarters in Cambridge, where he acted with great ſeverity, towards the Univerſity more eſpecially, after he miſſed of ſeizing the plate contributed by St. John's and other loyal Colleges, for the King's ſervice (x), which many writers affirm he actually did ſeize, but that is a miſtake; though it is very certain, that he did all that in him lay, and was as near ſeizing it as could be (y) [I]. He was more ſucceſsful in his next enterprize; for being informed, that the King had appointed Sir Thomas Coningſby, Sheriff of Hertfordſhire, and had ſent him a writ, requiring him to proclaim the Earl of Eſſex and his adherents traytors, Capt. Cromwell marched with his troop directly to St. Alban's, where he ſeized Sir Thomas Coningſby for that action, and carried him priſoner to London, with which the Parliament was highly pleaſed; committed Sir Thomas to the Tower, where he lay ſeveral years, and ſeized his eſtate (z). Capt. Cromwell having received the thanks of the Houſe for this, which paſſed in the month of November, was encouraged to perform a more important ſervice; for being informed that Sir Thomas Barker, Sir John Pettus, and other Gentlemen of great families and fortunes, were met at Loweſtoft in Suffolk, for the King's ſervice, he marched thither early in the ſucceeding Spring, where he not only ſurprized, and made moſt of theſe Gentlemen priſoners, but took alſo a large quantity of arms, ammunition, and military ſtores, which they had provided (a). This enabled him to increaſe his forces, ſo that we find him ſoon after at the head of a thouſand horſe, with the title of Colonel Cromwell; and it deſerves particular notice, that, entering ſo late in life, for he was in his forty-third year before he had thoughts of appearing in a military character, he ſhould notwithſtanding, in the ſpace of a few months, not only raiſe the reputation of an officer, but really become a very good one (b); and, which is ſtill ſtranger, ſhould, by mere dint of diſcipline, make his new raiſed men excellent ſoldiers, and lay the foundation of that invincible ſtrength which was afterwards exerted on the behalf of the Parliament. That all this is ſtrictly true, we

(s) Memoirs of Denzil Lord Hollis, p. 3. Warwick's Memoirs, p. 251. Winſtanley's Engl. Worthies, p. 528.

(t) Coke's Detection, p. 161.

(u) May's Hiſt. of the Parliament, B. iii. p. 79. Winſtanley's Engliſh Worthies, p. 529. Perfect Politician, p. 3, 4.

(x) Life of Dr. Barwick, p. 25.

(y) Winſtanley's Engliſh Worthies, p. 529. Perfect Politician, p. 4.

(w) Flagellum, or the life and death of O. Cromwell, p. 32.

(z) Chauncey's Hiſtorical Antiquities of Hertfordſhire, p. 462. May's Hiſt. of the Parliament, B. iii. p. 79.

(a) Flagellum, or the life and death of O. Cromwell, p. 34. Winſtanley's Engl. Worthies, p. 529. Heath's Chron. p. 59.

(b) Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 131. Heath's Chron. p. 60. Rapin's Hiſt. of England, 8*vo*. vol. xiii. p. 145.

[I] And was as near ſeizing it as could be.] The King wrote a letter to the Vice-chancellor, Dr. Richard Holdſworth, Maſter of Emanuel College, dated June 29th, 1642, ſignifying the extreme want he was then in, ſo as not to have wherewithal to ſubſiſt his private family; upon which the Univerſity reſolved to ſend his Majeſty a ſmall ſupply, which, though no way adequate to his occaſions, or to their zeal for his ſervice, was, however, as much as lay in their power. What the ſum might be appears not; only it is certain, that the loyal College of St. John's ſent one hundred and fifty pounds in money, and two thouſand ſixty five ounces of plate. It was for the ſhare they had in this tranſaction that Dr. Beale, Maſter of St. John's, Dr. Martin, Provoſt of Queen's, and Dr. Sterne, Maſter of Jeſus College, were by Cromwell carried up priſoners to London, where they ſuffered a long impriſonment in the Tower (56). Many Members of the Univerſity were much worſe treated, being kept priſoners for a long time in the hold of a ſhip in the river, and that too in very ſevere weather; and the three heads before-mentioned ſhared in proceſs of time the ſame fate, and were in danger of ſuffering ſtill worſe, one Rigby, a Lawyer, having twice moved, that they ſhould be ſold as ſlaves at Algiers, or ſent as tranſports to the plantations, becauſe he had contracted with two merchants for the purchaſe of them (57). The perſon intruſted with this ſmall treaſure was Mr. Barnaby Oley, Preſident of Clare Hall, who, being very well acquainted with the bye-ways, ſet out with a ſmall party of horſe the very night in which Cromwell took poſt upon the common road, and had the good fortune to bring it ſafe to his Royal Maſter, at the very time he ſet up his ſtandard at Nottingham (58). It was, very probably, not long after this that Mr. Cromwell had a very remarkable interview with his uncle, which Sir Philip Warwick had from the good old Gentleman's mouth, and therefore we ſhall give it in his own words.

'Viſiting old Sir Oliver Cromwell, his uncle and godfather, at his houſe at Ramſey, he told me this ſtory of his ſucceſsful nephew and godſon, that he viſited him with a good ſtrong party of horſe; and that he aſked him his bleſſing; and that the few hours he was there, he would not keep on his hat in his preſence; but at the ſame time he not only diſarmed but plundered him, for he took away all his plate (59).'

(56) May's Hiſt. of the Parliament of England, B. iii. p. 79. Querela Cantabrigienſis, p. 2, 3, 4. Life of Dr. Barwick, p. 41.

(57) Dugdale's Short view of the late troubles, p. 577.

(58) Life of Dr. Barwick, p. 26, 27.

(59) Warwick's Memoirs, p. 251.

have have not only the authority of his own aſſertion to prove, and he was not a vain man, but that likewiſe of the beſt writers on all ſides, who agree perfectly well in this point, and in the principal circumſtances relating to it (c) [K]. In the Spring of the year 1643, having ſettled all things in the ſix aſſociated counties, viz. Eſſex, Hertford, Norfolk, Suffolk, Cambridge, and Huntingdon, he advanced into Lincolnſhire, which was now added to the number, having diſarmed in his paſſage ſuch as he took to be diſaffected in Huntingdonſhire, and increaſed his forces to about two thouſand men (d). Here he did very great ſervice by reſtraining the King's garriſon of Newark, gave a check to the Earl of Newcaſtle's troops at Horncaſtle, and performed many other things, of which mention is made by thoſe who have written the hiſtory of this fatal war; which gained him ſtill farther credit with the Parliament, and more eſpecially with that party, which meant to proſecute things to extremity, and till they ſhould be terminated by compleat victory on their ſide (e). It was to accompliſh theſe views that new armies, under the Earl of Mancheſter and Sir William Waller, were ſet on foot, and in the former, though the Earl had the title, yet the power was chiefly in Cromwell; for things were ſo dexterouſly managed between him and his friends at Weſtminſter, that, as they knew they might depend upon all in his power, ſo they took care to put as much in his power as they could (f) [L]. The (c) Conference on the Parliament's deſiring him to take on him the title of King. Lond. 1680. 8*vo.* p. 38, 39. Bates's Elenchus Motuum, p. 238, 239. Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 72.

(d) Winſtanley's Engliſh Worthies, p. 529. Perfect Politician, p. 5.

(e) Flagellum, or the life and death of Cromwell, p. 35. Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 131. Lord Hollis's Memoirs, p. 5.

(f) Bates's Elenchus Motuum, p. 59. Warwick's Memoirs, p. 245. Flagellum, or life of O. Cromwell, p. 45.

[K] Who agree perfectly well in this point, and in the circumſtances relating to it.] When he firſt raiſed his troop of horſe, he gave a very ſingular ſpecimen of his ſkill in purging; for, not doubting that ſome of them might prove cowards, he deviſed a moſt effectual method of diſcovering which they were, by poſting twelve men in ambuſcade, who ruſhed out upon them at their firſt muſter. Upon this twenty of them rode out of the field as faſt as their horſes could carry them; and theſe Mr. Cromwell diſmiſſed, and liſted bolder fellows in their places (60). We are told, by a writer of great credit, that Cromwell's brave regiment of horſe were his countrymen, moſt of them freeholders, or freeholders ſons, men who had ſomething to loſe beſides their lives, and who, upon all occaſions, gave the ſtrongeſt teſtimonies of ſteadineſs and reſolution (61). A learned perſon, who knew him well, and loved him little, accounts for this clearly, by giving us a ſketch of his method of managing them (62). 'He uſed 'them, ſays he, daily to look after, feed, and dreſs 'their horſes, and, when it was neceſſary, to lie to-'gether on the ground, and beſides, taught them to 'clean and keep their arms bright, and have them 'ready for ſervice; to chuſe the beſt armour, and to 'arm themſelves to the beſt advantage. Trained up 'in this kind of military exerciſe, they excelled all 'their fellow-ſoldiers in feats of war, and obtained 'more victories over the enemy. Theſe were after-'wards preferred to be commanders and officers in the 'army, and their places filled up with luſty ſtrong fel-'lows, whom he brought up in the ſame ſtrictneſs of 'diſcipline.' But Cromwell's own account is far clearer, and more ſatisfactory, than any, and cannot therefore but be welcome to the judicious reader (63). 'I was,' ſaid he, in one of his ſpeeches, 'a perſon 'that, from my firſt employment, was ſuddenly pre-'ferred, and lifted up, from leſſer truſts to greater. 'From my firſt being captain of a troop of horſe, I 'did labour, as well as I could, to diſcharge my truſt, 'and God bleſſed me, as it pleaſed him. I had a 'very worthy friend then, and he was a very noble 'perſon, and I know his memory is very grateful to 'all; Mr. John Hampden was the perſon. At my 'firſt going out into this engagement, I ſaw our men 'were beaten on every hand. I did indeed, and de-'ſired him that he would make ſome additions to my 'Lord of Eſſex's army, of ſome new regiments. And 'I told him, it would be ſerviceable to him in bringing 'ſuch men in as I thought had a ſpirit, that would 'do ſomething in the work. Your troops, ſaid I, 'are moſt of them old decayed ſerving-men and tap-'ſters, and ſuch kind of fellows; and their troops 'are Gentlemens younger ſons, and perſons of good 'quality. And do you think, that the mean ſpirits 'of ſuch baſe and mean fellows will ever be able to 'encounter Gentlemen, that have honour, and cou-'rage, and reſolution, in them? You muſt get men 'of a ſpirit, and, take it not ill what I ſay, 'of a ſpirit that is likely to go on as far as Gentle-'men will go, or elſe I am ſure you will be beaten 'ſtill: I told him ſo. He was a wiſe and worthy 'perſon, and he did think that I talked a good notion, 'but an impracticable one. I told him I could do 'ſomewhat in it: and I accordingly raiſed ſuch men 'as had the fear of God before them, and made ſome 'conſcience of what they did. And, from that day 'forward, they were never beaten, but, wherever they 'were engaged againſt the enemy, they beat conti-'nually.' We are told by Echard (64), that the very firſt time he muſtered his troops, he dealt with them very plainly; that he would not cozen them by the perplexed expreſſion in his commiſſion, to fight for King and Parliament, but that if the King chanced to be in the body of the enemy, he would as ſoon diſcharge his piſtol upon him, as any private perſon; and if their conſciences would not permit them to do the like, he adviſed them not to liſt themſelves under him. This, as the Archdeacon obſerves, was thought very bold at that time; and yet, whoever conſiders it attentively will ſee, that it was very politickly ſpoken; for, in the firſt place, it let his ſoldiers into the true notion of what was required from them before they came to action, and, conſequently, before it was expected from them; ſo that this commander and his men were never at a loſs about each other's meaning: and, ſecondly, it gave the heads of the party a juſt hint of his reſolution; whence they ſaw, that he was a man determined, whom they might rely upon in going all lengths, and whom no propoſitions, how high or extraordinary ſo ever, could aſtoniſh; agreeably to Mr. Hampden's notions of him at the beginning of the troubles (65), and his own behaviour during the continuance and to the very end of the war.

(60) Flagellum, or the life of O. Cromwell, p. 33.

(61) Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 72.

(62) Bates's Elenchus Motuum, p. 239.

(63) Conference on the Parliament's deſiring him to take the title of King, p. 38, 39.

(64) Echard's Hiſt. of England, p. 579.

(65) Sir Richard Bulſtrode's Memoirs, p. 193.

[L] So they took care to put as much in his power as they could.] It muſt be confeſſed, that how deficient ſoever we are in reſpect to good hiſtories of other periods of time, yet, in reference to this of the civil war, we have as many, and thoſe too as conſiderable lights, as can well be deſired, either in regard to general regular compoſitions, or in reference to private memoirs, and on both ſides of the queſtion; ſo that if any judicious and impartial perſon will carefully read, and give himſelf time cautiouſly to compare, what all theſe authors have advanced on any point, he will not find it extremely difficult to fix his judgment about it. The matter we will endeavour to explain in this note is, the ſubdiviſion of the views with which the leading members in the Parliament at Weſtminſter began the war; for though themſelves, and their Hiſtorian Mr. May, would turn this upon the King (66), yet, from the dates of the commiſſions, and from many other unanſwerable reaſons alledged by Mr. Coke (67), who was no very zealous Royaliſt, it is inconteſtibly proved, that the Parliament began the war; and the buſineſs is to know why they began it: for, though numbers of men may concur in one joint reſolution, yet it cannot be thence inferred, that they are all governed by the ſame reaſons, or all aim to bring about the ſame end. Yet it muſt be allowed, that concurring in one reſolution may ground a preſumption, that ſuch perſons are of the ſame opinion; and the contrary of this can only be made appear from their ſubſequent behaviour:

(66) May's Hiſt of the Parliament, B. ii. p. 47.

(67) Coke's Detection, p. 149—155.

The Scots having been invited into England by that party to whom Cromwell adhered, it was judged highly requiſite that the army under the Earl of Mancheſter, and Cromwell, who was now declared Lieutenant-General of the Horſe, ſhould join them, the better to enable them to reduce York, which they had cloſely beſieged. This ſervice, very important in itſelf, was executed with great vigour and diligence, more eſpecially by Cromwell, who, with all his horſe, made a ſwift and ſurprizing march, ſo as to join the Scots unexpectedly (g). In the battle of Marſton-Moor, July 3d, 1644, it is unanimouſly agreed, that Cromwell's cavalry, who were commonly ſtiled Ironſides, changed the fortune of the day, as that did of the war; for the King's affairs declined, and the Parliament's flouriſhed, ever after (b). It is, I ſay, agreed, that all the ſucceſs here was attributed to Cromwell's forces, and, by many good writers, to him who headed and animated them, whereas others give the honour entirely to his men; and would have us believe, that his behaviour was far from being extraordinary (i)[M]. However this matter might (g) Heath's Chronicle, p. 60. Winſtanley's Engliſh Worthies, p. 530. Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 93.

(b) Clarendon's Hiſt. Rebellion, p. 402. Echard's Hiſt. England, p. 597. Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 94.

(i) Memoirs of Denzil Lord Hollis, p. 16, 17, 18. Sir Roger Manley's Hiſtory of Rebellions, p. 71.

for if, after going a certain ſpace together, theſe people divide, and take ſeparate roads, it is plain they had from the beginning different intentions, which remained ſo long concealed as all parties remained under the perſuaſion that they might travel with advantage together, and be, at the ſame time, advancing towards that point which each of them deſired to reach (68). This then was the caſe of the Members who remained at Weſtminſter: they all of them judged, that taking up arms was a thing expedient; and, from the meaſures they afterwards purſued, we may, with great probability at leaſt, if not with certainty, diſcover, what the motives were that led them to concur in this firſt ſtep. Now, not to perplex ourſelves, or the reader, with too great nicety, or more than neceſſary diſtinctions, we ſhall be content to obſerve, that, from their future conduct, it clearly appears, there were three great parties in this Parliament. The firſt was compoſed of ſuch as meant to reduce the Prerogative within narrower bounds, to ſecure the liberties of the people, and to prevent Miniſters from miſleading the King, or his ſucceſſors, into acts of arbitrary power with impunity. Without doubt theſe Gentlemen were right in their intentions; but, whether they purſued a method conſiſtent with the Conſtitution, is another queſtion; which, however determined, will ſtill leave it certain, that they did not aim to overturn the Conſtitution. The heads of this party were Mr. Hollis, Mr. Hampden, Mr. Pym, Sir John Maynard, Sir Philip Stapylton, &c. and, at the beginning of the war, this party had the majority in the Houſe of Commons (69). The ſecond were, from the beginning, bent upon changing the Conſtitution, overturning the Monarchy, and ſettling a Republic: the chief heads of this faction were Mr. Oliver St. John, Sir Arthur Haſlerig, Sir Henry Ludlow, and, after his deceaſe, his ſon, Mr. Liſle, Sir Henry Vane, Sir Henry Mildmay, Mr. Corbet, &c. (70). The third party might be ſaid to be without any ſettled principles, as being chiefly bent upon getting what they could for themſelves, and ſteering in ſuch a manner, in this dangerous ſtorm of their own raiſing, as might contribute to their own ſafety and proſperity, with no regard whatever, either to the King or Kingdom. Amongſt theſe Mr. Cromwell, Mr. Henry Martin, Mr. Thomas Chaloner, Sir Thomas Widdrington, and many others, might be reckoned (71). The diviſion that is commonly made in reſpect to religion, making the firſt Preſbyterians, and the two laſt parties Independants, is not very clear in itſelf, and, at the ſame time, far from being conſiſtent with truth. Some of the firſt party were very well inclined to the eſtabliſhed religion; and, notwithſtanding they diſliked ſome Biſhops, had no averſion at all to Epiſcopacy (72). On the other hand, many of the other two parties were well enough ſatisfied with the Preſbyterian diſcipline, if it could have been moulded ſo as to ſerve their civil purpoſes (73). If indeed it be neceſſary to aſſign a religion to each of theſe parties, the title of Preſbyterians may well enough become the firſt, that of Independents will ſit better upon the ſecond, but, truly, as to the religion of the third, it wants a name: ſome of them indeed profeſſed they had no religion, ſuch as Chaloner and Martin, and, without breach of charity, one may ſay, there might be others of this ſect in their heart, though they profeſſed a great deal. It is requiſite to obſerve, that there were in reality but two parties among the Lords, that is, ſuch as meant well to the public, ſuch as the Earls of Bedford, Eſſex, Mancheſter, &c. and ſuch as meant well to themſelves, as the Earls of Saliſbury, Warwick, the Lord Grey, and a few others (74). This brief account of parties is the true key to the underſtanding the hiſtory of thoſe times; and, as it may be very uſeful towards forming a right notion of other articles, ſo this would be abſolutely unintelligible without it.

(68) Remarks on the conduct of the long Parliament, p. 75.

(69) Memoirs of Denzil Lord Hollis, p. 3, 4, 5.

(70) Warwick's Memoirs, p. 183.

(71) Behemoth, by T. Hobbs, p. 4, 5, 6, 7.

(72) See Clarendon, Echard, Bates, Dugdale, Warwick, &c.

(73) As appears by their conforming during all the time that Preſbytery was eſtabliſhed.

(74) Memoirs of Denzil Lord Hollis, p. 155, 156. Behemoth, by T. Hobbs, p. 233.

[M] That his behaviour was far from being extraordinary.] In order to juſtify what is ſaid in the text, we muſt produce a very famous paſſage from the work of a noble author, who was himſelf very deeply engaged in theſe affairs, and who wrote this account when the perſon he reflects on was living (75). 'However, Lieutenant-General Cromwell, ſays he, had the impudence and boldneſs to aſſume much of the honour of it to himſelf, or rather, Herod like, to ſuffer others to magnify him and adore him for it; for I can ſcarcely believe he ſhould be ſo impudent to give it out himſelf, ſo conſcious as he muſt be of his own baſe cowardlineſs. Thoſe who did the principal ſervice that day were Major-General Leſley, who commanded the Scots horſe, Major-General Crawford, who was Major-General to the Earl of Mancheſter's Brigade, and Sir Thomas Fairfax, who, under his father, commanded the Northern Brigade. But my friend Cromwell had neither part nor lot in the buſineſs, for I have ſeveral times heard it from Crawford's own mouth; and I think I ſhall not be miſtaken, if I ſay Cromwell himſelf has heard it from him; for he once ſaid it aloud in Weſtminſter-Hall, when Cromwell paſſed by him, with a deſign he might hear him; that when the whole army at Marſton-Moor was in a fair poſſibility to be utterly routed, and a great part of it running, he ſaw the body of horſe of that Brigade ſtanding ſtill, and, to his ſeeming, doubtful which way to charge, backward or forward, when he came up to them, in a great paſſion reviling them with the name of poltroons and cowards, and aſked them if they would ſtand ſtill and ſee the day loſt? Whereupon Cromwell ſhewed himſelf, and, in a pitiful voice, ſaid, Major-General, what ſhall I do? he begging pardon for what he ſaid, not knowing he was there, towards whom he knew his diſtance, as to his ſuperior officer, told him, Sir, if you charge not all is loſt; Cromwell anſwered, He was wounded, and was not able to charge; his great wound being a little burn in the neck, by the accidental going off behind him of one of his ſoldier's piſtols. Then Crawford deſired him to go off the field, and, ſending one away with him, who very readily followed wholeſome advice, led them on himſelf, which was not the duty of his place, and as little for Cromwell's honour, as it proved to be much for the advancement of his and his party's pernicious deſigns. This I have but by relation, yet I eaſily believe it upon the credit of the reporter, who was a man of honour, that was not aſhamed nor afraid to publiſh it in all places. Beſides, I have heard a parallel ſtory of his valour from another perſon, Colonel Dalbiere, not inferior either in quality or reputation to Major-General Crawford, who told me, that, when Baſing-houſe was ſtormed, Cromwell, inſtead of leading on his men, ſtood a good diſtance off, out of gun-ſhot, behind a hedge. And ſomething I can might be, it is very certain, that, on the 19th, Cromwell ſtormed the Earl of Exeter's fine houſe at Burleigh; and the courage and conduct of the Lieutenant-General was the theme of every tongue, and no man's fortune or ſervices ſo much valued at London (k). He was alſo in the ſecond battle at Newbury, September 17th, in the ſame year; and is ſaid to have made ſo bold a charge with his Horſe upon the Guards, that his Majeſty's perſon had been in the utmoſt danger, if the old Earl of Cleveland had not come in to his relief, and preſerved his maſter's liberty at the expence of his own (l). In the winter the diſputes in Parliament ran higher than ever: nothing but Cromwell's merit and good fortune were talked of by his party; and ſome of whom blaſphemouſly ſtiled him, the Saviour of the Nation (m). Yet, notwithſtanding this, the wiſeſt men, and the beſt patriots, ſaw very clearly to what theſe exceſſive praiſes tended; and, that the nation might be made as ſenſible in this reſpect as themſelves, the Earl of Mancheſter exhibited a charge againſt him in the Houſe of Lords, and Lieutenant-General Cromwell, not to be in his debt, brought in another charge againſt the noble Peer in the Houſe of Commons (n). It is true, that neither of theſe charges were proſecuted; but it is nevertheleſs true, that General Cromwell and his friends abſolutely carried their point, by bringing in what was called the ſelf-denying ordinance (o), that excluded the Members of either Houſe from having any commands in the army; from which however, on the ſcore of his extraordinary merit, that ſet him above all ordinances, Lieutenant-General Cromwell was at firſt occaſionally, at length abſolutely, exempted. This victory in Parliament was ſtill of greater conſequence than that of Marſton-Moor; for, as that turned the fortune of the war, ſo this determined the fate of the King and Kingdom (p) [N]. Upon the introduction of the (k) Bates's Elenchus Motuum, p. 65.

(75) Memoirs of Denzil Lord Hollis, p. 15, 16, 17.

(l) Heath's Chronicle, p. 65. Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 149.

(m) The Civil Wars of Great Britain and Ireland, p. 122.

(n) Heath's Chronicle, p. 66.

(o) Warwick's Memoirs, p. 283.

(p) Hollis's Memoirs, p. 35, 36.

I can deliver of him upon my knowledge, which makes paſſage for the eaſier belief of both theſe, and aſſures me, that that man is as errant a coward as he is notoriouſly perfidious, ambitious, and hypocritical. This was, his baſe keeping out of the field at Keinton battle, where he, with his troop of horſe, came not in, impudently and ridiculouſly affirming the day after, that he had been all that day ſeeking the army, and place of fight, though his quarters were but at a village near hand, whence he could not find his way, nor be directed by his ear, when the ordnance was heard, as I have been credibly informed, twenty or thirty miles off; ſo that certainly he is far from the man he is taken for.' His keeping out of the field at the battle of Keinton has been taken notice of by Sir Roger Manley, who ſays, that Cromwell went to the top of a ſteeple, whence perceiving part of the Earl of Eſſex's army routed, he was in ſuch haſte to get down, that, inſtead of deſcending the ſtairs, he ſwung himſelf to to the bottom by the belly-rope (76). This we find confirmed likewiſe by Sir William Dugdale: yet neither of theſe writers mention this to the prejudice of Cromwell's character for courage: on the contrary, they regard it as an inſtance how much the human temper and diſpoſition may be changed from the effects of boundleſs ambition, and the force of a long continued habit (77). It is alſo to be remembered, that Colonel Dalbiere, one of Lord Hollis's witneſſes, was, at the beginning of the war, a great favourite of Cromwell's, who made uſe of his advice to keep his troops in better order (78); but, as he differed with him afterwards, it is not at all impoſſible that there might be a ſtrong mixture of reſentment in what Dalbiere delivered upon this ſubject (79). Major-General Crawford was likewiſe a competitor with Cromwell, and beſides, a great friend to the Earl of Mancheſter (80), to whom Cromwell was a profeſſed enemy. The accounts we have of the battle of Marſton-Moor from the Royaliſts, unanimouſly attribute the loſs of that day in a manner ſolely to Cromwell.

(76) Hiſt. of the Rebellions of England, p. 49.

(77) Short view of the late troubles, p. 110.

(78) Flagellum, or the life of O. Cromwell, p. 21.

(79) It was Cromwell's policy to find fit men for his purpoſes, and when they grew unfit, to diſcard them.

(80) Memoirs of Denzil Lord Hollis, p. 15.

[N] So this determined the fate of the King and Kingdom.] As we have, in a former note, given the reader an account of the ſeveral parties in the Parliament at the breaking out of the civil war, there will be no great difficulty in making him clearly comprehend how this great change was brought about, by which that aſſembly manifeſted an intention at leaſt, inconſiſtent with, if not directly repugnant to, that which they had ſhewn at the beginning. While the firſt of the three parties had the majority, they were very deſirous, that as much of the executive power of the Government as poſſible might be in the hands of their friends, that they might always know whom they had to truſt. Many of them being, by this means, at a diſtance from Weſtminſter, left the other parties, who generally voted together, much ſtronger than they would otherwiſe have been; and this ſtrength they made uſe of to fill moſt of the Committees with their friends, which procured them great intereſt in the country, drew over many to their party, and, whenever exceptions were taken to a Member's character, they had commonly ſtrength enough to vote him out as a malignant, and to bring one of their own party in (81). Cromwell was the officer in the army in whom theſe people moſt confided, and he was obliged to make great profeſſions of his willingneſs to ſerve them, becauſe, through a ſeries of untoward accidents, he was become very obnoxious to what was ſtiled the Preſbyterian intereſt. He had ſeen enough of the Scots when in Yorkſhire to be ſatisfied, that they by no means meant a change of Government in the ſenſe that his friends did, and for this he hated them heartily. His averſion to the Earl of Eſſex was as warm as implacable: he judged that he was but half an enemy to the King, which produced that Nobleman a whole enemy in himſelf. Beſides, he was informed, that the Earl of Eſſex had held a private meeting with the Earl of Loudon, the Scotch Chancellor, to concert meaſures for ſeizing and impeaching him, which he could never forgive (82). Add to all this, that his quarrel with the Earl of Mancheſter came to a very great height, as appears from what is ſaid in the text, and therefore we ſhall mention but one circumſtance of it here. He propoſed, in diſcourſe to that noble Lord, ſomething of an extraordinary nature, to which his Lordſhip expreſſed a doubt, whether the Parliament might be brought to conſent; to which Cromwell immediately replied, My Lord, if you will ſtick firm to honeſt men, you will find an army at your command that will give law both to King and Parliament (83). After premiſing theſe points, we may, without fear of being miſunderſtood, proceed to obſerve, that the party to which he adhered in Parliament comprehending perfectly his intentions, and confiding in his attachment to them, reſolved to make an effort to gain ſuch a ſuperiority, as might enable them to end the war in that manner, and with that expedition, which ſuited beſt with their deſign. In order to effect this they began to complain privately, of want of zeal in ſome of their great officers, and publickly of want of diſcipline in their army. To remedy both theſe it was propoſed, that, for the future, ſuch as had ſeats in either Houſe ſhould be diſqualified from having commands in the army; whence the intended law had the title of the SELF-DENYING ORDINANCE, and the armies, when put under this direction, were ſaid to be of the new model (84). The reader muſt obſerve, with what craft this party improved the abſence of the leading men on the other ſide, to gain a prevalence in Parliament; and now being

(81) The whole of this matter is thoroughly diſcuſſed in a treatiſe intituled. The Myſteries of the two Junto's, Preſbyterian and Independant, printed in 1648. 4*to*.

(82) Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 116. Wood's Athen. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 546.

(83) Clarendon's Hiſt. Rebellion, vol. iv. p. 561, 562.

(84) Hiſt. Independency, P. i. p. 4. Clarendon's Hiſt. Rebellion, p. 422. 435. 443. Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 118, 119—138, &c.

the new model, as it was called, the chief command of the army was given to Sir Thomas Fairfax, and, from being Lieutenant-General of the Horſe, Cromwell became Lieutenant-General of the Army; nor was it long before he gave a ſpecimen of his great ſkill in Politics, by procuring an addreſs from his regiment, declaring their ſatisfaction (q) with the change; which was a precedent ſoon followed by the reſt, and upon the heels of this, as ſtrong an inſtance of his military abilities (r). For, attacking the Earl of Northampton with a body of the King's forces at Iſlip Bridge, he routed them entirely, took four hundred horſe, two hundred men, and the Queen's ſtandard (s). The ſame good fortune attended him at Radcod-Bridge, where he beat Sir William Vaughan, and took him, and a great part of his troops, priſoners (t). He puſhed his good fortune to the utmoſt, and, April 24th, 1645, attacked Blechingdon-Houſe, in which Colonel Windebank had a garriſon. The place indeed was very indifferently fortified; but, as Cromwell had only horſe, he knew it was impoſſible to take it if defended, and thereupon ordered his men, as they approached, to cry out, fall on foot (u). His very name had terrified abundance of Ladies, who came to compliment the Governor upon his marriage, and this cry of fall on foot diſconcerted the Colonel himſelf, who, confounded with the cries of the women, and knowing the place was not tenable againſt infantry, ſurrendered; for which he was, ten days after, ſhot at Oxford (w). But Cromwell had not the like ſucceſs againſt Farringdon-Houſe, where Sir George Liſle commanded, though ſupported by ſix hundred foot; and he afterwards received a check from General Goring (x). At this time the King threatening the aſſociated counties, which had not been attacked during the war, the Parliament ordered Cromwell into the Iſle of Ely, where he had the power, if not the title of Governor (y). At the requeſt of Fairfax, however, he had orders to return to the army, which he accordingly did; and being informed, that the King intended to march northward, adviſed Sir Thomas Fairfax to prevent that, by fighting his Majeſty; which brought on the battle of Naſeby, June 14th, 1645, in which Cromwell commanded the right wing, and his ſon-in-law Ireton the left; and here it was that the King loſt all through the temerity of Prince Rupert (z), and the confeſſed conduct and courage of Cromwell, who, when Ireton was routed, and taken priſoner, charged the King's foot, and, with much danger to his own perſon, entirely broke them (a). He proſecuted the ſucceſs of this day with the ſame vivacity which acquired it. In a month's time he defeated General Goring, and reduced moſt of the King's garriſons in Hampſhire and Wiltſhire; defeated and cut to pieces the poor Clubmen (b); and, having made himſelf Maſter of the Devizes, Wincheſter, and Baſing-Houſe, with the perſon of the Marquis of Wincheſter, its maſter, he, for theſe ſervices, received the thanks of both Houſes (c). Afterwards joining Sir Thomas Fairfax, he had his ſhare in reducing the Weſt, till, upon the ſurrender of Exeter, April 13th, 1646, he found leiſure to return to London, in order to receive thoſe rewards (d) which the party he had ſo effectually ſerved were very willing to beſtow, and of which, as an earneſt, they had voted him the ſum of two thouſand five hundred pounds a year, the greateſt part of which was to be taken out of the eſtate of the Marquis of Wincheſter in Hampſhire (e). Upon his taking his ſeat

(q) Heath's Chronicle, p. 67.
(r) Winſtanley's Engliſh Worthies, p. 531.
(s) The Civil Wars of England, p. 154.
(t) The Perfect Politician, p. 9.
(u) Flagellum, or life and death of Cromwell, p. 41. Echard's Hiſt. of England, p. 614.
(w) Heath's Chronicle, p. 74, 75. Echard's Hiſt. of England, p. 614.
(x) Heath's Chr. p. 74, 75.
(y) Memoirs of Denzil Lord Hollis, p. 35.
(z) Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 150. Ruſhworth, vol. vi. p. 42. 44. Heath's Chronicle, p. 77. Echard's Hiſt. of Eng. p. 615, 616.
(a) Dugdale's Short view of the troubles, p. 200.
(b) The Civil Wars of Great Britain and Ireland, p. 163.
(c) Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 189.
(d) Flagellum, or the life and death of O. Cromwell, p. 46.
(e) Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 180, 181.

being pretty ſure of that, they made uſe of it to ſecure to their ſide the army. Yet it is not at all impoſſible, that they might have failed in this bold project, if they had not inſiſted upon theſe two popular points, of putting a ſhort end to the war, and of providing againſt civil and military power reſting in the ſame hands; for theſe gained to them the timorous and the weak of the other party, becauſe the former were afraid to oppoſe men who talked in ſo high a ſtrain, and the latter were actually impoſed upon by the ſolemnity of their profeſſions. By the paſſing of the Self-denying Ordinance, and the new modelling of the army, the Preſbyterians loſt their power, and the King all hopes of making a good peace, or, to ſay the truth, any peace at all. The firſt appeared by the little reſpect ſhewn to thoſe Members, both Lords and Commons, who had hazarded their lives and fortunes for the Parliament, and the ſeverity with which thoſe were proſecuted, who were ſuſpected of an inclination to return again to the King's obedience; the latter, from the leaving out in the new commiſſion of Sir Thomas Fairfax, the clauſe for the ſecurity of the King's perſon (85). In the courſe of the debates which aroſe upon this ſubject in the Houſe of Commons, for it did not paſs there without very high debates, Mr. Cromwell ſpoke vehemently on the ſide of the Bill, and, when ſome expreſſed a ſuſpicion, that this new diſcipline, though it made the army better ſoldiers, would go near to make them worſe ſubjects, he undertook for the contrary, more eſpecially for his own regiment, which, he ſaid, would fight or not fight, ſerve or not ſerve, juſt as the Parliament pleaſed, to whoſe orders they owed an implicit obedience, which they never had, or ever would, forfeit in any degree (86). It is thought, and not without reaſon, that many voted for the new model from their credulity in this reſpect, and from the certainty which they thought they had, that Cromwell would loſe his command as well as the Earls of Eſſex and Manchester, Sir William Waller, and the reſt. In this however they were ſtrangely diſappointed; for notwithſtanding Cromwell went to make a viſit to the new General, in which he declared his willingneſs to reſign his command; yet that ſubmiſſive, that well-diſpoſed, that implicitly obedient regiment, for whom he had ſo roundly undertaken, mutinied upon this occaſion, and refuſed to ſerve without their old Commander Cromwell at their head (87). Upon this the Parliament diſpenſed with the ordinance in reſpect to him, at firſt for twenty days, then for forty, and at length, Sir Thomas Fairfax being unwilling to loſe ſo able an aſſiſtant, for good and all; and thus, when it was too late, thoſe who had been cheated into an approbation of this ſcheme, ſaw their miſtake, and repented of their deluſion (88). By this refined piece of management the Independants, with the aſſiſtance of Cromwell, triumphed both in the Parliament and in the Army. We ſhall hereafter ſee how, by the aſſiſtance of the latter, he triumphed over them in their turn (89). Theſe are the great points of hiſtory that ought to be ſifted out, and ſet in their true light: theſe are thoſe ſhining particulars that diſtinguiſh Biographical Memoirs; and theſe are thoſe important ſecrets that are ſo ſeldom explained in a ſatisfactory manner in general hiſtories, where the courſe of events is more regarded than the ſprings of action, whence thoſe events ariſe.

(85) Heath's Chronicle, p. 74.
(86) Memoirs of Denzil Lord Hollis, p. 35.
(87) Flagellum, or the life and death of O. Cromwell, p. 40. Memoirs of Denzil Lord Hollis, p. 35.
(88) Hiſt. of Independency. Hollis and Warwick's Memoirs.
(89) See Clarendon, Heath, Echard, and all the Hiſtorians of thoſe times.

in the Houſe, thanks were returned to him, in terms as ſtrong as words could expreſs; and the prevailing party in the Houſe received from him ſuch encouragement, as induced them to believe he was wholly at their devotion (f) [O]. But in this they were miſtaken: for, while they thought the Lieutenant-General buſy in doing their buſineſs, he was in reality attentive only to his own; but covered all his deſigns with ſuch wondrous dexterity, that they were diſcerned only by a few, and of thoſe there were ſcarcely any that durſt ſpeak their thoughts plainly: neither did their ſpeaking avail, ſince the majority were of another mind, and ſome extraordinary methods were practiſed, to procure and preſerve a majority that ſhould be of that mind always (g). That party in the Parliament which began the war for the ſake of redreſſing grievances, and to ſet ſome bounds to the Prerogative, were now ſincerely deſirous of making an end of the war, to which they thought nothing could contribute ſo much, as having the King's perſon in their hands; for which reaſon orders were ſent to Sir Thomas Fairfax to beſiege Oxford (h). Others would have been better pleaſed with the King's eſcape, becauſe it was more likely to promote the deſign of continuing the army. Accordingly, April 27th, the King quitted Oxford, to go and put himſelf into the hands of the Scots. This was preciſely what the Independants wanted, becauſe it made long treaties neceſſary, not with the King only, but with the Scots (i). The latter demanded vaſt ſums of money, under the notion of arrears; but Lieutenant-General Cromwell, and his party, who did not either love or value them, oppoſed ſuch a negotiation as this, as injurious to the honour of the nation, upon a ſuppoſition that this might induce the Scots to join with the King, embark their cauſe and his on the ſame bottom, and produce thereby a ſecond war (k). It was to promote this that they puſhed things ſo far in Parliament, as to procure an Order of the Houſe of Commons, for burning the propoſals that had been made them by the Scotch Commiſſioners, by the hands of the common hangman. This, however, prevented the two nations from agreeing with his Majeſty, and produced ſome ill blood on both ſides, yet none of thoſe heats and tumults that were expected; for at length a bargain was made in the beginning of Auguſt, that the Scots ſhould deliver up the King to the Engliſh for the ſum of two hundred thouſand pounds, to be paid them immediately, and the like ſum ſoon after (l). The Parliament Commiſſioners accordingly received him with very great civility and reſpect; and this having ſet open a very wide door, perſons of all ages, ſexes, and ranks, were aſſiduous in paying, as far as they were permitted, their duty to him (m). To free the people from the burthens under which they laboured, and, at the ſame time, to ſtrengthen their own authority by leſſening that of the army, the Parliament inclined to diſband a part of their forces. As no-body better underſtood the meaning of this than Lieutenant-General Cromwell, inſtead of openly oppoſing it, he contrived to turn it in a double manner to his own and his party's advantage; for, in the firſt place, he inſinuated, by his emiſſa-

(f) Memoirs of Denzil Lord Hollis, p. 135. Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 202.

(g) Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. i. p. 172. Memoirs of Denzil Lord Hollis, p. 43.

(h) Dugdale's Short view of the troubles, p. 208. Memoirs of Denzil Lord Hollis, p. 54.

(i) Behemoth, by Thomas Hobbs, p. 217, 218.

(k) Memoirs of Denzil Lord Hollis, p. 62, 63.

(l) Heath's Chron. p. 121.

(m) Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. i. p. 187.

[O] As induced them to believe he was wholly at their devotion.] It was a maxim with Cromwell, as we may gather from his conſtant practice, whenever he had any extraordinary ſucceſs in the field, to return as ſoon as he had an opportunity, and ſhew himſelf in Parliament, that the hazards he ran in the field might contribute to his victories elſewhere. Another art he practiſed, as in truth what art is there he did not practiſe? which availed him highly; he was exceedingly conſtant in his correſpondence with the Parliament; his letters brought them the news of every conqueſt, nor was any expence thought too great to facilitate the early arrival of his diſpatches. His language too, though generally wrapped up in the cant of the times, which no man uſed more, had in it ſomewhat peculiarly ſubmiſſive, and irreſiſtibly inſinuating: his ſoldiers, as he ſaid, were not only dutiful but devoted; and if their courage deſerved to be remembered, as at the ſiege of Briſtol, they made it their requeſt to be forgotten: they deſired only to be conſidered as God's inſtruments in the righteous cauſe of the Parliament (90). By theſe methods he kept himſelf continually in their thoughts, and in their votes or reſolutions. Thus two days after the battle of Naſeby, they ordered that he ſhould be Lieutenant-General of the Horſe under Fairfax, during the pleaſure of the two Houſes, which the Lords changed to three months; Auguſt 8th, 1645, he was continued for four months longer; and on the firſt of December, the ſame year, they voted him two thouſand five hundred pounds a year, and that he ſhould be made a Baron; all which he ſeemed to accept with much leſs reliſh for the honours, than for the good-will ſhewn him by Parliament, to which, upon theſe occaſions, he profeſſed a reverence ſuperior to that which is paid to the moſt abſolute Monarchs of the Eaſt (91). By theſe contrivances both parties enjoyed, for a time, the higheſt ſatisfaction; for Cromwell's friends in Parliament believed him unalterably addicted to their meaſures, and that they might direct and diſpoſe of him how they pleaſed; while, on the other hand, he promoted his own intereſt moſt effectually, and ſuch propoſitions as he made, purely with a view to that, were by them interpreted as tending only to the maintenance of their authority, and ſecuring the unlimited obedience of the army to their orders (92). Beſides all this, he was likewiſe very attentive to the eſtabliſhment of an extenſive reputation, and that even among enemies; for ſome of his own ſoldiers having broken the articles upon which the city of Wincheſter was ſurrendered, he cauſed one of them to be hanged, and ſent five more of them priſoners to the Governor of Oxford, to be by him puniſhed as he thought fit; but he very wiſely ſent them back again (93). At the conferences alſo which preceded the ſurrender of Exeter, he entered into a converſation with Sir John Berkeley, of ſuch a nature, as to prove an introduction to a correſpondence with that Gentleman when a proper opportunity offered, as afterwards there did. Thus at one and the ſame time he managed many different intereſts, creating in all an attention to, and confidence in, his conduct, and yet communicating his real deſigns to none; for at this juncture, though all the parties in the army and the nation had their eyes particularly fixed upon Lieutenant-General Cromwell's management, in order to penetrate his deſigns; yet it manifeſtly appears, from the writings on all ſides, that there was not any two of them who concurred in their ſentiments. Only the Preſbyterians ſeemed to underſtand him beſt; for they judged him as little affected to the Parliament as to the King, and that, for the aggrandizing of his own power, he would make no ſcruple of conſcience to deſtroy both (94).

(90) Ruſhworth's Collections, vol. vi. p. 46. 88. 94.

(91) Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 180, 181. 189. 202.

(92) See Ludlow, Whitlocke, Hollis, Fairfax, and Warwick's Memoirs.

(93) See the Myſtery of the two Junto's Preſbyterian and Independant. Hiſt. of Independency, P. i. p. 4.

(94) See Whitlocke, Ludlow, Fairfax, Hollis, Berkeley, and Warwick's Memoirs.

ries, to the ſoldiers, that this was not only the higheſt piece of ingratitude towards thoſe who had fought the Parliament into a power of diſbanding them, but alſo a crying act of injuſtice, as it was done with no other view than to cheat them of their arrears (n). Secondly, he procured an exemption for Sir Thomas Fairfax's army, or, in other words, for his own, the General having that title only and appointments, while Cromwell had the power; and the weight of the reduction fell upon Maſſey's Brigade in the Weſt, together with the troops which Colonel Poyntz commanded in Yorkſhire, men of whom he had good reaſon to doubt, and upon whom the Parliament might have depended (o). Thus he dexterouſly turned to his own advantage, the means contrived for his deſtruction. To compleat the triumphs of this year, the Earl of Eſſex died ſuddenly, September 14th, at Eſſex-Houſe, and was buried with great pomp, October 22d, at the public expence (p), Mr. Cromwell coming poſt to town, in order to attend his funeral (q). On the 12th of November following, the army marched triumphantly through London, and, in the beginning of February following, the Scots having received their money, delivered up the King, who was carried priſoner to Holmby (r). At this time Lieutenant-General Cromwell had a very nice game to play. What wore the legal appearance of power, was evidently in the hands of the Parliament, in which the Preſbyterian party was ſtill prevalent; and as the General, Sir Thomas Fairfax, was likewiſe in that intereſt, it looked as if the real power was alſo on their ſide. At the bottom, however, the army, now taught to know their own ſtrength, were in reality the maſters, and they were entirely directed by Cromwell, though they knew it not themſelves (s) [P]. If the King and Parliament had immediately cloſed, which was the intereſt of both, the Kingdom muſt have been ſettled, which was the point that the army chiefs, and their friends, meant to avoid; and what gave them an opportunity of avoiding it was, the King's inflexible attachment to Epiſcopacy on one ſide, and the Parliament inſiſting as obſtinately on the eſtabliſhment of Preſbytery on the other (t). Lieutenant-General Cromwell ſaw the neceſſity of having a ſtrong place, and getting the King's perſon into their power; and he contrived to do both, without ſeeming to have any hand in either. Oxford was, at that time, in a good condition, and well ſupplied with artillery; upon which the army ſeized it with the magazines, and every thing elſe (u). And Cromwell, then at London, prevailed upon Cornet Joyce to ſeize the King's perſon, with a ſtrong detachment of horſe, not only without the General's orders, but without any orders at all, excepting theſe verbal inſtructions from Crom-

(n) Coke's Detection, p. 177.

(o) Memoirs of Denzil Lord Hollis, p. 81.

(p) Echard's Hiſt. of Engl. p. 630.

(q) Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 225.

(r) The Civil Wars of Great Britain and Ireland, p. 193. Dugdale's Short view of the late troubles, p. 234.

(s) Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. i. p. 189.

(t) Warwick's Memoirs, p. 297.

(u) Memoirs of Denzil Lord Hollis, p. 96.

[P] Though they knew it not themſelves.] There are ſome things in the text which ſtand in need of explanation; and indeed it cannot be otherwiſe: but to render this article intelligible, and to make the reader perfectly maſter of the ſubject of which we are treating, it is abſolutely requiſite to go very deep into the hiſtory of theſe times, which, in truth, is no other than the perſonal hiſtory of Cromwell; for his, and his friends intrigues, either moved, or gave motion, to all the parties in the kingdom. But, to come to thoſe difficulties we mention, and to reſolve them: in the firſt place then, it may ſeem ſtrange, that having before intimated more than once, that Cromwell's party was become the ſtrongeſt in the Houſe of Commons, we ſhould now aſſert, that there was a party ſtronger than theirs (95). The anſwer to this is, that the facts are certainly true; neither will it be hard to give a clear account of them. Thoſe might be juſtly called Cromwell's party who framed the new model, continued him, his ſon Ireton, and a few more officers, in their commands, notwithſtanding the Self-denying Ordinance; for theſe tranſactions ſhew that they were his party, as their being able to carry them ſhews they were the prevailing party. But, when the war was at an end, a conſiderable number of members, amongſt whom were Mr. Pierpoint, Mr. Whitlocke, and ſeveral other eminent perſons, altered their conduct, and believing that the army had anſwered the ends which it was propoſed they ſhould anſwer, by entirely ſubduing ſuch as were in arms for the King, were now very ſincerely for a peace; and therefore joined the old Preſbyterian party, that were always for it. With them came back thoſe who had been deluded, and ſuch as had been frighted out of their former principles; and thus, in the latter end of the year 1646, the firſt party in the Houſe was again become the ſtrongeſt, and, for a time, were ſtronger than ever (96). Another difficulty may be raiſed, from conſidering the conduct of Cromwell, and the great officers, who, while the army firſt became mutinous, remained in the Houſe, and not only remained, but ſpoke and voted with the majority; ſo that nothing ſeems to be more unfair, than to charge them, at this juncture, with promoting thoſe bad deſigns, notwithſtanding they afterwards openly concurred in them. Now to remove this difficulty, it muſt be obſerved, that Cromwell and Ireton went down from the Houſe to the army firſt, to diſpoſe them to diſband, but, inſtead of acting ſincerely in this matter, they diſcouraged and brow-beat ſuch officers and ſoldiers as ſhewed themſelves inclined to it, and gave hints to the reſt how they might avoid it, by ſuggeſting, that they were not mercenaries but military commoners, who, in that reſpect, had a right to apply to their repreſentatives, and, amongſt other things, to inſiſt, previouſly to their being diſbanded, upon an Act of Indemnity with the royal aſſent, that they might not ſuffer as the King's ſubjects for what they had done as the Parliament's ſoldiers (97). This produced the erecting a new council, compoſed at firſt of two private men out of each company and troop in every regiment, under the title of Agitators, who were to frame and diſpoſe the propoſitions of the army to the Parliament. After taking this ſtep, which was the foundation of all that followed, Cromwell, Ireton, and the reſt of the great officers, came up to attend the ſervice of the Houſe, well knowing, that the fire they had kindled would burſt out with violence in their abſence, as accordingly it did. Another difficulty yet remains, and that is as to their conduct in the Houſe, which, it is allowed, was not at all of a piece with their behaviour in the army (98). Now the reaſon of this will quickly appear; for, by the manner of their ſpeaking and voting, they ſecured the confidence of the Parliament to ſuch a degree, that, when the diſobedience of the army became flagrant, they were ſent down to reduce them to their duty, whereas had they uſed another language, or a different conduct, they had been ſent to the Tower. But what followed upon their returning to the army? Why, inſtead of performing what they were ſent for, they joined with the mutineers (99), added a Council of Officers to the Council of Agitators, erecting thereby Military Houſes of Lords and Commons, and ſent up their reſolutions to give law to the Parliament; which clearly proves the truth and certainty of all that is advanced in the text.

(95) Flagellum, or the life of O. Cromwell, p. 6.

(96) Memoirs of Denzil Lord Hollis, p. 72. See alſo Clarendon, Whitlocke, and Echard.

(97) See Major Huntington's Charge againſt Cromwell. Flagellum, or the life of O. Cromwell, p. 55. Hollis's Memoirs, p. 77.

(98) Myſtery of the two Junto's, Preſbyterian and Independant. Whitlocke's Memorials. Memoirs of Hollis and Ludlow.

(99) See Major Huntington's Charge againſt Cromwell. Flagellum, &c. p. 55.

well

well (w). This was executed on the 4th of June 1647, notwithſtanding the Parliament's Commiſſioners were then with the King, who was conducted from Holmby to Childerſley (x), then the army's head quarters, where he was received not only with reverence but with kindneſs, and treated much more indulgently than while in the hands of the Parliament; chiefly through the management of Lieutenant-General Cromwell and Commiſſary Ireton, his ſon-in-law, who, if Major Huntington, and others, may be believed, made high profeſſions for his ſervice (y). It is very certain, that Sir Thomas Fairfax knew nothing of the taking away of the King; that he diſliked it; that he would have ſent him back again with the Commiſſioners, under the guard of two regiments of horſe; but the Commiſſioners refuſed to act, or the King to move (z). Nay, to ſuch a degree was that Monarch perſuaded of the ſincerity of his new friends, that he had the indiſcretion to tell Sir Thomas Fairfax, when he made him a tender of his duty and reſpect, with promiſes of fair treatment, that he thought he had as good an intereſt in the ARMY as himſelf (a), The remaining ſix months of this year were the moſt critical of Lieutenant-General Cromwell's whole life; for, in order to ſucceed in his ſchemes, it was abſolutely neceſſary to deceive the King, the Parliament, and the Army, which, in their turns, was effected, though not without danger and difficulty. As for the King, he relied ſo entirely upon Cromwell and Ireton, and they, on the other hand, ſpoke of and acted towards him in ſuch a manner, that they were looked upon as abſolute courtiers; nor is it at all wonderful that the King gave credit to them, when they brought the army to ſend a letter to the Parliament, which was delivered July 9th, 1647, avowing the King's cauſe to be their's (b), and that no ſettlement could be hoped for without granting him his juſt rights. In reference to the Parliament, ſo long as they enjoyed their power, Mr. Cromwell always ſpoke the language of a Member of the Houſe of Commons, ſhewed a high regard for their privileges, and profeſſed, that he was ſuſpected and diſliked by the Army, for his attachment to the Civil Government (c). This did not, however, hinder his being diſbelieved by many, till at length he found it neceſſary, for his own ſafety, to make his eſcape from the Houſe with ſome precipitation (d). As to the ſoldiers, and that mutinous ſpirit which they diſcovered againſt the Parliament, it was raiſed, fomented, and managed, by Cromwell and Ireton, the former declaring at Triploe-Heath, when the Parliament had been obliged to eraſe their own declaration out of their Journals, Now they might be an Army as long as they lived (e). It was owing to this ſpirit that the eleven Members of the Houſe of Commons were impeached, the Houſe of Commons purged, and their authority brought ſo low, that the London apprentices came into the Houſe, and forced them to vote what they pleaſed (f). It is true, that, when the Earl of Manchester and Mr. Lenthal, the Speakers, retired to the Army, and the Lord Grey and Mr. Pelham were choſen in their places, the Lords and Commons recovered their authority; but they did not hold it for a week, Sir Thomas Fairfax marching directly to London, replacing the old Speakers, Auguſt 6th, and the next day marching in triumph through the city, ſo that now the Army, and not the Parliament, were the Supreme Authority (g). Soon after this a new party ſprang up among the ſoldiers, under the title of LEVELLERS, who made no ſecret of their hating equally both King and Parliament; and it was to ſave himſelf from theſe people, who, as he was informed by Cromwell, ſought his life, that the King, Nov. 11th, fled from Hampton-Court to the Iſle of Wight, after having rejected the Parliament's propoſals by Cromwell's and Ireton's advice (h). Immediately after this tranſaction General Cromwell altered his behaviour towards the King entirely, as ſome think, out of fear of the Agitators, but, as Lord Hollis and others affirm, in conſequence of his own deſigns (i); for, having made uſe of the King's preſence to manage the Army, and of the power which the Army had thereby acquired, to humble and debaſe the Parliament, there was no farther end to be anſwered by keeping meaſures any longer towards the King (k). In order to be convinced of this we need only conſider, that the ſame method was practiſed in the Iſle of Wight, while the Parliament was again treating with the King, which had been before practiſed at Holmby, and the very ſame inſtrument employed, the famous Cornet Joyce, who, upon very good grounds, is believed to be the very man that cut off the King's head (l). The Parliament, now much altered from what it was, upon the King's refuſing to paſs four Bills which they ſent him, fell into very warm debates, in which it is ſaid, that Cromwell was a principal ſpeaker, and inveighed bitterly againſt his Majeſty: he ſaid, the King was a very able man, but withal a great diſſembler, one in whom no truſt could be repoſed, and with whom therefore they ought to have nothing to do for the future (m). However this might be, the Parliament, on the 5th of January, voted that no more addreſſes ſhould be made to the King (n), and from that time he was more ſtrictly impriſoned than ever; all which the beſt writers attribute to a new conjunction between Cromwell and the Commonwealth's Men, who, after ſo much purging, had gained a very great influence in Parliament (o) [Q]. It very ſoon appeared, notwithſtanding this agreement between the grandees (w) Behemoth, by Tho. Hobbs, p. 225, 226. Hollis's Memoirs, p. 67.

(x) Perfect Diurnal, p. 1612.
(y) Coke's Detection, p. 178. Ludlow's Memoirs, p. 193. Major Huntington's Charge of High Treaſon againſt Lieutenant-General Cromwell.
(z) Dugdale's Short view of the late troubles, p. 240. See the General's own letter to the Parliament in Heath's Chronicle, p. 131.
(a) Memoirs of Thomas Lord Fairfax, p. 116.
(b) Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 259. Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. i. p. 195. Memoirs of Denzil Lord Hollis, p. 113.
(c) Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. i. p. 190. Hollis's Memoirs, p. 100.
(d) Flagellum, or the life of O. Cromwell, p. 55.
(e) Heath's Chronicle, p. 132, 133. Behemoth, by T. Hobbs, p. 230, 231. Major Huntington's Charge.
(f) Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 260. Coke's Detection, p. 162, 163.
(g) Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 264. Dugdale's Short view of the troubles, p. 253. Behemoth, by T. Hobbs, p. 233.
(h) Major Huntington's Charge. Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. i. p. 203, 204.
(i) Behemoth, by Tho. Hobbs, p. 234, 235. Memoirs of Denzil Lord Hollis, p. 186, 187.
(k) Flagellum, or the life of O. Cromwell, p. 63.
(l) Behemoth, by T. Hobbs, p. 239. Heath's Chron. p. 157.
(m) Memoirs of Denzil Lord Hollis, p. 190. Ludlow's Memoirs, p. 229. 236. Flagellum, or the life of Cromwell, p. 63.
(n) Dugdale's Short view of the troubles, p. 275.
(o) Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. i. p. 239, 240. Bates's Elenchus Motuum, p. 97.

[Q] Who after ſo much purging, had gained a very great influence in Parliament.] It is a point out of all diſpute, ſince there is not a writer of any party but agrees in the fact, that the great inclination ſhewn by the grandees of the Army, and the friends to a Republic, that the nation in general hated the thoughts of ſubmitting to a Stratocracy, Ariſtocracy, or a Democracy, and were reſolved the Army to provide not only for the ſafety of the King's perſon, but for his reſtitution to his juſt rights, was, at firſt infuſed, and promoted all along, by Lieutenant-General Cromwell and Commiſſary-General Ireton, who, from this merit, aſſumed to themſelves the negotiation with the King; which they carried on ſo much to his ſatisfaction in moſt reſpects, that he thought his condition much mended, and truſted them very much; though he was not ſo weak to confide entirely in their promiſes, as ſome writers have aſſerted. What the methods were by which Cromwell impoſed upon him and his old ſervants, and to how great a height this impoſition was carried, may appear by one paſſage out of many, in the work of a Gentleman of honour, and who was deeply intereſted in this affair; and who was both an eye-witneſs, and very largely concerned in every tranſaction that he mentions (100). After obſerving that the Agitators, on the King's firſt coming to the Army, were very ſincere in his cauſe, and deſired this Gentleman to give them notice if he ſaw any cauſe to ſuſpect the reality of Cromwell's profeſſions, he proceeds thus: 'In all my conferences 'with him, I found no man, in appearance, ſo zea-'lous for a ſpeedy blow as he, ſometimes wiſhing that 'the King was more frank, and would not tie him-'ſelf ſo ſtrictly to narrow maxims, ſometimes com-'plaining of his ſon Ireton's ſlowneſs in perfecting 'the propoſals, and his not accommodating more to 'his Majeſty's ſenſe, always doubting, that the Army 'would not preſerve their good inclinations for the 'King. I met with him about three days after I 'came to Reading, as he was coming from the King, 'then at Cauſum: he told me, that he had lately 'ſeen the tendereſt ſight that ever his eyes beheld, 'which was, the interview between the King and his 'children, and wept plentifully at the remembrance 'of it, ſaying, that never man was ſo abuſed as he, 'in his ſiniſter opinions of the King, who, he thought, 'was the uprighteſt and moſt conſcientious man of 'his three kingdoms; that they of the Independant 'party, as they were called, had infinite obligations 'to him, for not conſenting to the Scots propoſitions, 'which would have totally ruined them, and which 'his Majeſty's intereſt ſeemed to invite him to; and 'concluded with me by wiſhing, that God would be 'pleaſed to look upon him according to the ſincerity 'of his heart towards his Majeſty. I immediately 'acquainted his Majeſty with this paſſage, who ſeem-'ed not well edified with it; and did believe, that all 'proceeded out of the uſe Cromwell and the Army 'had of his Majeſty, without whom he thought they 'could do nothing.' This paſſage ſhews at what time Cromwell endeavoured to be thought well affected to the King, and profeſſed his having a good opinion of him. Had theſe been ſincerely his ſentiments, he would never have altered them, for the King gave him no occaſion; ſince it is clearly proved, that his final anſwer to the propoſals which were made him, not only ſpoke the ſenſe of him and Ireton, as the King conceived it, but was altered by their hands till it ſatisfied themſelves (101). Had he been really inclined to reſtore the King, he might have done it now with a high hand. A great majority of the Parliament were for him; the city of London was in their ſentiments; the meaſures taken by the Scots, and the inſurrections in ſeveral counties in his favour, ſhew, that this was alſo the ſenſe of the nation: if therefore Lieutenant-General Cromwell had made uſe of his wonderful capacity, to diſpoſe the Army not to any new deſign, but to have performed their own promiſes; he might have ſettled the Government upon its old foundation, and have made himſelf a very great man (102). He reſolved, however, not to do this; and, having made that reſolution, it became neceſſary to prevent the King's being ſettled by others; and how he contrived to bring this about, a noble Hiſtorian has very fully informed us, after having aſſured us that this was Cromwell's deſign (103). 'The difficulty was, how to bring this about to cozen the King, ſo as to make him act it himſelf, and fly into the cage: carry him by force they durſt not; it would be unhandſome; it might be dangerous: they uſe this ſtratagem; heighten, and ſharpen underhand, the mad humour of their party againſt him, to have it break out all manner of ways in threatning ſpeeches, pamphlets, ſome conſultations, that, whilſt his Majeſty lived in England, he could not be ſafe; meetings to conſider, and come to ſome reſolutions, of taking him out of the way; the Army is again diſquiet, the Officers not obeyed; all things tending to mutiny, and ſome violent eruption. Then does Mr. Cromwell, and his Cabinet-Council, ſeem to be extremely ſolicitous of the ſafety of his Majeſty's perſon; cauſe ſome diſcoveries to be given him of his danger; expreſs great indignation and trouble in the Houſe, in the Army, and other places, againſt theſe proceedings; act their parts ſo to the life, as the life of a man muſt go to make up the diſguiſe; an Agitator, whom, at a Council of War, with two more they condemned, was ſhot to death; ſo as the King could not but have a great confidence in theſe men, to believe that they were really for his preſervation. At laſt Cromwell writes a letter to Whalley, who commands the Guards about his Majeſty's perſon, to be ſhewn his Majeſty; and other informations are likewiſe brought him, to make him believe, that, if he eſcape not preſently, he will be murdered; and he is adviſed to go to the Iſle of Wight, where they had before-hand provided him a jaylor, Colonel Hammond, one for whom, they ſaid, they could anſwer, that there his Majeſty would be in ſafety, and they able to ſerve him. Here they have the King ſafe enough; and now the Army is preſently quiet, the Agitators as obedient as lambs, and Councils of War are ſet up again to act as formerly. And Sir Thomas Fairfax, with their advice, ſets out a Remonſtrance, to give ſatisfaction to the Army; which he concludes with a proteſtation to adhere to, conduct, live and die with the Army, in the proſecution of ſome things there expreſſed; as namely, to obtain a preſent proviſion for conſtant pay, ſtating of accounts, ſecurity for arrears, with an effectual and ſpeedy courſe to raiſe monies; a period to be ſet to this Parliament; proviſion for future Parliaments, the certainty of their meeting, ſitting, and ending; the freedom and equality of elections, and other things, which he had the impudence and boldneſs to publiſh in print.' It is true, that Lord Hollis, being an enemy to Cromwell, and writing this book to ſhew the cauſe of his enmity, is not a witneſs to be believed entirely from his own aſſertion. But the main fact here is, the letter which had been paſſed over by ſome, denied by others, and, for any thing that I know, never proved upon Cromwell by any; till Colonel Whalley's letter to the Parliament, upon the King's withdrawing from Hampton-Court, was publiſhed; in which it is poſitively ſaid, that Cromwell wrote the letter to him (104), and that he ſhewed it to the King. This letter Ruſhworth had in his power, and might have printed, if he had ſo pleaſed; but truths of all kinds are not welcome to all men. As for the Propoſitions that were ſent to the King in the Iſle of Wight, they were deſtructive not only of his power and honour, but of the Conſtitution. By them he was required to take the guilt of all the blood ſhed in the war upon himſelf, to cancel all his own acts, and to eſtabliſh the independent power of the Parliament and Army; that is, in plain Engliſh, to depoſe himſelf, and, at the ſame time, lend his authority for the eſtabliſhing a new tyrannical power over his people (105). For rejecting ſuch terms, Cromwell declared that he ought to be treated with no more; the Parliament, now under the direction of the Army, voted this; and Sir Thomas Fairfax, without waiting for their directions, ordered the King to be made a cloſe priſoner; and this, though done without their knowledge, was approved by Parliament (106). Theſe indiſputable facts are ſufficient to let us into the motives upon which thoſe men proceeded who did all theſe things, and who, in the Council of War held at Windſor, immediately after, reſolved to do all that they afterwards did, though, from certain unfore-

(100) Memoirs of Sir John Berkeley, p. 26, 27, 28.

(101) See Major Huntington's Charge againſt Cromwell; and the Memoirs of Hollis, Ludlow, and Aſhburnham.

(102) Flagellum, or the life of O. Cromwell, p. 60, 61.

(103) Memoirs of Denzil Lord Hollis, p. 185, 186, 187.

(104) Peck's Deſiderata Curioſa, vol. ii. B. ix. p. 38.

(105) Heath's Chron. p. 160, 161. Memoirs of Denzil Lord Hollis, p. 190. Hiſt. of Independency, P. i. p. 41.

(106) Flagellum, or the life of O. Cromwell, p. 64, 65.

resolved to run any hazard, in order to recover their old Constitution (p); and this it was that created the second Civil War, in which many, who had formerly fought for the Parliament, took up arms for the King; and part of the fleet under Vice-Admiral Batten, who had been displaced to make way for Cromwell's favourite Rainsborough, revolted to Prince Charles (q). Yet this was far from being all. The Scots, who now saw that their expectations were entirely defeated, fell upon new measures, and having, without doubt, some secret encouragement from the chiefs of the Presbyterian party in England, determined to raise an army, and march it into England (r), in hopes of being joined by the King's friends in the field, and, upon the first advantage gained there, owned and applauded by their old acquaintance in the Parliament (s), who were true to their ancient principles, and desirous of a settlement upon a basis of their own laying, rather than a revolution, taking rise only from chance and power (t). In the mean time there were risings also in Kent and Surrey; and, though these were in a manner suppressed by that part of the Army which lay near London, yet the remains of these two bodies forcing a passage into the county of Essex, took possession of Colchester, where, under the Earl of Norwich, Sir Charles Lucas, and Sir George Lisle, they made a very gallant defence (u). As the war was thus revived in all parts of the Island, there was a necessity of dividing the Army, in consequence of which Cromwell marched into Wales against Major-General Langhorn, Colonel Poyer, and Colonel Powell (w). Sir Thomas Fairfax besieged Colchester (x), and General Lambert marched northward against the Scots (y). The military power being thus employed, the city of London and the Parliament were left, in some measure, at liberty to pursue their own sentiments, and what these were quickly appeared; for on June the 27th, 1648, the city petitioned for a personal treaty with the King, which was very well received, and some steps taken thereupon (z). But by the arts of Sir Henry Vane, and those of his party, many obstacles being raised, the city, on the 8th of August following, petitioned the House of Lords in still stronger and more direct terms; which petition was not only favourably accepted, but the petitioners had also the thanks of the House given them; an evident proof, that the scope of their petition was also the sense of that House (a). A few days after the Commons recalled their vote for non-addresses, set on foot a personal treaty with the King at the Isle of Wight, and at length voted his Majesty's concessions satisfactory (b). An attempt was also made to impeach Cromwell of High-treason upon Major Huntington's information, whom he had chiefly intrusted in his negotiation with the King; but this failed (c). The great success of the Army quickly altered the face of things; for Cromwell having reduced, and, in a great measure, destroyed those who took up arms in Wales, began his march northward in the middle of July, and, in a month after, routed Sir Marmaduke Langdale, and the Scots under Duke Hamilton; the terror of which victory forced Colchester to surrender (d): and now the Army, returning towards London, November the 28th, sent a Remonstrance to the House of Commons, disapproving all they had done (e). This Remonstrance was carried by Colonel Ewers, who went next into the Isle of Wight, where he seized the person of the King, which was resented by the Parliament, who commanded the General to recal his orders (f). Instead of this the Army marched directly to London, and, in the first week of December, took possession of it, purged the House of Commons, that is, turned out the better part of its Members, and then forced the remainder to do what they pleased (g). In most of these steps Cromwell was very active, and is, with good grounds, believed to have directed all the rest (h) [R]. It is not necessary unforeseen circumstances that fell out, they were hindered from doing it so soon as they intended (107). As for the coalition between Cromwell and his creatures, and the Commonwealth party in the House of Commons, the history of it may be found in Whitlocke and in Ludlow (108), much to the honour of Cromwell's abilities, who deceived them with as much dexterity as he had done the King, and for the very same reason, because there was no other way of working his own purposes but by deceiving them. If there had, he would probably have taken it; but, as there was not, he was forced to take it; and the great wonder is, that, having dissembled and deceived so often before, he should be trusted again; to account for which we must consider, that this was not choice in the Commonwealth's men (109), but necessity: they did not trust Cromwell to do their work, but they made use of him, because he was the only instrument by which their work could be done.

[R] And is, with good grounds, believed to have directed all the rest.] After Lieutenant-General Cromwell was sent to reduce those who, deserting the Parliament's service, had taken up arms in Wales, he prosecuted that expedition with such vigilance, that he did more in a month than could have been well expected from him in six; and yet what he did was most effectually done also, and without the least tincture of passion; though he is commended for his clemency by some, and as loudly condemned of cruelty by others; but as haste was all he aimed at, so he was either gentle or severe as that directed. If he could procure a surrender upon terms, no-body gave better, none kept them more strictly; but if he was obliged to make use of force, he did not spare shedding blood; not from particular resentment, or any barbarous delight in it, but to serve his purpose, which, in this case, was dispatch (110). This war being quickly ended, though at a great expence of men, who had done the Parliament good service, those who fought against Cromwell having had a share in most of the battles against the King; he marched northwards to join Lambert, and came time enough to fall upon Sir Marmaduke Langdale, and the English Royalists, who behaved as well as men could do, and were beat by dint of numbers; but for the Scots under Duke Hamilton. they were so ill commanded, that, though they had numbers on their side, they were rather butchered than beaten, so that not a tenth part of them got home again (111). Cromwell now changed his maxim, proceeded slowly, went into Scotland, concluded

(p) Heath's Chron. p. 170, 171.

(q) Clarendon's Hist. of the Rebellion, p. 530, 531.

(r) Dugdale's Short view of the troubles, p. 278, 279.

(s) Bates's Elenchus Motuum, p. 100.

(t) The Civil Wars of Great Britain and Ireland, p. 232.

(u) Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. i. p. 249, 250.

(w) Rushworth's Collections, vol. ii. P. iv. p. 1098.

(x) Heath's Chronicle, p. 175.

(y) The Civil Wars of Great Britain and Ireland, p. 233.

(z) Rushworth's Collections, vol. ii. P. iv. p. 1167.

(a) Echard's Hist. of England, p. 647. Rushworth's Collections, vol. ii. P. iv. p. 1220.

(b) Dugdale's Short view of the troubles, p. 289. Echard's Hist. of England, p. 647.

(c) Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 325. 327.

(d) Heath's Chronicle, p. 178, 179.

(e) Rushworth's Collect. vol. ii. P. iv. p. 1331. Dugdale's Short view of the troubles, p. 293.

(f) Echard's Hist. of England, p. 651. Bates's Elenchus Motuum, p. 135.

(g) Heath's Chronicle, p. 192, 193.

(h) Flagellum, or the life of Cromwell, p. 70, 71.

(107) Berkeley's Memoirs, p. 71, 72, 73, 74, 75.

(108) Memorials of the English affairs, p. 361—363. Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. i. p. 271—273.

(109) Life of O. Cromwell, p. 99.

(110) The Perfect Politician, or life and death of O. Cromwell, p. 28, 29.

(111) Bates's Elenchus Motuum, p. 100, 111. Flagellum, or life of O. Cromwell, p. 67.

neceſſary to dwell particularly upon thoſe circumſtances that are well known, in relation to bringing the King before the High Court of Juſtice, and in purſuance to the ſentence paſſed there to his death, ſince the ſhare that Lieutenant-General Cromwell had therein was open and public: he ſat in the Court, he ſigned the Warrant, and he proſecuted the accompliſhment of it by the King's bloody execution (i). It is alſo known, that he threatened Colonel Downs out of that tenderneſs which he ſhewed for his Sovereign, when before the Court; and Colonel Ingoldſby always affirmed, that Cromwell guided his hand in his ſigning the ſentence. What applications were made to him for ſaving the King's life may be found in a multitude of books, and ſome of the paſſages relating to them are undoubtedly worthy of notice (k) [S]. One remark however is very obvious upon this head, cluded a treaty with the dominant party in that kingdom, and left a body of troops with them to maintain it; by which having ſecured that part of the iſland, he was in no pain about the reſt, as knowing that his victorious army muſt make all bend before them. At this diſtance, however, he ſignified to his friends in Parliament, that they ſhould adhere to their vote of making no farther addreſſes to the King (112), which, though they found it impoſſible to do, yet, as the moſt effectual ſtep towards fruſtrating the oppoſite meaſures, they procured Sir Henry Vane the younger to be one of the Commiſſioners in the Treaty at the Iſle of Wight, where, by his arts, and in conjunction with the Lord Say, he retarded it very much, which gave Cromwell time to march up to London (113). In this march the Remonſtrance was hammered out directly contrary to the declaration of the Army, in which they had bewailed their former miſcarriages towards the Parliament, offering violence to the two Houſes, and promiſed faithfully and dutifully to acquieſce in their wiſe reſolutions. Upon the very day that Cromwell came to London, Colonel Pride turned one-and-forty Members out of the Houſe, and made them priſoners; and the very ſame day Colonel Ewer ſeized the King in his bed-chamber, and carried him out of the Iſle of Wight to Hurſt-Caſtle (114); both which ſteps are ſuppoſed to have been taken by directions from Cromwell; and that this ſuppoſition was not ill founded, the reader may probably conclude from the following account of it by the General Thomas Lord Fairfax (115). 'In the Iſle of Wight the Parliament treated 'upon propoſitions of peace with the King; but alas! 'the Envious one ſowed tares, that could not be rooted 'out but by plucking up the corn alſo. The King 'was the golden ball caſt before the two parties, the 'Parliament and the Army; and the conteſt grew ſo 'great, that it muſt again have involved the kingdom 'in blood, but the Army, having the greater power, 'got the King again into their hands, notwithſtanding 'all endeavours to hinder it. The treaty was ſcarcely 'ended before the King was ſeized on by the hands of 'the ſame perſons that took him from Holmby; ſoon 'after followed his trial. To prepare a way to this 'work, this agitating Council did firſt intend to re-'move all out of the Parliament who were like to 'oppoſe them; and carried it on with ſuch ſecrecy, 'as I had not the leaſt intimation of it till it 'was done, as ſome of the Members of the Houſe 'can witneſs, with whom I was at that very time, 'upon ſpecial buſineſs, when that attempt was made 'by Colonel Pride upon the Parliament, which I pro-'teſt I never had any knowledge of till it was done. 'The reaſon why it was ſo ſecretly carried, that I 'ſhould have no notice of it, was, becauſe I always 'prevented thoſe deſigns when I knew them. By 'this purging of the Houſe, as they called it, the 'Parliament was brought into ſuch a conſumptive 'and languiſhing condition, that it could never again 'recover that healthful conſtitution which always kept 'the kingdom in its ſtrength, life, and vigour.' When the firſt propoſition was made in the Houſe of Commons, for trying the King, Mr. Cromwell roſe up (116), and ſaid, that 'If any man moved this upon 'deſign, he ſhould think him the greateſt traitor in 'the world; but ſince Providence and neceſſity had 'caſt them upon it, he ſhould pray God to bleſs their 'counſels, though he was not provided on the ſudden 'to give them counſel.' But not long after he was: for, being a great pretender to Enthuſiaſms and Revelations, he told them, that, as he was praying for a bleſſing from God on his undertaking to reſtore the King to his priſtine Majeſty, his tongue cleaved to the roof of his mouth, that he could not ſpeak one word more; which he took as a return of prayer, and that God had rejected him from being King; and to others he aſſerted, that it was lawful to circumvent a wicked man with deceit and fraud. If the reader is inclined to purſue this matter any farther, he may meet with the cleareſt information in the work of a late Prelate, who has given ſuch an account of Mr. Cromwell's diſpute with the Commiſſioners from Scotland, on the neceſſity of the King's being ſubjected to a capital proſecution, as will leave him without the leaſt colour of doubt, that the whole of this meaſure was of his contriving and conducting, though ſupported by all the Republican party in the Parliament (117).

(i) Clarendon's Hiſt. Rebellion, p. 567—569. Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 370—375. Echard's Hiſt. of Eng. p. 653—661.

(k) Heath's Chron. p. 200. Clarendon's Hiſt. Rebellion, p. 734.

(112) Life of O. Cromwell, Lord Protector, p. 96.

(113) Sir John Bowring's Memoirs. Burnet's Hiſt. of his own times, vol. i. p. 44.

(114) Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 355. 357.

(115) Short Memorials of Thomas Lord Fairfax, p. 118, 119, 120.

(116) Hiſt. of Independency, P. ii. p. 54.

[S] Are undoubtedly worthy of notice.] Of theſe one of the moſt remarkable is, the tranſaction between the Lieutenant-General and a couſin of his, Colonel John Cromwell, an officer in the ſervice of the States. This Gentleman is ſaid to have been in England while the King was in the hands of the Army; and that in a conference he had with the Lieutenant-General, the latter made uſe of this expreſſion, I think the King the moſt injured Prince in the world, and then clapping his hand upon his ſword, added, But this, couſin, ſhall do him right (118). The Colonel returning to Holland ſoon after, reported what he took to be truth, that the Lieutenant-General had a great regard and reſpect for the King. When, therefore, the news of the King's trial reached Holland, he was ſent over with Letters Credential from the States, to which was added a blank with the King's ſignet, and another of the Prince's, both confirmed by the States, for Cromwell to ſet down his own conditions, if he would now ſave his Majeſty's life. The Colonel went directly to his kinſman's houſe, who was ſo retired and ſhut up in his chamber, with an order to let none know he was at home, that it was with much difficulty he obtained admittance, after he had told who he was. Having mutually ſaluted each other, the Colonel deſired to ſpeak a few words with him in private; and began, with much freedom, to ſet before him the heinouſneſs of the fact then about to be committed, and with what deteſtation it was looked upon abroad, telling him, That of all men living he could never have imagined he would have had any hand in it, who, in his hearing, had proteſted ſo much for the King. To this Cromwell anſwered, It was not he but the Army, and though he did once ſay ſome ſuch words, yet now times were altered, and Providence ſeemed to order things otherwiſe. And it is ſaid he added, that he had prayed and faſted for the King, but no return that way was yet made to him. Upon this the Colonel ſtepped a little back, and ſuddenly ſhut the door, which made Cromwell apprehend he was going to be aſſaſſinated, but the other pulling out his papers, ſaid to him, Couſin, this is no time to trifle with words: See here, it is now in your own power not only to make yourſelf but your family, relations, and poſterity, happy and honourable for ever; otherwiſe, as they changed their name before from Williams to Cromwell, ſo now they muſt be forced to change it again; for this fact will bring ſuch an ignominy upon the whole generation of them, that no time will be able to deface. At this Cromwell pauſed a little, and then ſaid, Couſin, I deſire you will give me till night to conſider of it, and do you go to your inn, and not to bed, till you hear from me. The Colonel did accordingly; and, about one in the morning a meſſenger came to tell him, He might go to reſt, and expect no other anſwer to carry to the Prince; for the Council of Officers had been ſeeking God, a phraſe, it

(117) Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 365. Burnet's Hiſt. of his own times, p. 46, 47.

(118) Flagellum, or the life of Cromwell, p. 5.

head, which is, that his power and his principles muſt have been very well known, both at home and abroad, otherwiſe ſuch general applications could have never been made; for though it be true, that there were addreſſes alſo to the General, yet thoſe were from ſuch as oppoſed the action, as for inſtance, the Preſbyterian Miniſters, the Scots Commiſſioners, and ſome of the ſecluded Members; but thoſe who were guided entirely by pity and concern, laboured only to move Cromwell, who is ſaid, after this tragedy was acted, to have ſpoken his mind freely by owning, that, if he had not been a King, he might have lived longer (l).

(l) Flagellum, or the life of Cromwell, P. 74.

The Government being now entirely changed, for in five days after the King's death the Houſe of Lords was voted uſeleſs, it became neceſſary to think of ſome expedient for managing the executive power; and therefore it was reſolved to ſet up a Council of State, of which John Bradſhaw was Preſident, and Lieutenant-General Cromwell a principal Member (m). Before he had well taken poſſeſſion of this new dignity, he was again called to action, and that too as briſk, and at leaſt as hazardous, as any in which he had taken any ſhare. The perſons with whom he was to engage were a part, and certainly, if they had known their own minds, the far greateſt part of the very army which he commanded, and the occaſion this. All the purpoſes for which they were neceſſary being anſwered, it was reſolved the Agitators ſhould aſſemble no more. The Houſe of Commons had deprived the Houſe of Lords of a being, by a vote; but in the Army the contrary method was purſued; the General, and his Council of Officers, would no longer vouchſafe any conference with, or even countenance to, the Agitators, which was what the greateſt part of the Army could not bear; and therefore had themſelves recourſe to a method which their officers had taught them upon other occaſions; and this was, to ſet forth their ſentiments by way of Remonſtrance, which was preſented by five Agitators to the General (n). For this high offence they were ſeized, and tried by a Court-Martial, and ſentenced to ride with their faces to their horſes tails, at the head of their reſpective corps, with a paper, expreſſing their crime, fixed on their breaſts; after which their ſwords were to be broke over their heads, and themſelves caſhiered; every circumſtance of which was ſtrictly executed upon the 6th of March, in Great Palace-Yard (o). This ſerved only to raiſe the flame higher; for ſeveral regiments of horſe, and amongſt the reſt Cromwell's, mutinied, put white cockades in their hats, and appointed a rendezvous at Ware; where Cromwell appeared when he was leaſt expected, and brought with him ſome regiments quartered at a diſtance, that he could depend on. Here, without any previous expoſtulations, he, with two regiments of horſe, ſurrounded one regiment of the mutineers, and calling four men by name out of their ranks, obliged them to caſt dice for their lives, and thoſe two that eſcaped were ordered to ſhoot the others, which they did, and upon this the tame ſpectators of the tragedy thought fit to ſlip their white cockades into their pockets, and to ſecure themſelves by a ſubmiſſion (p). This affair did not end here: for one Lockyer being ſhot in St. Paul's Church-Yard for the like offence, his confederates, to the number of a thouſand, attended at his funeral with black and ſea-green ribbons, by way of favours (q). This portended a ſtorm, which quickly after broke out; for Scroop's regiment of horſe, quartered at Saliſbury, having firſt ejected their officers, marched to join three other regiments that were in the ſame diſpoſition (r); upon which Fairfax and Cromwell, with the troops that adhered to them, moved towards the mutineers with the utmoſt expedition, marching as the neceſſity of the caſe required, forty miles in one day. It is, however, very doubtful, whether all this vigilance, or even the valour of their victorious troops, would have done their buſineſs againſt theſe men, bred in the ſame ſchool, and not at all inferior, either in firmneſs or fame, to themſelves. In ſo nice and dangerous a caſe, therefore, Cromwell ventured upon a ſpecifick which he ſeldom adminiſtred, that is to ſay, he deluded them with a treaty, broke it, and deſtroyed them (s) with

(m) Hiſt. Independency, P. ii. p. 110.

(n) Heath's Chron. p. 233.

(o) Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 386.

(p) Flagellum, or the life of Cromwell, p. 81.

(q) Hiſt. of Independency, P. ii. p. 163. Heath's Chron. p. 233.

(r) Flagellum, or the life of Cromwell, p. 82, 83.

(s) Heath's Chronicle, p. 233, 234.

it ſeems, very much in uſe at that time, as he alſo had done the ſame, and it was reſolved by them all, that the King muſt die (119). All the circumſtances of this relation agree perfectly with the moſt authentic diaries of thoſe times, by which fictitious ſtories are eaſily detected. Lady Fairfax charged the whole deſign of ſeeking the King's death upon Cromwell, at his Majeſty's trial (120). Sir John Bowring told the King himſelf, during the Hampton-Court treaty, what Cromwell's intentions were; and Sir Peter Killigrew likewiſe told him, at the ſame place, that Cromwell meant to fetch him up to London, bring him to a trial there, and put him to death (121). Some have doubted whether the laſt was his original intention or not, for he never loved a Commonwealth, and therefore it is ſuppoſed, that he was the author of that paper-book of propoſals offered to the King the evening before he died; which would have eſtabliſhed the being of the Army moſt effectually, by putting it in their power to pay themſelves, and, at the ſame time, rendering them perpetual (122). If this be true, as indeed I think it cannot be diſproved, the King ſhewed that his great patience did not proceed from want of ſpirit, for he preſently rejected thoſe terms, and reſolved to die a martyr rather than live a cypher (123). But though, without Lieutenant-General Cromwell, this deed could not have been done, yet, when he had brought it ſo far, in order to try whether the King, who, by his laſt treaty, had conſented to a never ending Parliament, might not be brought to change that for an everlaſting Army, yet it might not be abſolutely in his power to go back, nor was it, probably, ever in his will; ſince, how generally ſoever the death of the King was imputed to him, the ſaving of him might, and, in all appearance, would, have been attributed to others; which was ſo repugnant to his ſcheme, if we may judge from his former and future actions (124), that there appears not the leaſt foundation to ſuppoſe he ever had a thought of conſenting to it, nor is there any thing like it ſuggeſted, by any of thoſe who either commend or condemn him.

(119) Echard's Hiſtory of England, p. 658.

(120) Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 375. State Trials, vol. i. p. 991.

(121) Bowring's Memoirs, p. 151.

(122) Hiſt. of Independency, P. ii. p. 109. Echard's Hiſt. of England, p. 660. Heath's Chron. p. 215.

(123) See the King's ſpeech at his death.

(124) Perinchief's life of Charles the firſt, p. 93.

as

as little mercy as, in the High Court of Juſtice, he had ſhewn to the King or his friends [T]. After this great ſtroke he accompanied the General, firſt to Oxford (t), where they were made Doctors in the Civil Law, and thence to London, where they were ſplendidly entertained by the city, and had preſents of great value when they took leave (u). At this time England, if not quiet, was totally ſubdued, the Scots were diſcontented but not in arms, ſo that Ireland became the principal object of the Parliament's care, ſince, in that iſland, of three parties which had been for many years ſhedding each others blood, their own was the weakeſt. It was reſolved to ſend over a compleat army of ſeventeen thouſand men, for the ſoldiers were now ſo humbled, they might be ſent any where, and to add weight to the new erected Commonwealth of England, by ſubduing this divided nation (w). One only difficulty remained, which was, to find a proper General. Fairfax was unwilling to go, Waller was talked of, then Fleetwood; but, upon naming Cromwell, a ſilent conſent was given, a great majority approved, and the reſt were afraid to oppoſe it (x). Hiſtorians ſeem at a loſs for the motives which induced him to accept of this command, but they were, probably, theſe: he was willing to be relieved from the troubleſome fatigue of inventing new ſchemes, to render himſelf uſeful to the Parliament, while, as yet, they had both credit and power; he was deſirous of being at the head of an army in action, wherever it was, and he foreſaw thoſe diſtractions that would make ſuch as were now glad to be rid of him, no leſs deſirous to recal him (y). The Parliament ſeemed ſtrongly inclined to make this ſervice as acceptable as poſſible; for they gave him the title of Lord Lieutenant, a moſt extenſive commiſſion, and he was ſent out of London with the greateſt pomp imaginable. He embarked for Ireland in the month of Auguſt, and arrived at Dublin ſoon after the ſiege of that city was raiſed, and Ormond defeated (z). The great induſtry he had uſed, in providing all things neceſſary for this expedition, made his army wear another appearance than any of thoſe that had been yet ſeen in Ireland; ſo that many places ſurrendered upon his approach; but Sir Arthur Aſton being in Drogheda with two thouſand five hundred men, all old troops, it was believed he would have detained the conqueror ſome time, and have allowed Ormond leiſure to have drawn together a new army. But Cromwell, better acquainted with the real ſtrength of places, and better provided with the means of reducing them than thoſe who had gone before him in this war, declined a regular ſiege, and, obſerving where the place was weakeſt, employed all his artillery to open a paſſage. In a very ſhort ſpace of time two breaches were practicable, which Cromwell immediately ſtormed, September 16th, 1649; and though the garriſon made a gallant defence, yet, by ſome accident, Cromwell's forces gained admittance, and, as he had before reſolved, he put all that were to be met with to the ſword, ſo that, at the out-ſide, there were but thirty eſcaped. The ſtrong town of Wexford had the ſame, or, rather, a worſe fate, for there abundance of unhappy women periſhed (a). His ſucceſſes here, as in England, were ſeaſoned with very few diſappointments, though ſome he did meet with; and ſickneſs and action having much reduced his Army, he was once in danger of being attacked with great advantage by Ormond; but that opportunity being loſt, was never recovered (b). He did not put his forces into winter-

(t) Wood's Faſti Oxon. vol. ii. col. 88.

(u) Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 406.

(w) Heath's Chronicle, p. 237.

(x) Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 406, 407.

(y) See Ludlow's Memoirs, Flagellum, or Heath's life of O. Cromwell, and the Hiſt. of Independency.

(z) Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 422.

(a) Heath's Chron. p. 243, 244. Ludlow's Mem. vol. i. p. 301—303.

(b) See Lord Clarendon's Hiſt. of the War in Ireland, and Carte's life of the Duke of Ormond.

[T] And deſtroyed them with as little mercy, as, in the High Court of Juſtice, he had ſhewn to the King or his friends.] It is very obſervable, that though, in matters of difficulty and great importance, Cromwell was ſlow in taking his party, and yet more ſo in declaring it when taken, this conduct of his was entirely altered from the time he once declared; for he was then, generally ſpeaking, not only as firm, but more forward than any, and this in matters that would have put the greateſt difficulties upon another man. As for inſtance, he moved for a Committee to look into the proceedings at the trial of the King, in order to teſtify their concurrence and approbation, and actually reported this matter to the Houſe himſelf (125). Upon the trial of Lord Capel, he made a ſpeech as ſenſible as it was ſevere: he acknowledged that Lord had great courage, induſtry, and generoſity; avowed a ſincere perſonal eſteem and reſpect for him; but then added, that the true queſtion was, not whether they ſhould ſpare the life of a ſingle man? but, Whether they ſhould preſerve the moſt bitter and implacable enemy they ever had (126). When he marched againſt the Levellers, it was not only the Parliament's, but his own cauſe that was at ſtake, and therefore he preſſed Lord Fairfax not to loſe a moment's time; and indeed if any time had been loſt, it is very probable that a new Civil War had begun; for Capt. Thompſon, who had put himſelf at the head of theſe people, had drawn together near five thouſand men, who, like himſelf, were determined; and the Manifeſto they had publiſhed daily brought in more. To prevent, if poſſible, an action whence Cromwell foreſaw the worſt conſequences imaginable, Col. Reynolds was allowed to parley with them, and to give them hopes of a treaty. Under the ſenſe of this being ſecure, they took the ſaddles off their horſes, and put them into a meadow to feed; but, about twelve at night, they were attacked on all ſides, and, being unable to form themſelves, were eaſily defeated. A great many ſurrendered upon having quarter given them, who were the next morning ſpectators of the death of three of their Chiefs, one of whom was Thompſon's brother: they all died with great courage and ſpirit. A meſſage was then ſent to the reſt of the mutineers, that they ſhould be decimated, that is, one in ten was to ſuffer death; but upon the heels of this came Lieutenant-General Cromwell, to let them know, that with much difficulty he had procured them pardon, by which he recovered the affection of the Army; neither is it at all improbable, that he brought the Lord General with him hither, that he might have an opportunity of doing this, which happened May 15, 1649 (127). As for Thompſon, the Ringleader, he eſcaped the ſlaughter made of his companions, and threw himſelf into a wood, where, though much wounded, he defended himſelf deſperately ſo long as he had any ammunition, and then, abſolutely refuſing quarter, was killed upon the ſpot. This broke the heart of that deſign, which might otherwiſe have given the Parliament a great deal of trouble, notwithſtanding they had voted them rebels, for they were a ſort of people not to be frighted with words. After this Cromwell purſued his point, and prevailed upon thoſe regiments, moſt inclined to join the mutineers, to wipe out the memory of paſt offences, by conſenting to go with him to Ireland, which accordingly they did (128).

(125) See the Journal of the Houſe annexed to the King's trial.

(126) Life of O. Cromwell, Lord Protector, p. 113. Echard's Hiſt. of England, p. 670.

(127) Hiſt. of Independency, P. ii. p. 167. Heath's Chron. p. 233, 234.

(128) Flagellum, or the life of O. Cromwell, p. 84.

quarters till the month of December; and the rainy ſeaſon made it impoſſible for him to keep the field. He was in motion again in the beginning of February, and reduced ſeveral other places: not a few alſo revolted to him; and at laſt, in the beginning of March, he came before Kilkenny, which had been the chief ſeat of that bloody and barbarous rebellion, which he quickly reduced, and, not long after, Clonmell, by ſtorm; ſo that by the month of June, 1650, all Ireland was, in a manner, ſubdued, and that in ſo ſhort a ſpace as nine months (c). A ſtrange concurrence of circumſtances made his preſence now deſired in England, not only by thoſe who wiſhed him well, but by ſuch alſo as wiſhed him worſt. Conſtituting therefore his ſon-in-law Ireton his deputy, he took ſhipping for Briſtol, where, after a dangerous paſſage, he ſafely arrived (d), leaving ſuch a terror on the minds of the Iriſh, as made every thing eaſy to thoſe who ſucceeded him, and compleated the conqueſt of that country [U]. Upon his return to London he came, as it were, in triumph, and all ranks of people contended, either from love or fear, who ſhould ſhew him moſt reſpect. At his taking his ſeat in the Houſe he had thanks returned him for his ſervices, in terms as high as the Speaker's eloquence could reach (e). Theſe ceremonies once over, they proceeded to things of greater conſequence; for, by this time, the Parliament had another war upon their hands, the Scots having invited home King Charles II. and preparing an army to invade England. There is no doubt that the Parliament would have been content to have truſted this war to the conduct of Lord Fairfax, a brave man, and a good officer, though no profound politician; but he had always ſcruples, and, having been often deceived and deluded, was now not ſo eaſily dealt with (f). Cromwell made no ſecret of his ſentiments, which were, that they ſhould not wait for an invaſion, but prevent it by an invaſion, and in this, without queſtion, he had the better ſide of the argument; but Lord Fairfax's conſcience could not digeſt this reaſoning: he had taken the Covenant, and, notwithſtanding all the ſeries of tranſactions he had run through, he could not bring himſelf to think of breaking it, by attacking the Scots in their own country (g). Cromwell, who had taken meaſure of his capacity, and knew that, as far as that went, he was inflexibly honeſt, carried his diſſimulation to the greateſt height, preſſed him to continue in his command, declared he thought it a greater honour to ſerve as his Lieutenant-General, than to command the fineſt army in the world in chief; and, ſtrange as this declaration was, he ſupported it with ſuch a ſhew of ſincerity, that Mr. Ludlow (h), who ſuſpected him as much as any man, confeſſes that he was deceived, and that he thought himſelf obliged to interpoſe, and to deſire that the Lieutenant-General would not ſuffer his complaiſance to prove fatal to his country. This famous conference was held June 25th, 1650; and, though a whole month had been now ſpent in trying to get the better of Lord Fairfax's diſtaſte to the expedition againſt the Scots, yet it was all in vain; ſo that June 26th an Ordinance paſſed for repealing his commiſſion, and, at the ſame time, another for appointing Oliver Cromwell, Eſq; General and Commander in Chief of all the forces of the Commonwealth (i). He had now as great power as might have ſatisfied the moſt ambitious mind; for, though he

(c) Heath's Chronicle, p. 251. Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 459. Ludlow's Mem. vol. i. p. 309.

(d) Flagellum, or the life of O. Cromwell, p. 88, 89.

(e) Heath's Chron. p. 267. Ludlow's Mem. vol. i. p. 313, 314.

(f) Memoirs of Thomas Lord Fairfax, p. 127, 128.

(g) Behemoth, by T. Hobbs, p. 273.

(h) Memoirs, vol. i. p. 315.

(i) Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 460—462.

[U] Leaving ſuch a terror on the minds of the Iriſh, as made every thing eaſy to thoſe who ſucceeded him, and compleated the conqueſt of that country.] We have ſeen the ſhare that Commiſſary-General Ireton had in affairs of the greateſt importance and difficulty, where Cromwell had occaſion for advice, and his hand was chiefly uſed in drawing all papers; for having been bred a Lawyer, he was much more capable in things of that nature than moſt of his party. He was very uſeful to his father-in-law in the courſe of the Iriſh war, and therefore it is no wonder that Cromwell committed the extinction of it to his care. Some writers, and more eſpecially a famous Prelate (129), have indeed ſuggeſted that he was ſo far from being ſecond to Cromwell, that he governed him, and that particularly in the buſineſs of the King's death he was the principal inſtrument, and drove the Lieutenant-General into it whether he would or not. Ludlow does not ſay this; but he ſeems to countenance ſuch an opinion; for he was as great an admirer of Ireton, as he was an implacable enemy to Cromwell. If one could give entire credit to this, it might be reaſonably preſumed, that Cromwell left him his Deputy in Ireland, to prevent his embarraſſing the meaſures he meant to take in England. But whoever conſiders attentively the characters of both theſe men, will not, I perſuade myſelf, diſcover any real grounds for ſuch ſuppoſitions. While Cromwell and Ireton dealt with the King, their behaviour was perfectly the ſame, that is to ſay, they diſſembled alike, or, if there was any difference, Ireton did it the beſt of the two, whence one would naturally infer, that his principles were the ſame with Cromwell's: neither is it at all improbable, that, if they had lived longer together, they would have agreed as well in the latter part of their lives as they did in the former (130). Upon the whole, therefore, the truth ſeems to be, that Cromwell made choice of him for Deputy, becauſe he was at once the fitteſt man for that employment, and the perſon in the world he could beſt truſt with it. If theſe were Cromwell's reaſons, they were fully juſtified in the event; for Ireton did every thing that could be expected from him: he proſecuted the war with all the vigour and vigilance of a great officer, and ſettled alſo the civil affairs of the kingdom upon the beſt foundation poſſible. At the time of his death, there was an Engliſh army in Ireland of eight thouſand horſe and twenty-two thouſand foot, and though the Iriſh had ſtill ſome thouſands in arms, and were poſſeſſed of ſeveral places of conſiderable ſtrength, yet their counſels were ſo broken, their forces ſo diſpirited, and they had ſo few reſources left, (Cromwell, from a ſeeming ſpirit of compaſſion, having ſuffered multitudes to be tranſported abroad for the Spaniſh and other ſervices) that notwithſtanding what Ludlow tells us of his own exploits in that kingdom, there was really nothing to be done of any conſequence; and as the reduction of Ireland was firſt rendered practicable by Cromwell, ſo with juſtice one can hardly ſay, it was compleated by any but Deputy Ireton and Lord Broghill, who were both of them, though from very different motives, equally attached to Cromwell and his family (131). We ſhall hereafter ſee that it was his policy to keep Ireland conſtantly in ſuch hands; which, without doubt, was very neceſſary, ſince the army there would have been always formidable, if at the devotion of any but thoſe on whom he could abſolutely depend.

(129) Burnet's Hiſt. of his own times, p. 44. 46, 47.

(130) See Sir John Berkeley's Memoirs, Huntington's Charge againſt Cromwell, Hiſtory of Independency, P. ii. p. 178.

(131) Cox's Hiſt. of Ireland, P. ii. p. 67.

offered to reſign his Lieutenancy of Ireland, yet the Parliament would not accept it. Being ſenſible, however, of the neceſſity there was to preſerve the military affairs in that kingdom from falling again into confuſion, and being deſirous to remove out of his way any officer the Parliament might think capable of taking a ſuperior command, he reſolved to follow that impreſſion which he perceived his late conduct had made upon Mr. Ludlow, and to procure his being ſent to Ireland in quality of Lieutenant-General of the Horſe; which was accordingly done (k). Experience afterwards taught Ludlow the true meaning of this; but, in all probability, he conſidered it, at that time, as a favour; and this the great admirers of Cromwell have juſtly conſidered, as an inſtance of his refined policy (l) [W]. All obſtructions being now removed, he began his march towards Scotland, much about the ſame time that King Charles appeared there in public. The army which he commanded conſiſted of about twenty thouſand men, which were the flower of the Parliament Army, and ſuch as, with the change of a very few officers, General Cromwell could well depend upon (m). He uſed great expedition, and arrived in a month's time at Berwick, where he publiſhed a Declaration, importing, that the Engliſh had no intention to impoſe any form of government upon the inhabitants of Scotland, but engaged in this war purely upon a principle of ſelf-defence. The Scots had deſtroyed all their own country, and withdrawn as many of their people as they could, ſo that from the time Cromwell entered it, his forces were much diſtreſſed; nor was the progreſs he made attended, for ſome time, with much greater ſucceſs; for at Muſſleborough he was attacked in the night (n) with great fury, and was in no ſmall danger of being defeated; notwithſtanding which he continued his march towards Edinburgh, and came to the very walls of that city. The Army of the Scots Preſbyterians, for it could ſcarcely be ſtiled the King's Army, ſince they would not ſuffer him to be in it, was commanded by old Leſley, who ſhewed himſelf a very good officer; for being ſenſible, that his new-raiſed troops were not able to contend in the field with Cromwell's ſeaſoned old ſoldiers, he kept them ſo well intrenched, that even Cromwell, who put his troops ſometimes upon doing miracles, could not think of attacking him, but depended chiefly upon propagating diſcontents in the Scotch Army, which was eaſily done, and upon provoking them to fight, which he judged muſt, ſome time or other, have its effect (o). The firſt, indeed, Leſley could not prevent, though it gave him a great deal of trouble and diſquiet; but the latter he hindered for ſome time, and thereby brought Cromwell's forces into great ſtraits. They had once retreated to Dunbar, and thence advanced again to Muſſleborough; but this having no effect, the Scots growing daily ſtronger, and the Engliſh Army dwindling in the ſame proportion, Cromwell marched again to Dunbar, with a deſign, as is generally believed, of ſhipping his foot for England, and breaking through the Scots Army with his horſe (p). But while he was meditating either this retreat, or a final attempt before he made it, the Scots changed their reſolution at the requeſt of their Miniſters, who promiſed them, with a moſt enthuſiaſtic vehemence, a complete victory; in confidence of which, againſt Leſley's advice, they determined to fight (q). General Cromwell who, in the night of September 2d, 1650, had alſo reſolved in a Council of War, to attack them, obſerving, with a perſpective glaſs, that they were in motion, declared, as if it had been through a ſpirit of prophecy, but in reality from his military ſkill, That God had delivered them into his hands (r). Their attack was furious; but Cromwell's foot ſtood ſo firm, that they were able to make but little impreſſion; and the hurry of their own charge having thrown them into confuſion, the Engliſh horſe eaſily broke,

(k) Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. i. p. 321—323.

(l) Modeſt Vindication of O. Cromwell, p. 35.

(m) Heath's Chronicle, p. 269.

(n) Sir Edward Walker's Hiſtorical Diſcourſes, p. 163.

(o) Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 466. Walker's Hiſtorical Diſcourſes, p. 165.

(p) Echard's Hiſt. of Engl. p. 684. Walker's Hiſt. Diſcourſes, p. 179.

(q) Burnet's Hiſt. of his own times, vol. i. p. 54. Walker's Hiſt. Diſcourſes, p. 180, 181.

(r) Burnet's Hiſt. of his own times, vol. i. p. 54.

[W] As an inſtance of his refined policy.] It muſt be very clear to ſuch as peruſe what Mr. Ludlow has written, and who conſider what General Cromwell had acted, that, if we except their bravery, there could not be two more different men in the world. Ludlow was ſincerely and ſteadily a Republican. Cromwell was not wedded to any kind of Government, but of all kinds liked that the leaſt. Ludlow ſpoke his mind plainly, and was never taken for any other than he profeſſed himſelf to be: Cromwell valued himſelf upon acting a part, or rather upon acting ſeveral parts, and all of them equally well; and when he had occaſion to perform that of a Commonwealth's-man, he performed it ſo admirably, that though Ludlow knew him to be a player by profeſſion, yet he now thought he had thrown off the maſk, and appeared what he really was (132). Ludlow was entirely devoted to the Parliament as now conſtituted, and would have implicitly obeyed their orders upon any occaſion whatever: it was quite otherwiſe with Cromwell, who marched into Scotland to do his own buſineſs as well as theirs: from all which it may be inferred, that Cromwell ſent Ludlow over to Ireland, that, in caſe of any accident, like that which actually happened of the King's ſudden march into England, the Parliament might not have any officer at hand fit to command a new army, which new army, being alſo compoſed of troops raiſed under their authority, might have given a check to his own. He well knew, that two armies in a country of any thing near equal force, is the ſame thing with having none, in caſe the civil authority and the voice of the people declare on one ſide; for then there will be no way left to keep the other army together, which would have been his caſe if Ludlow had ever had a Parliamentary army, and was actually the caſe of Lambert againſt Monk; for the latter prevailed only by his having the Parliament and the people on his ſide. In Ireland there was no ſuch danger: Cromwell himſelf was Lord Lieutenant, Ireton was his Deputy, and therefore Ludlow could do little harm, for Ireton fooled him there as Cromwell had done in England; but when, through a change of circumſtances, he might have become dangerous, we ſhall find that General Cromwell took notice of it in time, and ſent over another perſon whom he could truſt to take the command out of his hands, of which alſo Ludlow bitterly complained, though he does not ſeem to have apprehended fully the motives of that alteration (133). I have dwelt upon this as a proper inſtance of Cromwell's refined policy, of which alſo many others might be given, but, for the ſake of brevity, theſe are left to the reader's own obſervation.

(132) Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. i. p. 321.

(133) Modeſt Vindication of O. Cromwell.

routed,

routed, and cut them off with prodigious ſlaughter: only one highland regiment of foot remained firm, and covered with their bodies the ground upon which they were poſted, no more than twenty wounded men being taken priſoners out of eight hundred of which that corps conſiſted (s). Such was the famous victory of Dunbar, than which Cromwell never gained any more entire, or that did him greater credit as a Commander (t) [X]. After taking the neceſſary precautions, by ſending away the priſoners, he returned to Edinburgh, where he met with no reſiſtance except from the caſtle, which held out to Chriſtmas-Eve, and was then ſurrendered, or, as ſome ſay, betrayed into his hands (u). He continued the war all the winter, and, in the beginning of the enſuing year, made diſpoſitions for attacking the King, whom the Scots had now crowned, and provided with another army; but factions ſtill continued amongſt them, of which none knew better how to take advantage than Cromwell. In the Spring he was ſeverely attacked by an ague, and this gave the Engliſh Parliament an opportunity of ſhewing an equal concern for his perſon and their own intereſts, which they expreſſed by ſending down Dr. Wright and Dr. Bates, two eminent Phyſicians, to attend him, and large ſupplies of men and money for reinforcing his army (w). He quickly recovered his health, and in ſeveral ſmall actions and ſieges was conſtantly ſucceſsful; but the King continued near Stirling with his army, now in a good meaſure under his command, in a ſtrong camp, where Cromwell could not force him, and out of which he was reſolved not to be drawn. At length, tired with this tedious manner of making war, Cromwell attacked and reduced Perth, which threw the King into great perplexity, ſo that, towards the end of July 1651, he reſolved to take that which ſeemed to be his only advantage, a retreat from Cromwell into England, to which he was neareſt (x). All who were about him concurred in this advice, excepting only the Marquis of Argyle, who told him, his fate would, in that caſe, depend upon a battle, where if he loſt it, it would be in a country where he had no reſource, and where, without a miracle, his perſon would be alſo loſt; that he might ſtill retire into Argyleſhire, and thence, if any misfortune happened, into the Highlands, where,

(s) Whitlocke's Memorials, P. 471. Walker's Hiſt. Diſcourſes, P. 181. Burnet's Mem. of the Dukes of Hamilton, P. 424.

(t) Echard's Hiſt. of Engl. p. 684. Rapin, vol. xiii. p. 53, 54.

(u) Heath's Chr. p. 280, 281. Bates's Elenchus Motuum, P. ii. p. 110.

(w) Flagellum, or the life of O. Cromwell, p. 106. Heath's Chronicle, p. 289, 290.

(x) Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 501. Heath's Chron. p. 294, 295. Bates's Elenchus Matuum, P. ii. p. 120.

[X] Or that did him greater credit as a Commander.] The moſt ſatisfactory account that is to be met with of this battle, ſeems to be that given by Cromwell himſelf, in his letter to the Parliament, which not being eaſily met with, the reader cannot but be pleaſed to read the moſt remarkable facts in it, as delivered by himſelf (134). 'Upon Monday evening, the enemy, 'whoſe numbers were very great, as we hear about ſix 'thouſand horſe, and ſixteen thouſand foot at leaſt; 'ours, drawn down as to ſound men, about ſeven 'thouſand five hundred foot, and three thouſand five 'hundred horſe. The enemy drew down to their 'right wing about two thirds of their left wing of 'horſe, ſhogging alſo their foot and train much to the 'right, cauſing their right wing of horſe to edge down 'towards the ſea. We could not well imagine but 'that the enemy intended to attempt upon us, or to 'place themſelves in a more exact condition of interpoſition. The Major General and myſelf coming 'to the Earl of Roxborough's houſe, and obſerving 'his poſture, I told him I thought it did give us an 'opportunity to advantage to attempt upon the 'enemy, to which he immediately replied, that he 'had thought to have ſaid the ſame thing to me, ſo 'that it pleaſed the Lord to ſet this apprehenſion 'upon both our hearts at the ſame inſtant. We called for General Monk, and ſhewed him the ſame 'thing, and coming to our quarter at night, and demonſtrating our apprehenſions to ſome of the Colonels, they alſo chearfully concurred. We reſolved 'therefore to put our buſineſs into this poſture, that 'ſix regiments of horſe, and three regiments and a 'half of foot, ſhould march in the van, and that the 'Major-General, the Lieutenant-General of the 'horſe, and the Commiſſary-General and Colonel 'Monk to command the brigade of foot, ſhould lead 'on the buſineſs; and that Col. Pride's brigade, Col. 'Overton's brigade, and the remaining two regiments 'of horſe, ſhould bring up the cannon and rear, the 'time of falling on to be by break of day; but, by 'ſome delay, it proved not to be 'till ſix o'clock in 'the morning. The enemy's word was the Covenant, 'which they had uſed for divers days; ours the Lord 'of Hoſts. The Major-General, Lieutenant-General 'Fleetwood, and Commiſſary-General Whalley, and 'Col. Twiſsleton, gave the onſet; the enemy being 'in very good poſture to receive them, having the advantage, their cannon and foot againſt our horſe, 'and before our foot could come up the enemy made 'a gallant reſiſtance. And there was a very hot diſpute, at ſword's point, between our horſe and theirs. 'Our firſt foot, after they had diſcharged their firſt 'fury, being over-powered with the enemy, received 'ſome repulſe, which they ſoon recovered; but my 'own regiment, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Goff and my Major White, did come ſeaſonably in, and at puſh of pike did repel the ſtouteſt 'regiment the enemy had there, merely with the courage which the Lord was pleaſed to give, which 'proved a great amazement to the reſidue of their 'foot, this being the firſt action between the foot: 'the horſe in the mean time did, with a great deal of 'courage and ſpirit, beat back all oppoſition, charging through the bodies of the enemies horſe and their 'foot, who were after the firſt repulſe given, made, 'by the Lord of Hoſts, as ſtubble to their ſwords. 'Indeed I believe I may ſpeak it without partiality, 'both your Chief Commanders and others in their ſeveral places, and ſoldiers alſo, were acted with as 'much courage, as ever hath been ſeen in any action 'ſince this war. I know they look not to be named, 'and therefore I forbear particulars. The beſt of the 'enemy's horſe and foot being broken through and 'through in leſs than an hour's diſpute, their whole 'army being put into confuſion, it became a total rout, 'our men having the chaſe and execution of them near 'eight miles. We believe that upon the place, and 'near about it, were three thouſand ſlain; priſoners 'taken of their officers, you have this incloſed liſt; 'of private ſoldiers, near ten thouſand; the whole 'baggage and train taken, in which was good ſtore 'of match, powder, and bullet; all their artillery 'great and ſmall; thirty guns. We are confident 'they have left behind them no leſs than fifteen 'thouſand arms. I have already brought unto me 'near two hundred colours, which I herewith ſend 'you. What officers of quality of theirs are killed, 'we yet cannot learn, but yet ſurely divers are, and 'many men of quality are mortally wounded, as Col. 'Lumſdale, the Lord Libberton, and others; and that 'which is no ſmall addition, I believe we have not 'loſt twenty men; not one commiſſioned officer ſlain 'as I hear of, ſave one Cornet, and Major Rookſby 'ſince dead of his wounds; and not many mortally 'wounded; Col. Whalley only cut in the hand, wriſt, 'and his horſe twice ſhot, and killed under him, but 'he well recovered another horſe, and went on in his 'chaſe. Thus you have the proſpect of one of the 'moſt ſignal mercies God hath done for England and 'his people this war.'

(134) What is here cited was tranſcribed from Cromwell's letters in Dr. Nalſon's M. S. Collections.

while there were men, he would never want an army (y). This moved the King, and him only: the reſt were determined, and prevailed upon him to begin his march ſouthward, as he did on the laſt of July (z). The news of his coming into England alarmed the Parliament at Weſtminſter exceedingly, and put them upon augmenting their army with many thouſand men. The rapidity of the King's march brought him to Worceſter before Cromwell could overtake him; but in the mean time the gallant Earl of Derby, who was marching to his aſſiſtance, was routed and taken; and ſoon after General Cromwell blocked him up in Worceſter, where, on the 3d of September, he attacked and carried the place, totally defeated the King's forces, and gained that which himſelf called, in his letter to the Parliament, the crowning victory (a) [Y]. He did not remain long with the troops: for having ſeen the walls of Worceſter demoliſhed, and directing ſome thouſands of priſoners to be driven before him, he began his march, as it were, in triumph for London. He met four Commiſſioners from the Parliament not far from Ayleſbury, and, when he came to Acton, the Speaker, the Houſe, and the Council of State, met him in form, as did ſoon after the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Sheriffs, and with all this pomp he proceeded to Whitehall, where, having repoſed himſelf a little, September the 16th, he took his place in the Houſe, where his great atchievements were again the ſubject of Lenthall's eloquence; and the ſame day he dined upon a ſolemn invitation in the city (b). Yet theſe, though great, were far from being the moſt conſiderable marks of honour that were paid him. A general thankſgiving was appointed for his victory, and the 3d of September appointed an anniverſary State holiday: he had beſides four thouſand pounds a year voted him out of the eſtates of the Duke of Buckingham and Marquis of Worceſter (c). When theſe ceremonies and acknowledgments were over, he had leiſure to look about him, and to conſider as well his own condition as that of the nation. He ſaw himſelf at preſent General and Commander in Chief of a great army in England, and, at the ſame time, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; but then he knew that all this was derived to him from the Parliament; and he clearly diſcerned that, whether Independents or Preſbyterians ſat there, they would endeavour to perpetuate ſupreme power in their own hands, which, for many reaſons, he diſliked; and therefore he ſifted the moſt eminent perſons, in order to find out their ſentiments about the eſtabliſhment of the kingdom, which was a new phraſe invented to cover the deſign of ſubverting the Parliament (d). In reference to this he found, that different men had different opinions, all concurring in part, but not in the whole, with his own [Z]. As it was not yet time for him

(y) See the article of Campbell, Marquis of Argyle, in this work.

(z) Heath's Chron. p. 294. Behemoth, by T. Hobbs, p. 281.

(a) Bates's Elenchus Motuum, P. ii. p. 222. Behemoth, by T. Hobb, p. 281, 282. Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 507, 508. Echard's Hiſt. Eng. p. 697.

(b) Flagellum, or the life of O. Cromwell, p. 118, 119. Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 509.

(c) Echard's Hiſt. of Engl. p. 697.

(d) Bates's Elenchus Motuum, P. ii. p. 157.

[Y] The crowning victory.] In this battle of Worceſter Cromwell gave very high proofs of his perſonal courage, and that for a generous purpoſe, ſince he expoſed himſelf extremely to offer quarter to the Scots who defended the Fort Royal, with a view only of preventing the unneceſſary effuſion of blood amongſt his own troops, for his propoſition being refuſed, and the place taken, he directed all that were in it to be put to the ſword (135). He likewiſe ſhewed his impartiality in commending the courage of the King, who charged with the Scots foot, and gained ſome advantage even over Cromwell's guards (136): but the Scots horſe, under the command of Leſley, behaved baſely. There needed not much of conduct in the buſineſs, for beſides that they were certainly better troops, Cromwell had alſo the advantage in numbers, the King's army conſiſting but of ſixteen thouſand, and that of the Parliament of twenty-eight thouſand (137). It is ſaid that Cromwell treated the militia but indifferently, though they contributed much to the victory; but in his letter to the Parliament he acknowledges their great ſervices, in as clear and as ſtrong terms as could be expected. There is no doubt that this was as ſignal and compleat a ſtroke of ſucceſs, as even the ambitious heart of Cromwell could deſire, and therefore it is no great wonder that it took him a little off his guard, as it certainly did. He would have knighted two of his principal Commanders upon the field of battle, and was with great difficulty diſſuaded from it (138). His letter to the Parliament is conceived in more ſtiff and lofty terms than any of his former writings. Ludlow ſays that his behaviour was altered from that day, and that all who were about him obſerved it (139). Perhaps it would be nearer the truth to ſay, it was altered upon that day and the next, for he very ſoon recovered himſelf, and ſhewed as much ſubmiſſion and humility as ever. He treated his priſoners with great ſeverity, and it is thought would have brought Maſſey and Middleton to the ſcaffold, if they had not had the good luck to eſcape. He was now compleatly maſter of the Army, which expected its continuance and the payment of all arrears from his weight and influence, which opinion he took care to encourage, and gave them frequent aſſurances, that they might much better depend upon him than upon their old reſource of Agitators (140). All his conduct afterwards was of a piece with this, and he took all the care imaginable to make the Army ſenſible of their own importance, and to let them ſee that nothing could divide their intereſts from his own, which was the true foundation of his growing greatneſs, and of the gradual declenſion of the Parliament's power, which, though they clearly diſcerned, they knew not how to prevent.

(135) Flagellum, or the life of O. Cromwell, p. 116.

(136) Bates's Elenchus Motuum, P. ii. p. 123.

(137) Behemoth, by T. Hobbs, p. 282. Heath's Chron. p. 297.

(138) Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. i. p. 365, 366.

(139) Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 507. Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. ii. p. 447.

(140) Flagellum, or the life of O. Cromwell, p. 118.

[Z] But not in the whole with his own.] After the great victory of Worceſter, General Cromwell took a new text, upon which he preached with wonderful eloquence upon all occaſions, and this was, the neceſſity of an eſtabliſhment. There had been a great deal of fighting, and now the fighting was over, he thought the conquerors ought to know what they had been fighting for (141). In a meeting among the principal perſons in power, held about three months afterwards, he propoſed the queſtion fairly (142), when St. John, Whitlocke, Lenthall, and Sir Thomas Widdrington, declared plainly for monarchy, Harriſon, Deſborough, and Whalley, as plainly for a Commonwealth. Cromwell did not think fit to diſcover his own opinion with the like clearneſs, but expreſſed a deſire of knowing, if a Monarchy was neceſſary, Who was to be that Monarch? Sir Thomas Widdrington anſwered directly, one of the late King's ſons, and propoſed the Duke of Glouceſter then in their power. To this Whitlocke demurred, and was for inviting the two elder brothers; but this being nothing to Cromwell's deſign, he ſoon broke up that conference. Upon the 7th of Nov. 1652, meeting the Lord Commiſſioner Whitlocke in the Park, he entered into a long diſcourſe with him upon this important ſubject, in which the part that Cromwell took was this (143): he ſhewed him that the Parliament was now become a faction; that they were reſolved to rule all, and to rule for ever, merely for him to declare himſelf plainly, he made it his buſineſs to entertain as fair a correſpondence as poſſible with all parties. He behaved in public with great decency and duty towards that body of men he was contriving to remove, but held a private correſpondence with every one of the parties that were caballing againſt them, by which he was in all their ſecrets, as they probably thought they were in his, but in that they were deceived; he never had but one confident, and that confident was gone. This was his ſon-in-law Ireton, whom he had placed at the head of affairs in Ireland, where he died of the plague (e). It was of great importance to him to ſubſtitute another there as much devoted to his ſervice; but the thing was difficult. The Parliament had caſt their eyes upon Lambert, who was to govern with the title of Lord Deputy; but ways and means were found to change their reſolution as to the title, though not as to the man: but as he rightly foreſaw, the change of the one produced the change of the other; for Lambert, who would have been proud of being Deputy, diſdained to go thither as a Commiſſioner (f). Under theſe circumſtances the ordinance appointing Cromwell Lord Lieutenant of that kingdom determined, which he very prudently declined to renew, but inſtead of it got the ordinance appointing him Captain-General and Commander in Chief in England, extended by another ordinance to Ireland; and thus he had the power without the name: but as he never meant to go thither again in perſon, he gave his daughter, Mrs. Ireton, in marriage to Colonel Fleetwood, a man entirely under his direction, whom he procured to be declared Lieutenant-General of the forces in Ireland; by which the great point he aimed at was fully attained (g). This dexterity in his management became very ſoon after obvious enough, though little notice was taken of it at the time; which ſhewed the deep reach of his politicks, and how much his abilities were in reality ſuperior to thoſe of the perſons he had to do with, who, with all the good-will in the world to oppoſe him, found themſelves, at every turn, the dupes of his deſigns, which at the bottom were juſt as honeſt as their own (h). As a proof of this we may obſerve, that the very perſon worſt treated in this affair, that is, General Lambert, not only miſplaced his reſentment, and grew diſaffected to the Parliament, but ſuffered himſelf to be ſo far cajoled by Cromwell, as to believe, that he thought him worthier than to be ſent to Ireland upon any terms, and that if any thing ſhould happen to himſelf, he ſincerely wiſhed him for his ſucceſſor, how eminent ſoever his ſtation might be (i). All the winter of the year 1652 was ſpent in cabals and contrivances on both ſides, that is, by the friends of the Parliament, to ſupport and ſuſtain its authority, and, by their opponents, to bring things into ſuch a ſituation, as might render the neceſſity of diſſolving that aſſembly univerſally apparent. But while all this was doing, General Cromwell neglected nothing that might eſtabliſh hopes of favour from him, and of benefit to their reſpective cauſes in all the parties then ſubſiſting in the nation; which, conſidering the diverſity of principles on which they acted, and their inveteracy againſt each other, muſt appear a thing almoſt incredible (k) [AA]. As the Spring advanced

(141) Heath's Chron. p. 301.

(142) Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 460. Life of O. Cromwell, p. 214, 215.

(143) Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 516.

(e) Clarendon's Hiſtory of the Rebellion, vol. iii. p. 467.

(f) Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. i. p. 414.

(g) Heath's Chron. p. 309.

(h) Bates's Elenchus Motuum, P. 159, 160. Flagellum, or the life of Cromwell, p. 125.

(i) Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. i. p. 414. Flagellum, &c. p. 126, 127.

(k) Bates's Elenchus Motuum, P. ii. p. 159. Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. ii. p. 449, 450.

for their own ſakes; that they gave all employments to themſelves, their relations, or friends; that they drew every thing within their own cognizance, by which the ſubject loſt the benefit of the law, and held his property but by a precarious tenure; that, all this conſidered, they had fought themſelves into a worſe condition, and that, inſtead of a Monarch with a prerogative royal, they had now many maſters who made laws and broke them at their pleaſure; that, on the other hand, the Army was very ſenſible of this; that they bore it with great reluctancy; that they too had great diſputes amongſt themſelves; and that it could not be long before theſe miſchiefs broke out into a new flame. Whitlocke very readily agreed, that he had deſcribed both parties truly, but, at the ſame time, acknowledged, that, notwithſtanding he was acquainted with the diſeaſes of the Commonwealth, he was entirely ignorant of any right method of cure. What, ſaid Cromwell, if a man ſhould take upon himſelf to be King? Whitlocke undertook to ſhew him, that he would get nothing by it, that he had more power already than former Kings ever had, and that by aſſuming the name he might run a great hazard of loſing the thing. Cromwell then preſſed to know, What he would have done? upon which, as before, the Lord Commiſſioner propounded compromiſing matters with Charles Stuart, the debating of which Cromwell declined, as being a matter of much difficulty. There is no doubt but that he had many converſations of this ſort with the moſt intelligent of all parties; but we ſhall mention only one more, and that for two reaſons; firſt, becauſe it ſhews us that he was perfectly aware of what is ſuggeſted in the text, that thoſe who hated each other extremely, all concurred in ſtill hating him with greater inveteracy; for as the Royaliſts deteſted his perſon, ſo the Republicans abhorred his power. Secondly, becauſe it is reported upon good authority, having been often related by Mr. Henry Nevil, a celebrated Politician, and once a Member of the Council of State. He was wont to tell it thus (144): 'That Cromwell upon this great 'occaſion ſent for ſome of the chief city Divines, as if 'he made it a matter of conſcience to be determined 'by their advice. Among theſe was the leading 'Mr. Calamy, who very boldly oppoſed the project of 'Mr. Cromwell's ſingle government, and offered to 'prove it both unlawful and impracticable. Cromwell 'anſwered readily upon the firſt head of unlawful, and 'appealed to the ſafety of the nation being the ſupreme law. But, ſays he, pray Mr. Calamy why 'impracticable? Calamy replied, Oh 'tis againſt the 'voice of the nation, there will be nine in ten againſt 'you. Very well, ſays Cromwell, but what if I 'ſhould diſarm the nine, and put a ſword into the tenth 'man's hand, Would not that do the buſineſs?'

(144) Life of Henry Nevil, Eſq; p. 35.

[AA] Muſt appear a thing almoſt incredible.] It cannot but be ſatisfactory to the inquiſitive reader to ſee this point a little more fully explained, the chief difficulty lying in this, that the inveteracy of people in thoſe times was ſo great, as to render it next to impoſſible, to ſhew the leaſt favour to any one party, without irritating all the reſt. The path indeed was narrow, and precipices there were on every ſide; yet Cromwell had the courage to venture himſelf in this path, and ſo great conduct as to paſs through it without making one falſe ſtep. He never courted the Cavaliers directly, but, upon particular occaſions, and under a variety of pretences, he did many of them ſignal ſervices, and generally ſpoke of them as men of honour acting upon miſtaken principles; exclaiming at the advanced this great affair began to ripen: the people in different parts of the nation, and the Army in general, began to murmur at the amazing ſtretch of power which the Parliament, though ſo thin of Members, aſſumed to themſelves, which ſometimes the General encouraged, and at others repreſſed; as for inſtance, when it was debated in the Council of Officers, whether they ſhould petition the Parliament to turn their vote into a bill for their own diſſolution, Cromwell ſent Colonel Deſborough, who had married a ſiſter of his, to put an end to that debate, in which he declared, in expreſs terms, againſt uſing any violence, and at the ſame time ran out into the higheſt commendations of that Aſſembly (l). But afterwards perceiving, that the party againſt them in the Army was growing daily ſtronger, and that, on the other hand, the Parliament, having gotten both courage and credit from their ſucceſs in the Dutch war, were contriving to ſet up the Fleet againſt the Army, and to diminiſh the power of the one, and to augment that of the other, had ordered part of the Army on board the Fleet, he found himſelf obliged to make more haſte (m). On the 19th of April, 1653, he called a Council of Officers, once more to debate this point, in which as he had many friends, ſo he had alſo ſome opponents, who inſinuated, that what he did proceeded from ſelf-intereſt and ambition. Major-General Harriſon, a zealous Fanatick, but abſolutely deceived by Cromwell, aſſured the Aſſembly, in the ſincerity of his heart, That the Lord General ſought only to pave the way for the government of Jeſus and his Saints, to which Major Streater briſkly returned, That then he ought to come quickly, for if it was after Chriſtmas, he would come too late (n). Upon this Cromwell adjourned the meeting till the next morning, when a new point was ſtarted, whether it might not be expedient for the Houſe and the Army to appoint twenty perſons of a ſide, to be intruſted with the ſupreme power. In the midſt of this diſpute advice came, that the Houſe had under conſideration their own diſſolution, and upon this ſuch as were Members withdrew, and went thither to promote that deſign. But in reality the Parliament had framed a bill, to continue themſelves to the 5th of November in the next year, propoſing, in the mean time, to fill up the Houſe by new elections (o). Colonel Ingoldſby came back to the General, and informed him what the Houſe was upon: at which the General, who expected they ſhould have meddled with no other buſineſs but putting an immediate period to their own ſitting, without any more delay, was ſo enraged, that he immediately commanded ſome of the officers to fetch a party of ſoldiers, to the number of three hundred, with which marching directly to Weſtminſter, he placed ſome of them at the door, ſome in the lobby, and others on the ſtairs (p). Himſelf going into the Houſe, firſt addreſſed himſelf to his friend St. John, and told him, That he then came to do that which grieved him to the very ſoul, and what he had earneſtly with tears prayed to God againſt; nay, that he had rather be torn in pieces than do it; but that there was a neceſſity laid upon him therein, in order to the glory of God, and the good of the nation (q). Then he ſat down, and heard their debates for ſome time on the fore-mentioned act; after which calling to Major-General Harriſon, who was on the other ſide of the Houſe, to come to him, he told him, That he judged the Parliament ripe for a diſſolution, and this to be the time of doing it (r). Harriſon anſwered, Sir, the work is very great and dangerous, therefore I deſire you ſeriouſly to conſider of it, before you engage in it. You ſay well, replied the General, and thereupon ſat ſtill for about a quarter of an hour; and then the queſtion for paſſing the ſaid act being put, he ſaid again to Harriſon, This is the time, I muſt do it: and ſo ſtanding up on a ſudden, he bad the Speaker leave the chair, and told the Houſe, That they had ſitten long enough, unleſs they had done more good; that ſome of them were whoremaſters, looking then towards Harry Martin and Sir Peter Wentworth; that others of them were drunkards, and ſome corrupt and unjuſt men, and ſcandalous to the profeſſion of the goſpel; and that it was not fit they ſhould ſit as a Parliament any longer, and therefore he muſt deſire them to go away (s). He charged them with not having a heart to do any thing for the (n) Flagellum, or the life of O. Cromwell, p. 126, 127.

(l) Ludlow's Memoirs, p. 451, 452.

(m) Heath's Chron. p. 324, 325. Bates's Elenchus Motuum, p. 160.

(o) Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 524.

(p) Bates's Elenchus Motuum, P. ii. p. 160.

(q) Flagellum, or the life of O. Cromwell, p. 129. Life of O. Cromwell, Lord Protector, p. 230.

(r) Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. ii. p. 455, 456.

(s) Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 554. Dugdale's Short view of the troubles, p. 405. Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. ii. p. 457.

the ſame time againſt the flagrant acts of injuſtice done to them by the Rump, who, to get at their eſtates, made no ſcruple of diſputing away the force of their own acts, and breaking through the moſt ſolemn capitulations (145). This, with the heat he ſhewed in puſhing the Act of Oblivion after the battle of Worceſter, induced them to wiſh well to him rather than the Parliament. He complained to all ſober and religious perſons, of the ſcandalous lives, and diſſolute manners of ſome of the Republican Members. There are, ſaid he, Tom Chaloner and Harry Martin, bleſſed reformers and legiſlators, while they are notorious whoremaſters, and have no more religion than their horſes. He expoſed the pride of ſome, the fraud of others, and the ſelf-ſeeking of all; which gained him great reputation (146). To the Fifth Monarchy men he talked in their own ſtile, and profeſſed his deſire that the ſaints ſhould reign, explaining this to men of ſounder underſtandings, as meaning no more than that the Government ought to be in the hands of men of prudence and probity, which, the then ſituation of things conſidered, was very acceptable doctrine. His real deſign, however, he cloſely concealed; ſo that all who were deſirous of a change expected it from him, and at the ſame time flattered themſelves with the hopes that it would be ſuch a change as they wiſhed. In every thing he ſaid and did, he had a manner that ſeemed to manifeſt the greateſt ſincerity; and yet there was ſo much of caution in all his words and actions, that he knew how to interpret the one, and to account for the other, in ſuch a way, that no hold could be taken of them to his diſadvantage. In ſhort, he never expreſſed reſentment againſt any but it was followed with deſtruction, ſo as to leave them no capacity of revenge; and wherever he conferred obligations, it was in a way ſo high and ſo generous, that as he never beſtowed them on unworthy objects, ſo the memory of them was never loſt, or himſelf deceived as to their effects (147).

(145) Dugdale's Short view of the late troubles, p. 405.

(146) Echard's Hiſtory of England, p. 703, 704. Unparalleled Monarch, p. 114.

(147) See Maurice's Memoirs of Lord Broghill, Winſtanley's Select Lives of Engliſh Worthies, p. 596, 597.

public

public good, and eſpouſing the intereſt of Preſbytery and the Lawyers, who were the ſupporters of tyranny and oppreſſion, and accuſed them of an intention to perpetuate themſelves in power. When ſome of the Members began to ſpeak, he ſtepped into the midſt of the Houſe, and ſaid, Come, come, I will put an end to your prating; then walking up and down the Houſe, he cried out, You are no Parliament, I ſay you are no Parliament, and, ſtamping with his feet, he bad them for ſhame begone, and give place to honeſter men (t). Upon this ſignal the ſoldiers entered the Houſe, and he bad one of them take away that bauble, meaning the mace; and Harriſon taking the Speaker by the arm, he came down. Then the General, addreſſing himſelf again to the Members, who were about a hundred, ſaid, 'Tis you that have forced me to this; for I have ſought the Lord night and day, that he would rather ſlay me than put me upon the doing of this work. And then ſeizing on all their papers, he ordered the ſoldiers to ſee the Houſe cleared of all Members, and, having cauſed the doors to be locked up, went away to Whitehall (u). With the ſame ſpirit he proceeded to turn out the Council of State, and to take ſuch other meaſures as appeared to him the moſt proper, for the ſupport of that great authority he had attained, preſerving the affection of the Army, and keeping peace and quietneſs in the nation [BB]. He continued, for a few days, to direct all things by the advice of the Council of Officers, where he profeſſed his own painful ſenſe of the vaſt burthen laid upon his ſhoulders, and how deſirous he was to remove it; but finding, by the ſpeeches of ſome of them, he might probably be taken at his word, he firſt excited them to diſcover, and then ſo effectually expoſed their different, contradictory, and irreconcileable ſentiments as to Government, that they were at laſt glad to propoſe a new Council of State, in which the ſupreme authority was veſted (w); and then publiſhed a very rational and well-drawn declaration, dated April 22d, in which they gave the faireſt colours poſſible to the late diſſolution, and promiſed that a new repreſentative ſhould be called (x). This was accordingly done, by virtue of letters or warrants under the Lord General's hand. This Aſſembly conſiſted of one hundred forty-two perſons, and met July the 4th, in the Council-Chamber at Whitehall, where Cromwell told them, that they had a clear call to take upon them the ſupreme authority; which they did without ceremony, and elected Francis Rous, Eſq; Provoſt of Eton, their Speaker. This, from its narrowneſs in point of numbers, was ſtiled the little, from its manner of proceeding, the godly, and from the pragmatical behaviour of one Praiſe-God Barebone, a Leatherſeller in the city, Barebone's Parliament. This Aſſembly ſat long enough to do Cromwell's buſineſs and their own; for the majority of them being Fifth Monarchy-men, threatened total deſtruction to the Miniſtry, and the Lawyers; and took ſuch ſtrange ſteps with re(t) Dugdale's Short view of the troubles, p. 405. Bates's Elenchus Motuum, P. ii. p. 161. Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. ii. p. 457.

(u) Heath's Chron. p. 340.

(w) Flagellum, or the life of Cromwell, p. 136.

(x) Heath's Chron. p. 340, 341, 342, 343.

[BB] And keeping peace and quietneſs in the nation.] When General Cromwell came back to Whitehall he found a Council of Officers ſtill aſſembled, and this grand point yet in debate, upon which he told them roundly, they need trouble themſelves no farther about it, for he had done it. Col. Okey, who was none of his creatures, demanded immediately What he had done? and, when he had told him, expoſtulated the point warmly; but Cromwell talked ſo much louder than he, of the glory of God and the good of the nation, the removing of yokes and badges of ſlavery, that he very ſoon thought proper to be ſilent, and to wait for the concluſion of this affair, in order to diſtinguiſh from his actions, what were Cromwell's real intentions in ſo bold an action (148). In the afternoon of the ſame day, Cromwell, attended by the Majors-General Lambert and Harriſon, went to the Council of State, and finding them ſitting, addreſſed them in the following terms: 'Gentlemen, if you are met here as private perſons you ſhall not be diſturbed, but if as a Council of State, this is no place for you. And ſince you cannot but know what was done at the Houſe this morning, ſo take notice, that the Parliament is diſſolved.' Serjeant Bradſhaw boldly anſwered, 'Sir, we have heard what you did at the Houſe in the morning, and, before many hours, all England will hear it. But, Sir, you are miſtaken to think that the Parliament is diſſolved, for no power under Heaven can diſſolve them but themſelves, therefore take you notice of that.' Some others alſo ſpoke to the ſame purpoſe: But the Council finding themſelves to be under the ſame force, they all quietly departed (149). The true reaſon why General Cromwell diſmiſſed, in that manner, this Council of State, was, becauſe he intended to have another of his own conſtruction, theſe as they derived their authority from, being men entirely devoted to the Parliament. It cannot be ſuppoſed that ſuch a tranſaction as this ſhould paſs in ſilence, or that the perſons ejected, and their friends and creatures, ſhould not make a very great noiſe, as indeed they did, repreſenting this act of Cromwell's as the moſt inſolent violation of the ſupreme authority that could be practiſed or imagined (150). To prevent any impreſſion that theſe invectives might otherwiſe make, ſome were employed to tell the people, that theſe men had no reaſon to complain; that themſelves had taken pains to ſhew the nation that there was no authority inviolable in its nature, that they had themſelves fled to the Army, and by the aſſiſtance of the Army purged their own Houſe at their pleaſure; that they had taken away the Upper Houſe of Parliament without any other law than their will; and that in all their proceedings they had been by far more arbitrary, than any Monarch that ever filled the Engliſh throne, and this without any other colour of right than what was derived to them from their own vote. The Royaliſts took this advantage alſo to deſcant upon public affairs, and without much ceremony treated the diſperſed Parliament as a herd of uſurpers, exhauſting the wealth, and trampling upon the liberties of the people, who could only be delivered by one who had ſuperior power in his hands, and who in this inſtance had made the right uſe of it (151). When ſuch diſcourſes had been thoroughly ſpread, and the General afterwards proceeded to ſome popular acts, ſuch as reducing the tax from one hundred and twenty thouſand pounds to ninety thouſand pounds a month, and had emitted the Declaration mentioned in the text, it was preſently approved by addreſſes from the fleet and army, as well as from different parts of the kingdom, which was called the voice of the nation: and, by the way, it may not be amiſs to take notice, that this was the firſt riſe of addreſſes (152), which very clearly ſhews how great a politician Cromwell was, and how much better ſkilled in the art of giving a fair colour to all his proceedings than is generally imagined.

(148) Flagellum, or the life of O. Cromwell, p. 127, 128.

(149) Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. ii. p. 461.

(150) Flagellum, or the life of Cromwell, p. 136. Bates's Elenchus Motuum, P. ii. p. 162.

(151) Flagellum, or the life of Cromwell, p. 128.

(152) Heath's Chron. p. 343. 343.

gard

gard to the Dutch Ambaſſadors, that they were abſolutely at a loſs how to deal with them; ſo that all parties (except their own ſmall one) being heartily tired with theſe Legiſlators, ſome of themſelves, who were in the ſecret, met early on the 12th of December, and agreed to ſurrender up their power to Cromwell, from whom it came (y). Major-General Harriſon, and about twenty more, remained in the Houſe, and ſeeing the reign of the Saints at an end, placed one Mr. Moyer in the Speaker's chair, and began to draw up proteſts; but they were ſoon interrupted by Colonel White, with a party of ſoldiers; who aſking them what they did there, they told him, They were ſeeking the Lord: to this he replied, That, to his knowledge, the Lord had not been ſought there many years, and ſo fairly turned them out of doors (z). The ſcene thus changed, the ſupreme power was ſaid to be in the Council of Officers again, and they very ſpeedily reſolved, that the Lord General, with a ſelect Council, ſhould have the adminiſtration of public affairs, upon the terms contained in a paper, intituled, The INSTRUMENT OF GOVERNMENT; and that his Excellency ſhould be Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and have the title of Highneſs; and accordingly he was inveſted therewith on the 16th of December, in the Court of Chancery in Weſtminſter-Hall, with great ſolemnity (a). When he had thus reduced the Government into ſome order, he proceeded very wiſely and warily; appointed a Privy-Council, in which there were ſeveral great and worthy men, who, he knew, would either not act at all, or not act very long with him; but their names giving a ſanction for the preſent, he proceeded, with the advice of ſo many of this Council as attended upon him, to make ſeveral ordinances that were neceſſary, as alſo to diſpoſe matters for the holding a new Parliament (b).

(y) Ludlow's Memoirs, p. 475. Heath's Chronicle, p. 353.

(z) Flagellum, or the life of O. Cromwell, p. 139. Bates's Elenchus Motuum, P. ii. p. 170.

(a) Echard's Hiſt. of England, p. 707. Heath's Chron. p. 354.

(b) Coke's Detection, p. 49. Life of O. Cromwell, p. 265.

Thus, in the fifty-fourth year of his age, he aſſumed ſovereign power, and exerciſed it with great dignity; and though he well knew, that all obedience to him roſe from fear, and that his danger was nearly equal from all parties, yet, by his prudent management, he left none the capacity of hurting him [CC]. He applied himſelf immediately to the ſettlement of the public affairs, both foreign and domeſtic; he concluded a peace with the States of Holland, in which the point of the flag was carried pretty high, ſatisfaction was promiſed for the barbarous maſſacre at Amboyna, the reſtitution of Pollcroon, and other things that were never complied with (c). In this treaty the King of Denmark got himſelf included: the Lord Commiſſioner Whitelocke made a firm peace with Sweden: the King of (c) Heath's Chronicle, p. 357. Ludlow's Mem. vol. ii. p. 487.

[CC] Though by his prudent management he left none the capacity of hurting him.] Immediately after his turning out the Long Parliament, when, as we before obſerved, all parties took the liberty of ſpeaking, and ſome places that of addreſſing, which thoſe who liked the contents called the ſenſe of the people; ſome there were in the counties near London that talked of a King, and this hint ſome people had a mind to improve; for which purpoſe, on Tueſday the ſeventeenth of May in the forenoon (153), about 'Change time, a Gentleman extremely well dreſſed came in a coach to the Royal Exchange, where, taking out of his coach the General's picture, he fixed it againſt one of the pillars, and after making two or three turns, took coach again and drove away. Over the head of the pourtrait ſtood theſe words, 'Tis I; and underneath were the following verſes:

(153) From Dr. Nalſon's MS. Collections, vol. xvi. num. 134.

Aſcend three thrones, great Captain and Divine,
By the will of God, (*) O Lyon, for they're thine:
Come Prieſt of God, bring oil, bring robes, bring gold,
Bring crowns and ſceptres; 'tis high time t' unfold
Your cloiſter'd bags, ye State Cheats, leſt the rod
Of ſteel and iron, of this your King and God,
Pay you in 's wrath with intereſt; kneel and pray,
To Oliver, the Torch of Sion! the Star of day!
Shout then ye Merchants, City and Gentry ſing,
And all bare-headed cry, God ſave the King!

(*) Alluding to the Protector's arms.

As ſoon as exchange time was over the Lord Mayor cauſed the picture to be taken down, and carried it directly to the Lord General at Whitehall. Some writers mention this as a libel upon Cromwell (154); but in thoſe days, when the thing was moſt likely to be underſtood, it was believed that the fox was the finder, and that the Lord Mayor himſelf, not without the privity of the Lord General, ſet up this picture on the Royal Exchange by way of a political weather-cock, to ſee in what corner the popular wind ſat (155). Indeed, why might not my Lord Mayor aſk the citizens upon 'Change the ſame queſtion that Cromwell did Whitlocke in St. James's Park, What if a man ſhould take upon himſelf to be King? When it was found this ſcheme could not be brought to bear, then the calling an aſſembly by way of Parliament was the next ſtep, and for this the Lord General had three good reaſons: the firſt was, that it might appear that he made a diſtinction between diſliking the Rump, and diſcarding Parliaments: the next, that upon their ſinking again into nothing, he might receive his power back from them, as it were by form of law; and, laſtly, that by making the Fifth Monarchy men, who were predominant in this Parliament, both odious and ridiculous, he might have the leſs to fear from them, and withal the greater ſupport from the Clergy and Lawyers, for that Parliament had fairly voted that tythes were a relict of Judaiſm, that the Common-Law was a badge of ſlavery; and, on the other hand, that the Court of Chancery ought to be aboliſhed; and thus, to all the thinking part of the world, it was made evident that the Saints, having no ſenſe, were not fit to govern (156). The taſk he now undertook, of governing as a Monarch with a Council, was ſtill harder than all the reſt; and yet he ſeemed to manage it with the ſame eaſe, for he ſtill continued to practiſe upon all parties by their hopes and fears. As to the Cavaliers, he intimated that he was not irreconcilable to thoſe who ſhould give proofs of their affection to his government; that he meant not to hurt or oppreſs thoſe who were inclined to live quietly; but that if any attempted to aſſaſſinate him, he had thoſe at his command who ſhould immediately repay that by taking off whole families (157). He encouraged and protected the Preſbyterians that ſubmitted, and delivered up thoſe who oppoſed him to be worried by the ſectaries. He maintained his old language to the Fifth Monarchy men: he ſaid things were not ripe for the Saints to take the rule of the earth, and that in the mean time he was ſo far from taking the ſceptre, that he had only taken the Conſtable's ſtaff, in order to keep the peace, and prevent the people from cutting one another's throats. As for the ſenſible Republicans he knew them to be irreconcilable, and therefore he ſignified to them, that if they would live quietly they might, but that if they diſturbed his government he would make them feel the weight of his power, which he knew by experience was the only way to keep them in order (158).

(154) Examination of Neal's Hiſt. of the Puritans, vol. iv. p. 153.

(155) Thurloe's State Papers, vol. i. p. 249.

(156) Bates's Elenchus Motuum, P. ii. p. 164, 165.

(157) Life of O. Cromwell, p. 257, 258.

(158) Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. ii. p. 471—488.

Portugal alſo, notwithſtanding all that had paſſed between him and the Parliament, was obliged to accept of peace upon his terms. But matters were not ſo eaſily adjuſted with France, though, from the very beginning, that Crown paid the Protector great court, from an apprehenſion, it is ſaid, that he meant to marry one of his daughters to the Prince of Conde, which would have engaged him on the ſide of the Spaniards (d); but for this, perhaps, there never was any great foundation. By degrees, however, he impreſſed ſuch an opinion of the great importance of his friendſhip, both upon France and Spain, that the two crowns contended for it, with an earneſtneſs that made them both ridiculous [DD]. In reference to affairs at home, he filled the Courts of Weſtminſter-Hall with very able Judges; and directed the Lawyers themſelves to make ſuch corrections in the practice of their profeſſion, as might, in ſome meaſure, free them from public odium; which had a good effect. The ſame moderation he practiſed in Church affairs, affecting to carry himſelf equally between the Preſbyterians and Independants, but profeſſing an unalterable reſolution of maintaining liberty of conſcience (e). He laboured by degrees to purge the Anabaptiſts out of the army, diſmiſſing from their commands ſuch officers as he could not confide in. He gave the command of all the forces in Scotland to General Monk, and ſent his ſon Henry to govern Ireland (f). He by an ordinance, dated April 12th, 1654, united England and Scotland, fixing the number of repreſentatives for the latter at thirty, and ſoon after he did the ſame by Ireland (g). He ſhewed great zeal for juſtice, in cauſing the brother of the Ambaſſador from Portugal to be executed for murder, occaſioned by a quarrel that he had with one Colonel Gerrard. Upon pretence of a conſpiracy againſt himſelf, he procured ſeveral perſons to be convicted and condemned by a High Court of Juſtice, of which Major Liſle was preſident; and it is very remarkable, that the Portugueſe Gentleman before-mentioned, who murdered another Gentleman by miſtake, never ſaw his antagoniſt Colonel Gerrard again till they both came to loſe their heads together on a ſcaffold at Tower-Hill, July the 10th, the former for that murder, the latter for this conſpiracy, which he denied with his laſt breath; and ſhewed as much courage upon that melancholy occaſion, as his fellow-ſufferer did the want of it (h). The ſame day one Mr. Vowell, a ſchoolmaſter, was executed for the plot at Charing-Croſs; which he likewiſe denied, dying with heroic conſtancy, and reproaching the Guards for being inſtruments of tyranny and injuſtice, by aſſiſting at his execution, which, he aſſerted, was againſt law, becauſe without a crime (i). But, notwithſtanding all theſe ſucceſſes, and all the pains the Protector could take to conciliate the affections of the people, he found a great ſpirit ſtirring againſt him in all the three kingdoms, and his government ſo crampt for want of money, that he was under an abſolute neceſſity of calling a Parliament, according to the form which he had preſcribed in the Inſtrument of Government (k); and which though it put much in his power, and left the deciſion of diſputed elections to his council, yet, as it remained ſtill ſome ſort of repreſentative of the nation, he was not without apprehenſions of their not proving ſo tractable as he could wiſh; and the event proved, that his ſuſpicions were not without grounds (l). He fixed upon the third of September for the day on which they were to aſſemble, eſteeming it particularly fortunate to him; and to this he peremptorily adhered, though it happened to fall upon a Sunday. The Parliament was accordingly opened on that day, after hearing a ſermon at Weſtminſter-Abbey, to which the Protector went in very great ſtate (m). He received this Houſe

(d) Heath's Chronicle, p. 358, 359. Thurloe's State Papers, vol. ii. p. 5—12—31.

(e) Coke's Detection, P. ii. p. 49. Life of O. Cromwell, p. 265.

(f) Echard's Hiſt. of Engl. p. 724. Thurloe's State-Papers, vol. ii. p. 149.

(g) Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. ii. p. 497. Heath's Chron. p. 358.

(h) Echard's Hiſt. of Engl. p. 710. Bates's Elenchus Motuum, P. ii. p. 179.

(i) Heath's Chr. p. 360. Clarendon's Hiſt. Rebellion, p. 645.

(k) Bates's Elenchus Motuum, P. ii. p. 186.

(l) Warwick's Memoirs, p. 375.

(m) Heath's Chronicle, p. 363.

[DD] That made them both ridiculous.] In this note we ſhall give ſome account of the Protector's conduct with reſpect to foreign courts, at his firſt entering on that office. His peace with Holland has been very much magnified by ſome, whereas others affirm, that he was bribed by the Dutch to make it upon the terms he did (159). Theſe facts are certain, that the Parliament ſtood upon higher terms; that the Engliſh fleet beat that of the States twice after the Parliament was turned out; and that the expulſion of King Charles and his followers, with the excluſion of the Prince of Orange, were points particularly inſiſted on by Cromwell (160). The Queen of Sweden paid great reſpect to the Rump, and as great to Oliver, who, to expreſs his regard for her on the other ſide, hung her picture in his bed-chamber, which the laughers in thoſe times ſaid, made the Lady Elizabeth Cromwell, the Protector's conſort, not a little jealous (161); and yet it was not long after, that one of his agents wrote the Protector a very ſerious account of Queen Chriſtina's being inclined to marry Charles Stuart; but that was after her abdication, and no queſtion one ſtory was as true as the other (162). The Kings of Denmark and Portugal the Protector treated very haughtily, and obliged the Ambaſſador of the latter to come and ſign the peace at Whitehall the very morning his brother was executed on Tower-hill. He refuſed the title of couſin from the French King, expecting that of brother; and ſo artfully played the Spaniard againſt him at a very critical conjuncture, when the French were laying the ground-work of that power which has been ſince ſo fatal to Europe, that both Ambaſſadors made ſuch extraordinary advances, with ſo many ſingular acts of ſubmiſſion, that the Dutch ſtruck a medal (163) with the buſt of Cromwell and his titles on one ſide, with Britannia on the other, and Cromwell thruſting his head in her boſom, with his breeches down and his backſide bare, the Spaniſh Ambaſſador ſtooping to kiſs it, while the French Ambaſſador holds him by the arm with theſe words inſcribed, Retire toi l'honneur apartient au Roi mon maitre, i. e. Come back, that honour belongs to the King my maſter. It is true this medal was not ſtruck till two years afterwards; but as the ſtructure of this work obliges us to place together things of a like nature, we choſe to mention it here, the rather, becauſe I find no mention of it in any of the Hiſtories of Cromwell: but there is reaſon to ſuſpect it might occaſion that miſtake, which appears in a private letter intercepted in thoſe times, where it is ſaid, that a print had been handed about beyond the ſea, repreſenting Cromwell ſitting upon a cloſe-ſtool, the King of France on the right-hand, and the King of Spain on the left, offering each a ſupply of paper for his preſent occaſions (164). There have been many curious collections of prints made ſince, but I never heard of any ſuch thing amongſt them, whereas the medal is yet preſerved in ſeveral Dutch cabinets.

(159) Echard's Hiſt. England, p. 709.

(160) Coke's Detection, B. iii. p. 44, 45, 46.

(161) As appears by an intercepted letter in Dr. Nalſon's Collection.

(162) Thurloe's State Papers, vol. ii. p. 468.

(163) Catalogue des Medailles qui ſe trouvent dans le Cabinet de Nicholas Chevalier, à Amſterdam, p. 7.

(164) Thurloe's State Papers, vol. iii. p. 658.

of Commons in the Painted Chamber, where he made them a very long and a very ſenſible ſpeech, in which he gave them a large account of the nature of that government which he had thought fit to eſtabliſh, the ends he propoſed, and the means he had uſed to compaſs thoſe ends. He took great pains to ſhew them the folly of extravagant notions about liberty, civil and religious; told them to what purpoſe he had called them together, and promiſed to allow them all imaginable freedom in their debates on public affairs (n). When they came to their Houſe, they elected Mr. William Lenthall their Speaker, but did not preſent him; next they fell to debating, whether the ſupreme legiſlative power of the kingdom ſhould be in a ſingle perſon, or a Parliament? This alarmed the Protector, who found himſelf in danger of being depoſed by a vote of this new Parliament; to prevent which, on the twelfth of the ſame month, he cauſed a guard to be ſet at the door, to prevent their going into the Houſe of Commons, then ſent for them into the Painted Chamber, where he gave them a very ſharp reproof; nor were any permitted to go into the Houſe afterwards, before they had taken an oath to be faithful to the Protector, and his government; and though this excluded a great number, yet the new courtiers were ſtill a minority (o). While this Parliament was ſitting, an odd accident happened to the Protector. He had received a ſet of Friezland horſes from the Duke of Holſtein as a preſent, and would needs drive his Secretary Thurloe in his coach, drawn by theſe horſes, round Hyde-Park; but the horſes proving as ungovernable as the Parliament, threw his Highneſs out of the box, and, in his fall, one of his pocket-piſtols went off, notwithſtanding which he eſcaped without either wound or broken bones (p). By the Inſtrument of Government the Parliament was to ſit five months, which the Protector took the liberty of computing by his ſoldiers almanack, in which months conſiſts only of twenty-eight days; and, finding they were about to take away his power, and would give him no money, he, on the 22d of January, ſent for them once more into the Painted Chamber, where, in a very long, ambiguous, and bitter ſpeech, having told them his mind, he diſſolved them (q). Theſe were the principal events of the firſt year of his Protectorate, for of the principal events only we can, in this place, take notice [EE]. The opening of the year 1655 proved but cloudy. The diſſolution of the Parliament ſtirred all the ill blood in the kingdom, ſo that he found himſelf at once beſet with conſpiracies on all ſides, and by all parties; but he had the good luck to diſcover them before thoſe concerned were ready to put them in execution. His firſt ſtep was to put the city in good humour, by reſtoring to them their militia, under the command of their old officer Major-General Skippon; then, February 13th, he went to Guild-hall, and declared the Republicans and Cavaliers had formed deſigns againſt his perſon (r). Of the former Major John Wildman, who had been an intimate friend of his, was ſeized, while penning a paper, intituled, A Declaration of the Peo-

(n) Bates's Elenchus Motuum, P. ii. p. 186.

(o) Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. ii. p. 500, 501. Clarendon's Hiſt. Rebellion, p. 647.

(p) Compleat Hiſt. of England, vol. ii. p. 212. Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. ii. p. 508.

(q) Clarendon's Hiſt. Rebellion, p. 638. Heath's Chronicle, p. 365.

(r) Bates's Elenchus Motuum, P. ii. p. 200. Flagellum, or life of O. Cromwell, p. 161, 162.

[EE] We can in this place take notice.] It muſt appear very ſtrange to the reader, that Cromwell and his Council having a power to levy money by virtue of their ordinances, he ſhould, notwithſtanding, be ſo much diſtreſſed for it, as to be under the neceſſity of calling a Parliament; ſtill ſtranger, that with all the powers he had given himſelf in the inſtrument of government, he ſhould not have it in his power to pack one for his purpoſe; and ſtrangeſt of all, that he who formerly purged the Houſes ſo effectually by his army, when it was chiefly for other men's ſervice, ſhould not be able to do it as effectually for his own. We will endeavour to explain all theſe points. His ordinances had indeed the force of laws, and it was under colour of them that he raiſed thoſe monthly aſſeſſments which enabled him to carry on his government; yet theſe were not ſufficient for his expences, and almoſt all the caſual revenue of the public had been granted away by the Rump, or rather ſhared amongſt themſelves (165). He was unwilling to hazard raiſing new taxes without the conſent of Parliament, becauſe he had promiſed the contrary in his inſtrument of government, and he had equal reaſon to doubt whether the people would pay, or the army levy, ſuch taxes; to avoid which he took very extraordinary ways of coming at money, ſuch as ſeizing four hundred thouſand pounds belonging to the King of Spain, though as yet there was no war declared. But the want of money was not the only reaſon which drove him upon this meaſure: he wanted to have his own power and the Inſtrument of Government confirmed by Parliament, and flattered himſelf with many good turns from them, which could not with any decency be done by his own power (166). In his endeavours to model the Parliament before they ſat, he puſhed every thing to the utmoſt; but an act of cunning that had been very ſerviceable to him before, rendered all his contrivances abortive now, for in the plan of Parliament ſettled by the inſtrument, the counties, inſtead of having two, had moſt of them five, and ſome more, repreſentatives, a thing very right in itſelf, and therefore very wrong with reſpect to him, ſince he could introduce in that quality but very few of his creatures. Scotland and Ireland indeed, ſent for the moſt part officers of the army; and therefore the Patriots in the Parliament treated it as a ſoleciſm, firſt to enſlave countries, and then to enable them to ſend up their jailors and tyrants to ſit amongſt, and become a part of, the repreſentatives of a free nation (167). What was worſt of all, many of his own creatures fell off; for the free ſpeakers in the Houſe unmaſked his policy ſo effectually, that they ſaw they were forging chains for themſelves. His purges, however ſharp, came a little too late, the body of this Houſe of Commons being pretty well ſeaſoned to them; ſo that many of them took the Engagement in order to get into the Houſe, and explained it away as ſoon as they were got in. He was obliged to truſt the management of the Parliament to Lambert, who deſired to have the Inſtrument of Government confirmed, in hopes of becoming his ſucceſſor; but the true ſecret of their haſty diſſolution was a deſign diſcovered to the Protector by Col. Pride, which many of the inferior officers of the army had formed, of ſeizing and delivering him priſoner to the Parliament (168). In the midſt of theſe public perplexities his domeſtic quiet was interrupted by the death of his mother, Nov. 18, 1654. She lived with him at Whitehall, ſhared in the ſplendor of his Court, but enjoyed it not; for though ſhe troubled him but little with her remonſtrances, yet her fears were ſo ſtrong, that ſhe could not believe he was ſafe if ſhe did not ſee him twice a day, and if by accident ſhe heard a piſtol at any time diſcharged, ſhe could not help crying out, My ſon is ſhot (169)! The Protector, contrary to her deſire, who foreſaw they would never reſt there in peace, cauſed her remains to be interred in King Henry VIIth's chapel in Weſtminſter-abbey (170).

(165) Hiſt. of Independency, the third and fourth parts throughout.

(166) Dugdale's Short view of the troubles, p. 423. Ludlow's Mem. vol. ii. p. 498.

(167) Flagellum, or the life of O. Cromwell, p. 152, 153. See the Inſtrument of Government in Whitlocke and in Bates.

(168) Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. ii. p. 500, 501—503.

(169) Heath's Chron. p. 366.

(170) Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. ii. p. 488, 489.

ple of England againſt the Tyrant Oliver Cromwell, Eſq: ſome other violent men of that party he impriſoned, but was afraid of doing more (s). As to the Royaliſts, he ſuffered them to go on a little; for by the help of one Manning (t), who was his ſpy in the Court of King Charles II. he was ſo well acquainted with their projects, as to put themſelves upon ſuch meaſures as entirely defeated them; and this is a true account of that inſurrection which broke out at Saliſbury, where the King was proclaimed, and Cromwell's Judges ſeized; which act of open force left no doubt with the public, that there were ſome deſigns againſt the Protector, which, otherwiſe, they were ready enough to diſbelieve (u) [FF]. For this inſurrection Colonel Penruddock, Mr. Grove, and ſeveral other perſons, ſuffered death; and from hence the Protector, who had hitherto ſhewn an inclination to have governed as a lawful Prince if he could, ſeemed to lay aſide this diſpoſition, and no longer to make any difficulty of ſupporting his authority in any manner, and by any means; ſo that from the time the firſt public diſturbance broke out into a civil war, the people of this kingdom in general never underwent ſo great oppreſſion, either in their properties or perſons; were deprived to ſuch a degree of the benefit of the laws, or had ſo melancholy a proſpect before them, of unrelenting and irreſiſtible dominion, ſupported by an armed force (w) [GG]. In the Spring of this year was carried into execution that famous expedition, by which the Protector hoped to make himſelf maſter of a great part of the Spaniſh Weſt-Indies, having ſent thither a powerful fleet, under the command of Admiral Penn, and the greateſt body of land-forces that had been ever ſeen in America, commanded by General Venables; and though, in the main part of their deſign, theſe officers were utterly unſucceſsful, yet they made themſelves maſters of the Iſland of Jamaica, which has remained ever ſince part of the dominions of the Britiſh crown (x). We have different accounts of this great tranſaction in our general hiſtories, and many circumſtances there are which have not been hitherto fully explained [HH]. He was very deſirous

(s) Echard's Hiſt. Eng. p. 713.
(t) Heath's Chronicle, p. 368. Bates's Elenchus Motuum, P. ii. p. 185. Clarendon's Hiſt. of the Rebellion, p. 668—671.
(u) Heath's Chronicle, p. 372, 373. Flagellum, or the life of Cromwell, p. 163.

(w) Clarendon's Hiſt. of the Rebellion, p. 676. Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. ii. p. 519.

(x) Bates's Elenchus Motuum, P. ii. p. 206, 207, &c. Heath's Chron. p. 376. Behemoth, by T. Hobbs, p. 306.

[FF] They were ready enough to diſtelieve.] It is very certain that Mr. Thurloe, who, from being Secretary to Oliver St. John in his embaſſy to the States, was raiſed to be Secretary and Prime-Miniſter to Cromwell, had a great deal of the old Walſingham ſpirit, and knew how to manage a great number of buſy intriguing ſpirits ſo dexterouſly, as by the help of ſham plots of his own contriving, to find out and diſappoint the true. Here we muſt obſerve the wiſe diſtinction made by Cromwell for the preſent, between the Republicans and the Royaliſts, who were equally enemies to the Protector, though he did not care to ſhow himſelf equally an enemy to them. He contented himſelf therefore for the preſent, with diſplacing Major-General Harriſon, Col. Rich, Col. Okey, &c. and with the ſeizing Major-General Overton and ſome others, that expreſſed themſelves in terms of dangerous reſentment. Nay, to ſuch a degree was he maſter of his paſſions, though naturally no man was more paſſionate, that when Colonel, the ſame who was formerly Cornet Joyce, reproached him to his face with his ſervices, he only bid him Be gone (171). But he did not think himſelf obliged to treat the Royaliſts ſo favourably, and therefore being quite maſter of their projects, he made, or rather his Secretary Thurloe made, ſome of his creatures give out falſe times for a general inſurrection, by which the deſign was effectually defeated, and yet there were ſo many appeared in arms, as to ſhew that there really was ſuch a deſign, and thereby afford a colour for putting ſuch to death, as were unluckily involved in it; and they had the leſs reaſon to hope for mercy, ſince they pleaded in their own defence, that they could not be guilty of any treaſon, becauſe thoſe againſt whom they acted were not a legal government; and indeed the Chief Juſtice Rolle did not care to try them, and Mr. Ludlow very frankly owns, that their defence was well founded (172).

(171) Flagellum, or the life of O. Cromwell, p. 161.

(172) Heath's Chron. p. 367, 368. Ludlow's Mem. vol. ii. p. 518, 519.

[GG] Supported by an armed force.] To lay a foundation for all this violence, the Protector, with the advice of his Council, publiſhed an Ordinance, importing, that all who had borne arms for the King, or who at any time had declared themſelves of his party, ſhould be decimated, or pay a tenth part of the income of their eſtates for the expence of thoſe extraordinary forces that they obliged his Highneſs to keep up. Commiſſioners were appointed in every county to receive the money ariſing from this new eſtabliſhment, which brought in a prodigious ſum of money, as the Commiſſioners had power to compound all demands for three years purchaſe (173). This ordinance was ſo penned, that it took in all that ſhould diſturb his government, or rather be ſuſpected of diſturbing it, upon any principle whatever. At this time county troops were eſtabliſhed, every private man having eight pounds a year given him, not for military ſervice, but for informing: a Captain had a hundred pounds a year, and other officers in proportion. And finally to provide for all inconveniences, as well amongſt the people as in the army, he divided England as it were into ſo many cantons, over each of which he placed one called by the name of Major-General, which Major-Generals were in the nature of Prefects, or Governors of provinces (174). Theſe men were to have the inſpection and government of the inferior Commiſſioners in every county, to commit to priſon all ſuch perſons as they ſuſpected, to levy all monies which were ordered by his Highneſs and his Council to be collected for the public, to ſequeſter all who did not pay their decimation, and to put in execution ſuch farther directions as they ſhould receive; and there was no appeal from any of their acts but to the Protector himſelf (175). For the management of the affairs relating to this commiſſion they had an office at London, where recognizances were entered, and their proceedings filed, by which the Protector hoped to obtain a diſtinct account of the quality of every perſon in the Royal intereſt, and of the value of his eſtate, throughout the kingdom; for as to theſe Chriſtian Baſhaws, they were impowered by their commiſſions to take an account of all ſuſpected perſons of the King's party, and ſuch as were actually ſo to receive ſecurity of them, in which they were to be bound to act nothing againſt the government, and to reveal all plots that ſhould come to their knowledge. They were to ſuppreſs all horſe-races, cock-matches, and other concourſes of people; to ſecure the high-ways; to take Engagement from Cavaliers for their ſervants and children; and thoſe that did not ſo, nor give ſecurity, to commit to priſon, and to rate and receive the money ariſing from this decimation (176). Theſe Major-Generals carried things with a very high hand, decimating whom they pleaſed, interrupting the proceedings at law upon petitions of thoſe who thought themſelves aggrieved, and threatening ſuch as would not readily ſubmit to their orders, with tranſportation to the Weſt Indies.

(173) Heath's Chronicle, p. 373.

(174) Clarendon's Hiſt. of the Rebellion, p. 676. Heath's Chron. p. 378.

(175) Flagellum, or the life of O. Cromwell, p. 164, 165.

(176) Coke's Detection, B. iv. p. 53.

[HH] Which have not been hitherto fully explained.] It is not to be expected that in a ſhort note, any competent account ſhould be given of a very long expedition, the preparatives for and proceedings in which might well employ a ſmall volume, without inſerting any thing that could be eſteemed tedious by the reader: all therefore that I propoſe, is, to offer a few hints of circumſtances worthy of being thoroughly examined.

ſirous of bringing moſt of thoſe projects to bear, that he knew had a tendency to pleaſe the people; and therefore thought he could not make a better uſe of his power, than to reſtrain ſome things that were deemed exorbitant in the proceedings of the High Court of Chancery; upon which, however, Sir Thomas Widdrington, Mr. Whitlocke, and Mr. Lenthall, deſired to reſign their offices, who had kept them through ſuch a variety of changes, and when moſt people thought the Conſtitution had received greater injuries than this (y). They were permitted to do this without any offence taken, as appears from the Protector's making the two former Commiſſioners of the Treaſury, and the regard he ſhewed to Lenthall as long as he lived. As for the Great Seal, it went into ſuch hands as had ſcarcely been intruſted with it before, viz. Major Liſle and Colonel Fiennes (z). The new King of Sweden ſent over an Ambaſſador, to compliment the Protector, who was moſt graciouſly received, and great pains were taken to make this inſtance of reſpect from a foreign Court as public as it was poſſible; but the viſit that Queen Chriſtina was inclined to have paid him he judged proper to avoid, which was certainly an argument of his great prudence (a). That alliance, which had been ſo long in treaty with the Crown of France, was ſigned November 24, 1655, and proclaimed the 28th of the ſame month; by which it was ſtipulated, that Cromwell ſhould ſend over a body of Engliſh troops, to act in conjunction with the French againſt the Spaniards in the Low-Countries, and that, on the other hand, the French King ſhould oblige the Royal Family to quit his dominions (b). This treaty has been much magnified by ſome, but certainly without any great cauſe, ſince it was entirely deſtructive of the balance of power, and became, in its conſequences, the real cauſe of moſt of thoſe wars that have coſt us ſo much blood and treaſure [II]. The glorious ſucceſſes of the great Admiral Blake in the Mediterranean, and the great ſums that he recovered from ſeveral powers, for depredations committed by their ſubjects on the Engliſh trade, did much honour to the Protector's government; and, to conclude the tranſactions of this year, it muſt be allowed, that, how much ſoever he might be diſliked at home, his reputation, at this time, was very great abroad (c) [KK]. The loſs he ſuſtained in the diſcovery of Manning, whom King Charles cauſed to be ſhot for correſponding with Thurloe, was moſt effectually repaired by the aſſiſtance he received from a perſon of ſuperior character, who was Chancellor Hyde's great correſpondent, and ſuppoſed to be one of the moſt active and determined Royaliſts in England. The war with Spain, which had hitherto produced only vaſt ex-

(y) Life of O. Cromwell, p. 321, 322. Echard's Hiſt. of England, p. 716.

(z) See liſt of honors and officers conferred by O. Lord Protector.

(a) Life of O. Cromwell, p. 323.

(b) Bates's Elenchus Motuum, P. ii. p. 210.

(c) Life of O. Cromwell, p. 326.

examined. The motives to this expedition were none of the moſt honourable, ſince they were plainly avarice and fear. The Protector had juſt taſted the Spaniſh treaſures, and he had a mind to take a full meal; for whoever conſults his inſtructions will find, that it was not the particular Iſland of Hiſpaniola, but the Continent alſo that he had hopes of conquering; and yet the embarkation of the troops was from time to time deferred, ſo that the end of the expedition was no ſecret, even before the ſhips ſailed from England (177). In the next place it was fear, for Venables, who commanded the land forces, had never been well affected to Cromwell, and before this time was reconciled to the King, of which it is not impoſſible the Protector might be informed. The troops too were compoſed of men diſcharged out of all the regiments in his ſervice for diſaffection, and if at laſt they had not been hurried on board at Portſmouth, when they leaſt expected it, Venables had marched up to London, in order to try if it had not been poſſible to dethrone the Protector (178). There was a great deal of miſmanagement on all ſides in the ſetting out; a very high miſunderſtanding between the Commanders in Chief from the very beginning; the additional forces they took on board at Barbadoes were the moſt profligate and worthleſs people in the world; ſo that, upon the whole, it is much more wonderful that ever theſe people became maſters of Jamaica, than that they were diſappointed at Hiſpaniola, for which, however, Cromwell had no body to thank but himſelf; for there were ſuch a narrowneſs and ſelfiſhneſs in his inſtructions as diſpirited the ſoldiers, who found, that after all the hazards they had run, and dangers they had endured, they were to fight, not for themſelves, but to fill the Protector's privy purſe (179).

(177) Burchett's Naval Hiſtory, p. 385—395.

(178) Life of Dr. Barwick, p. 185, 186.

(179) Burchett's Naval Hiſtory, p. 385.

[II] That have coſt us ſo much blood and treaſure.] The conjuncture of thoſe times, and the high ſtruggle between the Crowns of France and Spain, were very favourable for the Protector, who might, if he had pleaſed, have taken the balance of power in Europe entirely into his own hands, and not only have held it during life, but have fixed it for the reſt of that century at leaſt. But after much deliberation he reſolved, or rather his affairs compelled him, to break with Spain, in hopes of filling his Exchequer by that war; and this made him join with France, as well as for two other reaſons; the firſt, that he might procure the Royal Family to be driven out of that country by treaty, as they had been before out of Holland; the ſecond, that he might have a port upon that Continent; the expediency of which was firſt ſuggeſted to him by the Spaniards, who, if he would have joined with them, promiſed to put him in poſſeſſion of Calais (180). It is aſſerted by Dr. Welwood, on the credit of Puffendorff, that in the negotiation of theſe treaties he carried himſelf very haughtily; that in the inſtrument he cauſed his own name to be put before the French King's; that he would not allow him to ſtile himſelf King of France, but of the French, though at the ſame time he ſtiled himſelf Protector of France as well as England. It would be very difficult to make any of theſe points good; for in Milton's Letters it will be found, that Cromwell, writing to Lewis XIV. gave him the title of King of France (181), not in the ſuperſcription only, but in the body of his letter; nor does it any where appear that Cromwell ever took the title of Protector of France at all, but of the republick or commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland; and therefore this is as much to be relied on as another fact laid down as notoriouſly true, that Cromwell was born on the third of September, though it is notoriouſly otherwiſe (182).

(180) See Thurloe's account of the negotiations of Cromwell with France and Spain, delivered to the Earl of Clarendon, at the end of the firſt vol. of his State Papers.

(181) Milton's Works, vol. ii. p. 455. 457. 469.

(182) Welwood's Memoirs, p. 115.

[KK] Was very great abroad.] It would be a very eaſy thing to prove this, from what is ſaid of him by a multitude of foreign authors; but it may be ſufficient to obſerve, that at this time there was a print of the Protector on horſeback publicly ſold at Paris, with theſe Latin verſes under it (183).

(183) From the MS. of the late Rev. Mr. Knight, Fellow of Chriſt-Church Oxford.

Cernimus hic omni caput admirabile mundo
Quod Reges, Populi, Barbarieſque ſtupent.
Regibus hic frater; populis pater, hoſtis multum,
Barbariem vera religione domat.
Nullius ille timet quam ſummi numinis arma;
Non timet, et pacem cuilibet eſſe parat.
Quis dubitat ſacro hoc ſi pergat Flamine Victor, Quin ſubita Meretrix de Babylone cadet?

pectations, began now to bear ſome fruit; for the gallant and fortunate Blake, falling in with the Plate Fleet, almoſt at the mouth of the harbour of Cadiz, attacked and deſtroyed it to the irreparable damage of the Spaniards, and the no ſmall gain of the Protector, who received two millions in ready money out of the prizes that were taken (d). The Protector, in the midſt of all that he poſſeſſed, ſtill felt ſome wants, which he judged nothing could ſupply but a Parliament; and, having concerted more effectual methods, as he conceived, for bending them to his will, than had been practiſed before the laſt, he directed writs to iſſue for the meeting of that aſſembly September 17th, 1656, at which time they met accordingly, but with a guard poſted at the door of the Houſe, who ſuffered none to enter till they had ſwallowed the oaths that were ready prepared for them, by which about two hundred were excluded, who ſigned a proteſt againſt this proceeding, and againſt all that ſhould be done by thoſe who ſat without them (e). The Parliament, however, choſe Sir Thomas Widdrington their Speaker, paſſed an act for diſannulling the King's title, another for the ſecurity of his Highneſs's perſon, and ſeveral money-bills; for all which the Protector gave them his moſt gracious thanks (f). It was apprehended, that ſome difference might have ariſen upon a motion in the Houſe, againſt the exorbitant power of the Majors-General; but, as they began to be formidable now to the Protector himſelf, they were fairly given up by Mr. Claypole, who had married the Protector's daughter, in a ſpeech, which ſet all things right again (g). About the cloſe of the year a new plot was either diſcovered, or made, for which one Miles Sindercombe was condemned, and that by the ordinary forms of juſtice; but he diſappointed the Protector, and was found dead on the morning intended for his execution, which gave birth to many conjectures (b) [LL]. However, a public thankſgiving was appointed for the happy deliverance of his Highneſs's perſon, and the Speaker and Parliament were ſplendidly regaled at Whitehall (i). In the Spring of the year 1657 it plainly appeared what the Protector drove at, by all the pains he had taken with his Parliament, in which a kind of legiſlative ſettlement of the Government was brought upon the carpet, under the title of The Humble Petition and Advice, in which there was a blank for the ſupreme Governor's title, and a clauſe prepared to countenance the eſtabliſhing ſomething like Peers, under the name of the Other Houſe (k). At length the whole came to light: for one Alderman Pack, a forward, time-ſerving, money-getting fellow, and deep in all the jobbs of the Government, moved, that the firſt blank might be filled up with the word King, which was violently oppoſed by the Army Members; but at length, after various debates, it was carried, as well as the clauſe impowering him to make ſomething like Lords; and in this form the petition was preſented to his Highneſs, who deſired ſome time to con-

(d) Bates's Elenchus Motuum, P. ii. p. 212. See the article of Blake in this Dictionary.

(e) Whitlocke's Memorials, p. p. 651. Dugdale's Short view of the late troubles, p. 450. Heath's Chron. p. 382.

(f) Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 653. Bates's Elenchus Motuum, P. ii. p. 213.

(g) Life of O. Cromwell, p. 338.

(b) Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 655. Heath's Chron. 385.

(i) Dugdale's Short view of the troubles, 450.

(k) Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 657.

[LL] Which gave birth to many conjectures.] The caſe of this Miles Sindercombe was very extraordinary. He was drawn in to conſpire againſt the Protector by Col. Edward Sexby, formerly a famous Agitator, and one in great confidence with Cromwell, afterwards his moſt violent and bitter enemy. That Col. again was an Agent of the Spaniards, and ſo well ſupplied by them, that, as he confeſſed, he furniſhed Sindercombe at ſeveral times with five hundred pounds (184). But as in conſpiracies of this ſort a man cannot act without aſſiſtance, Sindercombe found out one Toope (185), who was of the Protector's guard, and withal one of Mr. Thurloe's ſpies, to whom he communicated his deſign, and three different methods were contrived and attempted: one was, to ſhoot Cromwell in his paſſage through Hammerſmith in his way to Hampton Court; another, to fire Whitehall; and a third, to ſhoot him as he was going to Weſtminſter-abbey. Theſe attempts having miſcarried, he was ſeized, and brought to his trial in the Upper Bench, before the Lord Chief Juſtice Glynn, Feb. 19, 1656 (186): but whereas ſome writers ſay, that he was tried upon a law made by Cromwell's Parliament, that is a miſtake; for he was tried upon the common ſtatute of treaſon, the Chief Juſtice taking upon him to inform the Jury, that by the word King the Supreme Magiſtrate was intended, whether he had that title or not (187). The Jury, upon very full evidence, found him guilty; and Friday the fourteenth of the ſame month was appointed for his execution. He went to bed well; but when they came to call him up he was dead, and as appeared by a paper he left under his cloſe-ſtool, he deſtroyed himſelf by poiſon (188). It was given out however at that time, and believed by many, that Cromwell cauſed him to be poiſoned, being afraid of bringing him to a public execution (189). The reader will underſtand this better from what the Noble Hiſtorian (190) ſays upon this ſubject: 'Sindercombe was a 'very ſtout man, and one who had been much in 'Cromwell's favour, and who had twice or thrice, by 'wonderful and unexpected accidents, been diſappointed in the minute he had made ſure to kill him. 'And when Cromwell had cauſed him to be apprehended, his behaviour was ſo reſolute in his examination and trial, as if he thought he ſhould ſtill be 'able to do it; and it was manifeſt that he had more 'aſſociates who were undiſcovered, and as reſolute as 'himſelf; and though he had got him condemned to 'die, the fellow's carriage and words were ſuch, as if 'he knew well how to avoid the judgment, which 'made Cromwell believe that a party in the army 'would attempt his reſcue. Whereupon he gave 'ſtrict charge that he ſhould be carefully looked to in 'the Tower, and three or four of the Guard always 'with him day and night. At the day appointed for 'his execution, thoſe troops Cromwell was moſt confident of were placed upon Tower-hill, where the 'gallows was erected. But when the guard called 'Sindercombe to riſe in the morning, they found him 'dead in his bed, which gave trouble exceedingly to 'Cromwell, for beſides that he hoped that at his 'death, to avoid the utmoſt rigour of it, he would 'have confeſſed many of his confederates; he now 'found himſelf under the reproach of having cauſed 'him to be poiſoned, as not daring to bring him to 'public juſtice, nor could he ſuppreſs that ſcandal. 'It appeared upon examination, that the night before, 'when he was going to bed, in the preſence of his 'guard, his ſiſter came to take her leave of him, and 'upon her going away he put off his cloaths, and 'leaped into his bed, and ſaid, This was the laſt bed 'he ſhould ever go into. His body was drawn by a 'horſe to the gallows where he ſhould have been 'hanged, and buried under it with a ſtake driven 'through him, as is uſual in the caſe of ſelf-murder. 'Yet this accident perplexed Cromwell very much, 'and though he was without the particular diſcovery 'he expected, he made a general diſcovery by it, that 'he himſelf was more odious in his army than he believed he had been.'

(184) Thurloe's Letters, vol. vi. p. 553.

(185) A further narrative of the paſſages of theſe times in the Commonwealth of Engl. p. 21.

(186) State Trials, vol. vii. p. 372.

(187) Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 654.

(188) State Trials, vol. vii. p. 375.

(189) Killing no Murder, p. 22.

(190) Clarendon's Hiſt. of Rebellion, p. 696.

ſider before he gave his anſwer. The Parliament appointed a Committee, with their Speaker at the head of it, to confer with and ſatisfy the Protector; and, in this conference, they, with great learning and eloquence, proved, that, notwithſtanding all the faults they had formerly found with the office of a King, yet, after all, they were now perfectly ſatisfied, the four letters, of which that word was compoſed, were as harmleſs and inoffenſive as any in the whole alphabet (l). The Protector, who was not of a narrow way of thinking, but had as comprehenſive ſentiments as they upon this point, would have been content to have had the Kingſhip forced upon him, but that he found, that ſome of his beſt friends and neareſt relations, ſuch as his ſon-in-law Fleetwood, his brother-in-law Deſborough, and many others, were utterly againſt it, and carried their oppoſition ſo far, as to promote a petition from the Army to the Parliament againſt this meaſure (m); which though, to countenance parliamentary authority, laid aſide, yet chiefly determined Cromwell to refuſe that honour which he had been ſo long ſeeking; and accordingly, May 8th, 1657, he told them, in the Banquetting-houſe, that he could not, with a good conſcience, accept the government, under the title of King (n). The Parliament then thought proper to fill up the blank with his former title of Protector; and his Highneſs himſelf, that all the pains he had taken might not be abſolutely thrown away, reſolved upon a new inauguration; which was accordingly, with great ſolemnity, performed on the 26th of June, 1657, in Weſtminſter-Hall, with all the pomp and ſplendor of a Coronation (o). After this the Houſe of Commons adjourned to the 20th of January following, in order to give the Protector time to regulate all things according to the new ſyſtem; with a view to which he ſummoned his two ſons, and many other perſons, to take their ſeats in the other Houſe (p). About this time it was, that Major-General Lambert loſt his favour; which, however, does not ſeem to have been an act ſo much of the Protector's will, as a ſcheme of his own; for he utterly diſliked the deſign that Oliver had formed of making himſelf King; and told him plainly, that, if he perſiſted in it, he could give him no aſſurance of the fidelity of the army. The neceſſary and immediate cauſe of his diſgrace was, refuſing to take the oath appointed by The Humble Petition and Advice; upon which the Protector removed him from all his commands, but, at the ſame time, granted him a penſion of two thouſand pounds a year, to keep him quiet (q). The ſenſe of this, and ſome other untoward accidents, was, in ſome meaſure, qualified by the news of Admiral Blake's great ſucceſſes at the Canaries, and in the Mediterranean, by which Spain felt very ſeverely the weight of the Engliſh arms, and the Protector's coffers drew conſiderable ſupplies, but the honour and intereſt of the nation ſuffered extremely (r) [MM]. That gallant ſeaman, no way anſwerable for the cauſe or conduct

(l) Heath's Chron. p. 386, 387. Bates's Elenchus Motuum, P. ii. p. 214, 215, 216.

(m) Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. ii. p. 587. Flagellum, &c. p. 175, 176.

(n) Heath's Chron. p. 389. Behemoth, by T. Hobbs, p. 312.

(o) Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 661, 662.

(p) Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. ii. p. 594, 595, 596.

(q) Flagellum, or the life of Cromwell, p. 185. Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. ii. p. 593.

(r) Bates's Elenchus Motuum, P. ii. p. 227, 228.

[MM] But the honour and intereſt of the nation ſuffered extremely.] We will take occaſion in this note to ſet the buſineſs of the Spaniſh war in its true light. The Crown of Spain was very much diſtreſſed in almoſt every part of her dominions, and this induced her Monarch to be very ready in owning the Parliament, and very deſirous, if it had been poſſible, to procure the good will of Cromwell, whom, as is before obſerved, he courted to a degree that was indecent and ridiculous (191). The true motive to this war, on the part of Cromwell, was neceſſity. He wanted money exceedingly; ſome of his troops and many of his officers he could not depend on; therefore a war was requiſite, and that too ſuch a war as he might get by (192). He endeavoured to colour this, by engaging the Merchants to complain againſt Spain, in which he was unſucceſsful; for which he revenged himſelf, by ſuffering their effects to be ſeized in that kingdom (193). He next ſeized a large ſum of money belonging to that Crown, which they offered to lend him for a certain number of years without intereſt, and to have taken his word for the repayment; ſo deſirous they were of maintaining peace if it were poſſible (194). His Weſt India expedition was in itſelf a bad deſign, becauſe no war declared, ill concerted, worſe executed, and yet in ſome meaſure luckily concluded. Capt. Stayner's taking two galleons at Cadiz, with two millions of ſilver on board, and deſtroying twice as much more, was a dreadful blow to the Spaniards; and yet this loſs was inconſiderable in reſpect to the burning the Plate Fleet at Santa Cruz, by which however Cromwell got nothing (195). When Captain Richard Stayner came home with his prizes, all imaginable pains were taken to magnify the exploit in the eyes of the people: the money was carried with great parade through London, the Captain knighted and handſomely rewarded; there was a ſolemn thankſgiving alſo for this mighty ſucceſs, which Mr. Waller celebrated in a poem that will render it immortal, though the deſign with which it was written failed; for it plainly appears that the Poet meant to have recommended his hero to the regal dignity, as the only adequate return the nation could make for the benefit they had received (196). But in thoſe times men were more quick-ſighted; and all this pomp and art could not hinder the expreſſions of high diſcontent, ariſing from the general knowledge that this affected triumph was a downright impoſition calculated to amuſe and deceive the populace, without making the leaſt impreſſion upon men of ſenſe and property. The Merchants exclaimed bitterly, and with very good reaſon, as fully appeared from a report made to Richard's Parliament, that fifteen hundred Engliſh ſhips were taken in the courſe of this war (197). Beſides, this threw the Spaniſh trade firſt into the hands of the Dutch, to whom they were naturally averſe, and could hardly have been reconciled any other way (198). We may add to this, the irreparable loſs to all Europe of ten times as much ſilver as Cromwell gained, and of which this nation, in a fair courſe of trade, would have obtained much more than ever the war brought into the Protector's coffers (199). Yet muſt we not imagine that even he was at all the better for it upon a balance: on the contrary, the expence of the American expedition exceeded all that he acquired. This does not at all leſſen the reputation of Blake and the reſt of the Commanders. They obeyed orders, did what they took to be their duty, and carried the glory of the Engliſh Flag to an amazing height. Some have very improperly intereſted religion in this quarrel, and becauſe Cromwell made war upon a Catholic power, and threatened the Pope with burning Civita Vecchia, which no doubt might have been eaſily done, would thence magnify his zeal to the Proteſtant faith (200). At the bottom, however, this will be found but a very untoward compliment to the Proteſtant cauſe, which moſt certainly never inclines thoſe who eſpouſe it to unjuſt proceedings, and to the avowed breach of the law of nature and nations; and therefore to wipe off this aſperſion it was neceſſary to ſhew, that this war really took its

(191) See Mr. Secretary Thurloe's account, publiſhed in the firſt vol. of his State Papers.

(192) Behemoth, by T. Hobbs, p. 306.

(193) The World's Miſtake in Oliver Cromwell.

(194) Burnet's Hiſt. of his own times, vol. i. p. 71. Thurloe's State Papers, vol. iii. p. 113. Coke's Detection, vol. ii. p. 51, 52, 53.

(195) Bates's Elenchus Motuum, p. 323.

(196) Waller's Poems, p. 274. The propoſition is contained in the four laſt lines.

(197) The World's Miſtake in Oliver Cromwell, p. 16.

(198) Coke's Detection, vol. ii. p. 51, 52, 53.

(199) Happy future State of England, p. 18.

(200) Burnet's Hiſt. of his own times, p. 80, 81.

conduct of that war, but juſtly famous for his generous courage, and conſtant zeal for his country's ſervice, dying in his return home, within ſight of his native ſhore, in the arms of victory, his corps, by the Protector's orders, was, with great ſolemnity, tranſported to Weſtminſter-Abbey, and there interred with all the honours due to ſo great an officer, and to ſo good a man (s). The forces which had been ſent over to Flanders, for the aſſiſtance of the French againſt the Spaniards, gained very great reputation, and made the French Court more and more attentive to the preſervation of Cromwell's friendſhip; but, at the ſame time, it induced his Catholic Majeſty to afford ſome countenance and aſſiſtance to King Charles, then in the Low-Countries, and meditating an attempt upon England. To facilitate this great deſign, the Marquis of Ormond was ſent over, and remained ſome time in London, where he very narrowly eſcaped falling into the hands of the Protector, who received from his ſpies an exact information of all the meaſures taken by the Royaliſts, which, therefore, he eaſily diſappointed. Only Captain Titus contrived to wound him deeply, not in his body indeed, but in his mind, by publiſhing a ſmall treatiſe, under the name of William Allen, intituled, Killing no Murder; in which he argued ſo ſtrongly, that one, who had violated all laws could derive protection from no law, that Oliver thenceforward believed himſelf in continual danger (t). In the beginning of the year 1658, he pleaſed himſelf with the hopes of being once at the head of an aſſembly, ſomewhat reſembling the antient Parliaments of England; and accordingly, purſuant to their own adjournment, the Commons met on the 20th of January, as the other Houſe alſo did, agreeably to the writs of ſummons iſſued by the Lord Protector. He ſent for them by the Black Rod, and began his ſpeech with the pompous words, My Lords, and you the Knights, Citizens, and Burgeſſes of the Houſe of Commons; and, after he had done ſpeaking, ſuffered them to retire to their reſpective Houſes, where, to give the greater credit to his government, all ſhew of force or reſtraint was now withdrawn. This ſerved only to diſcover, that therein lay his whole ſupport; for the antient nobility would not reſume their ſeats in ſuch company as he had aſſigned them, ſeveral Members of the Houſe of Commons choſe to keep their writs requiring their attendance in the other Houſe, and ſit where they were; and not a few, who had been before excluded, took advantage of the doors being open, and boldly came to the Houſe (u). In leſs than a fortnight the new ſyſtem was in a fair way of being pulled to pieces. The Houſe of Commons would have nothing to do with the new nobles in the other Houſe; and they, on the other hand, were at a loſs to know what to do by themſelves; of all which the Protector being informed, he came on the 4th of February, and diſſolved them with great bitterneſs of ſpeech, and deep ſorrow of heart; for now he ſaw plainly, that a regular eſtabliſhment was a thing impracticable (w). Some farther deſigns were ſoon after diſcovered, not of the Cavaliers only, but of the Fifth Monarchy-men alſo; which diſcoveries were chiefly owing to the dexterity of Secretary Thurloe, whoſe implements, in the ſhape of Cavaliers and Fanaticks, mixed in all companies, and thruſt themſelves into all ſecrets, that they might acquire a ſubſiſtence by betraying them (x). With the latter, the Protector was obliged to obſerve ſome meaſures, and, though he took care to ſecure himſelf, yet he durſt not act with ſeverity towards them; which, perhaps, heightened his reſentment againſt the former, whom, contrary to Whitlocke's advice, he delivered over to a High Court of Juſtice (y). By the ſentence of that Court Dr. Hewett, a Reverend Divine of the Church of England, who had married one of Cromwell's daughters to the Lord Fauconbridge, ſuffered death for contumacy, having refuſed to plead, or to acknowledge the juriſdiction of the Court, June 8th, 1658; as did alſo Sir Henry Slingſby by the like ſentence. Several others were condemned by the ordinary forms of law, which, at length, the Protector was perſwaded to uſe, which ſtruck the nation with as much horror as fear (z). The gloomineſs of this ſcene was a little diſperſed by the ſucceſs of the Engliſh arms abroad, and the delivery of Dunkirk, taken chiefly by their valour, into the hands of Lockhart, his Ambaſſador; concerning which we have a very remarkable ſtory, if it be well founded [NN]. The great ſatisfaction the Protector expreſſed at this, and at the French

(s) Echard's Hiſt. of England, p. 725.

(t) Flagellum, or the life of O. Cromwell, p. 185.

(u) Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. ii. p. 595—597.

(w) Echard's Hiſtory of England, p. 730. Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 672.

(x) Flagellum, or the life of O. Cromwell, p. 184, 185.

(y) Memorials of the Engliſh affairs, p. 673. Ludlow's Mem. vol. ii. p. 604, 605.

(z) Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 673. Lloyd's Loyal Sufferers, p. 553.

its riſe from Cromwell's miſtaking his own intereſt, and preferring that miſtaken intereſt to the welfare of the nation, which manifeſtly appeared, not only from his attacking the Spaniards without cauſe and without warning, but, that he might do this, barbarouſly ſacrificing the Britiſh Merchants, whoſe effects were juſtly ſeized by way of repriſal for his injuſtice (201).

(201) Coke's Detection, vol. ii. p. 52. The World's Miſtake in O. Cromwell, p. 13, 14, 15.

[NN] Concerning which we have a very remarkable ſtory, if it be well founded.] This is to be met with in Welwood's Memoirs, and very well deſerves the place it holds there, if it could be ſupported by any clear authority. His relations runs thus (202):

(202) Welwood's Memoirs, p. 107, 108, 109.

'There was an article in the Treaty between France 'and the Protector, that if Dunkirk came to be taken, 'it ſhould be immediately delivered up to the Engliſh, and his Ambaſſador Lockhart had orders to 'take poſſeſſion of it accordingly. When the French 'army, being joined with the Engliſh auxiliaries, 'was in its march to inveſt the town, Cromwell ſent 'one morning for the French Ambaſſador to Whitehall, and upbraided him publicly for his maſter's 'deſigned breach of promiſe, in giving ſecret orders 'to the French General to keep poſſeſſion of Dunkirk in caſe it was taken, contrary to the Treaty 'between them. The Ambaſſador proteſted he 'knew nothing of the matter, as indeed he did 'not, and begged leave to aſſure him there was no 'ſuch thing thought of; upon which Cromwell, 'pulling a paper out of his pocket, Here, ſays he, is 'the copy of the Cardinal's order; and I deſire you to

'diſpatch

French King's ſending over the Duke de Crequi to compliment him upon the occaſion, in return to a civility of the ſame kind paid by the Protector, in ſending over his ſon-in-law Lord Fauconbridge (a), laſted not long; for his favourite daughter, Mrs. Claypole, falling ſick of a diſtemper, which, by the excruciating pains it brought upon her body, not a little diſtempered her mind, ſo wounded him by her vehement exclamations againſt his cruelties, and more eſpecially for the death of Dr. Hewett, on whoſe behalf ſhe had made the moſt importunate interceſſions, that he was no leſs affected thereby than from her death, which happened on the 6th of Auguſt following (b). He was, from that time, wholly altered, grew daily more reſerved and ſuſpicious, not indeed without great reaſon; for he found a general diſcontent prevailed through the nation, a ſignal diſaffection in the Army, and a great increaſe of the influence of the Republicans, to whom his ſon-in-law Fleetwood, and even his wife, were very much inclined; and beſides them, his Privy-Counſellors Pickering and Sydenham, upon whom he had principally depended, and even Deſborough, his near relation and great confident, caballed with Lambert, ſo that he knew not which way to turn, or what to expect (c). Theſe cares having long tormented his thoughts, at laſt affected his body, ſo that, while at Hampton-Court, he fell into a kind of ſlow fever, which ſoon degenerated into a tertian ague. For about a week his diſeaſe continued without any dangerous ſymptoms, inſomuch that every other day he walked abroad; but one day, after dinner, his five Phyſicians coming to wait upon him, one of them having felt his pulſe, ſaid, that it intermitted, at which, being ſomewhat ſurprized, he turned pale, fell into a cold ſweat, and, when he was almoſt fainting, ordered himſelf to be carried to bed, where, by the aſſiſtance of cordials, being brought a little to himſelf, he made his will with reſpect to his private affairs (d). As to the remaining part of the hiſtory of his diſtemper, which, on many accounts, is very remarkable, the reader will find

(a) Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 674.

(b) Clarendon's Hiſtory of the Rebellion, p. 196. Echard's Hiſt. of England, p. 734. Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. ii. p. 607.

(c) Bates's Elenchus Motuum, P. ii. p. 233, 234.

(d) Echard's Hiſt. of Engl. p. 734.

'diſpatch immediately an expreſs, to let him know, that I am not to be impoſed upon, and that, if he deliver not up the keys of Dunkirk to Lockhart within an hour after it ſhall be taken, tell him, I'll come in perſon, and demand them at the gates of Paris. There were but four perſons ſaid to be privy to this order, the Queen-mother, the Cardinal, the Marſhal de Turenne, and a Secretary, whoſe name it is not fit at this time to mention. The Cardinal for a long time blamed the Queen, as if ſhe might poſſibly have blabbed it out to ſome of her women; whereas it was found, after the Secretary's death, that he had kept a ſecret correſpondence with Cromwell for ſeveral years, and therefore it was not doubted but he had ſent him the copy of the order beforementioned. The meſſage had its effect, for Dunkirk was put into the poſſeſſion of the Engliſh. And to palliate the matter, the Duke and Marſhal Crequi was diſpatched into England Ambaſſador Extraordinary to compliment Cromwell, attended by a numerous and ſplendid train of perſons of quality, among whom was a Prince of the blood, and Mancini, Mazarine's nephew, who brought a letter from his uncle to the Protector, full of the higheſt expreſſions of reſpect, and aſſuring his Highneſs, that being within view of the Engliſh ſhore, nothing but the King's indiſpoſition, (who lay then ill of the ſmall-pox at Calais) could have hindered him to come over to England, that he might enjoy the honour of waiting upon one of the greateſt men that ever was, and whom, next to his maſter, his greateſt ambition was to ſerve. But being deprived of ſo great a happineſs, he had ſent the perſon that was neareſt to him in blood, to aſſure him of the profound veneration he had for his perſon, and how much he was reſolved, to the utmoſt of his power, to cultivate a particular amity and friendſhip betwixt his maſter and him.' This narrative has a very fair appearance, and has ſo long paſſed for an indiſputable truth that I ſhould not eaſily have inclined to queſtion it: but thus much is certain, that, if there be any truth in it, it would be a very difficult matter to find it out, becauſe almoſt every circumſtance of it may be ſhewn to be falſe. It appears from Lockhart's letters, who was not only the Protector's Ambaſſador in France, but alſo Commander in Chief of his forces, that the difficulty at the opening of the campaign lay in bringing the Cardinal to reſolve upon beſieging Dunkirk early, becauſe the Spaniards were poſſeſſed of Heſdin, and were thereby in a condition to have made a diverſion by an excurſion into France; and the people clamoured that the Cardinal was leaving them at the mercy of the Spaniards, while the army of France was to be employed in taking of towns, which were to be given up to the Engliſh, their antient and inveterate enemy (203). It appears farther, that it was impoſſible for the French to have broken their treaty with Cromwell in this reſpect, for three reaſons: the firſt, becauſe without the aſſiſtance of an additional aſſiſtance from him, they were not able to inveſt the place; ſecondly, becauſe he had a pawn in his hand, which was Mardyke, and which was to be given up to France, upon putting Dunkirk into his hands; thirdly, becauſe after taking the place, the preſervation of their own conqueſts, and even of their army, depended abſolutely upon the continuance of his friendſhip; ſo that if they had deceived him, not only the forces of France, and the fortune of the war would have been in the utmoſt danger, but the perſons alſo of the King and Cardinal, who were at that time in the army (204). We may add to all this, that there is not the leaſt notice of ſuch a tranſaction in Whitlocke, or in any of the Hiſtorians of thoſe times, and, which is the more remarkable, Whitlocke informs us, that Cromwell might have had the place betrayed to him by the Spaniſh Governor, which he refuſed (205) as leſs honourable than receiving it from France, a thing altogether incredible if he had entertained the leaſt ſuſpicion of their ſincerity. Add to all this, that from ſeveral of Lockhart's letters it appears, he never had the leaſt jealouſy of the Cardinal in that point (206), and that if there had been any ſuch tranſaction as this between the Protector and the French Ambaſſador, it could not have eſcaped the Miniſter's notice. In reference to Marſhal Crequi and Mr. Mancini, they came over in conſequence of Cromwell's ſending his ſon-in-law Fauconbridge to compliment the King and Cardinal, who carried letters from the Protector to both, and was received with unprecedented marks of reſpect. Beſides, the French Marſhal and the Cardinal's nephew had their audience of Cromwell before Dunkirk was taken, which within one hour after its being taken was put into the Engliſh hands. The truth of the matter was, what does infinitely more honour to Cromwell than this ſtory, that the French durſt not deceive him, nay, durſt not take any ſtep that could give him the leaſt jealouſy or ſuſpicion; for it was his fleet and army that enabled them to do all they did, and there is nothing more certain, than that he was the true author of all their future greatneſs, as well as of that lamentable depreſſion of the Spaniſh monarchy, which it could never recover, and which has been ſo fatal to the balance of power in Europe.

(203) Thurloe's State Papers, vol. vii. p. 60. 160. 169. 173.

(204) Quincy, tom. i. p. 238. Riencourt, tom. ii. p. 119. Buſſy, tom. ii. p. 129.

(205) Memorials of the Engliſh affairs, p. 674.

(206) Thurloe's State Papers, vol. vii. p. 174.

it in the notes [OO]. Being removed to London he became much worſe, grew firſt lethargick, then delirious; whence recovering a little, but not enough to give any diſtinct directions as to the management of public affairs; he died on Friday, September the 3d, 1658, aged ſomewhat more than fifty-nine years and four months. Some have intimated a ſuſpicion, that he died of poiſon (e); but the nature and length of his diſeaſe, together with his body's being publicly opened, ſeems to deſtroy all probability in ſuch a ſuppo-

(e) Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 674. Wood's Athen. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 424. Echard's Hiſt. of Eng. p. 734.

[OO] The reader will find it in the notes.] It is impoſſible to have a better account of his laſt ſickneſs, than that given by Dr. Bates, who was his Phyſician. After mentioning the circumſtance of making his private Will, as related in the text, he proceeds thus: 'Next morning early, when one of his Phyſicians came to viſit him, he aſked him (207), Why he looked ſo ſad?' and when he made anſwer, 'That ſo it became any one, who had the weighty care of his life 'and health upon him;' 'Ye Phyſicians, ſaid he, 'think I ſhall die.' Then the company being removed, holding his wife by the hand, he ſpoke to him to this purpoſe: 'I tell you I ſhall not die this 'bout, I am ſure on it.' And becauſe he obſerved him to look more attentively upon him at theſe words, 'Don't think, ſaid he, that I am mad; I ſpeak the 'words of truth, upon ſurer grounds than Galen or 'your Hippocrates furniſh you with. God Almighty 'himſelf hath given that anſwer, not to my prayers 'alone, but alſo to the prayers of thoſe who entertain a ſtricter commerce and greater intereſt with 'him. Go on chearfully, baniſhing all ſadneſs from 'your looks, and deal with me as you would do with 'a ſerving-man. Ye may have a ſkill in the nature 'of things, yet nature can do more than all Phyſicians put together, and God is far more above nature.' But being ordered to take his reſt, becauſe he had not ſlept the greateſt part of the night; as the Phyſician was coming out of the chamber, he accidentally met another, who had been a long time very familiar with him, to whom 'I am afraid, ſays he, 'our Patient will be light-headed.' 'Then, ſaid 'he, you are certainly a ſtranger in this houſe. 'Don't you know what was done laſt night? the 'Chaplains, and all who are dear to God, being diſperſed into ſeveral parts of the Palace, have prayed 'to God for his health, and all have brought this 'anſwer, He ſhall recover.' Nay, to this degree of madneſs they came, that a public faſt being for his ſake kept at Hampton-Court, they did not ſo much pray to God for his health, as thank him for the undoubted pledges of his recovery, and repeated the ſame at Whitehall. Theſe oracles of the ſaints were the cauſe that the Phyſicians ſpake not a word of his danger. In the mean time Cromwell leaving Hampton-Court, where hitherto he had lain ſick, is brought to London, and the Phyſicians meet at a conſultation in the Chamber of the afore-mentioned Doctor, who at that time was troubled with a grievous head-ach, and an impoſthume in his ear. But next morning early, another Phyſician coming, who had watched all night with the patient, and telling the reſt how ill he had been in the laſt fit, they all concluded that he could hardly out-live another. This ſentence of the Phyſicians awaking the Privy-Council, at an appointed time, they come to adviſe him that he would name his ſucceſſor. But when in a drouſy fit he anſwered out of purpoſe, they again aſked him if he did not name Richard his eldeſt ſon for his ſucceſſor, to which he anſwered, Yes. Then being aſked where his Will was which heretofore he had made concerning the heirs of the kingdom, he ſent to look for it in his cloſet and other places, but in vain, for he had either burnt it himſelf, or ſomebody elſe had ſtole it.' All this agrees very well with thoſe authentic accounts written by Lord Fauconbridge and Secretary Thurloe to Henry Cromwell in Ireland. In the letters of the laſt it is ſaid, that the Protector named his ſucceſſor in writing during the ſitting of the laſt Parliament; that he folded up the paper containing this nomination in the form of a letter directed to Thurloe; that when he was ſo ill at Hampton-Court he ſaid this letter lay upon the table in his ſtudy, and directed it ſhould be brought, but ſearch being made for it no ſuch paper could be found (208). It is farther ſaid, that he declared his ſon Richard his ſucceſſor, in the preſence of ſeveral of his Council; but this was generally doubted at the time, and is not confirmed in the Proclamation upon Richard's aſſuming the title of Protector (209). Before I cloſe this note it may not be amiſs to diſcuſs two points, that ſeem to have been but indifferently treated. The firſt is with reſpect to his pretending to have received a revelation that he ſhould not die at that time, not only at the beginning of his ſickneſs, but after he was brought to London, and given over by thoſe of the Faculty that were about him. The fact itſelf is very certain: General Fleetwood mentions it in a letter to Henry Cromwell, but recommends ſecrecy to him till the event ſhould direct him whether to bury it in ſilence or proclaim it to the world (210). One would think it hardly poſſible to aſſign a reaſon for this, excluding fanaticiſm or enthuſiaſm; and yet a foreign writer pretends to relate, upon good authority, ſomewhat on this head that deſerves notice. He obſerves, that the Phyſician who attended the Protector could not help expreſſing great aſtoniſhment at his boldneſs in this reſpect, to whom Cromwell, when they were alone, expreſſed himſelf to this effect: 'You are an honeſt man, Doctor, and 'have good ſenſe; I wonder that you do not ſee that 'I hazard nothing by my prediction; for if, as you 'ſay, I ſhould not ſurvive twenty-four hours, this 'rumour of my recovery which will be diffuſed 'through the whole nation, will keep the minds of 'men in ſuſpenſe, and prevent my enemies from 'coming to any certain reſolutions: on the other 'hand, if I ſhould recover, as you Phyſicians are not 'infallible, it will add new credit to my Government, and the bulk of this people will believe me 'a man ſent from God (211).' It may be objected, that it is very improbable Cromwell ſhould deal ſo very freely with any man, and indeed I lay no great ſtreſs upon this ſtory; but this may be obſerved by the way, that the only vanity he had was boaſting of his power to overreach, of which there is a remarkable inſtance in what he ſaid to Mr. Waller (212), and ſtill a ſtronger inſtance in a matter of greater notoriety; for to his firſt Parliament he magnified the Inſtrument of Government as the moſt compleat thing that could be, whereas, in his ſpeech to his laſt Parliament, he ran it down as a weak and inconſiſtent project, which he compared to a rotten plank (213). Beſides, had he lived, the Doctor durſt not have diſcloſed it in prejudice to his ſcheme of paſſing for a Prophet; and his divulging it after his death ſerved only to ſhew, that the Protector was in reality a conſummate Politician to the very laſt. The ſecond point to be explained is as to his being poiſoned, of which Mr. Wood tells us (214) there was a report that it was done by Dr. Bates; but he inſinuates that this was invented by the Doctor's friends, to apologize for his conduct in thoſe times, and that it might be no bar to his preferment; for he was Phyſician to King Charles I. to the Protector Oliver, and to King Charles II. Archdeacon Echard (215) ſets it down as a fact that he gave Cromwell a ſure doſe; but, in this reſpect, neither of theſe writers deſerve much credit, ſince it appears from Whitlocke (216), that there was a rumour of his being poiſoned at the very time of his death, conſequently it was not a tale invented after the Reſtoration; and that it was not a fact, appears from the ſenſe his family had of it, viſible in the Letters of Fleetwood, Fauconbridge, and Thurloe, and from the hiſtory of his diſtemper in thoſe letters, which appears to have been at firſt a ſlow fever, then a tertian, and at laſt a double tertian, which might well carry off a perſon of his years, without the aſſiſtance of a ſure doſe, and indeed in ſpite of the aſſiſtance of the Faculty: neither can it be believed, that ſuch a thing was practiſed upon ſuch a perſon by one, when, at the ſame time, he was attended by four other Phyſicians.

(207) Bates's Elenchus Motuum, P. ii. p. 234, 235, 236.

(208) Thurloe's State Papers, vol. vii. p. 364.

(209) See that proclamation in Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 674.

(210) Thurloe's State Papers, vol. vii. p. 355.

(211) Vie de Cromwell, par Raguenet, p. 395.

(212) See the life of Waller, prefixed to his poems.

(213) See that ſpeech in Whitlocke's Memorials.

(214) Athen. Oxon. vol. ii. p. 424.

(215) Hiſt. of England, p. 862.

(216) Memorials of Engliſh affairs, p. 674.

ſition. It appears to be more generally agreed, that there was ſomething very myſterious in the manner of diſpoſing of his body, which ſeveral authors, and thoſe too of oppoſite principles, very poſitively aſſert, was never carried to Weſtminſter-Abbey. It would undoubtedly be a very difficult thing to affirm which of the ſtories that are told about it is moſt probable; though there can be nothing clearer, than that none of them ought to be accounted certain (f) [PP]. A very pompous funeral was ordered at the public expence, and performed from Somerſet-Houſe, with a ſplendor not only equal but ſuperior to any that has been beſtowed upon crowned heads; though it is ſaid, that expence fell heavy upon his family, and upon ſome of the tradeſmen who furniſhed the ornaments of the ſolemnity, of which as there are many particular accounts common to be met with, there is no need that we ſhould inſiſt longer upon it here (g).

(f) See that point explained at large in the notes.

There were other, and thoſe ſtill more extraordinary, marks of public approbation beſtowed upon his memory, ſuch as the celebrated poems of Waller, Sprat, and Dryden, which are likely to laſt as long as our language (h); and which, though the authors lived all of them to change their ſentiments, will not fail of giving poſterity a very high idea of thoſe great actions, which were capable of exciting ſuch elevated deſcriptions by thoſe who were eye-witneſſes of them. Beſides theſe, there are multitudes of Latin verſes, ſome of them very fine, which ſpeak the ſame language with the ſame warmth (i). In his life-time his actions had been celebrated by two very learned foreigners, as well as by his own Secretary Milton (k), with which, very probably, he was not diſpleaſed. Yet, after all, Poets are not the moſt credible witneſſes; and we are, for very good reaſons, apt to ſuſpect whether truth be the ground-work of panegyricks. It was for this reaſon that Cromwell was mightily deſirous of engaging a very learned man to write his hiſtory, in which nevertheleſs he failed; for though conſiderable rewards were offered, that very able perſon declined the taſk (l). We have indeed various characters from various perſons, and thoſe too of various ſentiments; yet in moſt of theſe there ſeems to be a mixture either of flattery or of prejudice. Such as approved his actions, knew not where to ſtop their praiſes; and ſuch as deteſted his proceedings, gave a looſe to their reſentments, that, in ſome reſpects perhaps, carried them beyond the bounds of truth. Thoſe who hated his perſon went farther ſtill. Lord Hollis will hardly allow him either great or good qualities (m); and as for Lieutenant-General Ludlow (n), one principal deſign of his book is to repreſent Cromwell as the vileſt and wickedeſt of men. Againſt this laſt writer he has been very well defended by one, who, with great force of argument, and in very elegant language, has (g) Cowley's Works, vol. p. 631, &c.

(h) Echard's Hiſt. of Engl. p. 737. Heath's Chron. p. 410, 411. Perfect Politician, p. 266, 267.

(i) See theſe and others all collected in the 3d vol. of State-poems.

(k) See all theſe panegyricks collected and tranſlated by the Rev. Mr. Francis Peck, in his Memoirs of the life and actions of O. Cromwell, Lond. 1740, 4*to*.

(l) Wood's Athen. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 485.

(m) See the inſtances already given from Hollis's Memoirs.

(n) Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. ii. p. 480.

[PP] Than that none of them ought to be accounted certain.] In the firſt place it is proper to produce an authentic proof of the only fact that is aſſerted in the text, that his body was really buried before his pompous funeral. Dr. Bates gives us this account in the following words (217): 'His body being opened; in 'the animal parts, the veſſels of the brain ſeemed to 'be over-charged; in the vitals, the lungs a little in'flamed; but, in the natural, the ſource of the di'ſtemper appeared, the ſpleen, though ſound to the 'eye, being within filled with matter like to the lees 'of oil. Nor was that incongruous to the diſeaſe that 'for a long time he had been ſubject unto, ſince, for 'at leaſt thirty years, he had at times heavily com'plained of hypochondriacal indiſpoſitions. Though 'his bowels were taken out, and his body filled with 'ſpices, wrapped in a four-fold ſear-cloth, but put firſt 'into a coffin of lead and then into a wooden one, yet 'it purged and wrought through all, ſo that there was 'a neceſſity of interring it before the ſolemnity of his 'funeral.' Echard aſſerts preciſely the ſame thing, and, in all probability, from the ſame authority. We have another ſtory, ſaid to be founded on the teſtimony of Mr. Barkſtead, ſon to the famous Barkſtead, who was Lieutenant of the Tower in Cromwell's lifetime, to this effect (218): 'That Barkſtead, the fa'ther, among other confidents of Cromwell's, deſiring 'in his illneſs to know where he would be buried, the 'Protector anſwered, where he had obtained the 'greateſt victory and glory, and as nigh the ſpot as 'could be gueſſed where the heat of the action was, 'viz. in the field at Naſeby in Northamptonſhire: 'which accordingly was thus performed. At mid'night, ſoon after his death, the body, being firſt 'embalmed and wrapped in a leaden coffin, was in a 'hearſe conveyed to the ſaid field, Mr. Barkſtead 'himſelf attending, by order of his father, cloſe to 'the hearſe. Being come to the field, they found 'about the midſt of it a grave dug about nine feet 'deep, with the green ſod carefully laid on one ſide, 'and the mould on the other, in which the coffin 'being put, the grave was inſtantly filled up, and the 'green ſod laid exactly flat upon it, care being taken 'that the ſurplus ſhould be clear removed. Soon 'after, the like care was taken that the field ſhould 'be entirely ploughed up, and it was ſown three or 'four years ſucceſſively with corn.' We have a very different account from Mr. Oldmixon, who aſſures us that he had it from a gentlewoman who attended the Protector in his laſt ſickneſs (219): 'She told me, 'ſays he, that the day after Cromwell's death, it was 'conſulted how to diſpoſe of his corpſe; they could 'not pretend to keep it for the pomp of a public 'burial. Amongſt other propoſals this was one, 'that, conſidering the malice, rage, and cruelty of 'the Cavaliers, it was moſt certain, they, who never 'ſpared either living or dead, in the luſt of their re'venge, would inſult the body of this their moſt 'dreadful enemy, if ever it was in their power; and, 'to prevent its falling into ſuch barbarous hands, it 'was reſolved to wrap it up in lead, to put it aboard 'a barge, and to ſink it in the deepeſt part of the 'Thames, which was done the night following, two 'of his near relations, with ſome truſty ſoldiers, un'dertaking to do it.' That the Protector's body was buried before the public and pompous ceremony of the funeral ſeems to be out of all doubt; but that there was a body interred at Weſtminſter, and that this body was really the Protector's body, ſeems to be very clear, from the following account of what paſſed upon the order to diſ-inter him after the Reſtoration (220). 'In the middle iſle of Henry VIIth's chapel, ſays my 'authority, at the eaſt end, in a vault, was found his 'corps. In the inſide of whoſe coffin, and upon the 'breaſt of the corps, was laid a copper-plate finely gilt, 'incloſed in a thin caſe of lead; on the one ſide 'whereof were engraved the arms of England, im'paled with the arms of Oliver; and, on the reverſe, 'this following legenda: Oliverius Protector Reipub'licæ Angliæ, Scotiæ, & Hiberniæ, natus 25 April, '1599, inauguratus 16 Decembris 1553, Mortuus '3 Septembris ann. 1658. Hic ſitus eſt. Mr. Gifford 'of Colcheſter, who married the Serjeant's daughter '(who by order of the Houſe took up the body) had, 'in 1719, the plate.'

(217) Bates's Elenchus Motuum, P. ii. p. 236.

(218) Compleat Hiſt. of England, vol. iii. p. 228. in the notes.

(219) Hiſtory of the Stuarts, vol. i. p. 426.

(220) Compleat Hiſt. vol. iii. p. 229.

ſhewn

ſhewn, that Cromwell had juſt as much right to erect a new Monarchy, as the long Parliament had to eſtabliſh a new Commonwealth upon the ruins of our old Conſtitution (o). Another writer has laboured to vindicate the long Parliament, by ſhewing that they had the welfare and reputation of their country more at heart than Cromwell (p). The learned and ingenious Abraham Cowley has excelled all others, as well in reſpect to the matter as the manner of repreſenting his actions and adminiſtration in the different lights of praiſe and cenſure, ſo that his performance may be juſtly eſteemed the moſt perfect of any, as it is indeed, beyond compariſon, the moſt beautiful of all that have been written upon this ſubject (q). It is ſaid, that Cardinal Mazarine ſtiled him a fortunate madman (r). Father Orleans diſlikes that character, and would ſubſtitute in its ſtead that of a judicious villain. The noble Hiſtorian, with better ſenſe and better language, ſtiles him, a brave wicked man (s). A certain writer, very converſant in the hiſtory of thoſe times, would perſwade us, that a foreign author has given us the juſteſt idea of Cromwell in theſe few words: He was a Tyrant without vices, and a Prince without virtues (t). This, perhaps, is a character not eaſy to be underſtood. A certain Prelate of our own nation, has a very judicious reflection upon his death: he ſays, His life and his arts were exhauſted together, and that, if he had ſurvived longer, he would have ſcarcely been able to preſerve his power (u). But it is not in general characters, or from the many lives that have been written of Oliver Cromwell, that we may hope to find what it imports us moſt to know, with reſpect either to his public or to his private character; and there is ſtill wanting, though there ſeems to be now ſufficient materials, a candid, circumſtantial, and ſenſible account of both. As to the firſt, the world may juſtly expect to be ſatisfied how his domeſtic adminiſtration was conducted, what meaſures he purſued for the general benefit and advantage of the people, what ſuperior and extraordinary bleſſings he procured, what oppreſſions he removed, what grievances he detected and took away, what reſpect he paid to the laws, and with what revenue he was pleaſed to be contented. Theſe are things that would give us a true and rational notion of his title to fame, conſidered as the poſſeſſor of ſupreme power, by what means ſoever attained, or held by whatever title [22]. As to (o) Modeſt Vindication of O. Cromwell.

(p) The World's Miſtake in O. Cromwell.

(q) Cowley's Works, vol. ii. p. 631, &c.

(r) Father Orleans's Revolutions of England, p. 185.

(s) Clarendon's Hiſt. Rebellion, p. 697.

(t) Vie de Cromwell, par Gregorie Leti, vol. ii. p. 452, 453.

(u) Burnet's Hiſt. of his own times, vol. i. p. 70.

[22] Or held by whatever title.] It has been ſaid, by ſuch as were deſirous of raiſing the character of Cromwell, that the nation was much benefited by his Government; that there was nothing of pomp or needleſs magnificence in his dreſs, his equipage, his houſhold, or in his way of living (221); that his ears were open to complaints and to informations of every kind; that he was familiar with his old friends, and with the officers and ſoldiers of the army, after his advancement to the ſupreme power, which ſhewed that he had not either pride or vanity (222); that he ſhewed much juſtice in all private affairs, adminiſtered thoſe of the public with frugality, and paid both his civil and military officers punctually (223); that he kept up a great face of religion in his own Court, and through the nation; that he always profeſſed himſelf for liberty of conſcience, and ſhewed a very high zeal for the Proteſtant religion (224); that Weſtminſter-hall was never filled with Judges of greater learning and worth, than in his time (225); that his army obſerved the ſtricteſt diſcipline, and were not troubleſome in their quarters (226); that he was beneficent to learned men; that trade flouriſhed in his time (227); and that in ſpite of the badneſs of his title to, and the means by which he acquired power, he was univerſally reſpected at home and abroad (228). Now there are alſo ſome few particulars that deſerve notice on the other ſide. It is obſerved that Cromwell's motion to the ſupreme power was progreſſive, and that his ſtate augmented as it went: he took poſſeſſion of the King's lodgings at Whitehall, when he was only General; he prevented ſeveral Palaces from being ſold while a private man, that he might poſſeſs them in a princely character (229); he gradually increaſed his great officers, to the very end of his life; and, by a ſtroke of prerogative for which none of our Kings ſet him a precedent, would have made a houſe full of new Peers at once (230). Our former Kings ſwore to maintain the laws and liberties of their people, the meaning of which was very well known and aſcertained; but Cromwell's Inſtrument of Government was of his own making, ſo that his oath to maintain it was only ſwearing he would govern by his own will (231). Yet this was not kept, for the humble Petition and Advice was a new model of Government, which, as perfect as it was, needed a Supplement, and had it; ſo that a Government frequently changed, and changed by the will of him who adminiſtered it, was moſt certainly an arbitrary Government, if there ever was one in the world (232). He might be familiar with his creatures, and it was neceſſary he ſhould be ſo with his officers; yet not only Hollis and Ludlow, but even Whitlocke (233) ſays, he took upon him great ſtate; and Sir Philip Warwick (234), without intending him any hurt, confirms the ſame thing. There was a ſtrange kind of ſplendor in his time at Whitehall; for ſometimes his Court wore an air of ſtately ſeverity, at other times he would unbend himſelf and drink freely, though not to exceſs, that he might have an opportunity of ſounding then mens thoughts, in their unguarded moments, of fiſhing for ſecrets in a free converſation, and of raviſhing opinions by unexpected queſtions, for all which he was admirably qualified by nature, having two qualities that ſeldom meet in the ſame perſon, a memory retentive as marble, and a judgment that pierced like lightning (235). Sometimes, even in the midſt of ſerious conſultations, he ſtarted into buffoonry; ſometimes, the feaſts that were prepared for perſons of the firſt diſtinction, were, by a ſignal of drums and trumpets, made the prey of his Guards (236); there was a kind of madneſs in his mirth, as well as of humour in his gravity, and much of deſign in all. His juſtice, when not at his own expence, was his intereſt; but the caſes of Lilburn, Coney, and Sir Henry Vane, afford no great proofs of his ſacrificing intereſt to juſtice when he could not comply with both (237). As to frugality, there are ſome facts that will not allow us to believe their aſſertions. When he turned out the Long Parliament there were five hundred thouſand pounds in their coffers, the value of ſeven hundred thouſand pounds in their magazines, the army three or four months pay in advance, the fleet in an excellent condition, and nine hunderd thouſand pounds per annum had been refuſed for the cuſtoms and exciſe: when he died, the ſtate was much in debt; while he lived, it was always embarraſſed; his army was often in arrear, and the fleet in great decay (238). When he firſt ſeized the government he levied money by his own authority; afterwards very large ſums were given by aſſemblies that had no title to be called Parliaments; yet all could not ſuffice, even the addition of the vaſt ſums raiſed by decimating the Cavaliers; which was a di-

(221) Hiſtory and Policy reviewed, p. 112, 113.

(222) See Whitlocke, Coke, and Heath in his Flagellum.

(223) Unparalleled Monarch, p. 111.

(224) Burnet's Hiſt. of his own times, vol. i. p. 77.

(225) Unparalleled Monarch, p. 95.

(226) Winſtanley's true Character of Cromwell, p. 2.

(227) Oldmixon's Hiſt. of the Stuarts, vol. i. p. 410.

(228) Unparalleled Monarch, p. 19.

(229) Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. ii. p. 479.

(230) See the fourth part of the Hiſt. of Independency, p. 95.

(231) Coke's Detection, vol. ii. p. 65.

(232) Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. ii. p. 591, 592, 593.

(233) Memorials of Engliſh Affairs, p. 661, 662.

(234) Warwick's Memoirs, p. 248.

(235) Flagellum, or the life of O. Cromwell, p. 158, 159. True Character of O. Cromwell.

(236) Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. i. p. 240.

(237) Clarendon's Hiſt. Rebellion, p. 697. The World's Miſtake in O. Cromwell.

(238) Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. ii. p. 488. Coke's Detection, vol. ii. p. 65, 66, 67.

to foreign affairs likewiſe, though very much has been ſaid about them, we are nevertheleſs greatly in the dark. It is to be examined, not only whether the Britiſh nation was reſpected and revered by her neighbours, but whether her intereſts were thoroughly underſtood, and ſteadily proſecuted. We ought to know what meaſures were taken to protect, to improve, and to extend our commerce. We ought to be ſatisfied whether ſhe retained that weight, as well as that rank, which ſhe held before amongſt the powers of Europe, and whether more reſpect was not had to the deference paid to the Government, than to the advantages yielded to the Nation. We ſhould be particularly careful to learn whether a due attention was preſerved to the balance of power, and whether the unqueſtionable rights of the Engliſh flag were maintained in as high and ample a manner as they might have been; and, in ſhort, whether, without the bounds of our own dominions, the nation was the better or the worſe for his directing her affairs [RR]. Laſtly, as to his rect breach of the public faith, ſo much the more groſs, as he valued himſelf upon obliging the Parliament to paſs the Ordinance of Oblivion, and, when they came into power again, the Long Parliament declared their abhorrence of it (239). It is not eaſy to know what is meant by the face of religion; but this is certain, that religion never wore ſo many faces as in his time, nor was he pleaſed to diſcover which face he liked beſt. The Preſbyterians he hated, the Church of England he perſecuted, againſt the Papiſts he made laws, but the Sectaries he indulged; yet ſome of the Preſbyterian Divines he courted, affected kindneſs to a few of the Miniſters of the Church of England (240), and entered into ſome very deep intrigues with the Papiſts; which made Sir Kenelm Digby his favourite, Father White write in defence of his Government, and, which was more, of his conduct; and the Popiſh Primate of Ireland, Reily, who boaſted that he hated King Charles II. the two Dukes his brothers, and the Duke of Ormond, ſent precepts through all his province, under his ſeal, to pray for the health, eſtabliſhment, and proſperity, of the Protector Cromwell and his Government (241). He is charged with exciting a great charitable collection for the diſtreſſed Proteſtants abroad, ſending them a part, and making free with the reſt (242). As for the Judges in Weſtminſter-hall, he differed with St. John; he was ſometimes out of humour with Hale; he ſet up High Courts of Juſtice, unknown to the law, and put Dr. Hewett to death for not pleading before one of them, though he offered to plead, if any one that ſat there and was a Lawyer, would give it under his hand, that it was a legal juriſdiction (243); and Whitlocke himſelf owns, that though he was named in the Commiſſion he would never ſit, becauſe he knew it was not (244). His Majors-General, while they acted, ſuperſeded all law; and the Protector himſelf derided Magna Charta, ſo much reſpected by our Kings (245). The diſcipline of his army was neceſſary to his own ſecurity, and he taxed this nation to maintain twenty thouſand foot and ten thouſand horſe; whereas the King that he brought to the block had not a Troop of Guards (246). Yet, after all, he had not much to boaſt in this reſpect, if we may credit Mr. Coke (247), whoſe words are theſe: 'he had nothing to truſt to 'but a mercenary army, which he could not pay, 'and above half of thoſe would have been content to 'have cut his throat.' He was kind to ſome learned men indeed: Milton and Marvell were his Secretaries, and though he baniſhed Biddle the Socinian, he allowed him a penſion (248); would have hired Meric Caſaubon to have written his Hiſtory (249); and would have entertained Thomas Hobbes in his ſervice for writing the Leviathan, in which power is made the ſource of right and the baſis of religion (250). He gave the body of Archbiſhop Uſher a public funeral in Weſtminſter-abbey; yet he paid but half the expence, and the other half proved a heavy burthen upon that Prelate's poor family (251). As to the reverence of the nation, a certain writer, ſpeaking of the laſt days of his life, deſcribes his ſituation thus (252): 'His means would not pay for the intelligence he 'was forced to buy at home and abroad, to diſcover 'the practices which were every day hatching againſt 'him; ſo as he had no ſecurity but in the general 'fear, which all the factions as well as he had, that 'their diſcords might give an occaſion of reſtoring 'the King, to the ruin of them all.' Biſhop Burnet (253) alſo confirms this, as we have hinted in the text, and the reader will obſerve, that through this whole note there is nothing delivered but from authorities; and though it is a long one, much more is omitted than inſerted. Thoſe who would ſee things as they were, will truſt to ſuch accounts as are ſupported by facts, and not to florid characters, which are frequently but beautiful fictions.

[RR] For his directing her affairs.] All who are tolerably verſed in the hiſtory of thoſe times know, that ſuch as labour to magnify the Protector's Government, inſiſt principally upon the advantages he gained over foreign ſtates, and the terror which he imprinted throughout all Europe, of the Engliſh fleets and forces. He is repreſented as the conqueror of the Dutch, as the great author of their ſubmiſſion to, and acquieſcing in, an inferior character of maritime power. With reſpect to this nation, he is ſaid to have atchieved what Queen Elizabeth had left imperfect, and what the two laſt Kings had meditated indeed, but never could bring about. He is reported to have retrieved the honour of the nation with reſpect to the buſineſs of Amboyna; and, in ſhort, to have given, or rather, to have preſcribed, a peace to the Dutch upon his own terms (254). In reference to the Mediterranean, he is called the ſcourge of the pyratical ſtates, whom he did not barely reduce to reaſon, but taught humility (255). The Portugueſe not only ſought his friendſhip of their own accord, but beſought it upon ſuch conditions as he ſhould be pleaſed to grant (256). Spain too courted his alliance, and would have purchaſed it at a very high price, if his amity might have been ſet to ſale: but his hatred to a power that durſt not give up the Inquiſition, his ſenſe of the Merchants wrongs, and innate abhorrence of a bigotted Popiſh people, withheld him from cloſing with their propoſitions, and induced him to ſignalize his power by reducing them to the loweſt diſtreſs, and that by entering into a treaty and alliance with France (257). This alliance was at the humble and earneſt ſuit of that power, willing to make any conceſſions which might procure his good-will, and ready to ſubſcribe ſuch propoſitions as he judged reaſonable for the grounds of their new friendſhip (258). By this means it is ſaid he obtained a better treaty of commerce than had been ſettled with that nation in former times: by this he ſignalized his credit with the firſt power in Europe, and was treated with deference, not to ſay ſubmiſſion, by that Crown that to others was often wanting in reſpect (259). By this means he reached over to, and gained footing upon, the Continent, repaired to England the loſs of Calais, and laid a foundation for deſigns wonderfully great in themſelves, which he did not live to execute (260). But, as if bringing the Dutch to ſubmit, giving law in the Mediterranean, and being courted by France, was not ſufficient, he made himſelf alſo the umpire of the North, and ſecured, in the higheſt degree, the attachment of the Swediſh Monarch, who owed to his friendſhip his making ſo formidable an appearance, as hardly yielded to that of his glorious predeceſſor Guſtavus Adolphus, the ſupport of the Proteſtant religion, and the ſcourge of the Houſe of Auſtria (261). Theſe, ſay they, were the great acts of Cromwell, by which he made himſelf, and the nation he ruled, awful in the eyes of their neighbours, ſecured

(239) The World's Miſtake in O. Cromwell.

(240) Dr. Parr's life of Archbiſhop Uſher, p. 75, 76.

(241) Letter from a true and lawful Member of Parliament, p. 58.

(242) Flagellum, or the life of Cromwell, p. 173.

(243) Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. ii. p. 606. Mr. Emlyn's Preface to Hale's Hiſt. of the Pleas of the Crown.

(244) Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 673.

(245) Clarendon's Hiſt. of the Rebellion, p. 697.

(246) Coke's Detection, vol. ii. p. 65. The World's Miſtake in O. Cromwell.

(247) Coke's Detection, vol. ii. p. 67.

(248) Life of Mr. Thomas Firmin, Lond. 1698, 8vo. p. 10.

(249) Wood's Athen. Oxon. vol. ii. col. 485.

(250) The Leviathan heretical, Oxford, 1683, 12mo. p. 137.

(251) Dr. Parr's life of Archbiſhop Uſher, p. 78.

(252) Coke's Detection, vol. ii. p. 67. Warwick's Memoirs, p. 385.

(253) Burnet's Hiſt. of his own times, p. 70.

(254) Life of O. Cromwell, Lord Protector, p. 265.

(255) Neal's Hiſt. of the Puritans, vol. iv. p. 172.

(256) See the three panegyricks publiſhed by Peck.

(257) See Secretary Thurloe's account of the Protector's negotiations.

(258) See the account before cited, as alſo Milton, Welwood, and Oldmixon.

(259) Welwood's Memoirs, p. 130.

(260) Sir William Temple's Works, vol. i. p. 356.

(261) Milton's Works, vol. ii. p. 211, 218, 226.

his private life, it certainly merits our notice in all its ſeveral branches and relations, ſince it is thence only that we can be inſtructed to decide, with probability, as to the principles even of his public actions; for men of different diſpoſitions, act in the ſame manner, upon certain occaſions, from very different motives; and of theſe there is no judging, but from an acquaintance with their tempers; which can be no other way ſo well known, as from the relation of their private and domeſtic behaviour. Beſides, there is a natural curioſity to enter, as it were, into the privacies of extraordinary perſons; which is a kind of ſlipping behind the ſcenes, and taking a more nice and certain view of their conduct, by getting on the wrong ſide of the theatre. Men, called into high ſpheres of life, naturally become actors, and wear the robe and buſkin thence forward in public, ſo that we can judge but little of their real diſpoſition from their actions, unleſs we obtain a kind of key from the knowledge of their private life; ſo that circumſtances which, with reſpect to others, would be frivolous and impertinent in regard to them, are very uſeful ed them the full enjoyment of all that they could juſtly claim, and gave them a great facility in acquiring whatever more they wiſhed. Such, if we look into certain books, were the deeds, and ſuch the honours due to the Protector. But, on the other hand, it is obſervable, that theſe high eulogies were very boldly queſtioned in his own times, and that too not by envious declaimers, who meant to ſhew their eloquence in ſatire, or their ſkill in cavilling, but by men of the firſt rank, who undertook to contradict the facts, and to ſhew that the whole ſcheme of his foreign politics was either falſe in its principles, or narrow in its foundation. They bid us remember it was the long Parliament, not he, that beat the Dutch; and though we ſhould give no credit to what has been inſinuated, that he was encouraged by them to revolt from and turn out his maſters, yet moſt evident it is, that he relaxed in his demands, and made a peace upon lower terms, not that had been demanded only by, but had been ſubmitted to in reſpect to, the Parliament. He remitted the three hundred thouſand pounds, which the Dutch had offered that Aſſembly for the damages ſuſtained during the war; he did not inſiſt upon an annual revenue for the liberty of fiſhing in our ſeas; he inſiſted upon no other proof of our ſovereignty at ſea than the ceremony of the flag; and even in reſpect to the buſineſs of Amboyna, the ſatisfaction obtained was not ſubſtance but ſhew; for, though ſtrongly worded in the treaty, yet being referred to Commiſſioners, it came to nothing, any more than the reſtitution of the Iſland of Poleron, which was ſtipulated indeed, but never complied with (262). Not that Cromwell wanted force ſufficient to have compelled what he pleaſed; but the expulſion of the King out of the dominions of the State, and the excluſion of the Prince of Orange from the dignities due to his family; the conſenting to which was a violation of the Dutch Conſtitution, were, though private advantages only, accepted as equivalents for the benefits that might have been obtained for the nation (263). What there was therefore of honour in the Dutch peace, belonged of right to the Parliament, under whoſe auſpice all the victories, ſave one gained by Monk, were obtained that procured it; and moſt of thoſe great points they inſiſted upon had been claimed by King Charles and King James, as one of their own advocates acknowledges, in a piece dedicated to themſelves (264). With all the reſt of Europe the Engliſh Commonwealth was at peace: the King of Portugal's addreſſes were in conſequence of the Parliament's reſenting his protection of Prince Rupert, and, beſides, in the ſituation of that Crown, it was no wonder they made any advances to the firſt maritime power in Europe (265). The glory of the Engliſh flag in the Mediterranean has been juſtly aſcribed to Blake, who was truly an honour to his country, but not mighty well ſatisfied with Cromwell's Government any more than Monk was with the Dutch Treaty, which he was not afraid to declare was a baſe piece of treachery (266). In his quarrel with Spain, he acted as imprudently as unjuſtly; for the Spaniards had courted the Commonwealth earlier than any other power in Europe, and, with reſpect to Cromwell, had declared their willingneſs to guaranty his own and his ſucceſſors government, as profeſſing an implacable averſion to the Royal Family, and a reſolution to exclude that line from the Throne, from motives of intereſt (267). They were willing to have carried on a war againſt France in conjunction with Cromwell, upon very eaſy terms, or would have cloſed with him without inſiſting upon his taking part in that war at all. The Protector entertained a treaty which he never deſigned ſhould come to any thing, while he provided for a war, which, from a proſpect of advantage, he had been bent upon from the beginning, and began without publiſhing any declaration (268); all this in the very teeth of the Engliſh intereſt, at that time in the ſole poſſeſſion of the whole Spaniſh trade, which was the great ſource of our riches (269). It was this that induced him to enter into a league with France; and the reaſon that led him to prefer the friendſhip of that power was, the excluding the Royal Family out of it's dominions, which, joined to the excluſion already obtained out of the territories of the States, and his project of getting the ports in the Spaniſh Low-Countries into his own hands, ſhews what was the ruling maxim in his politics; which is very ingeniouſly acknowledged, and all the particulars clearly ſet forth, in a paper of Thurloe's (270). As to his management in the North, it was of a piece with the reſt; that is, he did all that lay in his power to deſtroy the balance (271), by making the King of Sweden maſter of Denmark and the North, which had been effected, if it had not been for the Dutch, who underſtood and purſued their own intereſts better. For, had his ſcheme been brought about, he muſt have laid himſelf at the mercy of Sweden and France, who, being old allies, would have had it in their power to give law to all Europe (272). This being ſo viſibly the aim of France, it ſhews plainly why Cardinal Mazarine paid ſuch exceſſive court to Cromwell, and perhaps it may give ſome light, why he ſtiled him "a fortunate madman;" fortunate, becauſe, by the bravery of Engliſh ſeamen and ſoldiers, he obtained all he ſought; and madman, becauſe, to the temporary ſecurity of his own eſtabliſhment (273), he ſacrificed the intereſts of his country, the balance of power, and the tranquility of Europe, which former Kings had always maintained; and the very laſt King, Charles the Firſt, had prevented the French and Dutch from diſpoſſeſſing the Spaniards of the Low-Countries, and dividing them between them (274); which plan Cromwell not only accepted but executed. What influence theſe errors in policy had upon the ſtate of this nation, at home and abroad, may be ſhewn from facts that admit of no diſpute; ſuch as the ſinking of our coinage (275), the declenſion of the city of London in the number of its inhabitants (276), the loſs of countries in America, where the Dutch were permitted to keep the New Netherlands, now ſtiled New York and the Jerſeys, though our right to them was inconteſtible (277); from the decay of the navy, and from the loſs of a great part of the Spaniſh trade; to which may be added, the laying the foundation of all the ſubſequent wars for reducing the exorbitant growth of France, which he aſſiſted, and which without his aſſiſtance, and his weakening the Spaniſh monarchy as he did, could not have been attained (278). Theſe are to be conſidered as brief heads for that examination, the neceſſity of which is ſuggeſted in the text, in order to the forming a true and impartial judgment of his adminiſtration as to foreign affairs.

(262) Coke's Detection, vol. ii. p. 36, 47.

(263) Warwick's Memoirs p. 372.

(264) See this dedication prefixed by Marchmont Needham to his tranſlation of Selden's Mare Clauſum.

(265) Milton's Works, vol. ii. p. 193.

(266) Dr. Gumble's Life of Monk, p. 74.

(267) See Thurloe's account of the Protector's negotiations.

(268) Coke's Detection of the four laſt reigns, vol. ii. p. 51, 52, 53.

(269) Thurloe's State Papers, vol. vii. p. 615, 616.

(270) Inſerted in the firſt vol. of his State Papers, p. 759.

(271) Sir Philip Warwick's Memoirs, p. 373.

(272) The World's Miſtake in O. Cromwell.

(273) Rymer's Fœdera, tom. xx. p. 793.

(274) Sir Philip Warwick's Memoirs, p. 53, 54.

(275) Happy future State of England, p. 78.

(276) See the Philoſophical Tranſactions.

(277) Britiſh Empire in America, vol. i. p. 236–238.

(278) The World's Miſtake in O. Cromwell.

as well as entertaining [SS]. The Protector Oliver Cromwell had many children, of whom ſix ſurvived to be men and women, viz. two ſons and four daughters. 1. Richard. Cromwell

